If there was one thing that the late President valued less than any other, it was dress. This indifference to the fine arts of the tailor, as might have been expected, led to a great many amusing blunders, on the part of his subordinates. On the day after the battle of Monterey, the General was in company with two other officers, in undress, "talking over matters" in the dining room of a cafe. The General was dressed in a white jacket, straw hat and nankeen continuations. The party had been in close conversation but a few minutes, when a young Lieutenant, fresh from Iowa, made his appearance. It was his first day in camp, having arrived that morning by the way of an up train from the Rio Grande. He was, of course, unacquainted with any body. After looking about him for a few minutes, he took his seat at a marble-topped table, and commenced "ordering up."

"I say, shorty, pass the bill of fare."

This was addressed to the General. "Humor the joke, General," whispered one of the officers, "he evidently takes you for the waiter."

"We'll see!" said the General. "What do you want?" he inquired.

"A mutton chop and cup of coffee, and suddenly too," responded the Iowa officer.

"No, sir!" energetically and quite indignantly responded the subaltern, "that won't do. If I wanted James to get my dinner, I would have given my orders to James. I went you, old fellow," he continued, rather facetiously, "to attend to the matter. It would do me good to see a man of your build fly around. Ha! ha!"

"But I am engaged, sir, and cannot possibly attend to you. James must wait upon you, or you must wait upon yourself," replied the General.

"Well, let James go," the subaltern replied. "Queer people, these," he muttered half audibly, "two big lubbers to get one mutton chop! No wonder they cannot resist invasion."

James attended to the order. The Lieutenant partook of his mutton chop and coffee: paid his bill, picked his teeth, adjusted his cap, and sauntered forth to take a look at things. The first person he met on reaching the Plaza, was "shorty" the waiter, arm-in-arm with Gen. Quitman and Col. Duncan.

"Well, if this ain't rushing things, you may shoot me!" exclaimed the surprised subaltern. "A getter-up of fried potatoes supported by a live General and a Colonel of Artillery. I wonder who the devil he is, and were he got his impudence. "My friend," he continued, accosting another officer, "can you tell me who that little old fellow with a white jacket is, and what he does for a living?"

"What! the one supported by Gen. Quitman?"

"Yes."

GEORGE COLMAN.—Old George Colman, on objecting to write in a lady's album, was asked why he had given up poetry. He opened the page and wrote—

"The muse and I, ere youth and fancy fled,
Sat up together many a night, no doubt;
The reason is, my fire is going out."

FIGURATIVELY SPEAKING.—Brown sent Smith a present of a pair of ducks, nicely finished in oil, and accompanied the gift with this note:

"Dear Smith: I send you a present of game, which please accept; a pair of ducks, 'real canvas backs.' Yours, BROWN."

"Dear Brown: Thank you for your ducks. I send you a nice dish, a 'plate of turtle.' Please accept, Yours, S."

TENDER SOLICITUDE.—Oh! Charles, dear, they tell me you are ordered off to the Theatre of War. I beg of you, therfore, dear, as you love me, dear, to bear in mind one thing—and that is, above all, not to forget to take your opera glass with you, for I know myself how extremely inconvenient it is to go to the Theatre without it. (Young lady's farewell letter.) [Punch.

If your wife runs away, don't you run after her, for if you do there will be two fools in the chase. When Mrs. Brown has got so far as to escape from you "on the sly," she can no longer be a useful institution, the sooner Mr Brown congratulates himself on his fortunate riddance the more sensible he will be.

CHERRY PECTORAL
FOR THE CURE OF
COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a Remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

Office of Transportation, Laurens R. R.,
August 4, 1853.

J. O. ARZA—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your Cherry Pectoral in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect,
J. D. POWELL, Capt. Trans., L. R. R.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Since your medicine has became known here, it has a greater demand than any cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefit it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours, with respect, JOHN C. WHITLOCK.

P. S. Almost any number of certificates can be sent you, if you wish it.

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

H. J. HARRIGAN, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

Marion Female Seminary,

MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALA.

THE EXERCISES of this institution will be resumed on Monday, the 2d day of October, under the charge of the Rev. Jas. K. Armstrong, as Principal, assisted by nine Professors, Teachers and Officers.

It has just closed its present session with one hundred and thirty-three students, seventy-seven of which number were boarders. There is but one session of nine and a half months.

Pupils can enter at any time during the session, chargeable from the beginning of the month in which they commence, to the close of the session. No deduction will be made but at the discretion of the Principal.

The Principal, with his family, resides in the building. The female teachers also reside in the Seminary. Boarders in the institution are under the control of the Principal at all times. A Steward, in the employment of the Principal, of experience, urbanity of manners, and faithfulness to his duties, a Matron who constantly and kindly ministers to the private wants of young ladies, and especially in sickness, a Governess who directs them in their exercises and amusements, superintends the order of their private apartments, instructs them in certain domestic duties, and guards their private, personal habits, manners and morals, always aided by the presence and active cooperation of the female teachers. The Principal and his lady secure to those committed to their charge every necessary, and proper comfort and kindness. Here they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations respecting neatness, order, punctuality and economy. They have regular hours for study and recreation, for rising and retiring, for eating, domestic duties, and social enjoyment among themselves.

The institution is furnished with a new and superior apparatus in the departments of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. There is also a large collection of Maps, Charts, Plates, Diagrams, Globes, etc., for simplifying the principles of Geography, Physiology and Astronomy.

In the department of Drawing, Painting and Embroidery there is a fine collection of Drawing Cards, Engravings, Pictures, Paintings, Patterns, and every other convenience important in the prosecution of these departments.

There is in connection with the institution a Library of more than one thousand volumes, and a Cabinet of several hundred specimens.

The institution is furnished with six Pianos, five Guitars, and one Harp.

MUSIC.—The Professor at the head of this department is equal to any in the country. He is a superior vocalist, a fine performer on the Piano, Harp, Guitar, Violin, Violoncello, etc. He has enjoyed ten years experience as a teacher of music in the best institutions in the Union, is profoundly versed in the principles of harmony, and is a real amateur of the sublime science to which he has devoted himself.

LOCATION.—Its salubrity, intelligence, morality and public spirit are unsurpassed.

PERMANENCY.—Parents may send their daughters here with confidence in their completing their education under the same course of instruction and system of discipline. Every thing conspires to make the permanency of the Principal a matter of duty, pleasure and interest.

TEACHERS.—The Principal, himself a native of Alabama, surrounds himself with a corps of teachers of known efficiency and tried success, nearly all of whom have been reared in the South, thus ensuring a better acquaintance with Southern peculiarities and sympathy with Southern views and interests. Thoroughness is our motto in teaching. We ascribe the true importance to the harmonious development of the physical, intellectual and moral nature.

Reports are sent to patrons once every two months, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and conduct of the pupil in our system of merits and demerits scholarship and conduct are connected.

The Principal regards it as his most important duty to attend to the moral habits of his pupils and to imbuing their minds with proper religious principles.

The facilities for acquiring the French and other modern languages are superior.

There are daily exercises in Orthography, Reading and Writing. Great attention is bestowed on letter-writing and composition.

Lectures are delivered weekly to the junior and senior classes on various subjects of Science and Literature, on which they take notes and are subsequently examined.

The Principal will be assisted in the Collegiate department, the ensuing session, by a gentleman, a Professor of long experience, of the ripest scholarship, and the most superior qualifications as a teacher. He will take charge of the department of Mathematics and some of the higher English branches, and the control of the male study hall.

No accounts will be opened in Marion. Money must be deposited or forwarded for all necessary and proper purposes. Let pupils be supplied from home as far as is practicable.

A sum of money for the use of pupils must be deposited with the Principal.

One hundred and forty-five dollars will pay the board and tuition of a young lady for the entire session in the collegiate course. $175 will embrace the languages. $235 will embrace board, tuition in the collegiate department, on the Piano, and in the languages.

Books, Stationery, Sheet Music, Drawing, Painting and Embroidery material is furnished by the Principal. The cost of these articles varies with the advancement of the pupil. Every effort will be made to secure economy in their use.

For further particulars or catalogues, apply to the Principal

WE'VE ALL OUR ANGEL SIDE.

Despair not of the better part
That lies in human kind—
A gleam of light still flickereth,
In e'en the darkest mind;
The savage with his club of war,
The sage so mild and good,
Are linked in firm eternal bonds
Of human brotherhood.

Despair not—oh! despair not, then,
For through this world so wide,
No nature is so demon-like
But there's an angel side.

The huge, rough stones from out the mine,
Unsightly and unfair,
Have veins of purest marble hid
Beneath the surface there;
Few rocks so bare but to their hights
Some tiny moss plant clings,
And round the peak so desolate,
The sea-bird sits and sings;
Believe me, too, that rugged souls
Beneath their rudeness hide,
Much that is beautiful and good—
We've all our angel sides.

In all there is an inner depth,
A far-off-secret way,
When through the windows of the soul
God sends his smiling ray;
In every human heart there is
A faithful sounding chord,
That may be struck unknown to us
By some sweet, loving word.

The wayward heart in vain may try
Its softer thoughts to hide,
Some unexpected ton reveale—
It hath an angel side.

Despised, and low, and trodden down;
Dark with the shade of sin,
Deciphering not those halo lights
Which God has set within;
Groping about in utmost night,
Poor prisoned souls they are,
Who guess not what life's ning is,
Nor dream of heaven afar.

O! that some gentle hand of love
Their stumbling steps would guide,
And show them that amidst it all,
Life has its angel side.

Brutal, and mean, and dark enough,
God knows some natures are,
But He, compassionate, comes near—
And shall we stand afar?
Our cruise of oil will not grow less,
If shared with hearty head,
For words of peace and looks of love;
Few natures can withstand.
Love is the mighty conqueror—
Love is the beauteous guide—
Love with her beaming eye can see
We've all our angel side.

THE CHURCH TRIUMPHANT.

BY WM. S. PLUMER, D. D.

We ask God to scatter our enemies; but we are slow to think that they will ever be gone. In the midst of the battle it is difficult to anticipate the peace and the pleasures of decisive victory. We must learn to trust the Captain of our salvation. We walk by faith. In our journey through this wilderness, our great support is seeing Him who is invisible. By Him we are bidden to look forward to the glory that shall be revealed.

In this we are greatly aided by the exaltation of our Lord Jesus Christ. Our forerunner has entered the eternal city. He has gone up with a shout! Though His sacred head was laid as low as ours shall be, yet it was not possible that He should be holden of the bands of death. He burst the bare of the grave. As He overcame and sat down with his Father on his throne, so shall he people overcome and sit down with Him on his throne. His resurrection is the sure pledge of their resurrection. His entrance into life makes certain their eternal repose on the bosom of God.

Many of the redeemed already stand on the banks of deliverance. They beckon to us, who are still warring with flesh and blood, with principalities and powers. They assure us of final and complete victory. What has been done, can be done. Saints in glory are ensamples to us.

Part of the host have crossed the flood,

We must fight the good fight. We must resist as they resisted. Then we shall conquer as they conquered. Blessed be God, some have entered into rest.

God's word makes sure the final triumph of all his people. Now they sigh and cry; they wet their couch with tears, and have sore travail; but soon the angels shall hear them home to Abrahm's bosom. The thing is sure. The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. "In my Father's house are many mansions..... I will come again and take you to myself, that where I am there ye may be also." "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God—a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." The Scripture can not be broken. Heaven is revealed. The victory is foretold by Him who will accomplish it.

But what is the triumphant state of the Church? Attaining to it, her foes no more insult, her warfare is accomplished. The wicked cease from troubling. Temptations cease. There blows are no more dealt, and wounds no more bleed. Without are dogs. At God's right hand conflicts never rage. The strife of battle is over for ever.

There her wishes are gratified. She longed to see Christ and be like Him. Now she has her desires. She is with Christ and beholds his glory. She sees him as he is. She is like him. She wears his image on her heart. She beholds that blessed face, which was smitten and buffeted, but is now far beyond the reach of the malignant. She sees the eyes that poured out tears, the side that poured out water and blood, and the lips that poured out grace and truth. How great the deliverance which rescues her from all fears, and gives her all the blessings of spotless purity, all the raptures of the beatific vision! No wonder the blessed sing the song of Moses and the Lamb. They have palms of victory in their hands.

There, too, is rest; the opposite of all that wearies, alarms, perturbs, sickens, or saddens. Robert Hall's highest conception of heaven was that of rest. The idea is Scriptural. "There remaineth a rest for the people of God." How welcome will be the repose of that blessed world! The shore was pleasant to Jonah, and Ararat to Noah; but heaven will be far more delightful to redeemed souls. There is no rest like heaven.

But there shall be no dullness in heaven. Its rest is not torpor. Heaven is full of activity. They that sleep, sleep in the night. But there is no night there. Heaven is no hive for drones, no place for opium-eaters to dream away a long eternity. The ransomed are before the throne of God and serve him day and night in his temple; and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more; neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

In heaven is found the best society. Myriads of choice spirits are there gathered. God himself has chosen, secured, fashioned, and glorified every vessel of honor. "Heaven is attracting to itself whatever is congenial to its nature; is enriching itself by the spoils of the earth, and collecting within its bosom whatever is pure, permanent, and divine, leaving nothing for the last fire to consume but the objects and slaves of concupiscence; while every thing which grace has prepared and beautified, shall be gathered and selected from the ruins of the world to adorn that eternal city." Every Christian friend that goes before us from this world, is "a ransomed spirit, waiting to welcome us in Heaven."

The employments of the Church triumphant are of the most elevating kind. There knowledge is pursued with eagerness, success, and certainty. We shall know even as we are known. Here we get glimpses of Christ by faith; there we shall gaze upon him with unutterable wonder. Here discord mars our songs; there shall be the perfection of harmony. There we shall have a key to unlock many mysteries which here sadly perplex us. There are no low employments in Heaven.

The perfection of the Church triumphant is absolute. Nothing can be more pure. She is without spot, or wrinkle, or blemish, or any such thing. And her stability is as great as her perfection. She shall go no more out. She shall no more be black, like the tents of Kedar. She changes only from glory to glory.

God himself is the glory of the Church triumphant. She hath no need of the sun or moon to shine in her, for the Lord God doth lighten her, and the Lamb is the light thereof. God is her sun and her exceeding joy. She has such discoveries of him as far exceed all earthly conceptions. He is the portion of every redeemed soul.

Of that happy state we know but little. Even if men were sent to that world for the express purpose of reporting its glories, not one of them could say more than Paul, "I heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." The light and language, the joys and experience of that blessed abode, must be possessed in order to understand its amazing sufficiency, its infinite fullness.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND.

From an article in the London Christian Times, we gather the following summary of English Sunday School statistics:

The aggregate number of teachers was about 318,000, being an average of one teacher to every seven and a half scholars.

ROMANISM IN AMERICA.

"In Maryland there are about 800 Protestant churches, and only 65 Papal. Out of 152 churches in Florida, there are only 5 Papal. In Louisiana there are 223 Protestant churches, and only 55 Papal. In Texas there are 164 churches, only 13 of which are Papal; and, at the present time, the Protestant is greatly the predominant influence in California. The census just published reveals the fact that in all the country the Papists have but 1,112 churches, accommodating 621,000 persons, which is not one-eleventh of the Methodist churches; scarcely one-eighth of the Baptists, and not one-fourth of the Presbyterians. The Protestant population of the United States is to the Catholic population as 12 to 1."

ROMANISTS OVERESTIMATED.

The influence and numbers of Roman Catholics in this country have no doubt been greatly estimated and exaggerated. According to the census of 1850 they have 1,112 churches. By the same document it appears that the principal Protestant denominations have 35,722 churches, to which others of the smaller sects might be added. The whole number of churches in the United States in 1850 was 38,061; of which more than 36,800 were Protestant places of worship. Protestants have more than thirty times as many places for public worship as Romanists. Popery is making little, very little progress in our country, except by immigration.

LA GRANGE COLLEGE ENDOWED.

Dear Editor,—The above caption is not a fact stated: it is a hope expected—a prediction uttered—a consummation prayed for. The fact must be waited for until the people understand the plan lately adopted by the Trustees, for the endowment of La Grange College. That plan is, (briefly,) to sell seven hundred and fifty scholarships, for one hundred dollars each; said scholarships to entitle each subscriber to tuition for the term of twenty years; the money to be paid in four annual instalments of twenty-five dollars. The plan to be inoperative until the whole number of scholarships shall have been sold.

Now, I like this plan for a good many reasons: let me tell you a few of them. First, It makes us independent of rich men. La Grange is the offspring of the Church—the child of wealthy parentage. Yet the only sign of its legitimacy has been its chastisements. The beggarly provision made for it nullus filius; the rich men of the church have nursed themselves in their accursed, drugged slumbers, until their opportunity has gone by, and God has become manifestly the friend of this Ishmael.

We all know, dear editor, that the Church and her institutions are supported mainly by the middle and poorer classes. Many individuals in these classes are looking for opportunities to learn more of "the luxury of doing good." To such persons this plan commends itself at once. The industrious mechanic, and the pious young men of the Church, can become owners of scholarships at La Grange, and educate needy relations, or select bright-faced orphan boys and start them on in the career of honor and usefulness. Can there be a pious heart that does not gladden at this prospect? Verily, no! And it is in view of this feature of the plan that I dare pronounce it Ideased of God.

Once more (for I am in danger of making this article too long) you are determined, it seems, to take God's ambassadors for Presidents and Professors in Colleges; and yet I would as soon be put to watching at an obsolete rathole, as be a professor in an institution that annually sends abroad a beggarly account of empty benches. Your institutions of learning are generally segregated and secluded, and, in each, watching and instructing some four or five score of boys, are found one, two or three heaven-taught Ministers of the Lord Jesus "preaching the Gospel to every creature" in the college; and the Church says, so let it be. But we say it shall not be so: in the name of all that is proper, it must not be so. If these preachers may not itinerate, let them have an itinerating congregation—one that is large enough to be worthy of their enriched minds and sanctified hearts. The successful operation of this new plan of endowment would send three or four hundred students to LaGrange College, to be under the oversight of Dr. Rivers and his worthy coadjutors; many of these would come from "the wide, wide world"—education in so good an institution, at so cheap a rate, would take them there; and they would leave the place indoctrinated in the things of God, and many of them with pardon from God sealed upon their hearts. Is not this a consummation devoutly to be prayed for? I should have said, most earnestly labored for, and, if need be, most cheerfully paid for.

In conclusion, let us piously hope that God will prevent our sleeping over such momentous questions any longer. If LaGrange college is not needed by the Church, we might drowsily fold our arms and let it rot and drop in pieces. But if we throw it away, we must have another institution like it; let us, therefore, cherish this institution, and make it what it should be; it can be done now, and each colaborer will be benefitting himself, while he blesses the Church and the cause of God. Before I close, let me say that no one is responsible for the above but an

METHODISM IN FRANCE.

The French Methodist Conference which adjourned on the 4th July, was formed into two districts and twelve circuits. It stationed twenty-seven preachers. Concerning the spiritualities of the connection in France a correspondent of the London Watchman writes:

"The spiritual state of our societies was reported as in a revived state; their experience generally good and in harmony with their life and walk. Congregations every where large and attentive, and doors of usefulness opening before us; such are some of the indications of prosperity during the past year, as reported to Conference; and for which we bless God and take courage."

Respecting their mode of stationing their preachers, by a stationing committee, and the length of time for which a preacher may be stationed, the same writer remarks:

"On Friday the stations were read for the second and last time. Unlike the British Conference, no discussion is allowed in the Conference in this matter. All petitions and remonstrances were referred to the stationing committee, whose decision was final. In the present instance there was no ground for discussion or dissatisfaction, and no alteration was made from the first draft. There was some discussion as to the length of time a minister might be stationed in one circuit, some favoring the limit of three years, as in England, and others a prolongation to five or six years. It was finally decided that the ordinary period of a preacher's stay should be three years, but a request from the circuit for a prolongation of his stay might be considered by the Conference, upon whose recommendation the committee might extend the period two years longer; but in no case whatever should it exceed five years."

HOW TO MEASURE THE LENGTH OF SERMONS.

1. Those preachers who write and commit their sermons, if they preach at one place often, must necessarily preach short sermons, except they have time and talent to write and memorize readily. Those who read their sermons, by taking time for composition, may comprise more in the same limits, and yet discuss subjects fully, in from thirty to sixty minutes, according to the subject. Those who speak extemporary, however well digested by study, must unavoidably use more words to convey their ideas in the matter. Yet justice can not be done to some subjects in less than fifty or sixty minutes, however prepared.

2. If the preacher is inanimate, and his congregation becomes inattentive and begins to slumber, it would be better for him to retrench than to lull them to sleep; and if this is a general thing, better quit preaching. If part of the congregation, however, is attentive and a few weep, whilst others sleep, the speaker should not cut short because of the sleepers, for they care and know little about the length of sermons; if all sleep, however, he can do no good, and had better dismiss at once.

3. If the speaker's general store of knowledge, or his memory, should fail to supply him with matter in point, better to cut short abruptly, than to spin out time with matter foreign to his subject.

4. Sermons made up with a puff of sounding words, with little Gospel truth, can not be too short; and if containing false doctrines, better for them to sleep in silence than be heard at all.

5. If the speaker should have a heartfelt flow of solid matter and sound words, and they reach from heart to heart, even should some of his hearers become restless, others show anger, and some, like Felix, show signs to get away for a more convenient season, he may safely venture to prolong the matter in point; and if they begin to cry, what shall we do! he may still venture more safely to enlarge in answering the inquiry, without regard to minutes. To stop to look at the watch, to guide in time, on such an occasion, would be like a fisherman stopping to look at his watch to know when to cease drawing the seine, when the fish were fluttering in it.

6. When a Church is in a lukewarm state, and think more of their dinner times than the Gospel feast, and begin to give their pastor hints about twenty minute sermons, let the pastor not shrink from duty to gratify a carnal spirit. But like the faithful physician, increase the dose of medicine as the symptome of disease threaten more danger, notwithstanding his patients loath the medicine and desire smaller dose.

In short, skillful ministers, like skillful physicians, should be governed by symptoms, times and circumstances, without regard to the caprices of men with respect to the length of their sermons; to study and do their duty, and leave events with God, whatever may be said by others in respect to the length of sermons, notwithstanding; for he that undertakes to please all his hearers, will have a hard task, and fail at last. [Southern Baptist.

HOUSE AND HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY OF THE PASTOR.

A minister, in marrying, should know according to what general principles his house ought to be governed, and the wife whom he has married (the aid he has taken to himself) should learn them from him, if she has not to learn them.

Without disparaging an honorable liberty, it is necessary that the order of his house, and the habits of the external life of his family, should be subordinated to the interests of his ministry. This is not a yoke which he imposes upon his wife, but principles she should voluntarily adopt in virtue of an interest which she shares with him.

If there be not this concert, or if principles are observed only at the expense of the liberty of one of the parties, every thing will go wrong.

This being assumed, we believe that the internal affairs (the affairs of the domestic establishment) ought to satisfy propriety in two ways: by order and neatness, if the pastor be poor; by simplicity, if he be rich; which, certainly, does not mean that order may be wanting in a rich house, or simplicity in a poor one; still less, that one will have order simply because he is rich, or simplicity merely because he is poor, without seeking it by other means.

Order is the ornament, the attire, the luxury of poverty. Nothing is so sad as the appearance of riches and pretensions to elegance in a poor house. But, on the contrary, order in poverty shows a firm soul, a serious character, a peaceful heart. Order and neatness among the poor are almost virtues, inspiring involuntary respect; and their absence greatly injures the influence of a poor pastor.

Simplicity is the only ornament which may properly attach itself to wealth; it is always in good taste, especially in a parsonage. The contrary presents too great a contrast with the functions of the pastor. If, at the house of a wealthy pastor, opulence may show itself, it must be only under a grave form, and there must be no appearance of fancy, of finery, or of sensuality. There is a luxury which addresses the senses, and another which addresses the mind and the imagination, and where matter is made subservient to thought. [Vinet's Pastoral Theology.

Death, to a good man, is but passing through a dark entry, out of one little dusky room of his Father's house into another that is fair and large, lightsome and glorious, and divinely entertaining. [Clark.

WESLEYAN LITERATURE.

Wesleyanism has a literature of her own, of considerable importance in forming the minds of large classes of our countrymen. The names of Wesley, Benson, Clarke, Watson, Townley, Treffrey, Powell, and others, will suggest works of divinity of which the Connexion may well feel proud. Most of them, indeed, are a credit to our common Christianity. The admirable and important work of the late Mr. Treffrey, on the Eternal Sonship of Christ, extorted even the high commendation of the organ of Tractarinnism, the British Magazine. Ethnology, too, and the science of living languages, are not little indebted to Wesleyan Missionaries, who have enlarged our acquaintance more especially with the dialects of Africa. And if, as we shall soon show, Wesleyan psalmody has won an easy conquest over the Tractarian lyre; so also may it be confidently asserted, that Wesleyan biography has put to the blush, in all that exalts human nature, by the exhibition of saving truth embodied in the blameless lives and happy deaths of Christian men and women, both Popish and Tractarian lives of Saints, with all their puerile superstition, and frivolous miraculous pretensions. No stronger proof of the value of Wesleyan biography need be adduced, (in addition to every one's consciousness of edification who reads it,) than the well known fact, that the late illustrious Robert Hall was wont to refresh and brace his Christian principles and sentiments by its earnest appeal. [British Wesleyan Magazine.

IRISH WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The annual session of this body of ministers commenced in the city of Dublin, the 21st of June. Five members of the Conference died during the past year, four hundred emigrated, making a decrease of three hundred and fifty. It is stated, however, as a cheering and hopeful fact, that while the decrease this year is much smaller than for several preceding years, there has been an increase on a larger number of circuits than during the last ten years. Six young men, recommended by the district meetings, were admitted on trial; and six who had completed their probation of four years, were approved by the Conference and ordained. The amount of money contributed for general missionary purposes was £5,600, being an advance of over £450 on the past year, while more than ever had been given to to aid in the extension of the work at home.

POWER OF THE PLAIN PROTESTANT PULPIT.

A few planks of timber for a pulpit, and the market-place of Wittemberg for a cathedral—three thousand agitated and inquiring spirits for an audience—Martin Luther the preacher, and the Lord of Glory in the midst—this is Protestantism. In the Romish church the pulpit stands in a corner, and the altar alone is made visible; in the Protestant church the pulpit is, and ever ought to be, the most prominent thing; the pulpit, with an evangelical minister in it, the Bible on it, and the blessing of God over it, is the instrument for the world's conversion. I mind not who the preacher is, or what he wears. I have my preference, or my prejudice, as some of you might say. It never can affect my solemn and deliberate conviction of the infinite value of eternal truth. I mind not whether the occupant of that pulpit wears lawn sleeves or a silk gown, or a surplice, or, like the Methodist preachers, what is still more apostolical, none of the three. I mind not much, I say, who the preacher is, or what the preacher wears, that occupies the pulpit—only let the preacher be seen—let him speak out—let him not look behind to see who frowns, nor before him to see who applauds, let him proclaim God's truth—let him be, like Knox, one who fears not the face of day—let him speak fearlessly as in the presences of God—let his word be like Luther's cannon shot, and his sermons half battles. Fears, and compromises, and livings, and patrons, and people—their promises, or threats, or gains, or loans must have no place in his heart, or conscience, or creed. [Cumming.

A PERTINENT REPLY.

A clergyman once traveling in a stage-coach, was asked by one of the passengers if he thought pious heathens would go to Heaven. "Sir," said the clergyman, "I am not appointed judge of the world, and consequently cannot tell; but if you get to Heaven, you shall either find them there, or a good reason why they are not." A reply well fitted to answer an impertinent question dictated by idle curiosity.

The Unappreciated Sky!—It is a strange thing how little, in general, people know about the sky. It is the part in Creation in which Nature has done more for the sake of pleasing Man; more for the sole and evident purpose of talking to him, and teaching him, than in any other of her works; and it is just the part in which we least attend to her. There are not many of her other works in which some more material or essential purpose than the mere pleasing of man, is not answered by every part of their organization; but a very essential purpose of the sky might, so far as we know, be unswered, if, once in three days, or thereabout, a great, ugly, black rain-cloud were brought up over the blue, and every thing well watered, and so all left blue again till next time, with perhaps a film of morning and evening mist for dew. And, instead of this, there is not a moment of any day of our lives, when Nature is not producing some effect, picture after picture, glory after glory, and working still upon such exquisite and constant principles of the most perfect beauty, that it is quite certain that it is all done for us, and intended for our perpetual pleasure. And every man, wherever placed, however far from other sources of interest and beauty, has this doing for him constantly. The noblest scenes of the earth can be seen and known but by few; it is not intended that man should live always in the midst of them; he forces them by his presence, he ceases to feel them, if he be always with them; but the sky is for all; bright as it is, it is not "too bright, nor too good for human nature's daily food." Some times gentle, some times capricious, some times awful; never the same for two moments together; almost human in its passions, spiritual in tenderness; almost Divine in its infinity, its appeal to what is mortal in us is as distinct as its ministry of chastisement or of blessing to what is mortal, is essential!

And yet we never attend to it; we never make it a subject of thought, but as it has to do with our animal sensation; we look upon all sky which it speaks to us more clearly than to brutes, upon all which bears witness to the intention of the Supreme, that we are to receive more from the covering vault than the light and the dew which we share with the weed and the worm: only as a succession of meaningless and inanimate accidents, too common and too painful to be worthy of a moment of watchfulness or a glance of admiration. [John Ruskin.

Hints.

By Hartley Coleridge, on a picture of a very young nun, not reading a devotional book, and not contemplating a crucifix placed beside her:

So young, too young—consigned to cloist'ral shade;
Unlovely wedded—wedded yet a maid!
And hast thou left on Hemlyn's sands behind,
No sorrowing mourner, for the wandering wind,
Who would be proud to waft a sigh from thee
Sweeter than anght the gales to Araby?
Thou wert immured, poor maiden, as I guess,
In the dank cloisters of thy shapeless dress;
Too young to doubt, too pure to be ashamed,
Thou gavest to God—what God had never claimed;
And didst unwilling sigh away thine all
Of earthly good—a guiltless perfect!
The large reversion of thine unborn love
Was sold to purchase an estate above.
Yet, by the hands upon thy bosom pressed,
I think indeed there are not quite at rest:
Plait Christ that hangs upon the sculptured cross
Is not the Jesus to redeem thy loss;
Nor will that book, whate'er its page contain,
Convince thee that the world is false and vain.
Even now there is a something at thy heart
That would be off—but may not dare not start.
Yes, yes thy face, thine eyes thy closed lips, prove
Thou wert created to be loved and love.
Poor maiden! victim of the vilest craft
At which e'en Moloch grinned or Belial laughed,
May all thine sinless wishes be forgiven,
May all thy sighs be registered in Heaven,
To what thou shouldst have been—and what thou art!

Sleep and Death.—The Angels of Sleep and Death, locked arm in arm, wandered over the earth. It was evening. They laid themselves down upon a lofty hill that overlooked the habitations of man. A mournful stillness reigned around, broken only by the evening bells, whose sound came only from the distant hamlet. Silent and speechless as their want, these beneficent guardian angels of mankind, lay in close embrace, till night's dark mantle fell around them. Then the Angel of Sleep rose from his dewy couch, and scattered with noiseless hand the invisible seeds of slumber. The evening wind carried them to the silent dwellings of the weary husbandman. Soon sweet sleep enfolded in its gentle embrace the inmates of the rural cottages—from the gray-haired sire, whose tottering steps a staff supports, to the infant in its cradle. The sick forgot his pains, the mourner his sorrow, the poor his cares. All eyes were closed. His task being finished, this benevolent Angel again lay down by his sterner brother's side. "When morning breaks," cried he, with happy innocence, "all the world will bless me as their friend and benefactor. Oh! what joy, thus to do good in secret and unseen. How happy are we, invisible messengers of the good spirit! How beautiful is our quiet office!" Thus spake the Angel of Slumber. The Angel of Death gazed upon him in silent sadness, while tears, such as immortals weep, stood in his large dark eyes. "Ah!" said he, "would that I, like you, could rejoice in cheerful thanks; but the world calls me its foe and joy-destroyer." "Oh! my brother," answered the Angel of Slumber, "will not every good man, upon awakening, recognize in thee his friend, and gratefully bless thee? Are we not brothers and children of one father?" So he spake. The tearful eyes of the Angel of Death shone with a gleam of pleasure, while he pressed his gentler brother more tenderly to his heart.

The Philosophy of Rain.—To understand the philosophy of this beautiful and often sublime phenomenon, so often witnessed since the creation of the world, and so essential to the very existence of plants and animals, a few facts derived from observation and a long train of experiments must be remembered.

1. When the atmosphere every where at all times of a uniform temperature, we should never have rain, or hail, or snow. The water absorbed by it in evaporation from the sea and the earth's surface would descend in an imperceptible vapor, or cease to be absorbed by the air when it was once fully saturated.

2. The absorbing power of the atmosphere, and consequently its capacity to retain humidity, is proportionately greater in warm than in cold air.

3. The air near the surface of the earth is warmer than it is in the region of the clouds. The higher we ascend from the earth the colder do we find the atmosphere. Hence the perpetual snow on very high mountains in the hottest climate.

Now, when, from continued evaporation, the air is highly saturated with vapor, though it be invisible and the sky cloudless, if its temperature is suddenly reduced, by cold currents descending from above, or rushing from a higher to a low latitude, or by the motion of a saturated air to a colder latitude, its capacity to retain moisture is diminished, clouds are formed, and the result is rain. It condenses as it cools, and, like a sponge filled with water and compressed, pours out the water which its diminished capacity cannot hold. How singular, yet how simple the philosophy of rain! What but Omniscience could have devised such an admirable arrangement for watering the earth!

Ivory.—Nine-tenths of all the ivory brought directly into the United States comes from Zanzibar, in Africa, to the port of Salem; and this is all large—a lot of 50,000 pounds which we saw averaging eighty pounds to the tusk. It has been conjectured that eventually the supply would be stopped, on account of the extinction of the animal; but this, we are informed by those conversant with the subject, is not probable, as large quantities are brought from the unexplored interior of Africa by the natives, and sold to traders on the coast, of which, a part is obtained from animals that have died naturally; and the elephant is too large game to be seriously affected by the weapons of the savages. The dealers can readily discern by the appearance of the tooth whether it was taken from a freshly slain animal or not. Some of these, broken and mutilated, give evidence of the deadly encounters their proprietors have had in their native jungles, while others are gnawed by African rats, probably, for the teeth-marks are large and deep incisions.

The English traders, owing to their superior facilities, have the monopoly of the market in India and Africa, and the choicest articles can only be obtained from them. In price it varies from 75c to $1.75 per pound net, which are the extremes for corresponding qualities. Within five years past, owing to its extended appropriation to purposes of art and luxury, it has increased twenty per cent. in cost, and great economy is requisite to work up the scraps and clippings to advantage, as its curved form will not admit of straightening without destroying the texture, which would be fatal to its usefulness and beauty. Nothing, however, is permitted to go to waste. The refuse is carefully collected, and, when ground upon a marble slab, yields a jet-black velvety pigment used by artists to paint "Uncle Tom's," broadcloth coats, and other matters, requiring a particularly jetty hue. Next to the Chinese, the Germans excel in ivory carving and ornamental work; most of the beautifully embellished umbrella and cane knobs being made by them. These, according to the amount of work lavished upon them, range in price from $3 to $10 each.

The most beautiful piece of art we ever saw was a marine landscape, in alto relievo, upon the lid of a small ivory box, and the the connoisseur who possessed it valued it at $600, but would not dispose of it at any price.

The curiously carved ivory balls which are brought from China, each containing several balls within them, and apparently entire, puzzling the senses to conjecture how they could possibly be made, are not really entire; but are joined so accurately as to be imperceptible, even under the glass of a microscope. Subjected for a time, however, to the action of boiling water, they separate, and the wonderful ingenuity of the Chinaman is revealed.

Ivory is dyed of various colors by contact with chemicals, though no art has yet succeeded in imparting a color deeper than the surface, and this will eventually wear off. The quantity imported into England, last year, foots up about 4000 tons, and into the port of Salem about 250,000 pounds.

In the business of the ivory dealer may also be included the manufactures of box wood, lignum vitæ, and other hard woods, which are, in a greater or less degree, substitutes for the former. The nearest resemblance that any article bears to ivory is found in the "ivory nut," a vegetable production of South America. These are much like a horse-chestnut in appearance, but about twice their size, and when turned into articles of fancy or ornament, are exceedingly clear, and of an alabaster appearance. They do not wear, however, are brittle, and soon become discolored and opaque. They may be seen in the form of infant's rings, needle-boxes, etc., in any of the fancy stores.

What Causes the Gulf Stream.—Mr. Stanton Shoales, an experienced navigator, gives it as his opinion that the waters of the Gulf stream are nothing more or less than the waters of the river Amazon. This great father of waters is bedded more than 1000 miles immediately under the equator, and all its tributary streams for many thousand miles are constantly pouring their hot water into this mighty reservoir of water. As these waters are gathered in under the burning sun of the equator, it is extremely warm; far more so than the Atlantic Ocean waters under the equator. The great body of heated water shoots out into the Atlantic more than a hundred miles, in the face of the eternal trade winds.

The Amazon is sixty miles wide, after being belted in its irresistible course, it curves off to the left and scuds off before the strong trade winds till out of their reach. Driven along with great force, it takes its course round the great bay formed between the two continents of North and South America. Dashing along the northern coast of South America, and passing to the leeward of the West India Islands, it leaves the shore of Cuba, and proceeds along the shores of Florida, the capes of Virginia and the south coast of North America and passing the shores of Newfoundland, ends its mission, among the icebergs which float out of the Northern ocean. Cut off the Gulf Stream, and it would not be many years before the North Atlantic would be filled with icebergs that would be very destructive in navigation. But o wise providence has provided an external reservoir of hot water constantly rushing around over back of the cold Atlantic to its destination, where, after spending its vital warmth among the icebergs it is hurried away by a new supply of native warm water from the great Amazon. Seamen can always tell when in or out of the Gulf Stream by dipping the hand in the water along side.

Undoubtedly this view will be new to some readers, but what I have written is from experience, and was seen while I was roving upon the mighty deep. The Gulf Stream, I repeat, is nothing more or less than the waters of the great Amazon of South America. I have crossed it in many places, and for many years have glided through its warm water, always pleased to have it astern. The most violent storms, from whatever quarter they may come never change its course or its current, but it continues to move on in that irresistible power which was given to it in the beginning by the Power above.

The Newspaper.—In promotion of so desirable an object as the union of the intellectual with the useful, the newspaper is an important auxiliary. It is more, it is typical of the community in which it circulates and is encouraged. It tells its character, as well as its condition; its tastes as well as its necessities; the moral, as well as the physical stamina of population and soil. It is the map wherein are traced our tendencies and destinies—the chart to direct the traveler and settler to safe and pleasant harborage, or divert them from the shoals and quicksands of social degradation. At home, it brings to our firesides, it imparts to our household, it impresses on our children, its sentiment of propriety or its tone of contamination. Abroad, it is regarded as our oracle, and speaks volumes for or against us. In its business features may be discerned the indications of our prosperity or otherwise, in a worldly sense; but in its general complexion will be discovered our moral and spiritual healthfulness or disease. It is the portraiture of our imperfections, as well as the chronicler of our advancement. [National Intelligencer.

A Short Romance.—The following romantic incident is said to have occurred a few years before the Russian conquest of Armenia. The Sirdar fell violently in love with a beautiful Armenian maiden, and demanded her from her parents. Their supplications and those of the girl were unavailing; for although she had a lover she was not formally betrothed; she was consequently carried off to the harem. During the night her lover entered the palace gardens, and in a low voice commenced singing beneath the windows of the harem, in the hope that she would hear him. Soon a window was opened and sons one leaped out. Fearing that his singing had betrayed him he fled; but as he heard nothing more he crept back, and found his beloved caught in the branches of a tree which had broken her descent to the ground. He helped her down, and they prepared for flight, but being overheard they were pursued and caught, and in the morning they were brought before the Sirdar; when the latter had heard the circumstances of the case, he exclaimed, "I see that in the sight of God you were already betrothed. Lovers so true should never be parted. Live happily together and God be with you!" [Baron Von Haxthausen's Sketches.

Stearns, of Holly Springs, Professor of Governmental Science and Law; Mr. Barnard, of the Alabama University, Professor of Mathematics, Astronomy, and Civil Engineering; and Dr. Francis Mattaner, of Virginia, Professor of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy.

Jackson, Miss.—John F. Rives, a brother-in-law of Bishop Early, has been selected as President of the Wesleyan Female College in Jackson. His lady will teach with him. Mr. Rives graduated at Randolph Macon College, Virginia, 1843; and besides being a ripe scholar and man of elevated moral character, has had experience as an instructor. We are happy to announce this selection.

Cedar Grove, Miss.—Dr. T. H. Caskie has accepted the Presidency of the Female College there. He has succeeded in securing a competent corps of literary teachers. A competent teacher for the Music department will hear of a situation by applying at 36 Camp street.

MORE LABORERS WANTED.

Under this head the Presbyterian Witness, Jackson, Miss., says:

"There has not been a period for many years when there were so many vacant churches within the bounds of our Synod. We feel assured that at least one dozen additional ministers could now be comfortably settled in the Mississippi Synod. * * * In addition to the pastors that we must have to supply our vacant churches, we want ministers to preach the gospel to our colored population. Many inviting fields are opened, and we want one or two thorough moving, practical evangelists; and we must have them if we do our duty. * * * And we see from the last minutes of our church, that there are two hundred and sixty ministers—leaving out the aged and infirm—who are put down W. C. Waiting for a Call. It is true that many of these are in and about New York and Philadelphia, who seem to be waiting for the pastors of those churches to leave for some distant field, or another world; such we do not want."

CHURCHES AND CHAPELS IN NEW ORLEANS.

"There are certainly not more than sixty places in this city at which divine services of any kind are observed on the Lord's Day. If the people were disposed to attend church statedly, from week to week, we seriously doubt whether there could be found sufficient room for them; indeed, we feel quite sure there could not. Our population is estimated, since the annexation of Lafayette, at about [200,000. Of this number about 60,000, we should think, are able to attend meeting. This would require sittings for an average of 1000 persons to each house; which is much too large an estimate. A fair average, we should say, is about 500.

"From the best information which we have been able to obtain, we can enumerate but fifty-five church edifices and chapels. Of these not less than twenty-one are Catholic, —many of them superior structures. The Episcopalians have eight places of meeting, —three of their buildings being good specimens of architecture; costing, we believe, $40,000, $60,000, and $35,000, respectively. The Presbyterians also have seven—one being a fine edifice. The Methodists have three—one being a large and commodious house, and the others not of ordinary finish. The Hebrews have two respectable synagogues,—both decidedly neat and handsome. The Lutherans hold meetings in four different portions of the city—in frame houses. The Baptists worship in a rented Hall,—though a new edifice is rapidly approaching completion. The Disciples have a small neat chapel, and the Unitarians are erecting one of the most costly structures in the city.

"Besides the above, we can report seven African churches—three of the Baptist and four of the Methodist persuasion—five of which have respectable buildings. Including these five, then, we can accurately report but thirty non-Catholic—including two Hebrew—and twenty-one Catholic places of worship. If, from the latter, we take the three "in the suburbs," our total number will be reduced to fifty. Now, estimating that these fifty chapels will hold an average of 500 each, they will give accommodations to but 25,000 persons; thus leaving about 35,000 without the privilege of waiting upon the Lord in His temple.

"Again: there are really but about twenty Evangelical churches, so termed, in our midst. In these, not more than 9,000 or 10,000 can be seated, we should think, as the smaller buildings will not hold over 300 persons This will leave near 50,000 of our citizens without proper instruction. There is surely much land yet to be possessed right here at home. We need not go far to find destitution." [Companion, September.

These statistics we take from the monthly organ of the Young Mens' Christian Association, of this city. Their general accuracy we do not question, but there is a mistake touching the Methodists. They have four chapels; also three others in the city in which the German Methodists worship, making in all for whites, seven.

The language of the Companion, which we do not accuse of denominational bias in making up its statistics is, at least, equivocal in speaking of the three Methodist churches,—"one being a large and commodious house, and the others not of ordinary finish." The Carondelet Street, in First District, is perhaps "the commodious house" referred to. The Felicity Street, in the Fourth, and the Morcan Street, in the Third District, "the others." This writer has hardly visited these two last. Neither of the Methodist churches is as costly as the Presbyterian, on Lafayette Square, or the Episcopal, on Canal street, but no other Protestant denomination in the city has three as large and commodious and well finished churches as those located respectively on Carondelet, Felicity and Mereau streets, which are of brick, free seats, with galleries and basements, and average to each 1000 sittings. We speak of what is completed, not in contemplation.

A remarkable home destitution there certainly is. We need not go far for missionary work. Will some one begin out door preaching? A cotton bale or sugar hogshead would make a good pulpit on the levee. A stand in Lafayette Square, Place de Arms, Congo, or Washington Squares, Sunday afternoons, would draw multitudes around the living preacher. And if the services were conducted with personal dignity and religious propriety, backed by a respectable church delegation, an earnest clear-toned, evangelical sermon would, we believe, find a more respectful hearing than is generally supposed.

THE OPEN SYSTEM—UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA.

A change in the course of instruction in this State Institution, is the subject of considerable discussion in the papers. A pamphlet has been sent us containing four articles originally communicated to the Montgomery Advertiser and the Tuscaloosa Observer, which sets forth the proposed change and its benefits very clearly. The Trustees, at the last Commencement, were in favor of it; but a quorum not being present, and unwilling to act hastily in so grave a matter, they requested the Faculty to draw up a plan in detail, and adjourned to the 25th September.

The usual routine of college studies is now taught in the University. They are arranged in a certain fixed order, and a specified time is allotted to each—the whole covering four years. Except in rare cases, and then at great disadvantage to him, a young man is not permitted to study any one of the subjects taught, unless he first studies all those which happen to occupy a prior place upon the catalogue—in fact, unless he undertakes the whole four years' course. It is now proposed to abolish this restriction, and let each study be pursued, independently of every other upon which it does not depend. To illustrate the effect of such a change, a late article in the Tuscaloosa Observer, says: "If a young man wishes to study Chemistry, the present system requires him first to study Algebra, Surveying, Latin, Logic, etc. etc., with which Chemistry has no connection. The proposed system would say, in such a case, these studies are not necessary, and you may study Chemistry whenever you are prepared to do so. It will therefore be observed, that, under both plans, the same subjects will be taught by the same officers; the difference will be, that under one, a young man will not be allowed to study one subject unless he undertakes to study every other also—under the other, he may study such only as he prefers."

The advantage of this system, which is called the "open system," is felt by poor young men who can not afford a four years' residence, but would like liberal advantages in studying, to fit them as merchants, or civil engineers, or for other professions. Others will be suited by it whose health or age is unequal to the regular course. The diploma would be given to those who fulfill the curriculum; but a certificate of progress and proficiency would be issued to the student of the partial course.

Most of the college courses remind one of smooth and nicely-jointed pavements laid years ago, over which thousands have walked content. But the roots have swelled and run and broken it up, and the whole needs resetting. In this case, not the roots of idleness or bitterness have done it, but the square roots and cube roots of enlarged knowledge. Latin, Greek, and Lockn on the Understanding, with some Mathematical Treatises, long laid on the shelf, do not complete the circle any more. Geology has been added to the sciences, and the scope of Chemistry and Mathematics enlarged to wide dimensions and applications, to say nothing of other departments.

Most of the American Colleges and Universities (and leading ones) have made more or less successful attempts at accommodating their instructions, not only to all citizens, but to the dynamics as well as statics of science and literature. More attention is given to modern languages and natural history. An eclectic course is provided for, with all due guards against idleness and superficiality. It is found to cost no more in the staff of instructors, to attract more students, to increase revenue, to diffuse more intelligence, to pass under thorough study a class of subjects necessary to a practical modern and American education that would otherwise be barely touched and skimmed over; in short, to answer the ends of a State institution and a University system.

"It is the Preaching that Comes to us." A gentleman from this city, who happened to be in Chicago at the time of the Colporteur Convention, relates, as a fact too good to be lost, that being one day at the depot in that city, he overheard a company of some forty Irish laborers discussing the propriety of attending the service. One claimed that it would be a mortal sin; another thought it would be only "venial," as there was no priest to visit them. But another settled the controversy saying, "Arrah, now, my honeys, it's not us that goes to the preaching, but it's the preaching that comes to us; and the holy father will not excommunicate us for that, at all, at all!" and they all became attentive hearers. END OF CONTROVERSY WITH THE ANA-BAPTIST BISHOP AND HIS PARTY.

The "Bishop of Mississippi" (?) is in a bad way—a very bad way. Holding the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, baptism must be with him classed among things necessary. His practice, therefore, is a violation of the rule of Catholic consent—In necessariis unitas. The highest authorities in his own Church are against him. Poor man. He took too rank a hold on the High-Church lever, and has broken down in the beginning.

The Church Herald, 8th inst., is busily and rather testily occupied in two separate editorials helping out "our diocesan." The Editors deny unqualifiedly the statement made by some body who erred in giving the Bishop credit for consistency, that he "has given notice that Methodists, Presbyterians and other persons wishing to join the Episcopal Church from other Churches, must be rebaptised without exception."

So far from this, they state elsewhere "that while Bishop Green does personally hold to the opinion that non-Episcopal baptism is invalid, yet so far as we know or believe, he has never attempted in his official action to enforce that belief on others who do not agree with him." Of course not. "The Church" in Mississippi is rather too few to be particular. The Editors, however, say—(and we never charged them with being weak and of small capacity)—that "it is well known to the Bishop that it is the individual opinion of each of the Editors of this paper that non-Episcopal, by which we mean lay-baptism, is, though irregular, valid, and should not be repeated."

While this reveals the comforting fact that the Protestant Episcopalians of Mississippi are not all unsound, it also reveals a schism that we were not aware of. Really, we had no thought when picking out a few items from the Bishop's Journal, for reading in the dog days, that we were getting him into so much trouble. And as we were instrumental in getting him in, he may expect us to lend a helping hand in getting him out. We then, in short, advise retraction at a single move. But by all means let him not fall into the tactics of his predecessor, ex-Bishop Ives, on a similar occasion, and plead a deranged state of health, nervousness, etc. Mississippians, like those of the old North State, would prefer straight-forwardness to the "somewhat devious track" described by his predecessor.

The Protestant Churchman, 26th ult., published in New York, and a leading journal, has a communication opening thus:

"Messrs. Editors,—A friend has sent to me a copy of the New Orleans Christian Advocate of July 15th. One column of which with the above heading is devoted to strictures upon the course recently pursued by Bishop Green in opposition to the validity of Baptism by the hands of non-Episcopal ministers. To some extracts from the Advocate I append the views of Bishop White on this point. An Episcopalian."

And Bishop White, the father of the P. E. Church in these United States, is quoted against the "Bishop of Mississippi" until we feel sorry for our neighbor. Bishop White says:

"I do not think that a clergyman of our Church is justifiable in administering the Ordinance of Baptism to persons who have been received, or intended to be received, within the Christian pale under non-Episcopal administrations but with forms accompanied by the element of water, and in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

"In the last rubric but one, under the head of 'Private Baptism,' it appears that the said two circumstances are thought the only essential parts of the Ordinance.

"Perhaps the best interpretation of laws is early practice under them; especially if it have been continued through ages, and without interruption. This is precisely the case with the construction given to the present subject by the Church of England."

Again:—

"Those of the Clergy who shall adopt the theory here rejected, may well be embarrassed by what Scripture says expressly that there is 'One Baptism.' How will the pastor of a congregation reconcile this with the admission of any member of it to the communion on the ground of non-Episcopal Baptism, and the treating of it as a nullity in another."

"More Church Suicide."—Under this title the Southern Churchman, Virginia, deplores the rebaptisms of Bishop Greene, of Mississippi, to which we lately made allusion. "If our voice," says the paper referred to, "could be heard by Bishop Green and those who are acting with him in this most inconsiderate attack on our own ecclesiastical foundations, we would entreat him and them to remember the significant warning of Bishop White, when a similar view was hinted in his own day: 'The present question (that of the validity of non-Episcopal baptism) has a serious effect on that of Episcopacy, INVALIDATING THE ACTS OF MANY ENGLISH BISHOPS, AND OF SOME OF OUR OWN CHURCH. IF WE EXTEND THE RETROSPECT TO THE AGES BEFORE THE REFORMATION, IT IS DOUBTFUL WHETHER THERE BE A VALIDLY ORDAINED BISHOP IN CHRISTENDOM.'"

Those correspondents in Mississippi who occasionally direct our attention to Bishop G.'s movements, will see the reason of our silence. He is at war with and under the ban of his own communion. That intelligent and respectable body of Christians, known as the Protestant Episcopal Church, has no Episcopal representative in Mississippi. While this individual, therefore, is quoted at a discount by his own Church standards, he can not expect "Methodists, Presbyterians and other persons," to accept him at par, much less at the premium he has the modesty to set upon himself.

Methodist Press.

With all the overflowing wickedness of California, we believe every benevolent and ameliorating institution has more or less got a footing there and is at work. The Quarterly session of the Grand Division of Sons of Temperance was held in Stockton, July 25. The Christian Advocate of August 4, says:

'The Grand Scribe read his quarterly report, from which it appears that the Order is in a highly prosperous condition; that within the quarter here have been twelve charters granted for the organization of new Divisions, and that two Divisions which had suspended operations have been revived, and that the order has been increased by the addition of 956 members, as appears by the reports received. Twelve of the Divisions have not yet reported. These undoubtedly would show that more than one thousand new members have been received within the quarter, and that the whole number of members at the present time amounts to nearly four thousand.

'At 8 o'clock P. M., in accordance with previous notice, a procession of Sons of Temperance was formed at the rooms of Stockton Division No. 9, and marched to the large room in the City Hall, which was densely filled with ladies and gentlemen.

'Col. Nevins of San Francisco was called to the chair, who explained the object of the meeting in a short address.

'The exercises were opened with prayer by Rev. I. S. Diehl, the Grand Chaplain of the Grand Division, and singing of a Temperance Ode by the choir with instrumental accompaniment.

'Rev. Morris Evans of Sonora, was called for and delivered an address of half an hour, of rare excellence for eloquence and power, which produced a thrilling effect upon his audience, which was evinced by frequent bursts of applause.

'After another Ode by the choir, Bro. Diehl was invited to the stand and spoke some thirty minutes in his usually animated style, interspersing his remarks with appropriate and striking anecdotes, illustrating the blasting influence of strong drink, and enforcing the importance of a prohibitory Liquor Law in California.

'The exercises were closed with another Ode and the benediction, and the audience dispersed, well pleased and strengthened in their Temperance principles and purposes. It was a good time, the singing was excellent, the addresses superb, and the impression made was decidedly salutary.'

The St. Louis Advocate calls attention to the Kansas Mission Conference and the great need of laborers for that field. Missouri is not full enough to spare them, and the Editor hopes they may be forthcoming from abroad:

'It will be recollected by most of our readers, and especially by the preachers, that at the last General Conference provision was made for the organizing a "Kansas Conference," embracing the Territory of Kansas, and so much of the Territory of New Mexico as was not embraced in the boundaries fixed for the Pacific Conference. It was also provided that the preachers now in the bounds of the Kansas Territory should meet with the St. Louis Conference until such time as a permanent organization of the Kansas Conference should be effected. All this was, no doubt, right and proper, but present indications lead to the belief that the time for such organization will arrive much sooner, perhaps, than was anticipated at the General Conference. From the best information we can gather, we incline to the opinion that, if the preachers can be had, the Conference should be organized this fall, or such arrangements be made by the Missionary Board in connection with the Bishops, that from ten to twenty good effective men could be thrust out in that field early next spring, at the farthest. Unless something of this kind be done, the Church will sustain a loss there which years upon years may not repair.'

The editor of the Charleston Advocate has seen the proof sheets of the Southern Methodist Almanac for 1855, to be brought out by our Book Editor and published at Nashville by Stevenson & Owen. It is a complete Church Almanac.

A correspondent writing from Nashville, while the Book Conference was in session, gives a graphic sketch of the drouth:

'The drouth here is appalling. Many of the trees have shed their foliage, the sidewalks are covered with leaves, every thing is buried in dust, the corn crop is past praying for, the grass is withered to the roots, farmers are giving away their swine to save them, the Cumberland river is too low to afford a fog in the morning, and the condition of the streets is a scandal to the City Council, and a caution to all who dread the cholera.'

The Memphis Advocate urges judicious and well-timed advice upon the churches. Pleasing it is to think what the scene and result would be if every Christian career, recently begun, should be, to the end, full of high and holy aspiration, pressing forward! But, if clear and definite purposes in prosecuting the solemn emprise of a religious life be wanting, many will "run their Christian career in fitful efforts for a deeper spiritual experience; at one time receding, at another advancing; now backsliding, now regaining their former state of grace; now cold, and now hot; to-day, eager for the world, to-morrow for Heaven; their experience as chequered as the leopard's skin; their Christian influence, owing to inconsistent life, weighing just as much against the Gospel as for it; and their final Christian position at the end of their race being pretty much that of a horse in a tread-mill—leaving off just where they began. Such Christianity tells badly on the age—it will never salt this corrupt earth, never leaven the whole lump of wide humanity with Divine influence."

But to the advice:

"The extensive revival influence, which is spreading over the field cultivated by our conferences, is to us a great cause for humility and gratitude to Him who has the dispensation of the Spirit in his power. But we rejoice with fear and trembling. Conversion and consequent Church-extension is but the commencement of the Gospel's work. If the Church and her pastors allow themselves to rest satisfied at this point, and relax their efforts to spend their time in idle self-gratulation over what has been done, the cause of God will be more seriously damaged than if the Church had remained unvisited by the outpouring of the Spirit. If we would retain not only our present advanced state of spirituality, but even prevent our last state from proving worse than the first, we should wake up to the importance of an earnest, steady culture of deep inward spiritual Christianity: we should seek to have the Church impregnated with more intimate and transforming spiritual influences. Not only should the old and stendfast members of the Church seek for more of the life of Christ in the soul, but those who have recently "put on Christ" should be most solemnly admonished, that the great work of attaining a firm and efficient Christian character now lies before them, calling for watchfulness, prayer, and punctual attendance upon all those means of grace so wisely instituted in the Church."

The Christian Advocate and Journal gives a leader on Know-Nothings—admitting that all secret societies are liable to be abused to bad purposes, and especially political organizations whose proceedings are secret, because they are not restrained by the wholesome check of public opinion; and hence the individual members are not so essentially controlled by regard to their reputation as they would be if what they propose to do was subjected to public animadversion. The editor comes out squarely:

"We do not belong to this association, and 'know-nothing' of it except from common report. Our information may, therefore, be incorrect, or at least imperfect; but assuming that public opinion does justice to the views and purposes by which the association is actuated, we incline to the opinion that a stern necessity called it into existence, and requires its continuance."

The prevalence of this opinion, and the boldness with which it begins to be avowed, all the country over, is significant. It assumes the political nature and secret workings of popery; that neither of the great existing parties can be trusted in dealing with it, as they alike bid for it; and the encroachment is threatening, and calls for action:

"Having, then, among us a very large secret society, governed by a priesthood, who are believed by the members of the association to exercise by divine right the power to fix and determine their eternal destiny, and this priesthood itself being the subjects of a foreign pontiff, prince, and potentate, by what means can such influence be controlled but by a combination of its opponents? and how can such combination be effected but by association and organization? Will it be answered that Romanism, though a secret organization, is not a political one, and therefore does not require to be opposed by a political combination such as that of the 'Know-Nothings?' To show this it will be necessary to prove that the secret organization of Romanism can not be brought to bear upon politics, and political institutions; a position which contradicts all history and experience."

CHURCH ITEMS.

Old School Presbyterians.—Rev. Dr. Stewart Robinson lately stated at the Congregational Association, that his denomination had 2,500 ministers, and about a quarter of a million of communicants. It raises for benevolent purposes about half a million of dollars annually. It is the largest Presbyterian body in the world.

During the year ending May, 1854, four new Presbyteries were organized, viz: Red River, Allegheny, Paducah and Central Texas

There are now in connection with the General Assembly, 28 synods and 146 Presbyteries; 2,203 ministers; 2,976 churches. Last year there were 108 pastoral relations dissolved and 160 installations—showing that with the theory of settled pastorates, there is still present an itinerant principle. The added members on examination, 13,433. Of adults baptized 3,597. This leads us to infer that about 10,000 of those added had been baptized in infancy. If our calculation be correct, then Infant baptism is very generally practiced. The number of infants baptized the year ending May, 1854, was 12,041.

New School Presbyterians.—Rev. Dr. J. W. M'Lane stated at the same association, that in their body there were 23 synods. 1,650 churches, and 140,000 communicants.

Ministers in Australia.—The British Wesleyans have already in Australia nearly one hundred traveling and local preachers The Missionary Society recently sent out six additional laborers.

The Protestant Episcopal Church have encouragement in their missions in China. Their missionary speaks of one, who, being repelled from the communion for cause, was nevertheless, present, and evinced much feeling on the occasion, hanging down his head and weeping.

Baptists in Texas.—In 1826 Rev. Joseph Boys, a licensed Baptist minister from Illinois, preached near Peach Creek, upon the west side of the Brazos river, within the bounds of Austin's Colony. Rev. Thomas Hanke, an ordained Baptist minister, preached on the east side of the same river in 1829. He is now living in Houston county. The first Baptist Church was organized on the Colorado river in 1833, and the second in Shelby county, in Eastern Texas, in 1835. The "Union Association" was organized in 1840, with three Churches numbering forty-seven members, including three ministers. There are now eleven missionary associations, and about one hundred and fifty ministers, and an equal number of Churches. There are also three anti-mission associations, and about forty churches, with as many ministers. In Texas there are from nine to ten thousand communicants.

Their State Convention was organized in the fall of 1848; and during the year 1853 the Board sustained nine missionaries in destitute portions of the State.

According to the eighth Annual Report of the Board of Domestic Missions of the Southern Baptist Convention, just published, the receipts of the year amount to nearly twenty thousand dollars, being an increase upon the previous year of about $6,000. The expenditures for the last year have been about $18,000. The following is the conclusion of the Report:

SUMMARY OF RESULTS.

Churches and preaching stations supplied during the year, 235; sermons and addresses delivered, 7,603; prayer and other religious meetings attended, 1,700; number of persons baptised, 743; number added by letter and experience, 481; number of Sabbath schools and Bible classes, 79; teachers, 313; pupils, 2,200; meeting houses began during the year, 9; finished, 3; churches constituted, 16; ministers ordained, 10; deacons, 14; number of persons converted but not baptised, 609; Sabbath school teachers converted during the year, 16; pupils, 36; and nine young men are preparing for the ministry.

Methodists Protestants.—We learn from the last number of the Methodist Protestant, published at Baltimore, that the denomination embraces 36 annual conference districts, over 70,000 members, and church property amounting to more than a million of dollars. The last General Conference consisted of 100 members, and the entire ministry, traveling and local, is over sixteen hundred. They have a Book Concern at Baltimore, out of debt and prospering, and another about to be commenced in the West. They have three regular church papers. They have a college at Uniontown, Pa., reported to be in a prosperous condition, and a Board of Missions, located at Pittsburgh, "who are contemplating enlarged usefulness, both at home and abroad."

MISSIONS TO THE NEGROES.—HOW IS THE WORK DONE?

The history of the organization of the Southern half of M. E. Church, pledges it by every obligation of principle and profession to the ardent, indefatigable and persuasive prosecution of the work of teaching the negro slave. Any dereliction of duty here, any sluggishness, any omission in doing the work originally claimed as cause sufficient for breaking the bonds of ecclesiastical union, is treason to history, to the missionary character of Methodism, and to God, the judge of all. Has this field been as fully occupied and as faithfully tilled as the cause demanded, and as the means permitted? This is a grave question for the conscientious consideration of the Conferences of the Church. Pious "Resolves," passed unanimously, do not begin to meet the obligations of the case. They do well as exponents of the faith and feelings of the Church, and of those who administer its affairs. But it is to be considered whether or not they do not go to form a part of that tessolated pavement, which serves as the floor of a certain very bad place. That the censure here implied does not apply to all the Conferences is joyfully admitted. Georgia and South Carolina carefully and efficiently do the work in God's providence assigned; and the fruit of their labors is seen in the frequent reports of missionaries, and in the satisties of those conferences, and in the praise of all the churches, and in the hearty cooperation of the planters, whose approval has been won over from coolness or from opposition, by patent results.

To the best of my knowledge, after enumerating these two conferences, out of some twenty, the praise for full work has to stop. I would not derogate from the claims of any others, but I know that full work has not been performed in some of the others. There is not that vigilant industry demanded by the nature of the case as above referred to; there is not that solemn consideration of means for ends; there is not that rigid exaction of the work required by the schedule; there is not that holy jealousy in having the work well done, which is announced as done, that honesty to the world, and the immense importance of the responsibility sternly demand.

There are more than three millions (3,000,000) of slaves within the limits of our operations. The Methodist and Baptist Churches, almost to the total exclusion of all others, minister to these. The happy absence of form and cast-iron ritual, the energizing presence of evangelical truth in the recognition of—the demand for—experimental godliness, have placed them in this position, combined with the fact that they rejoice to preach the Gospel to the poor. The Baptists, working under the crippling disadvantage of a most inefficient ecclesiastical organization, have done much, and number their communicants by ten thousands. The Methodists, far before them in compactness of organization, in power of concentration, in the persuasive presence of authority, and its correspondent recognition and sense of responsibility, have done more, and should do much more than has been done.

As said above, well-worded resolutions will not meet the case. A careful, sorcrely just inquisition of deficiencies and delinquencies, will show where and how to begin to work; and until this is done, any continuance in the present mode is only an aggravation of the evil. I have no place in the Conference room or in the Bishop's Council, but being an outside spectator, and a deeply interested one, I may see things which would be overlooked or apologized for by the Esprit du Corps, which naturally pervades every privileged association or class. I beg leave to say a word more hereafter.

BIBLE COLLECTIONS IN MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Clinton, Miss., Aug. 30, 1854.

Ma. Editor—Permit me, as the Chairman of the Committee on the Bible Cause, to call the attention of the members of the Mississippi Conference to a resolution passed at our last session, making it the duty of every preacher in charge of a circuit or station, to lift a collection for the benefit of that specific object. While we should do all we can to raise money for our worn out preachers, and the widows and orphans of those who have died in the work, (such being now cut off from all direct benefit arising from the profits of the Book Concern,) and while I would wish, by no means, to compromise the interests of our missionary operations, still I regard our obligations to this sister charity, the Bible Cause, as no less binding, especially in Southern Mississippi, where we have no regular Bible agent. Will you please remind us, in connection with this, what was the particular duties in reference to this matter, made binding on us, by the action of the General Conference? Your Brother in Christ. J. A. Lioht.

We are not aware of any change. Do the best you can, as before. [Ed.

Revival Intelligence.

Daneville, Ala.—We have had a meeting of considerable interest in Dadeville; several added to the Church. I was taken sick during the time, and was compelled to discontinue it. Bros. Sterns and Turner did effectual service. I have been greatly discouraged on account of my health. I still hope the Lord will restore my health, and enable me to do service. There have been accessions to the Church at nearly all the appointments. W. S. Wingfield.

Sept. 2.

Holly Springs, Miss.—We have a revival in Holly Springs at the present time. Forty-four persons have been converted. The work still goes on. D. C. Wells.

Crawford Ct., Ala.—The result, up to this time, of our meetings in Crawford Circuit, is two hundred and twenty whites converted; and on the Uchee Missions (North and South) about one hundred and fifty have joined our Church, and as many we hope born again, and several have professed sanctification. Crawford is our county site, reputed as a wicked place; there has never been any real organization of our Church there, until I came on the circuit. It has sometimes been on the plan and sometimes off. But, dear sir, a change has come over their spirits. There has been a gradual, though slow improvement up to the 3d Sunday in August. We held our missionary meeting, and set in in good earnest, and in nine days we admitted forty-two to the Church on probation; one quite old man (Britt Harris), and several middle-aged and young people not a few. Bros. C. Hays, W. C. Robinson, and F. H. Wardlaw were with me, and God blessed us abundantly.

But I want to tell you something about the Annual Jubilee among the colored people at Mt. Zion. Every year they have a two days' meeting for their servants in the week, and I was with the missionary there last Wednesday and Thursday. On the second morning we had a love feast, and it was a feast of love indeed. At the meeting there was about three hundred; in the love feast about one hundred and fifty; and it would have done you good to have heard them tell their experiences.

Abolitionists would have blushed to have seen how well-dressed and happy they were, but especially if they could listen at old Bro. Sawney tell about waiting on his old master in his last moments, and promising to meet him in Heaven, which he said he would certainly do. I noticed several simply announced—"The Lord has set my soul free from sin. Glory to God. Pray for me."

One said he could "shoot up" a prayer when hewing with his broad axe. One woman said (for they as well as men spoke this religion had made her happy in the corn field and in cotton patch, and at the wash tub and round the cook pot. But I can not describe; yet I never witnessed clearer, more explicit and satisfactory manifestations of true saving faith in any love feast in my life. Oh, sir, these people were happy, happy, and they would pass round, shaking hands with their owners and overseers, when they were all bathed in tears or shouting for joy. I said in my heart glory to God for Colored Missions. Wm. P. Miller.

Farmerville, La.—At a new appointment, on the 13th inst., I closed a four days' meeting with eight accessions. On the 20th at the same place, I closed a five days meeting, resulting in thirty-five accessions, with a goodly number of conversions. Regarding the untoward circumstances, it was one of the most interesting meetings I ever attended. Bro. Bruten was in attendance most of the time, and I was also visited two days by Bro. Hodge of Arkansas. E. W. Griswold.

Aug. 30.

Bayou Mason, La.—We learn that a good state of religious feeling prevails at Shiloh meeting house. Revs. Harp, Knox, Hall and Chaney conducting the meeting. So our informant, Aug. 30th:

"The meeting was protracted but a few days, but during this short time divine power was displayed in converting sinners, reclaiming the backsliders, and reviving the Church. There were fifty-two accessions to the Church, nine black, and the rest white, and two hundred dollars collected for the Sabbath School Library."

Gaston Ct., Ala.—Our Camp-meeting closed this day with the happy conversion of fifty-one souls; thirty-three accessions to the Church—twenty-seven whites and six blacks. The old members were greatly revived; I do not know that I ever saw such a time as we had the last night. I do hope and believe that the revival flame will spread around the circuit. God grant that it may.

Sept. 6. T. Y. Armstrong.

Demopolis, Ala.—Rev. J. D. Fisher writes Sept. 8: "The Linden Camp-meeting closed yesterday morning. Pretty good time. Twenty-five conversions and sixteen accessions to the Church. We commence a protracted meeting to-night. Pray for your old charge by whom you are held in very dear remembrance."

Too Much Freedom.—The Charleston Mercury, in commenting on some of the Northern notices about "Universal Liberty," "A Great Free Democratic Republic," etc., expresses apprehension of some awful calamity to the South. It is impossible (the Mercury says) to peruse the articles under notice, and indeed far the largest portion of the productions of the Northern press, without realizing the justness of Carlyle:

"To such an extreme length is this Democratic tendency going, that liberty, self-guidance demanded for the lowest slaves, for those needing most of all to be governed. And, by and by, we shall even hear of the emancipation of horses. Old Sorrel will get some notions of personal liberty, and will refuse to help Farmer Dobbin in his field; but woe to old foolish Sorrel when winter comes, and he finds that the revolution which he has made has cut off his supply of oats."

HYMENEAL:

MARRIED—In Waterproof, La., on the 8th of September, 1854, by Rev. Stephen J. Davies, ANDREW J. GIBSON and Miss EVELINE C. FOSTER; both parties of Tensas Parish, La.

OBITUARY:

Mrs. MARY PETTWAY departed this life at Alexandria, La., August 10, 1854, aged about eighty-five. She was born in South Hampton county, Va. Came to this State in '34, at the instance of her son, an only child, by whom she was comfortably maintained. She was a consistent member of the Methodist Church, and grace enabled her to bear all patiently. She was old-fashioned in style—somewhat quaint and blunt of speech. The Bible was her daily companion; when she could not read it herself, it was her delight to hear it read by others; and its precious promises, as they had been in life, were her comfort in death. The text for her funeral she selected more than twelve months ago, from Phil. 1:23: "For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ; which is far better." An earnest desire felt for the salvation of one dear member, and who still survives to mourn her loss, no doubt suggested this passage to her mind. May this thought influence him in his hours of mourning to give such heed to the pious counsels of a departed mother as shall cause him to follow her godly example; that in the end he, too, may reap the reward of the Christian—everlasting life through Jesus Christ.

P. M. G.

Alexandria, August 30, 1854.

Departed this life in Lenko county, Miss., on the 11th inst., ANN ELIZA, only daughter of Francis M. and Mary U. Stubbs, formerly of Macon county, Ala., in the fourth year of her age.

The deceased was an interesting child, fondly loved by parents and friends, and her death has covered their hearts with the deepest gloom. Her body was deposited on the following day in the dreamless tomb, there to rest until He who said suffer little children to come unto me, etc., shall call up her sleeping dust to the resurrection of the just.

"Their feeble frames my power shall raise
And mould with heavenly skill;
I'll give them tongues to sing my praise,
And hands to do my will."

SPECIAL NOTICE.

On and after the 1st November next, the subscription price of the New Orleans Christian Advocate will be $2 per annum in advance; if payment be delayed six months, $2 50; at the end of the year, $3.

After a fair and full experiment of two years, it is ascertained that the paper can not be supported at $1 50 per annum. This will be to all our friends and patrons, and to every reasonable person, a sufficient cause for the change. In labor and material there has been a change to higher rates. The price of printing is now 25 per cent. higher in this city than it was a year ago.

This arrangement has the unanimous recommendation of the Publishing Committees. It puts the New Orleans Advocate at the same rates with the family of Advocates, and the end will.

THE "ADVOCATE."

Labor is high. Living is high. Materials high. We are publishing the Advocate a heavy weekly cash expense. We need every weekly cash receipts. Much can be done in extending our circulation and keeping us in funds at the approaching fall meetings. Bring the paper before the meeting. Collect and remit.

Notice.

There will be a Camp-meeting at Bethel, Wilkinson county, Mississippi, commencing on Wednesday before the first Sabbath in October next. Preachers generally are invited.

Our City Wars.

It must be confessed that a most anomalous, unprecedented and disgraceful state of affairs has existed in our city during the whole of the present week. The days have been peaceable, quiet and orderly: the nights disorderly, unquiet and bloody. The civil power has been utterly paralyzed, and a portion of the city been virtually under military law for twelve out of the twenty-four hours. Men have been attacked, beaten and shot down; houses have been gutted and armed bands paraded through the streets half drunk, with threats and exciting cries.

HORRIBLE MURDER IN THE FOURTH DISTRICT.—There was a good deal of excitement, prevailing in the Fourth District yesterday originating in the fact that a child two years and four months of age had been inhumanly murdered by a man named William Young. The child was dead and the Coroner had been called upon to hold an inquest. The child's name was Christian Ithom, it was born in Germany and had been adopted by Young and his wife. The witnesses before the Coroner's Jury testified that Young had been in the habit of beating the child most cruelly, hanging it up by the neck and then beating it with a cane, besides starving it for days at a time, and finally on Monday last injuring it by blows on the head so badly that it died the same night. After hearing the testimony the jury returned a verdict in accordance with the above facts. The parties, Young and his wife, were arrested and yesterday were brought up for examination before Recorder Jackson. The testimony substantiate the charge of this fiendish murder in all its horrible details, and as the evidence of the witnesses was given, so horrible were the circumstances that it was feared the people would take the law in their own hands. The Recorder finally committed the accused for trial before the First District Court.

NINTH MISSISSIPPI.—Reliable accounts from North Mississippi, as late as the 30th of August, assure us (says the Mississippian) that there has been almost an entire failure in the cotton crop. A very intelligent planter of Marshall county states that the crop of that county will not average more than a bale to four acres.

CHOLERA IN KNOXVILLE, TENN.—The following is an extract from a letter received in Nashville a few days ago:

KNOXVILLE, September 5, 1854.—Dear Sir: I regret much to inform you that we have cholera in a very malignant form in our usually healthy city. There have been cases occurring for some weeks, but on Thursday last it assumed an epidemic character, and since that time there have been, I should suppose, fifty cases or more, and full one-half of the cases have proved fatal. Never having had this disease here before, it produced, as a matter of course, a great consternation, and at this time there is little food for the fatal visitant. The stores and taverns are closed, and business generally is suspended, and most of those who could fly have left.

There were fifteen deaths from yellow fever in Charleston during the twenty-four hours ending on the 6th.

In Savannah the total number of deaths for the week ending on the 5th was 123, of which 74 were of yellow fever.

There were 23 interments on the 4th, of which 18 were of yellow fever. This is said to be the largest day's mortality ever known in Savannah.

HEALTH OF MOBILE.—By reference to the Sexton's report, it will be seen that the number of deaths for the week ending the 9th are twenty eight, five of which are from yellow fever. This is a slight increase in the bills of mortality, but we are not at all surprised, considering the oppressive heat with which we have lately been visited. Three were brought to the city in a dying state, and all but one were hospital patients.

The reader will perceive that for the last two days there have been no deaths from this disease, consequently no increase is expected. None of the cases mentioned, the Sexton informs us, were citizens. The Evening News says: "We are assured by one of our physicians, that no case of yellow fever exists in our city at present, so there is still no cause for alarm." [Mobile Register, 10th.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.—It is believed by many that the blocks of marble presented to the Washington Monument Association materially aid in the erection of the monument. The following statement, furnished the Globe, will serve to disabuse the minds of many of this impression?

The average cost of each block sent by the States is about $2,000, exclusive of freight, committees to bring them on, etc. The aggregate for the thirty-one stones, $62,000 Average cost of the obelisk per foot, about $1,000; consequently the $62,000 which the blocks furnished by the States would cost, would put 62 feet on the obelisk. The 31 stones are not equal to one-quarter of a foot in the obelisk, and, as aid to the monument, would amount to only about $250, if the material was all of good quality; but as it is not all suitable for the work, its value is proportionately less. The additional expense of raising blocks, such as furnished by New York city, is about $1,000.

MORE TROUBLES WITH THE IRISH.—The following picture of scenes on a Sabbath day in Boston shows that this class of people are about as troublesome in that city as in New Orleans. We copy from the Courier of the 4th inst.:

About 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon, a drunken Irishman was staggering through Sea street. His son was endeavoring to conduct him home; but the old brute knocked him down. Thereupon officer Hawkins took hold of the man, and was assisting to carry him home, when some one threw a brick and the officer fell. This opened a general fight. Captain Enton, with a large posse of police, was soon on hand, and after a long struggle the drunkard and seven others were arrested and conveyed to jail. Soon after this officer Pratt and others of the police were passing through Beach street with a man whom they had arrested in Sea street. A mob fell upon them, assaulted them, and rescued the prisoner. A reinforcement of police was soon at hand and the prisoner was retaken. Again, soon after, there was another fight, growing out of an attempt on the part of the officers to arrest a drunken man. Several officers were badly beaten and twelve or fourteen men were arrested.

The Washington National Intelligencer says: "Some of the papers doubt whether Captain Hollins can be held personally responsible for the destruction of the goods and merchandize of Calvand Durand at Greytown. Do they remember the case of Harmony & Co., in which a recovery was had against Colonel Mitchell, of the army, for the seizure of their goods in New Mexico? In the latter case there was a declared war, and Gen Taylor gave the order; in the present case there was no war by the proper authorities. But the Government will sureely seek to shun improper responsibility."

ABDUCTION CASE IN WHEELING.—The Times has the following: An Irishwoman, a widow, resided in the family of a gentleman now living in the country. They lived in the city up to the last of July. This woman was a member of the Romish Church and remains such; but she has not for some years attended the confession regularly. She had a daughter, a little girl of some twelve or thirteen years of age, for whom she got a place in a good Protestant family on the Island, at 50 cents a week. About the time the family were going into the country, an Irishman went to the house and said the woman wanted her daughter to come and see her. The lady, with whom she lived, suspecting that all was not right, would not let her go. A few days after, a woman of this city went to the house and told the girl that her mother had died of cholera, and that she had come after her to go and see her buried. The child was permitted to go, and neither the family with whom she lived nor the mother can find her or obtain any satisfaction as to where she is. The one who enticed her away, under false pretences, is well known.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

NEW YORK, September 12.—The New York and Havre steamship St. Louis has arrived here with dates from Liverpool to the 30th of August, four days later than the accounts brought by the Africa. Her advices report a good demand in the Cotton market at Liverpool, with an advance of ⅛d for the grades below Middling. The sales of Monday, the 28th, and Tuesday, the 29th of August, were stated at 8000 bales each day. The market for Breadstuffs was dull, and prices were generally lower. Flour had declined 1s 6d to 2s per bbl. Wheat had fallen off 9d per 70 lbs. The depression was caused mostly by the condition of the weather, which was very favorable for the harvests.

Indian Corn was in good demand, and prices had advanced 1s per quarter.

The Messy market at London was easy, and Cassels had considerably advanced, closing at 95 to 95½.

Trade in the manufacturing districts had slightly improved, with a fair demand.

OPERATIONS IN THE BALTIC.—The French troops at Bucharest had re-embarked, and were expected to make a descent upon the coast of Finland, in the westward of Helsingfors.

THE BLACK SEA—THE CRIMEA EXPEDITION.—The latest advices from the Black Sea state that the expedition to the Crimea was to sail from Varna on the 30th of August. Transports to the number of 600 were prepared, on board which 70,000 troops, composing the main body of the expedition, were to embark.

NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—The bark Augusta, having a large number of George Law's muskets on board, sailed from this port to-day on a secret expedition. Some believe that she has been fitted out and ladened for Alvarz. The steamer Ben Franklin is nearly ready for sea, and is expected to leave in a day or two.

FURTHER FROM SANTA FE.

Massacre of Lieut. Fleming and Party.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 12.—Information of an authentic nature has been received here, that Lieut. Fleming, with a party of twenty men, has been massacred by the Indians, near Fort Laramie. The Lieutenant and his party left the fort in pursuit of some Indians, who had killed an ox belonging to an emigrant party, and it is believed, by a preconcerted plan, was drawn into an ambush, where he and his whole party were murdered. Fort Laramie was surrounded by the Indians, and there is reason to fear that it has been destroyed."

The Indians had proceeded to the American Fur Company's Station, which they had destroyed, and carried off goods to the value of fifteen thousand dollars.

A difficulty had occurred at Santa Fé, between Majors Wrightman and F. S. X. Aubrey, in which the former killed Major Aubrey.

Fire in Missouri.

ST. LOUIS, September 12.—A large fire occurred in Brunswick, Missouri, on Sunday last, which destroyed nineteen houses.

The German papers announce that a treaty, offensive and defensive, will soon be concluded between Austria and the Western Powers.

Ships bound for England.

Five ships of war passed through the Great Belt [one of the entrances to the Baltic] on the 20th of August, bonded [with prisoners?] bound for England.

Belgium.

France.

The St. Louis brings no news of any importance from France. The harvests were good, and prices in the Corn markets were tending downward.

Asia—Battle of Kars.

The Turkish account of the battle of Kars has been received. It states that the result was entirely indecisive; that the lose on both sides amounted to 5000 men; that among the killed was Hussein Pacha, and among the wounded Mustapha Pacha, and that three Generals were wounded.

The Empire City.

NEW YORK, September 12.—The steamer Empire City has arrived from the Isthmus with one million and eighty-six thousand dollars worth of gold.

Steamer Santa Anna.

GATHERING OF CATHOLICS AT ROME.—The Paris Univers states that a grand council of Roman Catholic Bishops from all parts of the world is to assemble at Rome at the end of next October, to deliberate on the question of the immaculate conception of the Most Holy Virgin, and finally to settle what is the true dogma of the Roman Church on that point. The Univers says that "it is probable that the 18th of December of this year will witness the accomplishment of the universal wish."

Terrific Gale.

Immense Damage to Property—Several Vessels Injured and Ashore—The Battery and Wharves Washed to Pieces—Houses Demolished and Unroofed—Boats Flying in some of the Principal Streets—Anxiety Respecting the People on Sullivan's Island

When penning our weather paragraph for yesterday's paper, we had no expectation of being today called upon to furnish a partial description of one of the most protracted, violent and destructive gales ever experienced in this section of the country. After high easterly winds, accompanied by heavy seas, had prevailed for several days, a gale commenced blowing on Thursday night, soon increased to a tempest, and continued to rage throughout yesterday and last night, with the most frightful fury. On Thursday night, and yesterday forenoon, the wind was from the East by E. N. E., but about three o'clock yesterday afternoon it shifted to the South-east.

Owing to the danger of venturing into the street, the difficulties that beset the pedestrian at every turn, and the fear of being knocked down by the tiles and slates that were tumbling from almost every roof, and the limbs of trees, signs, etc., that were occasionally seen flying in all directions, our reporters were unable to make as complete returns of the amount of damage as could have been desired. Their report, however, is sufficiently ample to show that thousands upon thousands of dollars worth of property had been destroyed up to last evening, and that so far as regards trees, etc., it will take years of time to repair the damage. Up to the hour of writing we have not heard of the loss of a single life.

THE BATTERY DESPOILED.

The pride and ornament of our city—the beautiful Battery—on which so much time and money has been expended, is rendered a perfect waste. Nearly all the stone facing and breakwater, which was believed to be capable of withstanding any sea, has been materially injured. The sea was making a complete breach over the highest portions of the wall yesterday morning, at which time the spectacle was exhilimely grand and terrific. The wild, irresistible breakers, as they dashed forward, carried with them the wood-work, and, in some instances, even the stone-flagging, and, as they receded, would leave all a chaotic wreck. The bathing house was still standing last evening, but the bridge connecting it with the Battery had been swept away. The trees on White Point Garden, which had, at length commenced growing finely, and gave promise of soon affording the visitors a cool shade from the scorching rays of the summer's sun, have been, it is anticipated, irretrievably ruined. We heard it estimated that it would cost at least twenty thousand dollars and ten years of time to restore the Battery to the condition it was in before the commencement of the storm.

SULLIVAN'S ISLAND—ANXIETY OF THOSE HAVING FRIENDS THEREIN—UNSUCCESSFUL ATTEMPT TO REACH THE PLACE, ETC.

The utmost anxiety prevailed among our citizens yesterday evening respecting the condition of the large number of persons congregated on Sullivan's Island. From the great height of the water in this vicinity, it was naturally supposed that the Island was completely submerged, and that the inhabitants and visitors, many of whom make that place their home during the summer season, were in distress. To add to the anxiety, the weather was so dark and the sea-spray and rain were so thick throughout a large portion of the day that the Island was hidden from view. What was still worse, a rumor was set afloat that the roof of the Moultrie House was believed to have been destroyed. Happily, this story was dissipated in the day by the fact that the cupola of the hotel was distinctly seen from the different points in the city. This circumstance, however, did not altogether allay the excitement among those having relatives and friends on the Island, and every effort was made to induce people owning vessels to venture down for the purpose of ascertaining the true state of affairs there.

Towards noon, the gallant Captain Payne, of the steam-tug Aid, generously concluded that he would make an effort to reach the Island. He gave orders to "fire up," and at 2½ o'clock his vessel left her moorings and started out on one of the most fearful excursions ever voluntarily undertaken. Many gentlemen, who were anxious to hear from their friends on the Island, had hastily congregated on board, among them our reporter, who, although an "old salt" himself, says he never went on a more tempestuous or hazardous voyage. The waves were rolling mountains high at the time, and the wind was howling with rage. While three men were standing at the wheel, the gale swept off the pilot-house, and left them perfectly exposed. The Aid proceeded as near the cove at this end of the island as she could conveniently get, but finding the old Point House washed away, it was concluded unsafe to venture further. (The Point House, it will be borne in mind, has been one of the guides to the pilots on their way to the Island.) The weather was so thick and hazy that not a house on the Island could be descried from the boat. On discovering that it would be impossible for the Aid to render service to those on the Island, Capt Payne returned and safely quartered his vessel in the Ashley River.

A meeting was held by those on board, and resolutions returning thanks to Capt. Payne for his humane, noble and generous conduct were adopted.

From what we can learn, it is the opinion of well-informed persons that the people on the island were perfectly safe. The Moultrie House and Fort Moultrie were safe when last seen, and would doubtless so continue. They, with the houses in the vicinity, would hold all the people on the island.

THE STORM IN THE COUNTRY.

As yet we have heard nothing respecting the extent of the storm in the country. Many of the telegraphic poles are down, and not a line of news by the wires was received from any quarter yesterday. From the vast amount of marsh weed, etc., floating in the rivers, it is feared that immense and irretrievable damage has been done to the rice and other plantations; many of the rice fields have no doubt been overflowed, and the crop utterly ruined. Millions will not repair the loss of property destroyed by the storm in this State alone.

The Latest.

At the time our paper went to press, three o'clock this morning, the violence of the gale had somewhat abated; the wind having shifted around to the south-east, however, is considered unfavorable for the shipping in the harbor and docks.

Since the 1st of January forty-five vessels are known to have been injured by lightning, and were it possible to procure a list of all the vessels damaged in this way, it is probable the foregoing number would be nearly doubled. Four vessels were struck in January, one in February, three in March, eleven in April, two in May, six in June, nine in July, and nine in August. Notwithstanding all these mishaps, but three live and two vessels were lost. The schooner Nebraska was struck on the 14th of April, fifty-four miles W. S. W. of Ship Island. The fluid caused the vessel to be completely enveloped in flames in a few minutes, and the crew had barely time to escape with a jug of water, a few biscuit and the chronometer. They were shortly after picked up. The other vessel, which was only partially lost, was the schooner A. W. Denslow, belonging to the Galveston trade. She was also struck and set on fire, on the 14th of April. Finding it impossible to subdue the fire, she was scuttled and sunk in shallow water.

DEATH OF A VOTARY OF SCIENCE.—Those who have read the journal of Col. Fremont will recollect that frequent mention is made of the name of Charles Preuse. It is now our painful duty to announce that the lifeless remains of this estimable gentleman and votary of science were found near Bindensburg, about six miles from the city, yesterday morning. A Coroner's inquest was held over this body of the deceased, and the verdict in effect was, that the deceased, being in a deranged state of mind, had taken his life by hanging. This is the melancholy end of a man of superior talents, high scientific attainments, and of great moral worth. [Washington Union, 8.

The Late Riot at St. Mary's Market

From the Daily Crescent of Tuesday

THE RIOT AT ST. MARY'S MARKET.—The unfortunate disturbances which commenced in the neighborhood of St. Mary's market on Saturday evening, we grieve to say, were renewed on Sunday night again, with more fatal and melancholy results. A thousand stories are afloat in relation to the occurrences of Sunday night, and it is almost impossible to arrive at a correct version of the affair. On Sunday, however, there was a good deal of excitement, growing out of the disturbances of the previous night—and a large party of persons had assembled in the neighborhood of St. Mary's market—around the coffee houses, and having been all day drinking, of course, towards night they became very noisy and boisterous, making all sorts of threats, and firing off guns and pistols. About 10 o'clock in the evening, Mr. Grinnell, of the firm of Leeds & Co., Mr John Mitchell, foreman of the same establishment, and Mr Green, a relative of Mr. Grinnell, all old residents of the Ward, and citizens of the highest respectability and most peaceable demeanor, who were taking a walk down Annunciation street, happened to pass by a coffee-house, when a loud-mouthed fellow came to the door and yelled forth—"A hundred dollars for the head of a Know-Nothing," and at the same time discharged a pistol in the air. The fellow, says the Evening Delta, presenting three respectable citizens walking past, then ran out, and standing in their front, asked in an insolent manner, "where they were going?" "Where we please!" was the answer of Mr. Grinnell, who added "that they were peaceable citizens, and had a right to go where they pleased." Whereupon the man ran back to the grogshop, gave a whoop, and a gang of more than twenty men ran out and commenced firing at the three citizens. One of them held his pistol so near Mr Grinnell's face and fired, that "he was burnt with the powder"—the ball, however, glanced from his jaw-bone without inflicting a serious hurt. Another ball struck his hand, and inflicted a slight wound. Mr Grinnell then succeeded in escaping. Mr Green was not so fortunate. He was knocked down and beaten until he was insensible, and left on the banquette. Mr Mitchell escaped, ran home, and securing a pistol, returned to the scene of outrage, where he found Mr Green terribly beaten. He succeeded in carrying him home. After this affair there was a constant fusillade at Faschnet's Beer Garden. A good many pistols were fired into and from the garden, and several persons narrowly escaped.

Recorder Summers being in the neighborhood early in the evening, and hearing shots fired went out to see what was going on. At Reilly's coffee-house he found assembled about 150 persons, all armed with muskets. They were just leaving, and the Recorder went into Reilly's and told him that he had better close up his house, as there would probably be a row, and, should one take place, he (the Recorder) would not be responsible for the safety of his property. Reilly refused—said he knew nothing about the parties who had been there, and would not close his house. The Recorder then left and went in search of some officers, but the only one he found was Corporal Sullivan, the Police. It appears, were all in citizen's dress. Hearing some heavy firing in the direction of the market, the Recorder next directed his steps towards that point, accompanied by Corporal Sullivan. On the way he met one of his own policemen hurrying along the street with a loaded musket in his hand. Mr Summers stopped him, and inquired what he was doing with that musket? He replied that he was bound to defend himself. The Recorder disarmed him, and told him to go home, and then carried the musket to the house of Mr. Bernard Wheelehan. In the meantime the firing had increased, and the Recorder again called forth to command the peace. Passing along Annunciation street his attention was attracted to four men who were standing outside the banquette, near an awning. As he came under the awning, opposite to them, they leveled their muskets, and three of them fired at him, the powder burning his face, as close were they together. The fourth had his musket resting against the awning, taking deliberate aim, and was in the act of firing at the Recorder, when Sullivan, who had sprung to the other side, struck at him with his club, thus deranging his aim and probably saving the Recorder's life. The four took to their heels and fled. The Recorder discharged a small pistol after the retreating ruffians, but without effect. Mr. Summers, after this narrow escape, buried himself in trying to command the peace until the riot subsided. He says the principal portion of the rioters were armed with muskets.

Yesterday there was considerable excitement about town in regard to the unfortunate occurrences of the previous night, but it was the belief and sincere hope of all good citizens that nothing further of a disagreeable nature would occur. At the present writing all is quiet, and we sincerely hope may continue in the same state—and we think will if the authorities but do their duty.

The report of the manner in which Mr Grinnell and his friends had been used soon reached St Charles street as also of the firing that was being kept up about the market, and further that the rioters contemplated making an attack on the armory at the corner of Levis and St. Charles streets. The police were all called in, and an express sent off for the Mayor and for a reinforcement of the police from the lower Districts. In the meantime a number of citizens took upon themselves the responsibility of guarding the armory, while another party repaired to St. Mary's market to quell the riot. Arriving there a firing was commenced and kept up for some time on both sides, during which several persons were badly wounded. The firing was tremendous for some time, and, to add to the confusion and alarm, a fire-bell was rung about half-past 12 o'clock. The Mayor shortly after arrived on the ground, accompanied by a police force and a number of citizens; but the firing had now ceased, and order seemed to reign in Warsaw. Nobody, however, was arrested, which does not speak very loudly in favor of our efficient police.

In this affray, aside from Mr. Grinnell, a man named Gilpatrick, was badly shot in the head, and is not expected to live. Policeman McMahon was shot in the side, wounded slightly; an old Spaniard was wounded, which we believe, is about the amount of the killed, wounded and missing by this disturbance.

From the same paper of Wednesday.

CONTINUATION OF THE RIOTS—Bloodshed.—When we closed our report of the disgraceful riots which have kept our usually quiet city in a feverish state of excitement ever since last Saturday evening, it was with the hope that we would not be again called upon to record further scenes of disorder, riot and blood-shed; but, alas, the occurrences of Sunday night it seems were only the beginning of the end—which, we fear, is not yet. About eight o'clock on Monday night, reports were freely circulated that parties of man were congregating in armed squads, in the vicinity of St. Mary's Market for the purpose of renewing the disturbances. In a short time after this rumor—and a thousand others still more exciting—had reached the central portion of the District, a large crowd had assembled in Lafayette Square. A committee was appointed to visit the neighborhood of St. Mary's Market, and ascertain the truth of the reports. During the absence of this committee, and they did not return till near eleven o'clock, reports of all kinds were brought from the upper portion of the city to the effect that persons of the Know-Nothings—or American party—had been fired upon, and that the Irish were filing out of houses and from behind fences. A good deal of excitement was manifested by the crowd as each successive courier arrived and delivered himself of his budget of rumors, and some of the hot-headed young men were for marching to the scene at once; but the conservatives were strong enough and had sufficient influence to keep them in check. A very large majority of the Americans were determined that nothing rash or ill-advised should be done; that if a disturbance did take place they would not be the aggressors, but would use every effort to command the peace and uphold the dignity of the State, and so awaited quietly till the committee should report. In the meantime, Major Lewis proceeded to the upper portion of the District, met the crowds of armed men, who were Irishmen, addressed them, and requested that they would retire and not commit any breach of the peace. His Honor addressed himself in particular to Capt. Cavanaugh, who was with a large party of men: told him that it was his wish that they should disperse, and that the other party did not contemplate making any attack or disturbing the peace, unless forced to it. Mr. Cavanaugh expressed his willingness to comply with the request of the Mayor, but Dr. J. J. Meighan, who keeps a drug-store in the vicinity, stepped forward, armed with a sword and fire-arms, and said they "would not disperse or lay aside their arms, but were determined to defend themselves," or some thing to that effect. The Mayor then returned to the City Hall, as did also the committee, and reported all quiet, with the exception of these bands of armed men parading around the streets and assembled at the corners.

About this time there was an alarm of fire, which caused the crowd around the square to disperse. Here the matter would have ended, had it not been for some mischief maker who spread the report that the Know-Nothings were assembling to burn St. Patrick's Church. About two hundred Irish promptly marched, armed with guns and pistols, under the command of Dr Meighan, to the protection of that edifice; when they reached the church they discovered a party coming up Camp street, as they supposed to attack the church, and immediately commenced firing upon them, and a general fight ensued, which resulted in the death of two men and two others severely wounded.

The bodies of the two dead men were taken to the Watch-house and discovered to be Edward Johnson, a man aged about thirty years, who was shot through the head by two balls from a gun, which were, from the position of the wounds, evidently fired from an elevated place. The other was a man by the name of Gillespie, also an Irishman, who was found on the sidewalk shot through the shoulder—the carotid artery being severed, causing his death by hemorrhage; he had also a severe cut with a knife in the back.

Another man by the name of Mallovern was found supporting himself by a pillar at the corner of Julia and Camp, badly shot in the side, two balls having entered his body. Near the same spot a man by the name of McAdams was also found badly cut. They are both in the Charity Hospital.

The dispersion of one party soon produced comparative quiet, and several policemen came on the ground, two of whom, Nixon and Hornsby, were particularly active and efficient; they succeeded in tracing Dr. Meighan into the alley near St. Patrick's Church; when found, he had the large sword which he had worn at St. Mary's market and his pistol in his hands, but surrendered himself without offering any resistance, and was taken to the Watch-house, where he now awaits a trial.

After the affair on Camp street, Col. Forno solicited the Mayor for authority to order out his battalion (the National Guards), which, after some hesitation, was granted, and in a few minutes the Guards promptly mustered, armed themselves, and march'd through the principal streets of the District. The disturbances of the night ended here.

As we write, however, the military are under arms, having been ordered out by the Mayor to command the peace and quell disturbances, and the streets are filled with excited crowds.

From the same of Thursday.

THE DISTURBANCES.—We sincerely hoped and believed, when we closed our last report of the riotous disturbances, that quiet had been restored and that the fair fame of our city would not again be dishonored by excesses and acts of lawlessness. But we were doomed to be again disappointed. It is not our desire to comment upon these silly but unfortunate affairs and give them any more importance than they really possess—nor do we think any good end would thereby be gained—therefore we will at once proceed to a statement of the facts, hoping that when we have got through it may be the last of the riots that we shall have any thing to say about. A good deal of excitement was visible in St Charles street street and about Lafayette Square, in which the military were assembled by order of the Mayor, up to about 11 o'clock at night, when the crowd began to disperse, and peacefully dispersed citizens went home. A report having been circulated among some of the boys to the effect that on the previous night guns and pistols had been discharged from a coffee-house on Levee street, between Girod and Lafayette, a party of about an hundred started for that place. They attacked the house and completely demolished it, breaking up the furniture, bar and counter, and driving the inmates into the upper portion of the house. About a dozen shots were fired into the house, and it is said they were intended for Duffy, as the cry was "to kill the scoundrel" from all sides. A man, Barney Boylan, who boarded at the house, ran out and crossed Levee street, where he was fired upon and wounded in the leg. Another man who had just arrived from Louisville, named John Kane and was stopping at the house, in attempting to escape from the house was stopped by the crowd who demanded of him "will you be American or Irish?" he replied, half frightened to death, that he was an American but seeing at the same moment a chance to run, he started down Levee street. About fifty shots were fired at him, and the crowd ran in pursuit. The poor fellow turned up Lafayette street towards the Levee, and as he got in front of John Corbett's coffee-house, which had been closed, he was overtaken by the crowd. An eye-witness to this occurrence informs us that he was here shot, notwithstanding a strong effort was made by some of the party to save him, who expostulated with the crowd and begged them not to kill the poor fellow; but the cries of "shoot the d—l," were loud and long, and shoot him it is believed they did.

Our informant states that they then picked him up and carried him away with them. We followed a track of blood for some distance down Fulton street. The body of Kane has not been found, nor has he since been heard of, although search had been instituted yesterday morning by his friends. It appears he was a quiet, inoffensive man, who had just arrived in the city on business, and knew nothing of the disturbance.

All this disturbance took place about 11 o'clock, while the military and police were about Lafayette Square, but they heard not knew nothing of it till morning. Shortly after this occurrence the military started out on a "voyage" of discovery, and after passing through the entire upper portion of the city, and finding all quiet, they returned to the Square and dispersed.

A young man named James Porter was most foully murdered at the corner of Tchoupitoulas and Susette streets at a late hour of the night, while returning to his home in the Fourth District. He was a clerk employed in the stave and lumber-yard of Gravino, Leddo & Co., at the corner of Levee and St James streets, who resides on St. Mary street, in the Fourth District, was shot through the head and instantly killed at the above place, where his body was found a short time subsequently. He was a very peaceable man and a good citizen, and it appears had not participated in any of the disturbances.

At the present writing all is quiet, and we think it may be safely said that the excitement has terminated.

From the same of Friday.

THE RIOTS ENDED.—We think it may be safely said that the disturbances which have disgraced our city during the past four days have terminated. Order reigned throughout the city on Wednesday night, and nothing has occurred since to mar the peace.

THE DEAD ALIVE.—During the attack on Tim Duffy's Coffee-house on Tuesday night last, our readers will recollect it was supposed that a man named John Kane had been killed, under circumstances of a most revolting character. We are happy to be able to state that the man is still alive, and likely to live, although badly wounded—being shot in four places. The story of his adventures, as related by himself, is as follows: He arrived from Louisville the day previous, and took lodgings at Duffy's. About 11 o'clock Tuesday night, he was seated in the bar-room in company with a companion when a crowd came in front of the door. Duffy and his friends immediately rushed to the doors, closed them, and hurried up stairs, leaving himself and his companion seated in the bar-room. The crowd rushed into the house and commenced shooting, and demolishing the property. Kane jumped up and attempted to leave, but was assaulted by the mob, and twice shot—one ball struck him in the breast and passing through the flesh lodged near the left shoulder; the other he received in the neck, near the carotid artery. He then fled into the street, was fired after, shot in the arm and thigh, and pursued by the crowd. He turned down Lafayette street; and as he arrived in front of Corbett's, where he fell, the crowd came up, and thinking him dead passed on.

In a few moments a couple of gentlemen, one of them named Phelps, happening to pass that way, and hearing his groans, picked him up and conveyed him to the Circus Street Infirmary, where his wounds were dressed, and yesterday he was removed to the Charity Hospital, and will, in all probability, recover.

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—The report of this institution for the last four days, commencing at 5 o'clock on Saturday evening, does not give us a very favorable opinion of the health on the city, to-wit:

Admitted	273
Discharged	148
Died of yellow fever	95

A JOLLY PRIEST IN LIMBO.—Last evening, a short, thick-set, rosy-cheeked and well-dressed man was seen rollicking around in the streets at the north part of the city, in a state of the most blissful "balminess," evidently from the effects of some liquid exhilaration which had overcome his sober faculties. Officer Reed at length took him into custody, whereupon the prisoner declared that he was a Catholic priest, belonging to Cleveland, Ohio; and begged to be saved the disgrace of being locked up. As his appearance gave credence to his statement, the officer obligingly lodged him at the Jefferson House, in North street, instead of taking him to the police station.

During the night the priest made his escape from the hotel, and was afterwards found in the street in a more intoxicated state than before, and having besides lost or been robbed of a valuable gold watch. He was taken by officer Hill to the 2d police station, but threatened that he would recover from the city "a thousand dollars for every moment" he was imprisoned—which rate, reckoning to the time he was brought into the Police Court and let off with the fine of $5 and costs, would make him "independent" in wealth, as he certainly was of all proper deportment.

In the first instance he gave his name as Bernard Carhan, and subsequently as

The Sea Furies.... By Alfred Tennyson

Slow sailed the weary mariners and saw
Betwixt the green brink and the running foam
Sweet faces, rounded arms and bosoms, prest'd
To little harps of gold; and while they mused,
Whispering to each other half in fear,
Shrill music reached them on the middle sea.

Whither away, whither away, whither away? Fly no more,
Whither away from the bright green fields, and the happy blossoming shore?
Day and night to the billow, the fountain calls,
Down shower the gambling waterfalls
From wandering over the lea:
Out of the live green heart of the dells
They freshen the silvery crimson shells
And thick with white bells the clover hill swells
High over the full toned sea.
O hither, come hither, and frolic and play;
Here it is only the mew that wails;
We will sing to you all the day;
Mariner, mariner, furl your sails,
For here are the blissful downs and dales,
And merrily, merrily carol the gales,
And the spangle dances in bight and bay,
And the rainbow forms and flies on the land
Over the islands free;
And the rainbow hangs on the poising wave,
And sweet is the color of cove and cave,
And sweet shall your welcome be.
O hither, come hither, and be our lords,
For merry brides are we:
We will kiss sweet kisses, and speak sweet words:
O listen, listen, your eyes shall glisten,
When pleasure, and love, and jubilee!
O listen, listen, your eyes shall glisten
When the sharp, clear twang of the golden chords
Runs up the ridged sea!
Who can light on as happy a shore
All the world o'er, all the world o'er?
Whither away? Listen and stay; mariner, mariner, fly no more!

Columbus Discovering America.

At sunrise on the second day, some rushes recently torn up were seen near the vessels. A plank evidently hewn by an ax, a stick skillfully carved by some cutting instrument, a bough of hawthorn in blossom; and, lastly, a bird's nest, built on a branch which the wind had broken, and full of eggs, on which the parent bird was sitting amid the gently rolling waves; were seen floating past on the waters. The sailors brought on board these living and inanimate witnesses of their approach to land. They were a voice from the shore confirming the assurances of Columbus. Before the land actually appeared in sight, its neighborhood was inferred from these marks of life. The mutineers fell on their knees to the Admiral whom they had insulted but the day before, craved pardon for their mistrust, and struck up a hymn of thanksgiving to God for associating them with this triumph. Night fell on these songs of the Church welcoming a new world.

The Admiral gave orders that the sails should be close-reefed, and the lead kept going; and, that they should sail slowly, being afraid of breakers and shoals, and feeling certain that the first gleam of day-break would discover land under their bows. On that last anxious night none slept. Impatient expectation had removed all heaviness from their eyes; the pilots and the seamen, clinging about the masts, yards and shrouds, each tried to keep the best place and the closest watch to get the earliest sight of the new hemisphere.

The Admiral had offered a reward to the first who should cry "Land," provided his announcement was verified by its actual discovery. Providence, however, reserved to Columbus himself this first glimpse, which he had purchased at the expense of twenty years of his life, and of untiring perseverance amidst such dangers. While walking the quarter-deck alone at mid night, and sweeping the dark horizon with his keen eye, a gleam of fire passed and disappeared, and again showed itself on the level of the waves. Fearful of being deceived by the phosphorescence of the sea, he quietly called a Spanish gentleman of Isabella's Court, named Guttierez in whom he had more confidence than in the pilots, pointed out the direction in which he had seen the light, and asked him whether he could discern any thing there. Guttierez replied that he did indeed see a flickering light in that quarter. To make indeed still more sure, Columbus called Rodrigo Sanches, of Segovia, another in whom he had confidence. Sanches had no more hesitation that Guttierez in pronouncing that there was a light on the horizon. But the blaze was hardly seen before it again disappeared in the ocean. to show itself anew the next moment, whether it was the light of a fire on a low shore alternately appearing and disappearing beyond the broken horizon, or whether it was the floating beacon of a fisherman's boat now rising on the waves, and now sinking in the trough of the sea. Thus, both land and safety appeared together in the shape of fire to Columbus and his two friends, on the night between the 11th and 12th of October, 1492.

The Admiral, enjoining silence to Rodrigo and Guttierez, kept his observation to himself, for fear of again raising false hopes and giving a bitter disappointment to his ships' companies. He lost sight of the light, and remained on deck until two in the morning, praying, hoping and despairing alone, awaiting the triumph or the return on which the morrow was to decide. He was seized with that anguish which precedes the great discoveries of truth, like the struggle which anticipates the liberation of the soul by death, when a cannon-shot, sounding over the sea a few hundred yards in advance of him, burst upon his ear—the announcement of a new-born world, which made him tremble and fall upon his knees. It was the signal of land in sight! made by firing a shot, as had been arranged by the Pinta, which was sailing in advance of the squadron, to guide their course and take soundings. At this signal a general shout of "Land, ho!" arose from all the yards and rigging of the ships. The sails were furled, and day-break was anxiously awaited. The mystery of the ocean had breathed its first whisper in the bosom of night. Day-break would clear it up openly to every eye. Delicious and unknown perfumes reached the vessels from the outline of the shore, with the roar of the waves upon the reef and the soft land-breeze. The fire seen by Columbus indicated the presence of man, and of the first element of civilization.

Never did the night appear so long in clearing away from the horizon; for this horizon was to Columbus and his companions a second creation of God. The dawn, as it spread over the sky, gradually raised the shore of an island from the waves. Its distant extremities were lost in the morning mist. It ascended gradually, like an amphitheatre, from the low beach to the summit of the hills, whose dark-green covering contrasted strongly with the blue expanse. Within a few paces of the foam of the waves breaking on the yellow sand, forests of tall and unknown trees stretched away, one above another, over the successive terraces of the island. Green valleys and bright clefts in the hollows afforded a half glimpse into these mysterious wilds. Here and there could be discovered a few scattered huts, which, with their outlines and roofs of dry leaves, looked like beehives, and thin columns of blue smoke rose above the tops of the trees. Half naked groups of men, women and children, more astonished than frightened, appeared among the thickets near the shore, advancing timidly, and then drawing back, exhibiting, by their gestures and demeanor, as much fear as curiosity and wonder, at the sight of these strange vessels, which the previous night had brought to their shores.

Columbus, after gazing in silence on this foremost shore of the land so often determined by his calculations, and so magnificently colored by his imagination, found it to exceed even his expectations. He burned with impatience to be the first European to set foot on the sand, and to plant the Cross and the flag of Spain—the standard of the conquest of God, and of his sovereigns, effected by his genius. But he restrained the eagerness of himself and the crew to land, being desirous of giving to the act of taking possession a New World a solemnity worthy of the greatest deed, perhaps, ever accomplished by a seaman; and, in default of men, to call God, and his angels, sea, earth and sky, as witnesses of his conquest of an unknown hemisphere. He put on all the insignia of his dignities as Admiral of the Ocean, and the Viceroy of these future realms; he wrapped himself in his purple cloak, and, taking in his hand a flag embroidered with a Cross, in which the initials of Ferdinand and Isabella were interlaced like their two kingdoms, and surmounted by a crown, he entered his boat, and was pulled toward the shore, followed by the boats of Alonzo and Yanez Pinzon, his two lieutenants.

On landing, he fell on his knees, to acknowledge, by this act of humility and worship, the goodness and greatness of God in this new sphere of his works. He kissed the ground, and, with his face on the earth, he wept tears of double import, and of double meaning, as they fell on the dust of this hemisphere, now for the first time visited by Europeans; tears of joy for Columbus, the overflowing of a proud spirit, grateful and pious; tears of sadness for this virgin soil, seeming to foreshadow the calamities and devastation, with fire and sword, and blood and destruction, which the strangers were to bring with their pride, their knowledge, and their power. It was the man that shed these tears; but it was the Earth that was destined to weep.

"Almighty and eternal God," said Columbus, as he raised his forehead from the dust, with a Latin prayer, which his companions have handed down to us, "Who by the energy of Thy creative word hast made the firmament, the earth and sea, blessed and glorified be Thy name in all places! May Thy majesty and dominion be exalted for ever and ever, as Thou hast permitted Thy holy name to be made known and spread by the most humble of Thy servants in this hitherto unknown portion of Thy empire." He then baptized this land, with the name of Christ, the Island of San Salvador.

His lieutenants, his pilots, and his seamen, full of gladness, and impressed with a superstitious respect for him whose glance had pierced beyond the visible horizon, and whom they had offended by their unbelief, overcome by the evidences of their eyes, and by that mental superiority which overawes the minds of men, fell at the feet of the Admiral, kissed his hands and his clothes, and recognized for a moment the power and the almost Divine nature of genius; yesterday the victims of his obstinacy, now the companions of his success, and sharers in the glory which they had mocked. Such is humanity: persecuting discoverers, yet reaping the fruits of their inventions. [Lamartine's Memoire of Celebrated Characters.

TRANSLATED BY W. H. U.

Mme. D——, who resided at Chaton, was a lady of the strictest character, and of a heart proof against all allurement. She prided herself upon her great insensibility, and her profound indifference had repulsed all those gallants who had ventured to offer their addresses. She country was for her a veritable retreat; she shunned reunions, and was only happy in solitude. The charms of a chosen circle, the pleasures of the world, had for her no attraction, and her favorite recreation was that of angling; an amusement worthy an unfeeling woman.

She was accustomed every pleasant day to station herself at the extremity of the lonely island of Chaton, and there, with a book in one hand, and her line in the other, her time was passed in fishing, reading, or dreaming.

A lover, who had always been intimidated by her coldness, and who had never ventured on a spoken or written declaration, surprised her at her favorite pursuit one day, when he had come to the island for the purpose of enjoying a swimming bath. He observed her a long time without discovery, and busied himself with thinking how he might turn to his advantage this lonely amusement of angling. His reveries were so deep and so fortunate that he, at last, hit upon the desired plan, a novel expedient, indeed; yet they are always most successful with such women as pretend to be invulnerable.

The next day our amorous hero returned to the island, studied the ground, made his arrangements, and when Mme. D—— had resumed her accustomed place, he slipped away to execute and retired shelter, and, after having divested himself of his clothing, he entered the stream. An excellent swimmer, and skillful diver, he trusted to his aquatic talents for the success of his enterprise. He swam to the end of the island with the greatest precaution, favored by the chances of the bank and the bushes which hung their dense foliage above the waters. In his lips was a note folded and sealed, and, on arriving near the spot where Mme. D—— was sitting, he made a dive, and lightly seizing the book, he attached to it his letter.

Mme. D——, perceiving the movement of her line, supposed that a fish was biting.

The young man had retired as he came; he had doubled the cape which, extending out into the water, separated them from each other, and had regained his post without the least noise in his passage under the willows. The deed was done.

Mme. D—— pulled in her line, and what was her surprise to observe dangling upon the barb of her hook, not the expected shiner, but an unexpected letter!

This was, however, trifling, and her surprise became stupefaction when, on detaching the transfixed billet, she read upon the envelope her name!

So, then, this letter which she had fished up was addressed to her!

This was somewhat miraculous. She was afraid. Her troubled glance scrutinized the surrounding space; but there was nothing to be seen or heard; all was still and lonely, both on land and water.

She quitted her seat, but took away the letter. As soon as she was alone and closeted with herself, and as soon as the paper was dry—a paper perfectly waterproof, and written upon with indelible ink—she unsealed the letter and commenced its perusal.

Still, the insolence had come to her in such an extraordinary manner that her curiosity would not suffer her to treat this letter as she had so many others—pitilessly burn it without reading.

No, she read it quite through. The lover who dated his letter from the bottom of the river, had skillfully adopted the allegory, and introduced himself as a grotesque inhabitant of the waters. The fable was gracefully managed, and with the jesting tone which he had adopted was mingled a true, serious, ardent sentiment, expressed with beauty and eloquence.

The next day Mme. D—— returned to the island, not without emotion, and some trace of fear. She threw her line with a trembling hand, and shuddered as, a moment after, she perceived the movement of the hook.

Is it a fish? Is it a letter?

It was a letter.

Mme. D—— was no believer in magic, still there was some thing strange and supernatural in all this.

She had an idea of throwing back the letter into the stream, but relinquished it. The most stubborn and haughty woman is always disarmed in the face of that strange mystery which captivates her imagination.

This second letter was more tender, more passionate, more charming than the first. Mme. D—— read it several times, and could not help thinking about the delightful merman who wrote such bewitching letters.

On the subsequent day she attached her line to the bank and left it swimming in the stream, while she withdrew to a hiding place upon the extremity of the island. She watched for a long time—but saw nothing. She returned to the place, withdrew the line, and there was the letter!

This time an answer was requested. It was perhaps premature, yet the audacious request obtained a full success. The reply was written after some hesitation, and the hook dropped into the stream charged with a letter which was intended to say nothing, and affected a sort of badinage, which was, nevertheless, a bulletin of a victory gained over the harsh severity of a woman until then unapproachable.

Mme D—— had too much shrewdness not to guess that her mysterious correspondent employed, instead of magic, the art of a skillful diver. Scruples, easily understood, restrained her from that portion of the bank where she was sure that the diver would emerge from the water.

But this game of letters amused her. First, it pleased her intellect, and her curiosity became so lively that she wrote: "Let us give up this jesting, which has pleased me for the moment, but which should continue no longer, and come with your apologies to Chaton."

The lover answered: "Yes, if you will add: Ilope."

The inexorable lady replied: "If only a word is necessary to decide you, be it so." And the word was written.

The young man appeared, and was not a loser. The gift of pleasing belonged to his person as much as to his style, and he had made such rapid progress under water that it was easy to complete his conquest on land.

Thus, Mme. D—— caught a husband without wishing it, and in spite of the vow which she had taken never to re-marry. Holding the line, she had been caught by the fish!

A Hundred Years Ago: The Highwayman.

Only three summers since, a French gentleman was in the Highlands, and gazing with some surprise at the tranquil and orderly scenes around him, and saying that his friends at Paris had advised him to come upon his journey well provided with pistol and sword, since they bid him bear in mind "you are going to the country of Rob Roy!" "We can scarce blame these Parisians for so faithfully remembering that little more than a hundred years ago Rob Roy was able to levy his "black mail" on all who came beneath the shadow of his mountains. But they might at least with equal reason have applied the same advice to England; for much less than a hundred years ago, the great thoroughfares near London, and, above all, the open heaths, as Bagshot and Hounslow, were infested by robbers on horseback, who bore the name of highwaymen. Booty—these men were determined by some means or other to obtain. In the reign of George the First, they stuck up handbills at the gates of many known rich men in London, forbidding any of them on pain of death to travel from town without a watch or with less than ten guineas of money. Private carriages and public conveyances were alike objects of attack.

Thus, for instance, in 1776, Mr. Nuttall, the solicitor and friend of Lord Chatham, returning from Bath in his carriage, with his wife and child, was stopped and fired at near Hounslow, and died of the fright. In the same way the guard of the Norwich stage (a man of different metal from the lawyer) was killed in Epping Forest, after he had himself shot dead three highwaymen out of seven that assailed him. Let it not be supposed that such examples were but few and far between; they might, from the records of that time, be numbered by the score: although in most cases the loss was rather of property than life. These outrages appear to have increased in frequency towards the close of the American war. Horace Walpole, writing from Strawberry Hill at that time, complains that having lived there in quiet for thirty years he can not now stir a mile from his own house, after sunset, without one or two servants armed with blunderbusses. Some men of rank at that period—Earl Berkeley above all—were famed for their skill and courage in dealing with such assailants. One day, so runs the story, Lord Berkeley, traveling after dark on Hounslow Heath, was awakened from a slumber by a strange face at his carriage window and a leaded pistol at his breast. "I have you now, my lord," said the intruder, "after all your boasts, as I hear, that you would never let yourself be robbed!" "Nor would I now," said Lord Berkeley, putting his hand into his pocket as though to draw forth his purse, "but for that fellow peeping over your shoulder." The highwayman hastily turned round to look at this unexpected intruder, when the earl, pulling out instead of a purse a pistol, shot him dead upon the spot. [Lord Mahon's History of England.

A Clerical Warming-Pan.

In many parts of Ireland a warming-pan is called a "friar." Not many years ago an unsophisticated girl took service in a hotel in the town of ——. Poor thing! she had never heard of a warming-pan in her life, though she regularly confessed to the friar.

It so happened that on a cool and drizzly night a priest took lodging at the inn. He had traveled far, and being weary, retired at an early hour.

Soon after the mistress of the house called to servant girl: "Betty, put the friar in No. 6."

The poor girl, not dreaming that by the word "friar" her mistress meant the warming-pan, hastened up to the priest, who was comfortably settled in bed.

Up went Betty to the poor priest: "Your reverence must go into No. 6, my mistress says."

"How, why?" asked the priest, alarmed at being disturbed.

"Your reverence must go into No. 6."

There was no help for it, and the priest arose, donned a dressing-gown, and went into No. 6.

Betty said some thing about disturbing his reverence, which the mistress did not understand. So she told the girl in a sharp voice to do as she was directed, and she would always do right. Up went Betty, and unhappy priest, despite his angry protestations, was obliged to turn out of No 6, and go into No. 4. But a little time elapsed ere the girl was told to put the friar into No 8. The poor priest, thinking that every one was mad in the house, and sturdily resolving to quit it the next morning, crept into the damp sheets of No. 8. But he was to enjoy no peace there. Betty was again directed to put the friar into No. 8, and, with tears in her eyes, she obeyed.

In about an hour the landlady consoled to go to bed herself, and the friar was ordered into her room. Wondering what it meant, Betty roused up the priest, and told him he must go into No. 11. The patient monk then crossed himself, counted his beads, and went into No. 11.

It so happened that the husband of the landlady was troubled with "the green-eyed monster" jealousy. Going to bed, therefore, before his wife, his suspicions were confirmed by seeing between his own sheets a man sound asleep.

To rouse the sleeper, and to kick him into the street, was the work of but a very few moments; nor was the mistake explained till the next day, when the priest informed the inn-keeper what outrages had been committed upon him; and he learned, to his astonishment, that he had been serving the whole night as a warming-pan!

Teachers Wanted.

THE Rev. P. J. ECKLES having resigned the Presidency of Sharon Female College, for the purpose of settling the estate of his father, recently deceased, the Board of Trustees wish to procure the services of some gentleman suitably qualified to take charge of said Institution.

The qualifications necessary are—ripe scholarship, unimpeachable character for morals and piety, and membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. A married gentleman, whose lady could take charge as teacher and governess, would be preferred. The President, by the rules of the Institution, is authorized to employ his assistants (subject to the approval of the Trustees). His family will have the privilege of residing in the College buildings; and the Teachers receive the entire tuition fees of the Institution—numbering from sixty to eighty—with a fair prospect, at present, of one hundred students. Additional buildings are now upon the eve of erection for the accommodation of the teachers and students.

Letters addressed to Rev. H. H. Mowbray and others, Sharon, Madison county Miss., will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

N. B. The public are hereby assured that the exercises of the Institution will be opened as usual, on the First Monday in October next, by competent persons temporarily employed until a regular engagement can be made.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than the combination of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast trial of the virtues throughout this broad country has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a Remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

August 4, 1853.

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your Cherry Pectoral in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect.

J. D. POWELL, Supt. Trans. L. R. R.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Since your medicine has became known here, it has a greater demand than any cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is unable to do much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefit it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours, with respect. JOHN C. WHITLOCK.

P. S. Almost any number of certificates can be sent you, if you wish it.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL.

Thos. C. Brame, A. M., Principal.
——, Assistant.

This Institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. None of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr Mitchell: but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will forever devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certainly to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the Institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

R. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

Marion Female Seminary,

MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALA.

THE EXERCISES of this institution will be resumed on Monday, the 2d day of October, under the charge of the Rev. Jas. K. Armstrong, as Principal, assisted by nine Professors, Teachers and Others.

It has just closed its present session with one hundred and thirty-three students, seventy-seven of which number were boarders. There is but one session of nine and a half months.

Pupils can enter at any time during the session, chargeable from the beginning of the month in which they commence, to the close of the session. No deduction will be made but at the discretion of the Principal.

The Principal, with his family, resides in the building. The female teachers also reside in the Seminary. Boarders in the institution are under the control of the Principal at all times. A Steward, in the employment of the Principal, of experience, urbanity of manners, and faithfulness to his duties, a Matron who constantly and kindly ministers to the private wants of young ladies, and especially in sickness. Governesses who direct them in their exercises and amusements, superintends the order of their private apartments, instructs them in certain domestic duties, and guards their private, personal habits, manners and morals, always aided by the presence and active cooperation of the female teachers. The Principal and his lady secure to those committed to their charge every necessary and proper comfort and kindness, such as but the discretion of experienced mothers can bestow.

The Institution is furnished with a new and superior apparatus in the departments of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. There is also a large collection of Maps, Charts, Plates, Diagrams, Globes, etc., for simplifying the principles of Geography, Physiology and Astronomy.

In the department of Drawing, Painting and Embroidery there is a fine collection of Drawing Cards, Engravings, Pictures, Paintings, Patterns, and every other convenience important in the prosecution of these departments.

There is in connection with the institution a Library of more than one thousand volumes, and a Cabinet of several hundred specimens.

The institution is furnished with six Pianos, five Guitars, and one Harp.

MUSIC.—The Professor at the head of this department is equal to any in the country. He is a superior vocalist, a fine performer on the Piano, Harp, Guitar, Violin, Violincello, etc. He has enjoyed ten years experience as a teacher of music in the best institutions in the Union, is profoundly versed in the principle of harmony, and is a real amateur of the sublime science to which he has devoted himself.

LOCATION.—Its salubrity, intelligence, morality and public spirit are unsurpassed.

PERMANENCY.—Parents may send their daughters here with confidence in their completing their education under the same course of instruction and system of discipline. Every thing conspires to make the permanency of the Principal a matter of duty, pleasure and interest.

TEACHERS.—The Principal, himself a native of Alabama, surrounds himself with a corps of teachers of known efficiency and tried success, nearly all of whom have been reared in the South, thus ensuring a better acquaintance with Southern peculiarities and sympathy with Southern views and interests. Thoroughness is our motto in teaching. We ascribe the true importance to the harmonious development of the physical, intellectual and moral nature.

Reports are sent to patrons once every two months, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and conduct of the pupil. In our system of merits and demerits scholarship and conduct are connected.

The Principal regards it as his most important duty to attend to the moral habits of his pupils and to imbue their minds with proper religious principles.

The facilities for acquiring the French and other modern languages are superior.

There are daily exercises in Orthography, Reading and Writing. Great attention is bestowed on letter-writing, and composition.

Lectures are delivered weekly to the junior and senior classes on various subjects of Science and Literature, on which they take notes and are subsequently examined.

The Principal will be assisted in the Collegiate department, the ensuing session, by a gentleman, a Professor of long experience, of the ripest scholarship, and the most superior qualifications as a teacher. He will take charge of the department of Mathematics and some of the higher English branches and the control of the male study hall.

Visitors are not received by boarders except with suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.

No accounts will be opened in Macon. Money must be deposited or forwarded for all necessary and proper purposes. Let pupils be supplied from home as far as is practicable.

All sums of money for the use of pupils must be deposited with the Principal.

LOCKS OF HAIR.

The following stanzas appeared a few years ago in the poet's corner of a Canadian newspaper. We think that all who read them will at once pronounce them worthy of preservation:

You've often heard me promise, Fred,
One day to tell you where,
And from what treasured heads I shred.
These treasured locks of hair.
Well, now the time has come at last:
Your birth-day festival
Has blithely come and quickly passed,
And you shall know them all.

Twelve years have fleeted since I bowed,
In tearless grief, my knee
Beside our dying sire, and vowed
A parent's care for thee;
And I remember how you tried,
Till even the menials wept,
To wake our father when he died,
And said: "He only slept!"

This short curled lock, self-dark, half-gray,
I pilfer it from his brow;
I've kept it sacred till to-day;
We will divide it now.
And when you look upon it, Fred,
Still think you hear the voice
That with its dying accents said:
"My Father, bless my boys!"

This raven braid belonged to one
You never knew, my brother;
She only blessed her new-born son,
And died—our sainted mother!
A fairer, tender flower;
But, like a plant of sun bereft,
She withered from that hour.

Spring's buds around our mother's tomb
Came just in time to weave;
We saw the flowers of Autumn bloom
Upon our sister's grave.
My boy! your tears are falling fast
On yonder golden tress;
It is a relic, and the last,
Of her lost loveliness.

And this long, waving, silken curl,
Ah! that you must not share;
You never knew the angel-girl
Who gave that aburn hair.
My beautiful! my blessed one!
Aged she, too, passed away!
I strove to breathe: "Thy will be done;"
But it was hard to say.

Oh! by how frail and weak a thing
May the heart's depths be stirred!
How close and long will memory cling
To one light look or word!
And are not these slight locks with more
Of spirit-meaning fraught
Than all the mystic, lettered lore
That sages ever taught?

Well! they are happy now, dear boy;
Their ransomed souls are free;
They feel no more Earth's hollow joy,
And real misery.
Our barks are struggling slow to shore,
By storm and tempest driven;
But they have passed Life's ocean o'er,
And anchored safe in Heaven.

MISSIONS TO NEGROES. HOW IS THE WORK DONE?

In a previous article some strictures, general in their character, were uttered against the present mode of conducting our Missionary operations among the negroes. It may be considered presumptuous in a layman thus to sit in judgment upon the doings of the Lord's anointed. In all deference to the wisdom and piety of these, I beg leave to proceed in a few words I have to say on this subject. There is undeniable inefficiency in this "arm of the service," originating in part and in places, in the weakness of the conferences—the absence of proper men to do the work required. But this does not by any means account for all the inefficiency apparent. More might be done by an energetic appropriation of the means and men available;—by making this matter more prominent in the consideration of conference; by holding to an higher account those entrusted with this service. And let no rebellious indignation arise at this suggestion of "holding to account" these men and ministers. The indignation is needless—the holding to account would not. God and Eternity and the Judgment are far off, that there are few of us who do not need some subordinate tribunal, and at least an annual day of revisal and comparison of accounts—a spiritual balance sheet and annual statement. And let him that is without sin, throw the first stone at the humble writer of this.

According to the present schedule of service, the negroes are preached to once in three or six weeks—a hasty, hurried sermon, for the preacher has to preach four times that day. (Here the master might come in for a word of blame, and it is admitted and its justice acknowledged by one who has not done the whole duty in this respect, but who is ready to reform as soon as the occasion calls for reformation.) Of course, by this long intermission of teaching, of appeal, of warning, the auditors and the preacher become dull, unconsoled, and fruitless—the hearer hearing listlessly, the preacher preaching, as my cook said of one of the missionaries, "as if there was no danger"—of eternal death. Line upon line, with all the prophets iterates, is required to impress the unretentive minds of these people. Impulse must be converted into habit and holy principle by assiduous exercising and patient teaching, by familiar talk, by frequent illustration, by apt analogies, by kind yet dignified familiarity, by occasional oratory. The young must be taught in the great cardinal truths and doctrines of evangelical theology, or they are exposed by a whole legion of superstitions and absurdities which are swift nids-de-camp of the devil. How can this be done as the work is now conducted? The field is large, the laborers few and very feeble—many not taking up in zeal and industry their task too often of intelligence. Stern truth, but true.

To supply this inevitable deficiency of labor from the want of laborers, this plan has occurred to my mind, and I propose it to your consideration, and also to those masters and ministers who are interested:

Following the practice of the early Church, I would organize a class of Catechists, whose work is indicated in their name. They should go from family to family, instructing from the Catechism and Bible and Hymn-Book, and by familiar conversation, all the negroes, particularly the young. Let them be, if desired, licensed exhorters—a class of laborers quite extinct—but their distinction and paramount business should be with the Catechism. They should cover only two weeks in their field of service, so as to serve not more than ten or twelve plantations. These men might become Colporteurs of Methodist publications, and thus become doers of a double work, each almost equally profitable. As over these, to administer the ordinances of the Church, to guide, restrain or impel, appoint fully ordained ministers, whose work should embrace, for each, the fields of some two or three of these Catechists, making their appointments monthly or in six weeks. The Catechist should make a quarterly report to the minister in charge, and he make a semi-annual report to his quarterly conference, and the Presiding Elder go to conference with a summary from each department of his district, and this to appear in the minutes or in the church paper patronized by the conference.

This plan, religiously carried out, I think, would prove thoroughly effective in doing the work indicated.

Now there are two difficulties in our way; we want men and money. The money I believe would be given by the owners of the slaves, and cheerfully given, if it were plain that the Church was in earnest, and not keeping the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. The expense would not be so much increased as to make this doubtful. The liberality of the master would increase with the improvement and christianization of the negro.

But the men. Yes, there is the grand want—in number and quality—men good and true, with common sense and pious hearts. Can the community supply them? Are they in the bosom of the Church? Men who are willing to work for moderate wages and the public weal, and the salvation of souls. I think, however, that an assurance of the money will secure the men—in number if not in quality. I should be glad to see the experiment, though with insufficient instruments.

NOTES OF RAMBLER.

MR. EDITOR:—As you have used the "editorial scissors" on the notes I have sent you hitherto, I will take the hint and be short.

NIAGARA FALLS.

Niagara means the Thunder of Waters! the most appropriate, descriptive and forcible name that could be given this wonderful phenomenon of nature. When my delighted eye first rested upon the Falls, my heart was filled with emotions of a stranger, wilder, sublimer character than any I had ever before realized. I felt that one half had not been told. To give a correct description of these Falls, an Angelo's language would have to be borrowed, and to paint them, the painter would have to dip his brush in the rainbow, and transfer its bright glowing colors to the canvas. After gazing on the Falls for hours, I descended by a winding staircase one hundred and eighty-five feet to the "Cave of the Winds." Here I procured suitable clothing and a careful guide, and passed behind this magnificent sheet of water, which, leaping exultant from the topmost rock, and flashing down into mid-air, plunges below with the hoarse voice of thunder. The dimensions of the cave are 100 feet wide, 30 feet deep, and 164 feet high. It is curious to observe the spray how it curls along the sloping bottom of the cavern, then rolling up along the rocky bank, seeks the shelving ceiling, where it breaks into distinct portions, and by its constant motion on the air, gives those reverberations which have given rise to its title of the "Cave of the Winds." The view presented in the cave, in connection with the tremendous and astounding roar of waters, enabled me to appreciate the following beautiful and graphic lines of Brainard:

The thoughts are strange that crowd upon my brain,
While I look upward to thee. It would seem,
As if God poured thee from his hollow hand
And hung his bow upon thy awful front,
And spoke in that loud voice which seemed to him
Who dwelt in Patmos for his Saviour's sake,
"The sound of many waters," and hath bade
Thy mighty torrent mark the ages back;
And notch his centuries in the eternal rock.
Deep calleth unto deep. And what are we,
Oh! what are all the notes that ever rung
From men's vain trumpet by thy thundering side?
Yea, what is all the riot man can make
In his short life to thy unceasing roar?
And yet, bold babbler, what art thou to Him
Who drowned a world and heaped the waters far
Above its loftiest mountains?—a light wave,
That breaks and whispers of its Maker's might.

From "Table Rock" is had the sublimest view of the Falls. It was upon this rock that these beautiful lines of Mrs. Sigourney were written:

Flow on for ever in thy glorious robe
Of terror and of beauty. God hath set
His rainbow on thy forehead, and the cloud
Mantles around thy feet; and he doth give
Thy voice of thunder power to speak of Him
Eternally—bidding the tip of man
Keep silence, and upon thy rocky altar pour
Incense of sweet praise.

LUNDY'S LANE.

I visited this famous battle ground, which is two miles from the Falls. A high tower has been erected on the spot, from the top of which a fine view is had of the whole battle-ground. An old soldier who was present and took part in the engagement points out to visitors the lines and positions occupied by the two armies, and relates some thrilling incidents connected with the battle.

BURNING SPRING.

This Spring is near the Falls, and is a great curiosity. A sufficient amount of gas issues from it to light a large city. If a lighted match is held several feet above it, the gas will immediately catch on fire, and a brilliant flame will play over the surface of the water.

THE SUSPENSION BRIDGE.

No one who has not seen this wonderful fairy-like structure, or a similar one, can form any idea of it. A railroad track is now being constructed on its top. What a wonder!—a wire bridge sufficiently strong to support the heaviest wagons and a train of cars. Some of your readers, perhaps, would like to know how the first wire was carried across the fearful chasm now spanned by this beautiful bridge. A kite was procured, to the tail of which was a string, and by flying this on the one side and letting it out until it was over the other side, the gorge was spanned by the string, by which a cord was drawn across, and by means of this cord, a rope of sufficient strength to draw a cable, which latter being well secured on both sides, was the means of transit for the first wire cable of 36 strands and 1,160 feet in length.

I could write many pages more, but as the "scissors" are in your hands, I must close. I must, however, allude to one more scene. I went out one night after midnight and gazed at the Falls by moonshine. I leave you to imagine, if possible, the grandeur and sublimity of the scene. More anon.

RAMBLER.

"ENTER INTO THY CLOSET."

Every Christian should have a closet, a place sacred to himself alone, where he may meditate and pray. The idea of a closet is that of absolute privacy. It is a place where none can hear or be overheard; where the most perfect freedom can be felt between the soul and God. When our Lord said, "Enter into thy closet," he added, "and shut the door." Be absolutely alone. He insisted upon this for two reasons: one was, that we might not be as the hypocrites, who prayed to be seen and heard of men. Such persons would not find the closet a very attractive place. They would prefer the corners of the streets, or the midst of the temple; and if they entered into their closets to pray, they would be very likely to leave the door on a crack, so that some might overhear their petitions, and say, "what a religious man he is!"

Another reason was, that we might have the full effect of seclusion; so that the mind might not only be free from distraction and corruption, but be free from all temptation to insincerity or mere formalism.

Few persons can so control their thoughts and feelings as to pray in the presence of others, without some reference to what others may think of the performance. Many, we fear, [illegible] to the people rather than God. We have heard of eloquent prayers. We have even seen in the public prints such notices as the following: "Rev. Mr. B. delivered a very impressive prayer." Whether the Rev. Mr. B. prayed to the people or to God, is not for us to say; but such eulogiums on the style of the delivery of a devotional exercise show how strong is the temptation, at times, to make our prayers sound well in the ears of men, rather than to have them acceptable to God. Even where there is real piety, and the thought of praying to men, while professedly praying to God, would be abhorred, still it is a most difficult thing to keep the presence of God more distinctly before the mind than the presence of the people. Unconsciously to ourselves, we are shaping our language with reference to what the audience may think or say of the exercise. Alas, how many prayers, offered in the sanctuary or in the social circle, if closely analyzed, would be found wanting in sincerity! May God forgive the the iniquity of our holy things! And may we always remember, as we take the posture of prayer, that great is the guilt of him who draweth nigh unto God with his lips, and honoureth him with his mouth, while his heart is far from him!

But in the closet there is no such temptation. We mean there is no inducement to show off—to pray in fine language—to use tropes and figures—to be eloquent. When the door has been shut, the first thought is, "I am alone with God." No mortal eye is upon me; no human ear can hear what I say. "This is the house of God; this is none other but the gate of heaven." Be it remembered that Jacob used this language when he was alone with God. Great, then, is the advantage of the closet in promoting sincerity in our devotions. If we enter it with a desire to worship God, we shall be very likely to have the desire fulfilled. We do not say that the Christian will at no time find the tempter invading his closet; nor that when entering it under the influence of the best motives, he will always find it as the gate of heaven. We recollect that Hannah More says, she sometimes found herself catching flies when she ought to have been calling upon God. Even in the closet, Satan will first divert the thoughts, and then deaden the heart. But one thing he cannot tempt us to do, and that is, to play the hypocrite. Here, when we kneel in secret, with none but God to see and hear, we surely can indulge in no language but that of sincerity.

The closet, too, has charms for those who wish to unburden all their souls, to confess all their sins, to make known all their desires. Who is there that does not feel, pressing on the heart and conscience, burdens which no human sympathies can alleviate, or human power remove? We do not wish to make others unhappy by imparting a knowledge of them; but we can retire into the secret chamber, and make them known to Him who can remove them, or can impart the grace that will enable us to bear them. There are sins to confess, of thought and feeling, which we would not and could not disclose to our dearest earthly friends; which can only be whispered in the ear of Him who seeth not as man seeth. We want a place of prayer so secluded that we may ingenuously and with deep contrition lay open all the tortuous and deceitful windings of the heart. Such is the closet. There can we fall upon our faces, and tell our God all our weaknesses, all our sins, and plead for mercy and forgiveness through the blood of Jesus. "The closet," says Kempis, "seldom visited, becomes disagreeable: but often and daily resorted to is delightful." The closet is the soul's armory. Here it is that the panoply is stored; and here must we come to select it, to fit it, yea, and to burnish it. Soldier of the cross, you cannot contend without the closet!

Every Christian should have his closet. This we said in the beginning, and we say it again. When you are hiring a house, among all the conveniences regarded, don't forget to have a place for secret prayer. When you are engaging lodgings, let this idea of a closet enter into the arrangement. Have an eye to it when you are traveling. A part of every day should be spent alone with God. Piety cannot thrive on any other condition. Having made this arrangement, enter daily into thy closet. Be found there at the dawn, and at the eve of day. Let not that closet mourn thy absence. Let not its silence for days rebuke thee. Be it thy home,—the most sacred spot to thee this side of heaven. [Edinburgh Christian Treasury.

THE PREACHING OF PAUL.

"I speak the words of soberness," said St. Paul. And I preach the Gospel "not with the enticing words of man's wisdom." This was the way of the apostle's discoursing of things sacred. Nothing here of the fringes of the north star; nothing of nature's becoming unnatural; nothing of the down of angel's wings or the beautiful locks of cherubim; no starched similitudes, introduced with a "Thus have I seen a cloud rolling in its airy mansion," and the like. No; these were sublimities above the rise of the apostolic spirit. For the apostles, poor mortals! were content to take lower steps, and to tell the world in plain terms "that he who believed should be saved, and that he who believed not should be damned." And this was the dialect which pierced the consciences and made the hearers cry out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" It tickled not the ear, but sank into the heart; and when men came from such sermons, they never commended the preacher for his taking voice or gesture; for the fineness of such a simile, or the quaintness of such a sentence; but they spoke like men conquered by the overpowering force and evidence of the most concerning truths: much in the words of the two disciples going to Emmaus, "Did not our hearts burn within us, while he opened to us the Scriptures?" [Dr. South.

GRADUAL PROGRESS OF THE GOSPEL.

"The voice of one crying," not in the thronged streets of the world's metropolis, but "in the wilderness" of Judea, heralded the coming of that kingdom. And when it was actually set up in the world, it was the noiseless operation of a carpenter's son, attended by a few common fishermen. In the same manner it was communicated from heart to heart, from individual to individual. John points out to Andrew "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." The next day Andrew introduces his own brother, Simon Peter. Jesus calls Philip to follow him; and "Philip findeth Nathaniel," his townman and friend. A woman of Samaria, in a brief conversation with Christ, whom she meets at the well, becomes a believer. Immediately she propagates the faith among her neighbors, and "many more" believe. And even that great Pentecostal movement, where three thousand were converted in one day in one place, if we consider its relations to the world, will appear to be only the preparation of so many individuals to act the part of Andrew and Philip, and the Samaritan woman, each in his own separate sphere, among the widely dispersed families and neighborhoods and nations from which they severally came, and to which they returned. It was the deposit of so many parcels of leaven in different portions of the great mass, each diffusing its own nature to other adjacent particles, and through these to others still. If we follow these converts to their respective homes, with the lamp of ecclesiastical history in our hands, we shall find a Christian church springing up, and a Christian influence starting forth in nearly every community over the wide world that was represented at Jerusalem on that memorable day. Take a single case—those "strangers of Rome," for example. They disappear from our view when the scenes of that day are over. And shall we ever hear of them again? Yes; after the lapse of more than twenty years we find an Apostle writing "to all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to the saints," apparently a large and flourishing church, and thanking his God that their "faith is spoken of throughout the world." Who planted that church? for neither Paul nor Peter, nor any other Apostle had seen Rome. Who were the honored instruments in the production of this great result? Put this question to the earliest Christian fathers; consult all authentic sources of information; send conjecture forth; and still the most probable conclusion to which we arrive in the absence of all positive information is, that the prime movers in this enterprise were those "strangers of Rome" whom we saw at Jerusalem on the day of the Pentecost—gone home now, and gone to work—the hidden leaven showing itself only in its effects. The operation was so gradual and silent, that even the names of its actors cannot now be ascertained; and yet so powerful that in twenty years it had made itself felt throughout the Roman Empire. MINISTERS FILLING PROFESSORSHIPS IN COLLEGES.

A correspondent of the Southern Presbyterian says: "Almost every day brings the intelligence of some pastor being elected to the principalship of some female academy or college in some part of the country. The increased frequency of changes of this kind, together with the numerous deaths of ministers, is giving rise to painful apprehensions in the minds of many lovers of the Church, lest some of our churches may soon find it impossible to supply themselves with pastors. If our academies, colleges, and theological seminaries absorb all or nearly all of our ablest ministers, where are our pastors to come from? Has the pastoral office lost its charms? Could not many of these professorships be filled just as well with laymen as with ministers of the gospel? Is a minister faithful to his ordination vows when he, by going to a college or seminary that is already supplied with enough professors who are ministers to do the preaching to the students and surrounding destitutions, sinks the minister into a mere teacher of worldly science? Is it good policy in the Church to concentrate seven or eight of her ablest ministers in one small town or village, whilst hundreds of others must go without any? These and similar questions are agitating the minds of our people. I do not doubt that there might to be one or two ministers in every college, and that there are some ministers who, from various causes, can serve the Church better as professors than they can as pastors, but there surely is a limit beyond which it is not proper to pass. I for one can see no good reason why all the professors in any college should be ministers, when it is certain that many of them must sit silent on the Sabbath, and their ministerial talents be lost to the Church. The Church certainly never ordained them for any such purpose. If they must teach to make a support, which I regret to say is too often the case, let them do it where they can unite teaching and preaching together; and not all congregate about one spot, where they are in each other's way as ministers. This is a point which, I doubt not, will attract more attention than it has hitherto done, when the want of pastors and missionaries comes to be felt more than it now is, which will doubtless soon be the case if the process goes on much longer."

NOT TIME ENOUGH.

Not time enough! So the gilt edges of the Bible remain untarnished, and it leaves its own profile in dust on the table. Not time enough to study its teachings. But there is time enough for other things.

Time enough to coil around the soul the web of wealth, which, when completed, forms its shroud!

Time enough to simmer away afternoon after afternoon in the maudlin sympathy of romantic sentimentalism, until the heart, in its voluptuous impotence, becomes incapable of real love to God or man!

Time enough to lay plot upon plot, and scheme upon scheme, for the gratification of ambition or vanity!

Time enough to be sick, though then, when the heart is troubled, and the body faint, and the head sluggish, there is indeed not time enough to repent!

TIME ENOUGH TO DIE!

WHEN WE ARE DEAD.

1. There will be some honest sorrow. A few will be really sad, as we are robed for the grave—fewer, probably, than we now suppose. Out of a small circle, how soon we shall be forgotten! A single leaf from a boundless forest hue fallen! That is all.

The gay will laugh when thou art gone,
The solemn brow of care plod on,
And each one as before will chase
His favored phantom.

2. But the world goes clattering on as if nothing had happened. If we filled important stations in society—yet how soon others will fill our stations! The world will be a bustling world without us. It was so before we entered it—it will be so when we are gone.

3. When we are dead, affection may erect a monument. But the hand that sets it up will soon be as powerless as ours, and for the same cause. How soon they that weep over us will follow us! If the marble or the granite long endures, yet the eyes of affection will not endure to read the graven letters. Men will give a glance at the name of one they never knew, and pass on with not a thought of the slumberer below.

4. When we are dead, our influence will not be dead. We leave epitaphs upon indestructible materials. Our manner of life has been writing them. We have stirred up thought, and awakened emotion. The wonderful machinery of mind has felt our presence. We have pressed the stamp of our character in the warm wax of other sensibilities around us.

Our places of business, our social resorts, may know us no more; but living, accountable beings feel the influence that involves our personal departure.

When we are dead, the kingdom of God will not die. It did not depend upon us for existence. And onward will it go when we have ceased to live. Happy, indeed, if it has been the honor and joy of our labors to have promoted it. Blessed is it to be remembered as having loved Zion, as taking pleasure in her stones, and favoring the dust thereof.

Sacred, consoling thought! The kingdom of Christ moves on, when we drop our earthly relationship with it.

OUT-DOOR PREACHING.—We understand that the Rev. Dr. Hannah, son-in-law of Dr. Chalmers, and his biographer, has, during the week, preached twice at Hurlford to large audiences in the open air. [Kilmarnock Chronicle.

FIRE IN THE WOODS!

BY ALFRED B. STREET.

Emerging from a grassy place where the bough-house was situated, I became sensible of a stifling penetrating smell as of burning wood, pervading the atmosphere, which was also quite thick; so much so, that the stars looked wan through it. Sweeping my vision around, I saw in the East a broad red stripe of light over the forests, while an immense murky cloud illumined at its lower edge rising above. As I looked, curls of bright flame flashed up all along the edge of this red stripe, and a low roar blended with faint cracklings broke upon my ear. The truth darted upon me in a moment—the forest was on fire—I rushed within the bough-house, and awakened my companions. We knew, however, there was no danger to us; for there was the lake, and the skiff could be a few minutes' place us in safety upon it. We therefore stood, and leisurely surveyed the scene. The forest was like tinder from the long drouth which had prevailed, and the fire driven also before the powerful wind, was sweeping down upon us with tremendous speed. Higher and higher leaped the flames, louder and louder came the sounds of their progress. A fierce glare lit up their quarter of the heavens, and commenced casting a lurid tint upon the sable pond and murky forest surrounding it. The scene was now momentarily brightening, until at last the sandy margin, the bough-house, the nearest trunks of the trees, the mossy stones and old wet logs in the shallows became visible, while enlarging spots and spaces of flame could be seen far in the depths of the innumerable vistas of the forest.

As we were thus gazing upon the sight, a quick shape darted from the woods, and the next instant a large deer, in the very frenzy of affright, with his eye-balls bursting from their sockets, shot past us, and leaped far into the pond. Scarcely had he disappeared before a wild cat, his long low frame stretched to a furious speed, darted also by us, and dashed into the water. A blended howl then broke upon the air, and several wolves, their necks bristling, and their eyes gleaming, came gliding across the margin, and likewise plunged, one after another, in the reddening flood.

So light had the whole scene now become, that we could see the dark heads of all these animals, their natural instincts overwhelmed in the presence of the common danger, moving above the rough crimson surface, seeking the safety of the opposite shore.

We, however, still lingered, until we saw a huge wall of fire approaching us with a quick and wavering motion, raking the trees before it, as the cradle rakes the grain. Deep rumblings and cracklings, blended with the howling of the furious wind, and the screams of the escaping birds, filled our ears.

At last, as the intense heat of the advancing element began to flush our faces, we betook ourselves, with our instruments, to the skiff, and left the shore.

The scene was now nearly at its height of fearful grandeur. As far as the eye could extend swept a line of fire, its flanks advancing, while the centre from some cause was remaining almost stationary. A moment's recollection, however, explained the reason. I have stated that the pond had been visited before by me, for the purpose of fishing. I knew, consequently, that a stream put into the pond at a point a little below where the bough-house was built, after running a parallel course with the head of the oval, and athwart the path in which the fire was advancing. Its parallel length was quite broad, diminishing rapidly, however, upward. The flames had doubtless reached the border of the precious part of the stream, and had there been arrested, while the upper wing had crossed the narrow channel above, and was rioting in its true course along the side of the pond, the lower wing having met with no obstruction whatever, sweeping somewhat in advance along the opposite border. On moved these fearful wings, the forest melting, as it were within them, like snow in water. They had just completed the circuit of the pond downward, their ends blending with each other, when the line in front, having completely overleaped the watery barrier, rushed up to the narrow margin. The bough-house was shriveled and the little grassy spot swallowed in the twinkling of an eye; while the flames hissed along the edge of the water as if in rage at being thus stopped in their career.

The whole scene had now reached its climax of sublimity and magnificence. The shores rising into slopes, as before stated, wherever the eye turned was one mighty amphitheatre of blazing fire. The roaring and crackling were tremendous, drowning even the tumult of the wind. The sky was a dome of crimson, the tossing waters flushed the same deep hue, so that our skiff seemed rocking in blood, and abroad was shed an almost scorching heat and blinding light. Great mountains of smoke continually rolled up, and were hurried tumultuously off by the rushing and rioting wind. Birds were darting in every direction, uttering the most plaintive cries, and frequently dropping in the waters, suffocated by the smoke; while, now and then, agonizing howls and piercing screams rang from the burning forest, proclaiming the torments of the wild animals, deer, wolf, bear and panther, that had been caught in their dens and recesses, and were consuming in the flames.

The greatest variety was apparent in the blazing spectacle. Here great gulfs and caverns opened, of such keen splendor as to be almost white; there rolled immense billows, dashing up fiery spray, resembling what we may suppose of Hell surging in its horrors.

Fiery serpents seemed darting through the smoke from tree to tree, twining and flashing around stem and branch, and licking them as the anaconda licks its prey previous to swallowing it. Red banners gleamed from out the smoke, long pennons fluttered, and sun-like streaks fell and glanced, like the sights of a furious battle-field.

Visions of the most exquisite beauty and grace were also every where perceptible. Graceful arches would form for a moment and then sink, festoons of flashing beauty arranged themselves from trunk to trunk like the vines of Lombardy, rich sparkling lacework ran among the leaves, blazing columns would support a blazing dome with deep red vistas opening to them, a gorgeous temple, flowers, and wreaths, and diadems, and thrones, glittered for an instant, and appearing like the phantasmagoria of some wizard summoned purposely by him to amaze and charm the senses of the beholders.

But the last scene in the magnificent drama was the crowning one of the whole. Happening to cast my eyes toward the conical hill before mentioned, plumed with its lofty pine tree, near which we had now floated, I discovered that the fire had not only reached its base, but was rapidly ascending its sides. Up, up, it swept its gleaming way, seizing the smaller trees and devouring them in an instant, and raging among the oaks and hemlocks until there was a perfect chaos among them, each falling from, in company with, and against the other, as if a host of demons was there engaged in fierce strife amid the horrors of their own element. Up, up, still went the flames until the whole hill was enveloped—a blazing pyramid. The pine tree yet towered untouched, but now a serpent of fire darted around its trunk which rose like a naked pillar to a great height ere the spreading out of its branches. As the head of the flame shot in its ascent among the limbs, a singular spectacle was developed.

An immense eagle was seen on the apex of the tree, with wings drawn up and long neck stretched downward, as if in the act of striking in mingled wrath and terror. There stood the devoted bird, doubtless above her aery, endeavoring to protect her helpless brood. It was for a moment only she was seen; a red streak like the tongue of the fiery snake darted against her ruffled breast, and we could see her burning shape falling, fluttering and writhing athwart the lurid crimson, down into the rolling and heaving gulf below.

A few minutes more, and the whole body of the fire, its ailment being destroyed, swept away from us before the wind, in its awful and devastating course. We watched its progress, moving down the forest as it passed majestically onward toward the Delaware, until its light sank again into a broad lurid stripe, reddening the portion of the heavens above us. We then wore out the remaining watches of the night, as well as we could, amid the clouds of smoke that still ascended from the desert of blackness around, until the sun rose, pale and sickly, and showed us the wide and smouldering waste of ruin and desolation.

A FELLOW SITUATION.—So accurately had the Indian calculated time and distance, that I was hardly at my place when a huge ball thundered heading by me, and received a shot jaw and close behind the shoulder as he passed. He stumbled on for about ten paces, and lay quietly down. I waited to reload, and on going up found him stone dead. The Indian then joined me, and said that the other two balls had not gone far, but had taken different directions; so we agreed that he should pursue one, and I the other. I soon came in sight of mine. He was standing a little way off on the open plain, but the skirting willows and brushwood afforded me cover within eighty yards of him; profiting by which, I crept up, and, taking sure aim, fired. The ball gave a convulsive start, moved off a little way, and turned his broadside again to me. I fired again, over a hundred yards this time; he did not stir. I loaded and fired the third time; whereupon he turned and faced me as if about to show fight. As I was loading for a fourth shot, he tottered forward a step or two, and I thought he was about to fall, so I waited for a little while; but as he did not come down, I determined to go up and finish him. Walking up, therefore, to within thirty paces of him, till I could actually see his eyes rolling, I fired for the fourth time directly at the region of the heart, as I thought; but, to my utter amazement, up went his tail and down went his head, and, with a speed that I thought him little capable of, he was upon me in less than a twinkling. I ran hard for it, but he rapidly overhauled me, and my situation was becoming any thing but pleasant. Thinking he might, like our own bulls, shut the eyes in making a charge, I swerved suddenly to one side to escape the shock; but to my horror, I failed in dodging him, for he bolted round quicker than I did, and affording me barely time to protect my stomach with the stock of my rifle, and to turn myself sideways as I sustained the charge, in the hopes of getting between his horns, he came plump upon me with a shock like an earthquake. My rifle-stock was shivered to pieces by one horn—my clothes torn by the other. I flew into mid-air, scattering my prairie-hens and rabbits, which had hitherto hung dangling by leather thongs from my belt, in all directions, till landing at last, I fell unhurt in the snow; and almost over me—fortunately not quite—rolled my infuriated antagonist, and subsided in a snow drift. I was, luckily, not the least injured; the force of the blow having been perfectly deadened by the enormous mass of fur, wool and hair that clothed his shaggy head and face. ARCHÆOLOGICAL DISCOVERY.—The Quebec Canadian gives an account of the discovery of an archæological specimen in that city. Some works are in progress for the extending of Durham Terrace on the site of the old castle and Fort St. Louis. In demolishing an old wall that separated a garden from the Fort, there were found at one of the angles of the wall two pieces of monumental stones covering a copper plate, on which is an inscription in Latin, of which the following is a translation:

"In the year of Grace one thousand six hundred and ninety-three, in the reign of the very august, very invincible and very Christian King of France, Louis the Great, 14th of the name, the very excellent and very illustrious seignor Louis de Buade, Count of Frontenac, for the second time Governor of the whole of New France, the rebel Inhabitants of New England, three years before having been repulsed, routed and completely vanquished by him when they besieged this city of Quebec, threatening to renew the siege this same year, has caused to be constructed, at the expense of the King, with the fortifications adjoining it, for the defence of the whole country, for the safety of the inhabitants and to confound again that perfidious people as well toward God as their legitimate King. And he has laid this foundation-stone."

This inscription is one more proof of the aversion of the old French Canadians to the New England Roundheads. From most of the historical accounts there was not much love lost between them, and Franklin might as well have saved himself the trouble of his mission to induce the Canadians to join in the revolt with the old thirteen colonies.

A skeleton has also been found in Quebec by workmen excavating in the Place d'Armes. The bones were in a good state of preservation. The place is believed to have been the site of a cemetery of a small body of Huron Indians, who there sought protection under the cannon of Fort St. Louis, from the attacks of their redoubtable enemies, the Iroquois.

INCREASE OF POPULATION IN GREAT BRITAIN.—The British census shows a wonderful increase of population in the last century compared with that in the preceding one. The increase in the century ending in 1751 was 1,114,000; in the next century, ending in 1851, the increase was 13,703,000. The London correspondent of the National Intelligencer, who states these facts, adds the following interesting statements:

Without stopping to inquire into the cause, we will state some facts relating to the wonderful increase in marriages which began to be noticeable about 1760. About that time an alteration was made in the law of marriage, rendering the condition more stringent; this, instead of preventing marriages, most surprisingly increased them. Lord Chesterfield said, in 1764, "the rage for marriage is very prevalent;" and in 1767 he writes, "in short, the marriage phrenzy seems to rage at present, and is epidemical." In the year 1750 the marriages were 50,972; they gradually rose to 70, [illegible] hundred thousand annually, and in the [illegible] year 1851 to 154,206. At the end of the century terminating in 1851, the increase of the population was 14,000,000, being fourteen times as much as the increase in the preceding century. A few extracts from the tables will give us some interesting details on this subject. The census tables show that among the population of the age of 20 and upwards, 52 in the 100 of males and 57 in the 100 of females are married. The mean age at which marriages are first contracted in England and Wales is about 26 for males and 25 for females. This shows the great amount of forethought which characterizes the population; a man of 20 or a woman of 25 rarely contracts an imprudent marriage.

THE ODD FELLOW FRATERNITY.—The Grand Sire of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows has submitted a report to the Grand Lodge of the United States, from which we learn that there are under the jurisdiction of that body 8110 Lodges, with 264,000 members, their annual revenue being $1,875,000. The expenditures for benevolent purposes, $530,000. The Grand Lodge of British America having been extinguished, the Grand Lodge of the United States has, at the desire of the members of Order in Canada, resumed its authority over the continent north of us. When this resumption took place, on the 14th of October last, there were but six Lodges in British North America, but now there are fifteen actively at work. The Grand Master of California has inquired of the Grand Sire as to the propriety of admitting Chinese members to the Order, and allowing them to have a Lodge at work in the Chinese language, and the reply has been favorable. Pennsylvania has the largest Grand Lodge in the Union, with over five hundred subordinate Lodges, and a membership but little short of fifty thousand.

Many of our exchanges are emphatic and [illegible] their complaints of mail failures—in some cases totally failing to reach their subscribers, in others, irregular.

THE NEW DISCIPLINE.—A copy of the Discipline, just published by Stevenson & Owen, our book agents, is to hand too late to be noticed this week.

Rev. Mr. Hendrix has been elected to the Presidency of the Alden Institute, Lebanon, Ohio. He has accepted the position, and intends to enter upon its duties at the opening of the next year, the first Monday in October next. The friends of female education have good reason to congratulate [illegible] upon the acquisition of the [illegible] to the position and management of that [illegible].

MISSISSIPPI, Dec.—By reference to the card of Dr. Bellsbazer, it will be seen that he has adopted New York as his winter quarters and New Orleans as his winter. Those afflicted in the South are highly favored in this arrangement. Dr. B. belongs to the [illegible] both as a gentleman and practitioner. His remarkable success in one direction of his profession determined his practice to it. He is no quack. He is a man. He has the modesty of true science—too modest to have known the singular success of his treatment, and for years even to publish a card. We have yet to hear of a case in which he has failed. Our own experience and knowledge prompt us to this notice.

MINISTER DECEASED.

The Rev. Joshua G. Payne, of the M. E. Church, South, died in Savannah on the morning of the 12th, a victim in the discharge of his pastoral duties to the prevailing epidemic. The Georgian says:

Mr. P. was but a few months over twenty-two years of age, with an apparently long and promising future and bright career before him, this being but his second year in the ministry. He graduated at Emory College in this State, and was a Georgian by birth, education and sympathy.

RAVAGES OF THE FIRE AT COLUMBUS, MISSISSIPPI.

Rev. L. J. Scheoler writes: "All of the block on which the Columbus Hotel stood, including hotel, was consumed; thence crossing over, the fire consumed the City Hall; from thence it extended to the beautiful building, not long completed, the Masonic, Odd Fellows and Sons of Temperance Hall, which, with their furniture, were burnt. [illegible] of the Post. On the evening the [illegible] block, fronting [illegible] Market street, were all destroyed, including the Columbus Insurance Office. The progress of the fire was arrested at North's corner." Such was the dryness of everything from the excessive drouth, that [illegible] and its course was at last arrested by blowing up of houses." We are sorry to hear that Brother S. was himself a sufferer.

REVIVAL OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

A very remarkable religious movement has taken place at Leeds, in connection with the Church of England. Special services have [illegible] been held in that town by various [illegible] of evangelical sentiments, who [illegible] deeply impressed with the importance [illegible] among their hearers an earnest [illegible] for the salvation of their souls. [illegible], it would seem that large numbers [illegible] persons, after having experienced the most [illegible] conviction of their sin, have found joy and peace in the reception of the Gospel. Large meetings for united prayer are held, at which the fullest liberty is given for parties to engage, and one of the converts is a clergyman, formerly remarkable for [illegible] principles and predilections. [illegible] had long been professionally, though not in reality, ministers of the word and doctrine, appear to have become the subjects of a spiritual change, and there seems reason to hope that the work is genuine.

NOAH'S ARK.

From the Sailor's Magazine we clip the following, which we think worthy of notice. The largest ocean steamships, now plying on the Atlantic, bear precisely the proportions in length, breadth, and depth, as is said to have existed in Noah's Ark. The largest of the Atlantic steamers are, in round numbers, three hundred and twenty-two feet long, forty-two feet beam, fifty feet, depth twenty-five and a half feet. The dimensions of the Ark were, length three hundred cubits, breadth fifty cubits, depth thirty cubits. It will be seen, therefore, that the Ark was nearly twice the size, in length and breadth, of these vessels, the cubit being twenty-two inches. Both had upper, lower, and middle stories. After all the equipments of forty-two centuries which have elapsed since the Deluge, the ship-builders have to return to the model adopted by Noah's Ark.

THE DEATH OF YOUNG CHILDREN.

The blessings which have come to us from Christ are strikingly displayed in the salvation of children. Their entrance into Heaven demonstrates the universal extent of the "redemption that is in Christ Jesus," and declares the reign of Grace over them that have "not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression." In Heaven they may testify to earth's pains—not to its sins. There the beauty of the Paradise of Christ shall be upon them—theirs. Many shall be there who shall scarcely know but that Heaven had always been their home; they have known no other. No scar of sin, no dark images upon their memory, of mercies unrequited or wasted; but pure as the breath of the morning, unstained as yet by the dust and exhalations of the day, they shall stand in virgin splendor near their Redeemer. To have a representative there, so near, in that sweet band of choristers, shall be our pride—the pride of the family.

These delightful ones! They enable us to take a very steady view of Heaven. No blood passes as we contemplate them there—no shade of doubt. Oh, happy souls, they have made the port! The storms may still be wrecking us, but they, the most helpless, have got over safely. The voyage, if rough for a season, was short and prosperous. Happy shall we be to feel the same security of life that we see theirs.

They have finished their "course." Sweet ones, how they perfected earth's idea of innocence, of happy dependence! They argued to us God's care for us—how He hovers, embosoms, protects and pities us, as a mother her babe, "as a father pitieth his children"—how we ought to trust and ask for "good things," even as a child does his father for bread.

The circle of an infant's acquaintance is a small one; but how deeply does it impress that circle! What an entrance to the heart it gains! How it opens the hitherto sealed soul, kindles tender sentiments, awakens sympathies the most valuable, and infuses the energy of love into the daily toil of those who labor for its support! It fills the house with the music of its voice, the sound of its feet, the perfume of its breath, and the light of its smile. It often affords to parents the strongest persuasive to prayer, that God may spare and bless it: it causes them to have a care for their ways: it binds their hearts in one, and never more than when together they watch over its fevered couch. Then that the chain of its sweet influences may not be broken, takes its flight to Heaven. For, in its leave, it presents the thought of affliction intended to correct—"For whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth"—to improve us, to make us more like itself, humble, tractable, believing, to wean our hearts from time and knit them to glory. How great a favor from our Heavenly Father was the residence in our family and the delightful relationship of the babes which have been taken back to himself by Him who gave them!

Take the child no longer mine,
Thine he is, for ever thine."

DR. SCOTT'S BOOK ON DANIEL.

On or about the 9th July, a communication headed "DR. SCOTT AND HIS TRADUCERS," appeared in the Creole of this city. The preface tells the public that on "August 5th, two articles, seriously attacking Dr. Scott as an author, appeared in this city simultaneously—the one in a political newspaper, the other in a religious denominational journal," and both exhibiting a strong partisan bias against Dr. Scott."

As the Creole is regarded a Presbyterian paper, we were not surprised that in its columns something should appear on that side of the subject; but we were surprised to find ourself charged with "a strong partisan bias." Wherein was it exhibited? On the first appearance of the Book on Daniel it met in our "denominational journal" a meed of hearty and abundant praise. After the extraordinary plagiarism was made potent, "Daniel" was dealt fairly by. The charge of bias is, therefore, without any proof, and gratuitous. As to partisan, we hope our notice of an author who comes fairly before the public with his literary wares, is not to be construed into opposition to the religious communion he belongs to! Such a view would be exceedingly embarrassing to us, who entertain toward the Presbyterian Church the most friendly and appreciative feelings; and it is exceedingly narrow-minded in those who urge it.

We should have let the matter rest within the circulation of the Creole, but we find this offensive article, classing us with traducers and partizans, copied abroad; not left to its fate among exchanges, but ollpt out and forwarded with special request to be inserted. We do not choose to be placarded after this style.

The Presbyterian Herald, Aug. 31, publishes, by request, the Creole article, with some comments. The editor gives the reasons, in part, that now influence us—"feel it due to ourselves, as his (Dr. S.) friend has intimated that all who have expressed the opinion that he has taken unwarrantable liberties with other men's writings, are his traducers. We are not willing to be placed in that category."

Our readers will remember that, in our notice of Dr. Cummings' lectures on Daniel, we referred to the charge which had been made by a number of the newspapers against Dr. Scott, of taking a large portion of his lectures from them, without a proper acknowledgment, and we then expressed the opinion that, so far as we could see, after a careful examination of the two works, there was some foundation for the charge. A friend has sent us a vindication of the Doctor from the charge, which will be found in another column, which originally appeared in the N. O. Creole. We insert it with great pleasure, and would gladly insert a much fuller and more satisfactory explanation from Dr. Scott himself. We still indulge the hope that when he sees the way in which the newspapers from one end of the country to the other are ringing the charge of plagiarism against him, he will be able to make an explanation that will be satisfactory to his friends. The explanation given by his friend meets the difficulty only in part.

After acknowledging his general indebtedness, in his preface, he quotes from Cumming and Kitto giving them credit in more than a dozen places, which would lead his readers to suppose that those quotations were all that he had taken from those authors, whereas, in fact, they do not embrace the tenth part of what he has taken with very slight alterations. He has taken sentence after sentence and changed them, putting in a word and phrase and omitting another.

We are not therefore willing to admit that all who assert that he has taken unwarrantable liberties with the literary production of other men, are his "traducers," as his defender charges. When his work was sent us for examination we were highly pleased with it and so expressed it in our notice.

When Dr. Cummings came to hand we took it up with the design of finding the evidence to vindicate Dr. Scott but were disappointed. Being unwilling to trust to our own judgment we handed the two works over to a literary gentleman, a warm personal friend and admirer of Dr. Scott, and requested him to prepare a vindication for our columns. He went to work to do so, but, after some days, returned the books, saying the vindication, if there was any that was satisfactory, must be found outside of the books themselves. We make this statement that he and his friends may see that it is not his enemies alone, if he have any, that think that an explanation is due from him to the public.

THE FINANCIAL PROBLEM.

A very serious one it is, too, to the Church—Oh; that these days may be shortened!—we should have said, to the ministry. Souls groan not under the altar yet, but at it. "They which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar." The right is clear enough—admitted; but—there's nothing on the altar! Then, what? "Aye, there's the rub; there's the respect that maketh calamity of so long life."

It is an old grief but a weighty. Paul felt it, we trust for our sakes, that those which were to come after might not feel it. We would be glad to know that he had filled up this suffering. He certainly has in the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians vindicated the claims of the Gospel ministry to support, after a style which must touch the hearts of all who are "born of God," and which may not be justly gainsaid by any.

Mr. Wesley and the first preachers of our own Church, to defend themselves against it, adopted a financial expedient which, in much of the territory of Methodism, works well to this day—the Class meeting. It was first devised to pay a church debt; then it came into play as a convenient means for ascertaining the spiritual state of the members; finally, it became what it now legitimately is, a meeting for financial and spiritual purposes—good for the body, good for the soul.

"The origin of these Classes was, however, purely accidental. The Chapel at Bristol was in debt, and it was agreed that each member of the society should contribute one penny a week to reduce the burden. The Bristol society was therefore divided into classes, and, for convenience, one person was appointed to collect the weekly subscriptions from each class, and to pay the amount to the stewards. The advantage of these classes, when turned to a higher purpose, at once struck the methodical mind of Mr. Wesley." [Watson's Life of Wesley.

Here, too, we see why it was made the duty of a leader to see his members once in the week, either at the meeting or, if absent from that, at home. When this has been attended to, there has been bread enough and to spare. How do they do in England? and how in the Middle States? Why, plainly, they say in class, "Brother, you owe for this week and last week." The leaders are not too religious to ask the members to pay their dues to the service of God. It is understood to be a main part of a class meeting to collect the thank-offerings for the support of the altar. It is the first law of their minds with old class leaders in the old States. What! no class collection! God forbid! That would be tantamount to no bread, no house, no clothing for the ministry, no vitality, no efficiency, and soon no existence for the Church. Nothing would turn those grey heads greyer than such a state of things. Verily, we remember they were set over a man, and we felt that we were marching under guard on our way to Heaven. Such a state of things prevents all kinds of slack-twistedness in the Church, both in temporals and spirituals.

"But suppose there are no persons in Class to make collections from." That is to suppose either that they are not put down to a Class, or that being down they are not there. The first supposition is out of the question, as we take it for granted that the name of every member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is on some Class-book. As to the second, If they are not in Class it is clear that you will not have a chance to say, "Brother, etc." There remains then but two courses, either to see them anyhow, as they run, get their weekly dues and enquire of their spiritual health; or, bring the machinery of the discipline to bear upon them, that they may be drawn by the cords of the Church into their proper Class-attitude. "But where is the scriptural right to do this?" We are not just this moment discussing that question, and so pass on. The Church has provided ways and means for making every member attend Class. When once in Class said member is easily managed, being in traces, or as our colored brethren call it, in the gospel yoke. Now then, here is the financial solution of the whole matter: the Church has provided a strong disciplinary means to secure the support of the ministry—i. e. to make her members attend Class. We repeat it, a Class-attending Church is already in financial drill, and is self-supporting—does pay the preacher. The Church has then a way by which members who pay nothing and will pay nothing can be turned out; for, such are they who do not attend Class—nine times out of ten. A church-member who pays nothing to the cause of Christ, excepting he be in poverty more extreme than that of the widow who had but but two mites, is the most covetous being on earth. To prove that such are what they are, and to turn them out is a work that might well fill an angel's hands, and should fill a minister's. But how can you prove a covetous man covetous? Ah, there is the difficulty. Fortunately our Church judges by his symptoms, he keeps out of the way of reckoning—out of the Class-room. Of the symptom there can be no doubt, it is a plain case—he is not there. Treat the symptom according to the discipline, and you will be apt to hit the disease.

The question, what scripture right? is not now. The right is plain. Archbishop Whately proves in his work on Episcopacy that any form of church government is scriptural. Every reader of the New Testament, unbiased, must accord with this view. The Apostles were Jews, and by education must have conceived of the Church only as one of specific form, and with express rules of government. That they should have avoided specifying any form minutely and in express terms, it must be allowed, was extraordinary, and could only have been through a special direction of the Holy Ghost. Both the Episcopal, Presbyterian, Congregational, and all other forms which secure discipline, the preaching of the Gospel, and the administration of the Sacraments, must be valid. Such have a right to act as a Church under the authority of the great Church Charter, in Matthew XVIII., 17, 20. "And if he shall neglect to hear them tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican. Verily I say unto you whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in Heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in Heaven. Again I say unto you that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in Heaven. For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

This defines what a Church is—a company of men who are associated to secure from God the blessings which he promises to give to them only in answer to united prayer. And it tells the basis of their authority, "I am in the midst of them." And it also specifies that authority to be disciplinary. And surely so long as a body of men so demean themselves as that Christ is one of the company it is a Church and its authority will be respected by Earth and Heaven.

If this be so we hold that the Methodist Church has a right to decide upon the expediency of Class-meetings, as vital to the spiritual and temporal existence of this her own form of Church; and that she has a right to enforce an existence. Different forms of church government we regard as one of the great gospel checks to secure piety, and as one of the provisions of mercy which consults the constitutional differences of men's minds. If we wish our form to continue let us enforce attendance upon Class-meetings."

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA.

The tenth annual session of this Institution will commence the first Monday in October. The Institution is prepared to give a thorough collegiate course, the Faculty being full, competent and efficient. The chair of the Greek language and Literature, vacated by the resignation of Professor Drake, has been filled by the election of Professor Holcombe, who has accepted the situation. The vacant Presidency has been filled by the election of Dr. Deems, of North Carolina, who has not yet signified his acceptance. The chair will be filled pro tem. by myself, until a suitable President is obtained.

The College buildings are in good repair, and an early contract will be made to erect suitable centre buildings for chapel, society halls, etc., between the present magnificent wings. The College Library and Society Libraries are large and well selected. The Philosophical and Chemical aparatus are complete, with a respectable cabinet of minerals and natural curiosities. The catalogue number of the last year was two hundred and thirty-eight in all the departments. Prompt attendance is earnestly urged, and students will find it much to their advantage to be there in time to secure rooms in College.

B. M. DRAKE.

September, 1854.

"I would think it a greater happiness," said Matthew Henry, "to gain one soul to Christ, than mountains of silver and gold to myself. If I do not gain souls, I shall enjoy all other gains with very little satisfaction, and I would rather beg my bread from door to door than undertake this great work." Doddridge, writing to a friend, remarked, "I long for the conversion of souls more sensibly than for any thing besides. Methinks I could not only labor but die for it with pleasure."

Revival Intelligence.

Rev. F. M. Grace writes: "The revival in Montgomery still advances; more than seventy have joined."

Rev. D. C. H. Connerly writes: "We have just closed a camp-meeting at Hargroves, (Pickens Cir., Ala.,) at which there were between twenty and thirty conversions, and twenty-four accessions to the Church. The spirit was present in blessing various branches of Christ's Church.

"The Lord is working wonders in Pickens Circuit, which we may regard as one of the consequences of an increased circulation of the 'Advocate.' Reading people will think, and serious thinking will beget conviction; and soon, then, we have the result—religion, peace and joy."

Rev. W. E. M. Linfield writes: "Our Church up here (Jacksonville, Ala.) is still advancing. We are in the midst of prosperity. Our membership is increasing, and our piety, too, we hope. We have closed two camp meetings with a very large number of conversions, and with valuable accessions to the Church, though, as usual, converts will be considerably divided. We are engaged in the erection of church buildings to accommodate our people. One very neat and comfortable church finished, and another of the same style nearly finished."

Rev. L. J. Schooler writes: "We had a glorious revival on the plantation of Mrs. Winston, near Columbus, Miss., where the different missionaries have labored for seven years without a conversion." He adds: "There will, however, be no ingathering to the Methodist Church, as they are under the influence of old Baptist negroes." [No uncommon experience—a great deal of preaching, many mourners, but few conversions—in our colored missions, we mean—and then the whole result diverted, to say the least, from its proper channel by a few old negroes. May be the long fruitless labors and the finale should be set down to the same cause. Our testimony is, that one colored exhorter on a plantation can undo more than two missionaries can do; and if our friends seriously desire their negroes to be enlightened and converted, it is passing strange that they suffer the continuance of the best instrumentality ever devised to propagate superstition among them. Correct views of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity are as necessary to secure conversion in the case of the negro as in that of the white man. Our Church groans under a vast amount of colored membership, who know nothing of the power and life of the Holy Spirit.—ED. pro. tem.]

Rev. H. H. Montgomery, from Sharon Cir., Miss. Conference, Sept. 15, writes: "We have been blessed with a gracious revival at three appointments on this circuit.

"At Sharon, in May last, we had a very good meeting, which resulted in twenty-eight conversions and twenty-six accessions among the whites. The Church greatly revived and built up.

"On Saturday before first Saturday in August, we began a meeting in Camden, which resulted in thirty conversions and thirty-five accessions among the whites, and seventeen accessions among the colored people.

"A meeting at Sulphur Springs, commencing the second Sabbath in this month, resulted in thirteen conversions and sixteen accessions among the whites, and sixteen [illegible] among the colored people. The [illegible] at both those appointments are [illegible] and greatly encouraged."

OLD FASHIONED SERMONS.

It is refreshing to quote such an article from such a source as the following. Most of the sermons of modern times are utterly destitute of the Gospel. Too many ministers seek the applause of men rather than the approbation of God. We are glad to see that the pious of all denominations are entering their protest against such ministrations:

An esteemed friend, in writing to us recently in reference to certain religious services which had taken place in the place where he resides, says:

"Dr. —— preached one of his full, rich, Gospel sermons, full of Christ, yes, all of Christ. None of your nice divisions and keen metaphysical distinctions, but a real old fashioned, pleuteous outpouring of the treasures of God's word at the feet of Jesus."

Both the writer of this letter, and the preacher to whose sermon he alludes, are ministers of deservedly high standing. They are not the men to decry a thoroughly educated and learned ministry. They are by no means unfriendly to metaphysics in its place. Either of them could, with entire facility, and in a masterly manner, produce sermons characterized by nice divisions and subtle speculations. The one, however, prefers to hear discourses of another class, and the other delights to preach them. They both regard the office of the ministry, in ordinary circumstances, as more usefully fulfilled in such exhibitions of the truth as savor chiefly of the great doctrines and earnest evangelical spirit of the Gospel—such as are adapted at once to instruct and to kindle the pious emotions of the hearers. In this feeling we fully concur, and so, also, as we are persuaded, do the great mass of God's people every where. There are hearers, perhaps, in almost all congregations, who take pleasure in the more intellectual feats of the pulpit, and relish the most ingenious speculations. Many would, undoubtedly, listen to finished rhetoric with much gratification, whether or not the topic was adapted to promote the spiritual welfare of the people. Ministers who seek the approbation of such hearers, and who have an intellectual ambition to gratify, may be tempted to cultivate a style of preaching which savors of these characteristics. We are convinced, however, that the large majority of all who attend upon the ministrations of the sanctuary would greatly prefer sermons whose prominent feature is, that they have the tone of the Gospel, and hold Christ prominently up to view. They may be ever so much entertained by elaborate, intellectual efforts; but when they once more hear the clear, full, joyful, heavenly notes of the Gospel, they straightway say that this old wine is the best, though it may have been kept to the last. We have known congregations which had been habitually accustomed to a speculative and coldly intellectual ministry, who, when occasionally some strange minister preached to them a faithful Gospel sermon, said with one accord, "That is the kind of preaching we like to hear." Christ Jesus and him crucified, is the theme which all know best becomes the message of an embassador from God to men.

It is by no means necessary, in order to preach Christ, that learning, and the attractions of the highest cultivation, should be despised. Every department of knowledge, and literary attainments and tastes of the highest grade, may find ready and useful employment in proclaiming the Gospel; but these, of course, must be subsidiary to the great business of applying the truth to the hearts and consciences of the hearers. The most beautiful garlands of fancy, and the richest treasures of learning, must be laid at the foot of the cross, and baptized with the spirit of Him who shed his blood upon that cross for the reconciliation of men to their offended God.

It is a mistake into which some seem to have fallen, that what is called simple Gospel preaching requires but little ability. Such sermons they think can be produced by ministers of the most ordinary talents. Some would consider it almost an aspersion upon their intellectual pretensions, to have it said, as the chief compliment to their most studied productions, that they were excellent Gospel sermons. Such persons, however, take a very narrow view of the vast range and compass of Gospel truth. It is a glory of the scheme of redemption, that whilst its leading saving features can be explained and enforced by minds of the plainest cast, it affords a field in which the most gifted intellect may be taxed to its utmost capacities. Even as a mere test of ability, which would seem to require the larger amount of talent—to discuss philosophical questions which have been treated of a thousand times by all ages of the modern Church, and to take up the current events of the day as themes for discourse, or to dwell habitually on the old story of the cross, in such a manner that it shall afford exhaustless variety and be ever fresh to the mind of hearers? The conceit of those who disparage ministers, who are eminently preachers of the Gospel, and think well of their gifts because they are able to entertain congregations with speculations and novelties, is, to say the least, based on a very shallow foundation. We, not long since, had an interview with a clerical friend, whose mental qualities will rank with the first in the land, and who, during a large portion of his ministry, has addicted himself to pulpit preparations of a speculative character, but whose views as to what best becomes the pulpit have recently undergone a most healthful change. He has seen his error in this respect, and his great desire now is, to learn how most effectively to preach Christ. After listening to a discourse, which, though delivered by a minister of the finest erudition, was still characterized by its full Gospel tone, he said to us, "I would give the world to be able to preach just such a sermon as that. Without vanity, I can say, that I can prepare speculative discourses, such as some persons would perhaps call striking sermons, all the year round; but the sermon that is full of the unction and spirit of Christ, that is what I wish to be able to preach." Such preaching as this excellent and valued minister now esteems so highly, is the preaching which most honors God, and which is most blessed to them that hear it. It is that which comforts troubled souls; which encourages the feeble-minded, supports the weak, nourishes alike the babes and the strong men, prepares those that are appointed to death for a peaceful and triumphant departure, and leads careless sinners to the cross, which enables the minister to look back upon a life of usefulness, when called to rest from his labors, which stude with unfading jewels his crown in heaven. Happy the hearers who sit under such ministrations; happy the man of God who proclaims to his people "full, rich, old-fashioned Gospel sermons!

GONE TO BED.

An eminently holy man thus wrote, on hearing of the death of a child:

"Sweet thing, and is he so quickly laid to sleep? Happy he! Though we shall have no more pleasure of his lisping and laughing, he shall have no more the pain of his crying, nor of being sick, nor dying. Tell my dear sister, that she is now so much more akin to the next world; and this will be quickly passed to us all. John is but gone an hour or two to bed, as children used to do, and we are very soon to follow. And the more we put off the love of this present world, and all things superfluous, beforehand, we shall have the less to do when we lie down."

A NEW SOCIETY.—An organization has been formed by members of the Episcopal Church, with a view to raising funds for the purchase of Western lands, to serve hereafter as sites for churches, or to grow, perhaps, into town lots of great value. The idea of the Society was suggested during the recent Rock Island excursion, probably by the successful pecuniary result attending the early purchased land of the Episcopal Church at St. Paul's, Minnesota, when $300 wisely invested a few years ago has now produced $20,000 or more. The Society desires to raise $10,000, and particularly solicits twenty contributions of $500 each, which will make up that amount.

My friend, hast thou ever thought how pleasant and altogether lovely would be a life of entire sincerity married to perfect love? The wildest stories of magic skill, or fairy power, could not equal the miracles that would be wrought by such a life; for it would change this hollow masquerade of veiled and restless souls into a place of divine communion.

A GEM OF THOUGHT.—The Rev. Robert Hall most beautifully and truly says:

"Religion is the final center of repose; the goal to which all things tend, apart from which man is a shadow, his very existence a riddle, and stupendous scenes of nature which surround him as unmeaning as the leaves of the sybil scattered in the wind."

QUICKSILVER MINES.—The Tuscaloosa Observer says that there is a deposit of quicksilver to be found on the road from Tuscaloosa to Fayette Court House, fourteen and a half miles from the latter place.

OBITUARY:

DIED.—At the residence of J. M. Bates, Esq., in Greene county, Ala., on the 6th inst., the venerable SAMUEL PATTON, aged 79 years and 1 month.

Father Patton was born in Abbeville District, South Carolina. In early life he removed to Georgia, and thence to Wayne county, Miss., in 1819. In 1821 he settled in the county of Greene, Ala. For nearly fifty years he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, during which time he was not only acceptable, but his christian character was irreproachable. He was a man of rather a taciturn temper, of simple, unobtrusive piety, rarely excited, and seldom depressed, his uniform religious deportment and experience enabled him at all times to give a reason for the hope within him. In his business transactions, his stern integrity and punctuality, gave him the confidence and respect of the community. And his unswerving probity and gentleness of spirit in social life gave him an influence, which very few men, with so little mental culture ever possessed. Though he lived to a good old age, much beyond the ordinary limit of human life, still our feelings of filial fondness and perhaps of selfishness, would make us say his removal was too soon. But we sorrow not as those without hope, for we certain no doubt but he has entered into the "rest that remaineth for the people of God."

DIED.—On the 4th of August, 1854, at his father's residence, Dale county, Ala., JAMES HALLFORD, aged 24 years and 2 months, after a painful illness of thirteen days. Some years ago he joined the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and ever since has continued a consistent member. He said that he was both willing and happy to die. He asked the physician to pray with him; after reading the 14th chapter of the gospel of John. Upon these glorious promises his faith fastened, and with fortitude he went down into the Jordan of death, after calling and bidding farewell to his friends, wife and child.

DIED.—SUSAN HALLFORD, daughter of Samuel Hallford, on the 28th July last, aged 19 years and 19 days. Sister H. joined the church in 1848. Up to the day of her death, during her last sickness, she said that she was not as happy as she hoped to be, but before her sun set the glory of a better life poured into her soul. She called about her father, mother, brother and sisters, and composedly bade them farewell. To a question, she replied that all was well, that her home was in heaven. N. A. SKIPPER.

DIED.—On the 18th inst., after a short illness, HOLLAND NIMMONS, the infant son of the Rev. H. N. MCTYERIE, aged 2 years, 7 months and 21 days. He was a fine, healthy looking babe, when seized with congestive fever, in one of its most unmanagable types, and

"We all have left for Jesus' sake,
And shall we grieve to part with one!
No, if a wish would call him back,
We would not have our darling son
Brought from his everlasting rest,

WASHINGTON ALLSTON.—Soon after his marriage with his first wife, the sister of the late Dr. Channing, he made his second visit to Europe. After a residence there of little more than a year, his pecuniary wants became more pressing and urgent, more so than at any other period of his life. On one of these occasions he himself used to narrate the event, he was in his studio, reflecting with a feeling of almost desperation upon his condition. His courage seemed to toll him that he had deserved his afflictions, and drawn them upon himself by his want of due gratitude for past favors from heaven. His heart all at once seemed filled with the hope that God would listen to his prayers, if he would offer up his direct expressions of penitence, and ask for Divine aid. He accordingly locked his door, withdrew to a corner of the room, threw himself upon his knees and prayed for a loaf of bread for himself and his wife. While thus employed a knock was heard at the door. A feeling of momentary shame at being detected in this position, and a feeling of fear lest he might have been observed, induced him to hasten and open the door. A stranger inquired for Mr. Allston. He was anxious to learn who was the fortunate purchaser of the painting of "Angel Uriel," regarded by the artist as one of his most precious, and which had won the prize at the exhibition of the Academy. He was told that it had not been sold.

"Can it be possible? Not sold? Where is he had? "In this very room. Here he is producing the painting from the corner, and wiping off the dust. "It is for sale; but its value has never yet, to my idea of its worth, been adequately appreciated, and I would part with it." "What is its price?" "I am always, so far, exceeded my offers. I leave for you to name the price." "Will four hundred pounds be an adequate recompense?" "It is more than I have ever asked for it." "Then the painting is mine." The stranger introduced himself as the Marquis of Stafford, and he became from that moment one of the warmest friends of Mr. Allston. By him Mr. A. was introduced to the society of the nobility and gentry; and he became one of the favored among the many gifted minds that adorned the circle, in which he was never tired of appearing often. The instantaneous success of this offered by the liberality of this visitor, was always regarded by Allston as a direct answer to his prayer, and it made a deep impression upon his mind. To this event was ever after went to attribute the increase of devotional feelings which became a prominent trait in his character.

Mrs. Elizabeth Benton, wife of Col. [illegible], who died at Washington on Sunday evening, 60 years of age. For several years she had been prostrated, having been deprived of the use of all her energies, but she bore her sufferings, it is stated, with unexampled patience and Christian resignation. A writer in the Intelligencer says:

The ruling feeling in Mrs. Benton's heart and strongest to the last, was her devotion to her husband. Of late she has sat [illegible] by his side when at his labors at home, and indeed their lives may be said to have been inseparable, for she has made her home where his business called him. She was reconciled to part with him on his late return to Missouri because she was too weak to accompany him, but knew that his duty required his presence at home. When she felt the approach of death, which terminated her life, she led her husband to the vacant chair in which her husband worked, and, by look and gestures, made it appear that she required his recall. It was too late. She walked to the bed to this apartment, from which she was never to rise.

MISSISSIPPI.—According to the census of 1850 there were 13,528 free adults in this State who cannot read and write. Of these, only 81 are foreigners. The white and colored population of this State in 1850 was 606,648. Of these, 439,407 were natives of the State. 155,211 natives of the other States of the Union, 4,788 natives of foreign countries, and 508, nativity unknown. The State produced for the year ending June 1st, 1850, 484,283 bales of cotton, 187,000 bushels of wheat, and 22,556,552 bushels of corn.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

On and after the 1st November next, the subscription price of the New Orleans Christian Advocate will be $2 per annum in advance; if payment be delayed six months, $2 50; at the end of the year, $3.

After a fair and full experiment of two years, it is ascertained that the paper can not be supported at $1 50 per annum. This will be to all our friends and patrons, and to every reasonable person, a sufficient cause for the change. In labor and material there has been a change to higher rates. The price of printing is now 25 per cent. higher in this city than it was a year ago.

This arrangement has the unanimous recommendation of the Publishing Committees. We make the New Orleans Advocate at the same time with the family of Advocates, and cheap at

Labor is high. Living is high. Materials are high. We are publishing the Advocate at a heavy weekly cash expense. We need every weekly cash receipts. Much can be done in extending our circulation and keeping us in funds at the approaching fall meeting. Bring the paper before the meeting. Collect and remit.

There will be a Camp-meeting at Bethel, in Wilkinson county, Mississippi, commencing on Wednesday before the first Sabbath in October next. Preachers generally are invited.

CHOLERA IN KNOXVILLE, TENN.—The Knoxville Register Extra of the 9th inst. says: We are truly glad to be able to announce the abatement of cholera in Knoxville, no new case having occurred within the last forty-eight hours.

HEALTH OF MOBILE.—The list of interments at this place for the week ending on Saturday, the 26th, shows a slight increase on that of the week previous. There were thirty deaths, two of which were from yellow fever.

The Advertiser of the 17th inst. says:

"There is considerable sickness in town of dengue or bone fever; but as it is generally regarded as a substitute for its yellow brother, although painful, not at all dangerous, it is rather welcomed than otherwise. We renew our caution as to prudence in protecting the system from the sudden changes of temperature to which it will be for a short time exposed, for disease in any sort is not so desirable as to induce one to invite its approach."

AID FOR SAVANNAH.—The Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel says the ward committees in that city had collected and sent to Savannah, on Tuesday night last, $2371 35 for the relief of the sufferers in the city. The Chronicle adds:

"This sum, with the collections made at the Catholic and Methodist churches, and the appropriations made by our City Council, swells the amount which has been sent from this place in the last four days to about four thousand dollars, and would doubtless have been much larger but that many of our wealthiest citizens are absent."

CHOLERA IN COLUMBIA, PA.—The awful mortality in Columbia is said to have been caused by the putrid carcasses of sheep which had died and been thrown into the reservoir. When the water was drained off the bodies were discovered. A dispatch from that place dated the 13th states that fifty deaths had occurred on the previous day. The dispatch says:

The disease is still raging with unabated malignity. Several new cases and many deaths this morning.

The Town Hall has been converted into a hospital, which is filled with the sick and dying. Fire has been burnt in various parts of the town as a preventive, in hope of purifying the atmosphere.

The distress and suffering is beyond description, and principally for want of nurses and attendants. The dead cannot be buried as fast as required; nearly every person has left the place. It is estimated that out of a population of about 7000 only about 1500 remain, and among these the scourge is dreadful. All business is suspended, and stores closed.

The Baltimore Patriot, of the 14th, says the disease has produced such a panic that the country people round the devastated town refuse to hold any intercourse with the citizens, and much suffering from the want of wholesome food has been the result. Dr. Jewell estimates that if Philadelphia was ravaged in a degree corresponding with her population, as compared with Columbia, the deaths would have reached seventy-five an hour! The same gentleman is of opinion that the exciting cause of the epidemic is in the atmosphere, and not in the water, as the victims have been indiscriminately from among those who use the water from the reservoir, and those who drink nothing but spring water. The Susquehanna, at Columbia, is now extremely low, and the atmosphere of the town is visited by the quantity of decomposed animal matter in its bed, or lodged above the dam.

HEALTH OF CHARLESTON.—The Board of Health reported nineteen deaths from yellow fever for the twenty-four hours ending on the 15th instant. Contributions have been placed in the hands of the editor of the Courier to the amount of $861 for the Roper Hospital and $521 for the relief of Savanneh. The Courier says:

"A friend suggests that the pastors of the different churches in the city announce to-morrow from their respective pulpits that inasmuch as the City Council have appointed Friday next as a fast day, it would be a very appropriate occasion to take up a collection for either the suffering poor of this city and Savenneh, or the Roper Hospital only, as in this way a great many would have an opportunity of contributing, who otherwise might not think of it."

HEALTH OF SAVANNAH.—There were twenty-four deaths in Savannah on the 14th instant, twenty of which were from yellow fever.

FURTHER DISTURBANCES AND ACTS OF VIOLENCE.—After closing our report on Friday night last, when we left the city in the apparent enjoyment of tranquility which it was thought would not again be disturbed. But about 10 o'clock, a party composed of about half a dozen ruffians fired at a lady and two gentlemen seated on the gallery of a house on Suzette street, near Tchoupitoulas. The lady was Mrs. Adams, and the gentlemen her husband and Assistant Alderman Cooper of this District. Mrs. Adams seeing this party approach and make ready to fire, sprang to her feet and forced her husband into the house. The ruffians at that moment fired, and the lady fell wounded in three places—one ball passing through the muscles of the arm, lodged in the shoulder, where it still remains—another struck her in the head, and a third grazed her forehead. From the appearance of the leader of this party, Mrs. Adams is under the impression that he is a notorious desperado—an Irishman named Dick Holloway, with whom her husband had had a difficulty some time since, and who sought the fine opportunity afforded by these riotous times to settle it, and place all to the account of the riot. This fellow is a most cruel monster, and was, some years ago, tried on a charge of having butchered a negro in a most cruel manner. He is a terror to the neighborhood in which he resides—heads his countrymen at will, and intimidates them from prosecuting him.

These ruffians, when they had perpetrated the fiendish outrage of shooting Mrs. Adams, precipitately fled, and although there was a watchman close by he made no attempt to arrest them. The night watch were completely intimidated. It is asserted that if one of them saw a crowd of two or three persons coming along the street he would run and hide, yelling to his companions "here they come."

Shortly after this, in passing Accocointion Market on horseback, Sergeant Kearny was fired upon by some persons concealed therein, but escaped unhurt.

About the time these outrages were being perpetrated in the upper portion of the city, a small party of persons walked down Girod street, threw a few cairs into a couple of small grog shops between Magazine and Tchoupitoulas streets, and dangerously stabbed a notorious fellow named Michael Heyde, who had been making a "fuss" about the levee that day, in the abdomen; a man named Downey was also beat and dangerously stabbed at the corner of Girod and Tchoupitoulas streets, by this party. The wounded men were subsequently found by the police and sent to the hospital. This small body of riotously disposed persons next directed their steps towards the seventh ward, where they threatened the house of Malachi Kelly, but committed no further outrages and soon after dispersed.

In the morning when these outrages became public the indignation of our citizens knew no bounds. So long as the killing had been confined to parties engaged in the disturbances, the most respectable portion of our citizens did not care much which whipped, but when the ruffians had turned their attention to shooting defenceless ladies and gentlemen at their very hearths, it was high time measures were adopted to speedily terminate these outrages, and protect life and property. Mayor Lewis immediately issued a proclamation calling upon all good citizens to come forward and enroll themselves in a civil police to protect the city, requesting all coffee-houses to close at 8 o'clock, and that parents, guardians and masters, should keep their children, wards and servants at home after nightfall.

This proclamation had the desired effect. About 250 of our best citizens enrolled themselves as a special police. Col. Forno was sworn in as the Chief, and they were divided into squads, who were ordered to patrol all portions of the district, returning at fixed intervals and making reports.

About half past 10 o'clock one of the patrols heard a shot fired in the neighborhood of Lafayette Square, and presently a man was seen running up Lafayette street who was stopped by the patrol, when it was found that he was slightly wounded in the head. He said that his name was Thomas Smith, and stated that while quietly walking up Lafayette street he had been shot at by some person unknown to him, and, whom he did not see. He was taken to the watch-house, where his wound was found to be of no very serious character. He could give no idea why he was shot at, or who did it.

The various patrols arrested a number of persons whom they found in the streets with weapons of various kinds concealed on their persons.

The most important arrest of the night was made by Capt. S. J. N. Smith and Capt. William Tenbrink, who brought in Richard Halloway and two others, whom they found concealed in a yard, well armed and prepared. Halloway is accused of being the man who wounded Mrs. Adams on Friday night.

With the above exceptions, not an incident occurred to disturb the peace of the city on Saturday.

The citizen police seemed to have the desired effect; and it is a great pity it was not called into service at an earlier period of the disturbances. The city was perfectly quiet all day yesturday; and the citizen police went on patrol again last night.

MOBILE ITEMS.—The Evening News of the 15th says:

"Attempts were made yesterday to set fire to several houses in the suburbs of the city. Among them was the residence of Mr. C. LeBaron, on Dauphin Way, opposite the Asylum. A hole had been made under one corner of the house, and filled with light wood, leaves, paper and rags. Fire had been applied to these combustibles, and they had fairly kindled when the children on the premises perceived the small of burning rags, and scarcely for the fire. It was found in time to prevent damage and save the building."

The Register has discontinued its Monday morning publication, at the sacrifice, it says, of pecuniary advantage, for the purpose of avoiding Sunday work in all departments of the establishment.

The commercial progess of our country will be seen at a glance, so far as our commercial shipping is concerned, in the following statistics obtained by the Washington Star at the Treasury Department:

Excess in favor of 1853	4,407,348
Tonnage of the U. S in 1847	1,295,596
Tonnage of New York city in 1854	1,272,801

The fever is on the increase in Charleston, having become generally diffused among the population.

A SAD AFFAIR.—The grand jury of Jackson county, Miss., on Tuesday, the 13th inst., found a true bill against S. L. Montgomery, (for assault with intent to kill,) in the late shooting of Col. D. M. Fulton, at Cooper's Well, two weeks ago, the particulars of which we published at the time. Mr. Montgomery is a stepson of Col. Fulton.

A THEORY EXPLODED.—The theory stated some time since, that rain could be coaxed down from the clouds by fire, has been put to a hard test this season. There have been fires enough to make the "heavens weep" the biggest kind of tears, but all in vain. The theory, thus far, may be regarded as an exploded one.

GRAND LODGE OF ODD FELLOWS.—The Grand Lodge of the United States of I. O. of O. F. were in secret session all day on Saturday, the 9th inst., and did not adjourn until late at night. The session was to last until the following Tuesday. A large number of the delegates had left the city, and but a bare quorum remained. The motion to abolish the degree of Rebecca had been rejected.

No spectacle can be imagined more mournful than that of Savannah on Saturday morning. The streets filled with ruins, the gale not yet fully ceased, the waters boiling and the wind moaning among the prostrate trees, while above the sound of all could be heard the church bells tolling the death-knell of the unhappy victims of the pestilence. On Saturday, there were twenty burials in the city—twenty funeral processions poking their melancholy way over the ruins which the storm had left. Can a more awful spectacle be imagined? [Macon (Ga.) Telegraph, 13.

A CARPET OF IVORY.—Among the curiosities to be transmitted from India to the Great Exhibition in Paris next year is a carpet of ivory. It is 20 feet long by 6 broad; and made of long strips of ivory, plaited like matting. The price fixed upon it is £300.

A mile or so from town a gentleman met a boy on horseback, crying with cold. Why don't you get down and lead the horse?" said our friend, "that's the way to get warm." "It's a b-b-borrowed horse, and I'll ride him if I freeze."

One year ago a frightful epidemic raged in this city, carrying death and sorrow into the bosom of almost every family, striking down the native born and acclimated as well as the stranger, and filling our hospitals and graveyards with victims from every class of society and from every age and condition of life. New Orleans was reduced to a deplorable depth of wretchedness. Her dwellings were marked with the symbols of mourning, her streets bore silent witness night and day to the desolation which reigned every where; business deserted her marts, and his chief employment of those who escaped the pestilence or survived its deadly grasp was in attending the sick and dying and burying the dead. In the midst of these horrors New Orleans made no frantic appeals to her sister cities for aid; no appeal was needed. From almost every quarter of the United States contributions came pouring into the hands of our organized committees and our charitable societies and institutions, and the distresses of the indigent sick, thousands of whom were perishing in helpless disease and poverty, were thus relieved to an extent not to be estimated.

The people of New Orleans have not forgotten in one short year the terrible scenes to which we have alluded; and it would be a libel upon their character to say that they had forgotten, or were ungrateful for, the kind aid so liberally extended to them in that dreadful extremity. They have now an opportunity of exhibiting their sense of the noble efforts once made in their behalf, and of discharging to some extent the obligations entailed upon them by acts of humanity and charity.

This city of Savannah is at the present in almost if not quite as deplorable a condition as was New Orleans one year ago. Her population is perishing by hundreds before that destroying scourge, the yellow fever; many of her most respectable citizens have been stricken down, hundreds are fleeing in terror from the place, and yet the bills of mortality go up daily at a frightful rate. In this extremity she implores for aid, and surely in no city should the appeal meet with a more ready response than in New Orleans. The Howard Association has already taken the first step towards meeting the case in a proper manner, and we earnestly hope and confidently expect that our citizens (inasmuch as the Common Council is not at present in session) will take immediate and active measures to prove their substantial sympathy with the suffering people of Savannah. The Maryland colony in Liberia is now a free and independent State. The new constitution, containing a clause which prohibits the traffic in ardent spirits, was adopted by the people on the 20th of May, and on the 6th of June William A. Prout was elected Governor, and B. J. Drayton, Lieut. Governor. The new Governor was for many years Secretary to the late Governor Russwurm, and last winter visited Baltimore to consult with the managers of the Maryland Colonization Society in relation to the separation, which has now been effected. He was inaugurated on the 8th of June, when the agent of the Maryland Society formally relinquished the government into his hands. He is said to possess much ability. Thomas Mason has been appointed Secretary of State under him.

Colonel Harney, of the United States Army, sailed from New York on Wednesday, in the steamer Asia, for Liverpool, en route for the theatre of the Eastern war. If the gallant Colonel could be permitted to take a hand in it, we have no doubt it would become a little more interesting than it has yet been. He intends, however, to be a mere spectator.

The Herald, New York, has a statistical article about the value, population, etc., of the hotels in that city. The whole number is set down at between forty and fifty, the number of guests nine thousand, the total value of hotels, furniture, etc., $12,750,000. The figures are taken from the Assessor's books. The St. Nicholas is estimated at $888,000; Metropolitan, $550,000; Astor House, $450,000; Irving House and New York Hotel at $300,000 each; the appraised is about one-third less than the actual value. The Herald states that it is the intention of Monet, late of the New York Hotel, to erect a structure on the site of the Hippodrome. The building to be constructed of marble, and to cost, when done, upwards of a million of dollars.

FIRE IN RICHMOND.—The Richmond Enquirer of the 11th says: "Incendierism continues its work of destruction in our city. Two destructive fires occurred, almost simultaneously, yesterday morning, between 3 and 4 o'clock. The first in a four-story dwelling-house, owned by Abram Warwick, Esq., on Fifth street, between Franklin and Grace streets. It was untenanted, for the purpose of undergoing repairs, which were at the time in course of execution. The fire was communicated in the rear, and soon extended to the handsome four-story brick house adjoining, owned and occupied by Archibald Pleasants, Esq. Both buildings were almost entirely destroyed, and several others were much injured. Loss between $10,000 and $12,000.

FIRE IN COLUMBUS, MISS.—A letter from the town of Columbus, Miss., dated the 8th inst., says:

"One of the most destructive fires which ever occurred in the South broke out in a building in one of our principal squares, burning some fifteen of the largest business houses in our place. The efforts of the fire companies to arrest the flames were unavailing. The principal sufferers are Mrs Tufts, milliner; Spoare's tin factory; Gaston & Co., furniture store; Franklin & Bro., dry goods; J. Jones & Co., druggists; Smiles, dry goods; Evans, fancy and fruit store; Markstein's music store; Parham & Mason, grocery; E. C. Eggleston, grocery; Scholers, variety store; J. L. Pierce's office; Delaney's tin factory; barber shop, and a few other smaller tenements. The Columbus Insurance Office (a fire proof house) was completely surrounded by the flames, but withstood the devouring element. I am glad to add that most of the parties were insured. I omitted to mention that the Post-office, with most of its contents, was destroyed. Our streets are filled with goods and property of every description, and our two military companies—the Dragoons and Rifles—are on duty to protect it."

NOVEL INCIDENT.—A ride was involuntarily taken on the express train of the Troy and Boston Railroad, the other day, the particulars of which are novel and interesting.

As the train was coursing towards Troy at its highest speed, on passing a curve it suddenly dashed into a flock of pigeons upon the track. All of them save one—a pure and beautiful white—raised from the ground and escaped. The white one was not as fortunate, for rising and flying low in a line from the locomotive, it was overtaken and caught on the centre of the cowcatcher, where, unable to raise its wings against the rushing air, mute and bewildered, its neck and head stretched forward, it stood transfixed and motionless, as though converted into stone. On went the train in its wild speed, and on stood the pigeon in it wingless flight, and fourteen miles were thus traveled by the twain. It was only when the Union depot at Troy was reached and entered, that the pigeon, recovering from its bewildering enchantment, slightly ruffled its feathers, then tried its wings, and finally trusting them once more, soared aloft, lighting on a cross-piece of the dome. Here it was soon the observed of all observers, the story of its marvelous ride having many hearers. After an hour or so it sallied forth in the direction of its home, and doubtless will often tell in pigeon-tongue of its flight with the locomotive. [Albany Express.

EQUESTRIANISM.—As horseback riding is quite fashionable among young ladies and gentlemen, we copy the following in relation to a very important and hitherto undecided point, which proves, we think, pretty conclusively, that the right side is not the right side, after all:

"The rein are to be held in the left hand and the right hand is free to render aid should the horse become fractious, or the habit of the rider require adjusting. If the gentleman rides on the right side, he must use his left hand, and can do so to very little purpose. Instances have occurred where the lady's horse has taken flight on the instant, and the rider was rescued by the gentleman being on the left side and taking her from the frightened animal to his own. If the lady wishes to converse, and her escort is at her right hand, she must turn her head half round to make herself heard. Again, the escort being at the left hand, her dress is protected from the vehicles passing, and if it becomes disarranged, is not exposed to public view."

HOW TO BURN COAL.—Graham's Magazine has an article on coal buying and coal burning, from which we select the following:

One of the most important features in the use of all anthracite coals is to know how to burn them: And while there is almost universal ignorance on this subject—and especially among servants—there are very few, indeed, who are at all acquainted with the virtues of the poker, that would like to acknowledge it. To make and regulate a coal fire is one of those every day items of life with which all are familiar; but to do it properly and economically and perfectly, is a point in which the great mass of consumers are lamentably deficient.

A coal fire should never be started without an abundance of kindling wood; for, if this be scanty or damp, the chances are on the side of failure. The ash-pan should always be emptied before a new fire is made; and when the first supply of coal is thoroughly ignited, another supply should be thrown on. When this is covered with a red flame, the draught of the stove should be regulated so as to preserve an even heat, and no more coal ought to be thrown on for at least five hours.

At 12 o'clock, or thereabouts, the grate should be moderately agitated, and a new supply of coal added, with a moderate increase of draught, to be lowered when thoroughly ignited.

At about 6 o'clock, another supply should be thrown in; and, if intended to keep the fire all night, another thorough raking, and a slightly increased quantity ought to be thrown in. Now, after ascertaining the particular character of the stove, the chimney and the coal, these simple directions should be observed with perfect regularity, and the result will be all that could be desired.

Servants are generally too irregular in their attentions to the fires, and often entirely too assiduous in stimulating them to sudden heights, and hence make free use of the poker. The great mistake of all is to put on too much coal, as if it were wood—the greater the quantity the greater heat. If too much coal is supplied, the combustion is necessarily imperfect, because the fire is "choked up," the draught destroyed, and the elements of the coal, slowly escaping from it, pass off to the chimney unconsumed, or are disseminated in gases throughout the room. Whereas, if the stratum of coal be but moderate, a red flame will play around the interior of the stove, by which entire combustion and a healthy heat are secured. One ton of coal, therefore, by thorough combustion, will often secure more heat and a healthier atmosphere than two tons consumed in the ordinary way; and this is a fact which can only be demonstrated to ignorant servants by close watchfulness over their movements. The evil of over-supplies becomes a serious one in the kitchen, where the victuals become full charged with the sulphurous gases. Indeed, if the cook cannot be made to understand how to burn coal properly and sparingly, it should not be used at all—rather go back to "old hickory" and oak, and thus be sure of steaks and roast beef in their purity.

BLOODHOUNDS IN ENGLAND.—Bloodhounds have been used in England several times lately to aid in the capture of sheep stealers, under the direction of the police. This seems a dangerous and inhumen course, for which the crime committed affords but an inadequate justification. The manner in which the hounds are used may be gathered from the following remarks of the Sussex (England) Express, in noticing a recent capture of sheep stealers by police superintendent Attar:

"This is the second capture this active officer has made within the past three months. A few weeks ago the same parties stole a sheep from Mr Bettsworth, of the same parish, and Mr. Smith and his bloodhounds were sent for. The latter ran from the spot where the sheep was killed, through the most remote valleys in the neighborhood, a distance of three miles, causing great sensation to the guilty gang. They ultimately arrived at a cottage occupied by a shoemaker, when the gallant huntsman was accosted by the paralyzed inmate as to what his business was there. He was informed of the nature of his visit. The bloodhounds tried to make an entrance to their prey through the thatch on the roof of the cottage. The door, however, was opened, a search was made, and a part of the sheep found in the house. The prisoners were subsequently apprehended and committed for trial.

INTERESTING ITEMS.—A dispatch from Washington to the New York Tribune, dated September 8, has the following:

Information has been received from St. Petersburg with respect to the place of Embassador there, vacant since the death of Mr. Bodisco. The Russian Government had named to the place Count Medan, who since 1848 has been the Russian Envoy Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary Minister at Rio Janeiro, but the Count has replied to the order to remove to Washington, with a letter of thanks for the honor conferred upon him by the nomination to a position of higher rank, (the American Embassy stands higher on the Russian list than the Brazilian;) but stating at the same time that he was seriously suffering from bronchitis, for which he had entered upon a course of treatment that would require some months. He accordingly asked permission to remain there at least for the present, and it has been recorded.

It is highly probable that Mr. Stoeckl, the present Chargé d'Affaires of Russia, may be eventually appointed to the office which Count Medan thus declines. I learn that the Emperor is in the highest degree satisfied with the negotiation of the neutrality treaty.

The attempt to settle the Greytown question will probably be carried on at Washington rather than London. The question will accordingly be debated between Mr. Marcy and Mr. Crampton. I am unable to state that the instructions of the latter are of a positive character, and that under the present extraordinary circumstances, England will not yield a whit of her old pretensions on that coast. Forty-four-forty taught British statesmen that there was nothing to be feared from a sham Democratic Administration.

James M. Mason, United States Consul at Curracoa, starts for New York on Monday. Secretary Marcy fully endorses his course, and the entire Administration commend him.

The venerable Elisha Whittlesey, First Comptroller, has tendered his resignation. He takes to heart the removal of his favorite clerk, and complains of interference with his duties by the Secretary.

The Treaty between the United States and the Netherlands is very advantageous to us. It provides for the recognition of American Consuls in Dutch ports.

The Secretary of the Treasury has approved of the new design for gold dollars, and sent orders to the Mint to commence striking them off.

Among the bidders for the contract for the construction of the six new steam frigates are the following from New York: Morgen Iron Works, T & E. Farren, Allaire Iron Works, Pease & Murphy, Jno. E. Ericsson and J. Burne, West Point Foundry; and from Philadelphia, Messrs. Merrick & Sons.

The Star asserts that the St. Domingo negotiations refer only to the securing of a West India port for the use of American shipping, where their privileges will be superior to those of all other nations.

We sometimes have felt exceeding provocation at the quarrelsome spirit of the United States. They are always ready to fight—to seek an occasion for fighting. They would at any time rather go to war than not. They are perpetually seeking satisfaction. Now, it is of ourselves; again, it is of France, or Spain, or Austria, or Japan. Their very ambassadors make pretexts for duels if they cannot find them; their consuls demand compensation for injured citizens; their captains of the navy are ever on the brink of a broadside in foreign ports, either with the State in whose harbor they are at anchor, or with some rival navy or competing traders. Yet they are at peace with all the world—have no national debt—their surplus revenue is a nuisance—every body is civil to them—every body concedes to them more than is their due. To make war in words is enough; to be sudden and quick in quarrel, seeking the bubble reputation even at the cannon's mouth," turns out to be the best way of superseding the necessity of an appeal to the cannon. To a man bristling with spikes all are ready to give "a wide berth." So it was with us in the days of the protector. Old Noll had enough on his hands at home, but that did not prevent him from keeping foreigners in order. Being always ready to fight with every body, nobody was willing to fight with him. He had "enough of the devil in him to keep the devil off him." He made England's rights to be respected, and her name to be feared. We ourselves were at war with France for thirty years. We fought to the last—lavished all our wealth upon it—pawned our credit for it. We would never give in. Often we rejected terms of peace. The consequence is, we have had no war for forty years. We are not sure that it is not to our peace principles we are to attribute the fact that we are at war now. Had we shown our teeth sooner, and threatened to use them earlier, the general impression appears to be that we should have had no occasion for their use. Armies and navies are, indeed, expensive; but it is no bad economy which spends ten millions to be prepared for war, to save a hundred millions in the war itself."

We extract the following from a letter to the Charleston Standard written by a South Carolinian in New York:

The other day a party of us went to Greenwood, which is the most beautiful cemetery I have ever seen. For several months in the year, three hundred men are daily employed on the grounds; and beautifully, indeed, are they kept; last, as I rode through those splendid paths, and saw the mockery of woe, my mind reverted to those beautiful and heart-eyed lines of Gray:

"Can storied urn or animated bust
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath,
* * * * * * *
Or flattery soothe the still cold ear of death?"

When I left a monument which cost thirty-two thousand dollars, I thought that affection might have given to the poor what it wasted in vanity. When I passed the mausoleums of Townsend and another quack sarsaparilla man, I asked aloud if they expected to humbug in the world to come as well as in this. As we rolled by the tombs of men still living, I despised the vanity which sought to perpetuate itself by this means. No city graveyard now is place for solemn thought. See you splendid pile! it claims your admiration of the art which framed it. See this temple erected to the praise of self, and these grounds made a matter of speculation. What feelings do they raise? Contempt! contempt! contempt! See rascals proclaimed good men, and villains misnamed worthy citizens! What feelings do these excite? Disgust for the hypocrisy of man.

To my taste, no tomb has ever spoken half so much as the simple slab in St. Philip's yard, bearing the one word "Calhoun!" What volumes of thought does that one word raise! The statesman stands before you in all his glory. Let Carolina ladies build a monument where they will, but let them not insult the memory of the dead by moving that simple stone which graces his resting-place. But here I am dealing seriously with things, forgetting that we should all follow the crowd; but here my soul resists, and says the only place in which the memory of the dead should be preserved with shining beauty is in the hearts of those who love and honor them. Let a simple stone mark the spot, that friends and admirers may know where sleep the dead; but this is all that a man should wish. Virtue needs no gaudy parade, and vice should be ashamed of all such mockery.

THE SUBTERRANEAN PASS THROUGH THE SIERRA NEVADA.—The narrative of this discovery, which appears in the Mariposa Chronicle, is elaborately worked up as to wear the air of fiction. The writer says he had heard of a long one near the head of Yo-Semity valley, and as the mammoth caves near Marble Springs, in the immense marble ledges that traverses the gold region, are more or less connected, he was led to suspect that there might be a subterranean pass through the Sierra Nevada, particularly as Indians, when pursued in that region, invariably disappeared at a certain point at the head of the valley. Having searched this locality three days for this subterranean pass in vain, he at length took a bath near the famous cataract, when a gust of wind blew the mist of the fall away, and exposed the long sought pass behind it. He and his party made preparations, and next day entered the cavern with lighted torches, and discovering an Indian trail, followed it until they encountered two Indians. These told them that they were half way through the pass; that a little further on was a great chasm bridged with logs; and that there were other passages leading into the lakes and rivers, but without any known outlet. Parting from the Indians, the party reached the chasm, found it filled with human remains, and the legs petrified. Finally, after being four days in the cave, they emerged on the other side of the Sierra, among a village of white Indians!

THE CALIFORNIA SNAKE BIRD.—Alexander S. Taylor, of Monterey, in his Familiar Sketches of the Natural History of California, says that in the coast counties of Southern California there exists a singular species of bird, generally called, on account of his well-known mortal aversion to all members of the snake tribe, the "snake bird." It is not a bird of prey, but lives entirely on grain, like the gallinacea. When full grown it measures two feet from the tip of its bill to the tip of its beak. The tail has four or five long features tipped with white. Its feet are furnished with four toes, two in front and two behind; and all are guarded with sharp needle-like claws. The color of the bird is a mottled, yellowish gray, and it rarely attains the weight of a pound. Its beak is two and a half inches long, and hard and sharp. When the bird finds a rattlesnake; and rattlesnakes are to be found in great numbers in Southern California, wherever the ground is covered by the cactus plant—it immediately proceeds, with the greatest caution and dispatch, to gather the fallen cactus fruit and dry lotice, and corral him to the height of a foot or more—the spikes and spines of the plant, strong and sharp as needles, serving as an insurmountable barrier to the escape of the snake. This being accomplished, the bird gathers with his feet and claws the young cones of the pine which are as hard and heavy as stones, and hovering over its enemy, lets them fall, one by one, from a height of five or six feet, upon the infuriated viper, who, surrounded by prickles and points wherever he turns, is soon fully aroused to the danger of his position. The bird, with malicious soreness, continues to drop cone after cone, until his foe is exhausted, and then, demolishing the corral, picks the snake to death with his iron beak.

"Twenty-two years ago, a marriage took place in this city which from some cause or other was invalidated, and the parties separated. The lady went to India and married an officer, who subsequently rose to the rank of a General in the army, and on his death bequeathed a large fortune to his widow. The gentleman also married, and about a year since, his wife, on discovering various old love-letters, etc., in his possession, proposed to burn them; etc., in his possession, proposed to burn them; but, fortunately, as will be seen, did not do so. In due course of time the first wife died, and left to him who had once been her husband, on less than £20,000, stating that he would be enabled to prove his identity by the documents in his possession. The fortunate Heir, who lives in this city, was soon found, and his claim duly established; and he has, we believe, received the legacy of his first love, to the comfort and delight, we presume, of his second."

U. S. STEAMER POWHATAN,

I am obliged, from want of time, to give you but a brief report of our doings for the past month. After the diplomatic negotiations in Yoko-hamma were concluded, the survey of the bay was vigorously carried on, and in spite of rough and stormy weather, made good progress. On the 6th of April the Saratoga fired her salute of departure, and sailed, amid hearty cheers from the remaining vessels of the squadron.

Before the fleet went down to Simoda, (one of the ports designated in the treaty as open to American ships), the Commodore desired to have a view of Yedo, which desire met with great opposition on the part of the Japanese, who were struck with horror at the prospects of our fire-wheel ships anchoring under the walls of the Imperial Palace. As the Commodore remained firm in his purpose, some of them declared that the dropping of the anchor under the walls of this former would be the signal for their own disembowelin cut. We were all not a little excited, when, on the morning of the 8th of April the ships got under way. Yenske, the chief interpreter, with some other Japanese, were on board the flag ship. They looked haggard and alarmed as we steamed up the bay. Yenske especially, was petrified with alarm, and frequently said, "Do you really intend to remain in Yedo? Oh, no; Commodore Perry has a good heart; he certainly will not do so." We stood across the bay, and then, at a distance of three miles from shore, made directly up toward the imperial city. About 10 o'clock we had the light-house of Kuwasaeki abeam, on the left hand, while before us, in a long semi-circular line, stretched the white houses of Yedo. At the light-house commenced the suburb of Sinagawa; further toward the city were many large junks at anchor; behind them a great many smaller craft, while crawls of fishing boats and junks of all sizes covered the bay. A mound, or eminence, towered above the houses of the city near its centre, and from the turrets and shining white fronts of buildings covering it, we judge this to be the Imperial Palace.

By this time the sailing vessels were far astern, and only the Powhatan and Mississippi lay before the town. Commodore Perry halted for about half an hour, and then returned to the old American anchorage, to the infinite relief of the Japanese officers, who speedily recovered their good spirits. I cannot deny that we all felt somewhat disappointed, although we felt convinced the Commodore had pursued the wisest course. At the time, no important result could have been obtained by our anchoring at Yedo; it was a matter of entirely, not worth sacrificing at the price of several lives,—for I really think the Japanese officers fools enough to kill themselves—and would have created ill feeling towards us. So the Commodore has kept his word—gone in sight of Yedo, and without driving the Japanese to desperate measures. I cannot but express my admiration of the masterly manner in which Commodore Perry has managed this difficult business from the beginning. He has succeeded in combining dignity and firmness so happily with kindness and cordiality, that he has made our squadron and our country respected without humiliating the national pride of the Japanese.

On the 16th of April we have anchor and stood down the bay toward Simoda, our port in Japan. Simoda is situated near Cape Eggs sixty miles west from Point Segasil, on the entrance of the bay of Yedo, and not far from the point where we first made land in coming in Yedo last year. It is a good, commodious harbor, well sheltered by hills several hundred feet high. It has only a moderately large entrance toward the south, with a rock within the entrance which affords a still more protected anchorage. The little town of Simoda, of about 1000 houses, is situated at the north-western end of the harbor, on the banks of a small stream which flows down through a fertile valley, often not more than half a mile wide, and again widening to one and a half miles. Several little brooks offer good watering places for the ships. The larger Japanese junks mostly anchor at Kowesaoki, a village of about 300 houses, on the north-eastern end opposite Simoda. There are eight temples—some of which are very large—in the town, and little chapels (miu) on almost every eminence and by the road-sides. In the location of their buildings for religious purposes, the Japanese show a fine appreciation of the picturesque, and, in general, they seem to be great lovers of nature. On eminences, whence fine views are to be seen, spaces under the trees are cleared, and here the fellows sit, smoke, or pic-nic for hours.

I cannot say much concerning customs and manners of the Japanese, partly because it would be a repetition of what others have said before me, partly because I have not the time and space necessary; enough, that we have had ample opportunity, verifying most of what former writers have said of this strange people.

The country is exceedingly picturesque, and resembles very much the lower ranges of the Alps. Along the little river of Simoda are many villages, and numbers of rice mills stamp and grind along its banks. About six miles from the bay this river divides into several branches. Following either of them, you pass through numerous gorges and glens, and finally the barren tops of mountains, some three thousand feet high. Their summits and the narrow table lands are covered with bushy grass, among which a certain herb, upon which pheasants and partridges feed, grows very plentifully. This is a fine ground for sportsmen, who might soon bag a dozen of these plump, golden-green birds.

In one of the larger temples, a place has been arranged for the daguerreotype, and Mr. Brown is actively at work. He has obtained many very fine daguerreotypes of the Japanese, and will have a fine collection to show when he reaches home. Mr. Blaine continues his sketching, drawing, painting, gunning, skinning, pressing and preserving plants. Lieutenants Murray, Boet, Whiting, Bamboo, Nicholson, etc., etc., have been busily engaged in the survey, and deserve no small credit for their exertions and the important results they have obtained. Mr. Bent is now Flag Lieutenant. The Commodore expects the Imperial Commissioner in Simoda for a final settlement of coinage, freights, postage regulations, etc., etc.; to which end our coins, measures and weights have been sent to Yedo. This will take place when we return from Chakodade, which port in future will be probably a great resort for our whalers to recruit and obtain supplies, as Simoda will undoubtedly be our coal depot, and the station of the future Californian-Chinese line.

Yesterday at daylight the Mississippi and Powhatan got under way for Chakodade, for which place the Macedonia, Vandalia and Southampton sailed eight days ago. About noon we were within three miles of the Island of Oho-ima, and had a fine opportunity of observing the traces of volcanic action which it presents. The whole island is one immense volcano, the top of which has fallen in and formed a great basin, which incessantly belches forth white smoke and ashes. The edges of the crater are black, as if charred by fire, and on the south-western side of the island a stream of lava reaches from the summit to the sea. Some large crevices continue still smoking, and others are filled with ashes. A bluff near the sea, about 200 feet high, appears to be of recent formation, for the bushes and trees along the edges of the lava have a yellow, burnt appearance. The slopes of the mountain are covered with luxuriant vegetation, and there are two towns, one on Several instances are on record of really gallant actions fought between large French privateers and English frigates. A noteworthy affair of this kind occurred in 1708. The British forty gun frigate Pomona, Capt. Reynolds, chased the Cheri, privateer of Nahles, and as the latter made no attempt to escape, the two ships were soon yardarm to yardarm, and a furious battle ensued. At length the privateer struck, after losing her mizzen mast and receiving great damage; so much so, in fact, that she sank almost before the wounded and prisoners could be removed. The privateer mounted twenty-six guns of various caliber, and was manned by two hundred and thirty men. Her captain and fourteen men were killed, and nineteen wounded. The English frigate also sustained considerable damage. Considering the immense disparity of force, this was certainly a most gallant defence on the part of the privateer. Later in the same year a memorable action also occurred between the British sloop of war Trincomale, of sixteen guns, and the French privateer Iphigenie, of twenty-two guns. It lasted upwards of two hours, when by some accident the Trincomale exploded, and all the crew but two perished with her. The two vessels touched each other at this awful moment, and therefore it was not surprising that the privateer also was so dreadfully shattered that she sank in a few minutes. All her crew, with the exception of about thirty, perished. A more valamitous finale to a well fought action has rarely occurred. While on this topic we must not omit to mention a third important and singular affair about the same time. The British thirty-eight gun frigate Revolutionnaire, chased a strange ship off the coast of Ireland, and after a run of one hundred and fourteen miles in less than ten hours, the stranger hauled down her colors, and proved to be the Bordelais privateer of Bordeaux, a splendid ship of more than six hundred tons, with a crew of two hundred men, and mounting twenty-four guns on a main deck. She was reckoned as fast a sailer as any privateer belonging to France, and on her first cruise captured the immense number of twenty-nine valuable prizes. Her second cruise proved thus fatal to her.

Concerning this privateer and the frigate that captured her, Mr. James, in his Naval History, gives the following curious information: "It was a singular circumstance, not merely that the Bordelais was constructed by the same builder who had constructed the Revolutionnaire, but that the builder, at a splendid dinner given by the owners of the Bordelais to her officers soon after the termination of her first trip, should have said: 'England has not a cruiser that will ever touch her except the Revolutionnaire; and should she ever fall in with that frigate in blowing weather, and be under her lee, she will be taken.' The Bordelais was added to the British navy by the same name." It appears by the above that the frigate herself had previously been taken from the French and adopted into our navy. Whatever may be the case, nothing is more certain than that during the last war the French built the finest men-of-war in the world. Most of the crack frigates than in our navy had been taken from the French, and with them we captured more of their vessels—a fact which must have been bitterly mortifying to that gallant and sensitive people.

Owing to the extreme swiftness of most privateers, it rarely happened that large men-of-war could captnre them, unless under particular circumstances. Corvettes of war, and handy gun-brigs, were the vessels to hunt down and destroy these pests of commerce, and they did their duty manfully. Some times, however, it happened that they caught a Tartar in the shape of a privateer, and had much ado to escape being captured themselves. As a general rule, both English and French privateers carefully steered clear of all contact with men-of-war, for they knew they could have nothing to hope for but hard blows, and probably discomfiture. It did, however, occasionally happen, that when a privateer fell in with a sloop of war, or other small-armed ship of the enemy's royal navy, and knew the latter to be of decidedly inferior force, he would risk an attack. Several instances are on record of king's ships being captured after a hard fight, by one or more daring privateers. For example, the British gun-brig Growler, well armed, and commanded by Lieutenant Hollingsworth, with a crew of fifty men and boys, was engaged along with other men-of-war, in convoying merchant vessels; and when off Dungeness, the Growler was suddenly attacked in the night by two French lugger privateers, the Espiegle and Rose; and in spite of a gallant defence, in which her commander lost his life, was captured, and triumphantly carried into Boulogne. It is supposed that the privateers at first mistook the Growler for a merchantman.

A somewhat similar affair occurred about the same period. The British armed sloop George, Lieutenant Mackey, of 6 guns and 40 men, was attacked and captured by the West Indies by two Spanish privateers, one carrying 109 and the other 68 men. The British crew made a most heroic defence, and did not surrender until eight were killed and seventeen wounded, out of her forty men. The Spaniards had thirty-two killed. On the other hand, some French privateers made quite as determined a resistance against hopeless odds. The British 14 gun brig sloop Armaranthe, with a crew of 80 men, chased the French privateer Vangeur, a schooner of only six 4 pounders, and a crew of 80 men, including passengers. At length the two vessels ranged at pistol-shot distance, and the combat lasted upwards of an hour. When the privateer surrendered, her loss amounted to fourteen killed and five wounded. If the inferior disparity of force is taken into consideration, this is one of the most desperate defences on record, and proves that the issue of the combat would have been very doubtful had the force been more equal. We could give dozens of similar instances of the desperate courage often displayed both by English and French privateersmen; and this is about the only redeeming trait in their character. It may, however, be safely assumed, that, as a general rule, privateers only fought when fighting became unavoidable. On rare occasions French and English privateers fought each other, just as tigers and sharks will sometimes do when looking their natural prey.

The damage done to British commerce—and vice versa—by French, Danish and American privateers, was altogether incalculable, and it must also be borne in mind that the prodigious risk of capture raised the rates of marine insurance to a ruinous degree, so that merchants whose vessels made safe runs seldom realized remunerative returns on their invested capital; and if, on the other hand, they sent their ships to sea uninsured, they risked total ruin, for it was about an equal chance that a ship sailing to and from many ports would be captured. It is not fair to draw a parallel between regular men-of-war and privateers, as regards making prizes of enemy's merchant-ships. The mere act of capturing an enemy's merchantman is only a part of episodical performance on the part of men-of-war, their main business being to defend the coasts of their country from hostile invasion, and to fight and subdue the ship of war belonging to the foe. The prize-money they receive from occasional captures is only a legitimate extra reward for the services they perform to the state; while a privateer is sent forth wholly and solely to pursue and capture merchantmen, that its crew and owners may be enriched by their confiscation, the privateer neither defending their country, nor fighting its armed foes, unless reluctantly compelled to do so. These views of the question are now generally held by civilized States; and England, France and America, the three foremost nations of the earth, seem to have tacitly arrived at the somewhat tardy conclusion that there is hardly a hairbreadth of practical difference between privateering and piracy. Henceforward, pirates and privateersmen will alike swing from the yardarm, whenever captured in pursuit of their kindred profession.

A DOUBTFUL STORY.—A correspondent of the Petersburg Express, writing from Charlestown, Va., makes the following statement, for the truth of which we can not vouch. We remember that it is not long since a story was circulated among the newspapers of the country that an ancient watch, which once belonged to George Washington, had been unearthed on the site of old Fort Du Quesne, and we have always given the General credit for more sense than to scatter his valuables broadcast over the land. Barnum is no doubt by this time in possession of the watch and both seals. Here is the story:

"Washington was accustomed to wear two seals to his watch—one gold and the other of silver. Upon both of them the letters 'G. W.' were engraved, or rather cut. These seals he wore as early as 1754, and they were about his person on the terrible day of Braddock's defeat. On that day he lost the silver seal. The gold one remained with the General until the day of his death, and was then given by him to his nephew;—a gentleman of Virginia, who carefully preserved it until about seventeen years ago, when, in riding over his farm he dropped it, and could never recover it. The other day the gold seal, lost seventeen years ago, was ploughed up, recognized from the letters 'G. W.' on it, and restored to the son of the gentleman to whom Washington had presented it. At almost the same moment the silver seal, lost in 1854, just one hundred years ago, was ploughed up on the site of the battle in which Braddock was defeated; and, in like manner, recognized from the letters 'G. W.' So that in a very short time the two companions will be again united. I have this whole statement from the most reliable source possible—namely, from the gentleman himself, who has thus had restored to him these precious mementoes of his great ancestor. The affair is but one more proof of an oft-stated maxim, that truth beggars fiction in strangeness. I repeat, that there is not the slightest exaggeration or misstatement in the matter; and no room for mistake. In legal phraseology, the truth 'excindes every other hypothesis.'"

TROUBLE AMONG COTTON GROWERS.—The Clayton (Ala.) Banner of a recent date states that considerable excitement has been caused at that place and Enfaula, by the announcement that suits had been instituted by one E. M. Kelis against a number of farmers, under section 930 of the code, which reads:

"All owners of cotton gins must mark upon each bale of cotton ginned at such gine, the initials of their names, and the county in which such gin is situated; and failing to do so, are liable to a penalty of five dollars on each bale, to be recovered by any person suing for the same."

Kelis has instituted suits for penalties amounting to about $20,000, and should he persist in instituting suits against all who have subjected themselves to penalties, they will amount to not less than $100,000. Meetings have been held at Clayton and Enfaula to express indignation at the proceedings of Kells, and there appears to be a determination to resist the suits by all lawful means.

"My cousin Watty," said he, "was a midshipman some forty-yeare ago at Portsmouth; he and two other companions had gone on shore and overstayed their leave, spent all their money, and run up an immense hill at a tavern on the Point. The ship made a signal for sailing, but the landlady said:

"No gentlemen, you cannot escape without paying your reckoning," and she accompanied her words by appropriate actions, and placed them under the keeping of a sufficient number of bailiffs.

They felt they were in a scrape, and begged to be released.

"No, no," said Mrs. Quickly, "I must be satisfied some way or other; you must be aware, gentlemen, that you must be totally ruined if you don't get on board in time."

They all made long faces and confessed that it was true.

"Well," said she, "I'll give you a chance. I am so clroumstanced here that I cannot carry on business as a single woman, and I must contrive somehow to have a husband, or, at all events, I must be able to produce a marriage certificate, and therefore the only terms on which you shall leave to go on board to-morrow is, that one of you consent to marry me; I don't care a snap which it is, but by all that's good, one of you I will have or all three go to jail, and let your ships sail without you."

The virago was not to be pacified, and the poor youths, left to themselves, agreed after a time to draw lots, and it happened to fall on my cousin. No time was to be lost, and so off they marched to the church, and my poor relative was forthwith spliced. The bride, on returning, gave them a good dinner, and several bottles of wine apiece, and having tumbled them all in a wherry, sent them off. The ship sailed, and the young men religiously adhered to the oath of secrecy they had made previous to drawing lots.

The bride, I should have said, was the first to propose an eternal separation.

Some months after, at Jamaica, a file of papers reached the midshipman's birth, and Watty, who was observed to be looking over them, carelessly reading an account of a robbery and murder at Portsmouth, suddenly jumped up in ecstasy, and forgetting his obligation of secrecy, cried out,—

"Thank heaven, my wife is hnnged!"

Prof. F. A. P. Barnard, for many years a Professor in the State University of Alabama, has been elected to the Chair of Professor of Mathematics, Civil Engineering and Astronomy in the University of Mississippi, which we learn he accepts.

Medical Card.

W. BODENHAMER, M. D., still continues to devote his whole attention to the Medical and Surgical treatment of Chronic Diseases, especially those of the Rectum, Anus and Urinary Organs, such as Fistula, Ja Ano, Piles, etc. He will also treat the various Chronic Diseases of the Womb.

He may be seen and consulted in New Orleans at the St. Charles Hotel, from the 1st of December to the 1st of May; and in New York City at No. 37 Irving Place, from the 10th of May till the 20th of November of each year.

W. BODENHAMER, M. D.—The card of this gentleman will be found below. Having known the Doctor for a number of years, and the singular success attending his peculiar practice in the diseases named in his card, it affords me great pleasure to add our own testimony to that of the following, from one of the leading journals of Louisville, Ky.:

[From the Louisville Journal, May 30, 1854.]

Dr. W. Bodenhamer, a distinguished gentleman in his profession, from Louisville, Ky., has settled in our city, and has rooms at the St. Nicholas Hotel, office No. 37 Irving Place. Dr B. is well known throughout the South and West for the successful and skilful treatment of diseases mentioned in his card. [N. Y. National Democrat, May 23, 1854.

It seems from the notice above that Dr. Bodenhamer has established himself in the city of New York. We can not commend him too strongly to the people of New York city and of all that section of country. He has devoted about fifteen years in Louisville and New Orleans, to the treatment of the diseases named in his card, and we have always understood that, in the cure of those diseases, he is wholly without a rival any where. We know that he has treated not only hundreds but thousands of aggravated cases, and we are assured that, in every instance, he has succeeded in effecting a perfect cure, and that too without pain to the patient. He is an skillful physician, and one of the best of men. sept 23

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known to man can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary diseases which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a fifteenth part of all the lives of the human family destroyed by this fatal class of complaints can be saved by the use of this remedy. Where the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by it, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your Cherry Pectoral in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

He is one of the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect.

J. D POWELL, Supt. Trans., L. R. R.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefit it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours, with respect, JOHN O. WHITLOCK.

P. S. Almost any number of certificates can be sent you, if you wish it.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL.

Thos. C. Beach, A. M., Principal.
——, Assistant.

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments here been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell: but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter preside over the male and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages this presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

D. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain brass [illegible], white muslin.

Marion Female Seminary,

MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALA.

THE EXERCISES of this institution will be resumed on Monday, the 2d day of October, under the charge of the Rev. Jos. K. Armstrong as Principal, assisted by nine Professors, Teachers and Officers.

It has just closed its present session with one hundred and thirty-three students, seventy-seven of which number were boarders. There is but one session of nine and a half months.

Pupils can enter at any time during the session, chargeable from the beginning of the month in which they commence, to the close of the session. No deduction will be made but at the discretion of the Principal.

The Principal, with his family, resides in the building. The female teachers also reside in the Seminary. Boarders in the institution are under the control of the Principal at all times. A Steward, in the employment of the Principal, of experience, urbanity of manners, and faithfulness to his duties, a Matron who constantly and kindly ministers to the private wants of young ladies, and especially in sickness, a Governess who directs them in their exercises and amusements, superintends the order of their private apartments, instructs them in certain domestic duties, and guards their private, personal habits, manners and morals, always aided by the presence and active cooperation of the female teachers. The Principal and his lady secure to those committed to their charge every necessary and proper comfort and kindness, where they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations as to neatness, order, punctuality and economy. They have regular hours for study and recreation, for rising and retiring, for eating, domestic duties, and social enjoyment among themselves.

The institution is furnished with a new and superior apparatus in the departments of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. There is also a large collection of Maps, Charts, Plates, Diagrams, Globes, etc., for simplifying the principles of Geography, Physiology and Astronomy.

In the department of Drawing, Painting and Embroidery there is a fine collection of Drawing Cards, Engravings, Pictures, Paintings, Patterns, and every other convenience important in the prosecution of these departments.

There is in connection with the institution a library of more than one thousand volumes, and a Cabinet of several hundred specimens.

The institution is furnished with six Pianos, five Guitars, and one Harp.

MUSIC.—The Professor at the head of this department is equal to any in the country. He is a superior vocalist, a fine performer on the Piano, Harp, Guitar, Violin, Violoncello, etc. He has enjoyed ten years experience as a teacher of music in the best institutions in the Union, is profoundly versed in the principle of harmony, and has a real amateur of the sublime science to which he has devoted himself.

LOCATION.—Its salubrity, intelligence, morality and public spirit are unsurpassed.

PERMANENCY.—Parents may send their daughters here with confidence in their completing their education under the same course of instruction and system of discipline. Every thing conspires to make the permanency of the Principal a matter of duty, pleasure and interest.

TEACHERS.—The Principal himself a native of Alabama, surrounds himself with a corps of teachers of known efficiency and tried success, nearly all of whom have been reared in the South, thus ensuring a better acquaintance with Southern peculiarities and sympathy with Southern views and interests. Thoroughness is our motto in teaching. We ascribe the true importance to the harmonious development of the physical, intellectual and moral nature.

Reports are sent to patrons once every two months, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and conduct of the pupil in our system of merits and demerits scholarship and conduct are connected.

The Principal regards it as his most important duty to attend to the moral habits of his pupils and to imbuing their minds with proper religious principles.

The facilities for acquiring the French and other modern languages are superior.

There are daily exercises in Orthography, Reading and Writing. Great attention is bestowed on letter-writing and composition.

Lectures are delivered weekly to the junior and senior classes on various subjects of Science and Literature, on which they take notes and are subsequently examined.

The Principal and his assistant in the Collegiate department, the ensuing session, by a gentleman, a Professor of long experience, of the ripest scholarship, and the most superior qualifications as a teacher. He will take charge of the department of Mathematics and some of the higher English branches, and the control of the main study hall.

No accounts will be opened in Marion. Money must be deposited or forwarded for all necessary and proper purposes. Let pupils be supplied from home as far as is practicable.

All sums of money for the use of pupils must be deposited with the Principal.

One hundred and forty-five dollars will pay the board and tuition of a young lady for the entire session in the collegiate course. $175 will embrace the languages. $235 will embrace board, tuition in the collegiate department, on the Piano, and in the languages.

Books, Stationery, Sheet Music, Drawing, Painting and Embroidery material is furnished by the Principal. The cost of these articles varies with the advancement of the pupil. Every effort will be made to secure economy in their use.

VARIOUS STATES OF EXPERIENCE.

THE HALF AWAKENED.

Many who hear the gospel are occasionally affected by it, in a faint and feeble degree. Attracted for a time by its promises, or disturbed by its appeals, they begin to desire true religion—but the world, and the things of the world, soon again engross their attention and efface all religious impression. These are represented by the parable of the seed which fell among thorns. When they have heard they go forth, and the good seed sown in their hearts is choked with the cares and riches and pleasures of this life, and they bring no fruit to perfection. Luke viii, 14.

THE AWAKENED.

But some, cherishing their desires by serious attention and reflection, are gradually enlightened to see themselves and the things of God. "The grace of God appeareth teaching" them, and gently opening their minds; the Lord gives them to see, as they can bear, the wickedness of their hearts and lives. Such are symbolized under the figure of "the smoking flax." It is "the day of small things."

THE PENITENT.

Some are led not only to see but to feel their sins as a grievous burden. Made sensible of their guilt, they are filled with sorrow on account thereof, and greatly hate themselves because they have offended against God. Overwhelmed with the anguish of a broken heart, they are driven to the verge of despair. They have no hope from man, none from themselves, none from any means. Their only cry is, "Lord, save, or I perish."

THE FORMALIST, OR NOMINAL BELIEVER.

Some coming thus far, proceed no further, but by yielding to sloth, fear, and evil reasoning, or by neglect of prayer, gradually lose their convictions and become formal. They put on merely the outside of religion, attend the preachings, the prayer meetings, and the class. Their lives are moral, their conversation modest. They walk circumspectly. They are much given to watch others, and know not that they themselves are miserable, poor, and blind, and naked. These are neither penitents nor believers, but merely nominal Christians.

THE JUSTIFIED BELIEVER.

But others go forward. Improving the light God has given, he bestows more. They have been awakened, and made sensible of their guilt; they now believe on the Lord Jesus, and receive pardon. They have the witness in themselves that they are born of God. Their names are written in heaven; they are the sons of God and heirs with Christ. And if, in their present state, they depart this life, their spirits will be delivered from evil, and they will receive that degree of glory promised to little children.

THE BACKSLIDER.

Many, once pardoned, go back in their hearts. By looking at themselves, at their graces, and not at Christ, (for we do not live by any grace but that of faith,) their evidence becomes clouded, and they lose their witness by degrees. They generally remain in this reasoning state for a time, till all the power of godliness is lost, and nothing but a form remains. Then leaving the work of the heart, they settle down in a false security, without love to God, without joy in the Lord. Neither these preach, or pray, or converse about the things of God, their discourse and manner of action produce no effect. It is sad to confess such a state. Reader, is this your case?

THE SEEKER AFTER PURITY OF HEART.

Others go on by faith and prayer, from perception of sin to entire purity of heart. God graciously discovers to them the need of a further work, and then the means to be used. To all who are justified, if diligent and faithful, without taking away the evidence of pardon, he shows the remains of the carnal mind, existing within them the deepest contrition of soul. He shows them also how the blood of Christ was shed to cleanse them from all unholiness; and how this corruption is purged away, not by works, or the virtue of any means, but by a simple and naked faith,—that being justified by faith, so likewise must we be "purified by faith." They hunger, more ardently than ever, hunger and thirst after righteousness. They would be Israelites indeed, in whom there is no guile. Diligently seeking the Lord, he graciously makes known to them further discoveries of his will. Faithful to his promise, he leads them into all truth, and exhibits the nature of their exalted privilege, even an entire conformity to the divine image. And now, cordially embracing the promise, they boldly declare themselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God by our Lord Jesus Christ.

THE PERFECT BELIEVER

Receives Christ in the fullness of his gracious word, "Be it unto thee according to thy faith," and he is filled with all righteousness, peace and joy in believing. He now more than ever feels that without Christ he is ignorant, weak and helpless; but that Christ is made unto him wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. Renouncing all self-dependence, he relies implicitly on the guidance of the Holy Spirit—without fear confessing his Lord on every suitable occasion, and laying himself out all possible ways to glorify God. Continuing steadfastly to trust in the all-cleansing blood, the inclination to sin is done away, and with his blessed Lord he can humbly, but boldly say, "The prince of this world cometh, but hath nothing in me."

THE PERFECT BELIEVER IN TEMPTATION

Being delivered from the carnal mind, he is enabled now to grow up into Christ his head in all things. Being cleansed from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, he perfects holiness in the fear of God. The flesh no longer lusteth against the Spirit, nor the Spirit against the flesh. But this exalted and happy state of mind does not exempt him from temptation. He may be tempted to unbelief—to presumption—to the world with all its vanities, by all its greatness, honor and beauty—to spare himself, and be not zealous overmuch—to anger, revenge, and every evil temper. He may sometimes be more tempted, sometimes less. He may be tempted for days and weeks, and powerfully tempted, so as to be in great heaviness, yea, exceeding sorrowful even unto death, so that all communion even with God may appear to be broken off, and be led in the bitterness of his soul to exclaim, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

In these respects the disciple is not above his Master, nor the servant greater than his Lord—but in all these things, if he abide in Christ, he shall not only be enabled to endure this fiery trial, but be brought off more than conqueror by the Captain of his salvation. [Class Leader's Magazine.

NEW BOOK OF SERMONS.

BY T. H. STOCKTON.

It gave us joy to read in a late number of the Methodist Protestant, published at Baltimore, Md., that a volume of "sermons for the people" (420 pp.) had been issued by a Pittsburg house—Stockton's Sermons! We intend to have the volume, as who does not that has heard or heard of the Pulpit Orator!

The Editor accompanies the announcement with an able and generous critique upon the preacher and his preaching. He says: "With some of these discourses our earliest recollections of preaching are associated. Perhaps the first strong, distinct impressions ever made upon our mind from the pulpit, were from passages which we here identify after the lapse of nearly a quarter of a century."

Dr. Stockton's denominational relations are, and we believe have always been with the Methodist Protestant Church. Though such is the breadth and warmth of his soul, he passes among all sects like a white flag of truce. About the time of its organization he commenced his ministerial career. He was an itinerant preacher, without large opportunity for literary acquirements, about twenty one years of age, endowed by nature, quickened by grace, and developed under the saddle-bags regime. Reputation, unsought, intruded itself upon him, and he was uniformly pronounced one of the most eloquent men in the American pulpit.

In June, 1851, a correspondent of this paper heard Dr. Stockton preach, and in a letter then published expressed an opinion and a regret—"Strange to say, he is still in a forming state. It is painful to see a man of his powers yet at sea, contending for a vision of Church unity, which he can get no one to see but himself. If he had been content to take the plain, mill-horse track of John Wesley, and labored as any other preacher in our Church, what a man he might have been! I believe none would have stood so high in the pulpit."

But to the extract from the Methodist Protestant:—

"Little of a satisfactory character has heretofore come from the press as the production of his pen. His contributions have been mostly fragmentary, and have generally, we believe, fallen below what was expected of him. The absence of the speaker was sensibly felt by those whose expectations were molded by the remembrance of his wonderful oratory. We confess, therefore, that we were fearful this volume would not fairly represent the man or the preacher.

"But in this we are glad to say we were mistaken. The genius of the preacher, the spirit of the man is diffused over the whole volume. The first sermon has less of his marked peculiarities than any other in the volume. It is a sort of ground work, or summary of scriptural and historical facts in the Apostolic Proclamation, "We preach Christ and him crucified;" and there is not in his mode of treating it (in its general aspects) a field for the exhibitions of his best powers. But in the second discourse, in which he gives a review more at large of the reputed feebleness and folly of the Gospel, and a closing contemplation of its real and divine power and wisdom, he unfolds the charm of his powers of description, amplification and illustration, and lifts the heart of the reader to a sense of exultation that he has ever been privileged to hear of 'Christ and him crucified,' and share in the glorious triumphs of the Redeemer's cause in the earth. It has been some fifteen years since we heard this sermon preached in St. John's Church of this city, and so vivid were the impressions it left with us that we could yesterday anticipate much of its successive portions, and remember the very modulations of some of its impassioned passages. The scene between Elijah and Ahab—when the prophet predicted the drought of three years and six months—when the 'fountains failed, the grass crisped to rottenness, the cattle perished, the people languished: the Eden-like plains of Jordan, Esdrelon and Sharon blended with the desert, and filled the air with the fine dust of palm leaves, harvests and flowers,' when 'Carmel, Hermon and Lebanon became barren as Ebal, and desolate as the cliffs of Cursing;' when 'it seemed as though Jehovah in his anger had sworn that Baal, the sun god, should be suffered to make the world his temple, the elements his priests, the mountains his altars, and mankind his victims; ruling heaven and earth with the omnipresence and omnipotence of fire,'—all this once heard never could be forgotten. And then the trial by the coming down of fire and flame, in answer to the prophet's prayer on the slope of Carmel! Whoever heard Mr. Stockton repeat the irony of the prophet's exclamation, 'Cry aloud, for he is a god: either he is talking or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey or, peradventure, he sleepeth and must be awakened!'—whoever heard this, and was ever after able to blot it from his remembrance?

"The dramatic power of this second sermon is also a fair exemplification of this feature of the preacher's peculiar abilities. He impersonates Judaism and interrogates the apostles on the signs of the Messiahship; he impersonates Grecian wisdom and interrogates them on the claims of Jesus to authority in philosophy and morals, and upbraids them with the infatuation, the unparalleled folly, of supposing that the laurels of Greece may be suspended as trophies on the cross of Calvary. He takes his hearer right into the heart of the Pharisaical Jew; into the heart of the proud and cultivated Greek—you see them, hear them and feel the utter and contemptible folly of their rejection: and then turn with the author to the contemplation of the onward conquests of that divine power and that divine wisdom which was the glory and boast of apostolic rejoicing:"

'And hark! There three thousand happy voices ascend from the blood-stained streets of Jerusalem in Pentecostal thanksgivings! City after city, country after country, join the cry. Age follows age, and still the marching of the saints shakes the world like an earthquake; and the thunder of their praise resounds through the skies from pole to pole. Jerusalem is cast down: Athens laughishes; and Rome grows old and decays. The wondering barbarians crowd the capitals of the West, and the voluptuous infidels usurp the gardens of the East. The thrones of Europe are established. The powers of the East begin to fail. And now, the lands of the sunset, the last and best, the loveliest and richest expanse ever opened to equal dignity and enjoyment, looms between the seas and blooms among the billows, all green and golden, all fruitful and roseate; its fadeless valleys shining and sleeping with thousands of streams, and its purple mountains lushed into rapture by visions of beauty and peace through all the evening air.

'But thou, O Judah! where is thy crown? where is thy sceptre? Where is thy throne? And where is the harp of thy majesty and joy? All buried, long buried, deep buried, at the foot of Calvary's cross! And where are thy sons and daughters? All scattered, long scattered, far scattered—the only handless, boneless race under the whole heavens! And thou, Grecia! Where is thy wisdom? Speak, Socrates! Speak Pluto! Speak all ye divinities of philosophy and eloquence! Speak! Alas! the immortals are no more! Thy laurels, O Athens! were hung upon the beam, abhorred; until, fading and falling, they crumbled and mingled with the dust beneath. And now, the voice of thy fame is the fainting echo of the long gone past.

'But thou, Christianity! thou Power of God! thou Wisdom of God! thou Angel from heaven! thou Spirit of the cross!—tell me! where art thou? Methinks she answers with a smile, Ask "them which are called!" I do ask. And hark! they answer! From the continents, they answer. From the islands, they answer. From the mid-mountains and from the mid-oceans, they answer. From pole to pole, from the whole creation, they answer. In all tongues, they answer. From all conditions, they answer. But, with one joy, they answer,—Here! here! here! and every where! In every land, on every wave, through every clime! Here is a promised the cross of Christ! Here, the potentates and magnates are all forgotten in the spectacle of the Crucified! Here, the power of God is felt! here, the wisdom of God is understood! Here, the subjects of salvation look around upon the world, to bless it with their labors of faith and love; and look up to heaven, to claim it for their holy and perpetual rest!

'Brethren! Sisters! what is stronger than Jewish pride? What more invincible than Grecian vanity? What more fearful than Roman domination? What, more impenetrable than Gothic ignorance? What, more cruel than Mahommedan sensualism? What, more oppressive than Brahminical superstitions? What, more enthralling than Savage fetichism? What, more hopeless than the condition of all people in past ages? And yet, to a great extent—to an extent absolutely demonstrative of the divine adequacy of its ability to the full accomplishment of its predicted destiny—Christianity has already triumphed over the combined opposition of all.

'The prospect brightens. The vapors of the night have risen and withdrawn. The dews of the morning have sparkled and vanished. The sward is all beauty; the sky is all glory. 'Tis almost noon! Behold the shadows—how short they are! Shine on, O Sun of Righteousness! shine on. Secure thy cloudless sphere, sublime and supreme, in the midst of heaven. Let thy reign be complete, universal and everlasting. Ah! Living Sun! expand thy healing wings—those wings which never yet shed sin or grief, or death, or any ill! Shake all thy plumes divine; thy plumes of light, and life, and love; shake wide thy plumes above immortal nations! Disperse thy rays, diffuse thy beams from the zenith to the horizon, from the center to the circumference; and fill the scope centre with the pure and quickening elements of perfect and endless day.'

"Minuteness of detail in description is a characteristic of Mr. Stockton's preaching. He plays upon words to great excess, and delights in repetitions or verbal refrains beyond any man we ever heard speak. With his peculiar elocution this gives a definitiveness in the delivery of sermons that is by no means to their disadvantage; but—the preacher absent—the same thing upon paper, if prolonged to a degree, becomes wearisome and distasteful. There is less of it in this book than we have met with in some of his other published discourses;—instance his sermon on the death of Gen. Taylor, and several of the addresses in his "Bible Alliance." To illustrate more fully what we mean to those not familiar with Mr. Stockton's preaching, we select the following from his third sermon in the volume before us:"

'Again: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel." This is your distinctive office; preach the Gospel—as I have preached it. Preach the Gospel—as I have taught you to preach it. Preach the Gospel—as, hereafter, my Spirit shall teach you to preach it. Preach it, not only as a Gospel, but as the Gospel—not only as glad tidings, but as the glad tidings, infinitely more gladdening than any other tidings ever heard. Preach it—not prove it. You might as well attempt to prove that sunshine is from heaven, as to prove that the Gospel is from heaven. Only preach it—and it will prove itself, as sunshine will prove itself. Preach it—all heaven would exult to preach it. Preach it—all the earth languishes to hear it preached. Preach it every where; for sin is every where. Preach it every where; for sorrow is every where. Preach it every where; for death is every where. Preach it every where; for there is no other hope, any where. Preach it—as salvation from sin. Preach it—as salvation from sorrow. Preach it—as salvation from death. In all the world, to the end of the world, this is your whole office—to preach the Gospel.'

"There is little uniformity in the sermons in this book, in regard to construction—though they are all able sermons. Mr. Stockton does not appear to be much of a skeleton-maker. He works by his impulses, which rise above artificial restraints. A prominent principle for illustration given, and he has enough it seems for half a dozen sermons. He amplifies and enlarges, with beauty and effect, where other men would scarcely know how to begin, or what there was to amplify. If you attempt to condense one of these sermons into a skeleton it will be a meager affair. The bones might be very many—but they would be very dry, and very disjointed. But let the breath of his genius breathe upon them, and they rise—mantled with the flesh of glowing beauty and radiant with faith and hope and love."

UNITY OF THE RACES.

From an exchange we clip the following observations, which constitute a postscript to Dr. Bachman's notice of Nott and Gliddon's infidel book on the "Types of Mankind." They show very clearly the relations of this subject to what is known as the "domestic institution of the South." He says:

"We are induced yet to offer a few remarks on the bearing of the doctrine of the Unity of the Human Race on the domestic institutions and vital interest of the South; and this note is intended expressly for the mature reflection of our Southern community. Politicians who resorted to DeBow's and the Southern Quarterly Reviews for arguments in defense of slavery, such as have been instilled into their minds by Dr. Nott and others, have been taught to believe that the best argument that could be urged in favor of slavery, was to prove the negro of a different species. Hence, those who have supported the doctrine of the Unity, have sometimes been stigmatized as abolitionists and the enemies of the South. We trust that one who has never lived in a State where no slavery existed, and has been identified with the institutions of South Carolina for the last forty years—one who, in the North as well as the South, openly and fearlessly defended them on every necessary occasion—may be allowed to express his sentiments on this subject without the danger of having his motives misinterpreted. The following are our views: That all the races of men, including the negro, are of one species and of one origin. That the negro is a striking and now permanent variety, like the numerous varieties in domesticated animals. That varieties having become permanent, possess an organization that prevents them from returning to the original species, although other varieties may spring up among them. Thus the many breeds of domesticated animals that have arisen, some only within a few years, would never return to the form of the wild species, without an intermixture. That the negro will remain as he is, unless his form is changed by an amalgamation, which latter is revolting to us. That his intellect, although underrated, is greatly inferior to that of the Caucassian, and that he is, therefore, as far as our experience goes, incapable of self-government. That he is thrown on our protection. That our defense of slavery is contained in the Holy Scriptures. That the Scriptures teach the rights and duties of master to rule their servants with justice and kindness, and enjoin the obedience of servants. That the Bible, which teaches the doctrine, is not inspired, no more than a book of fables—that, therefore, nothing that is said by Moses, by the prophets, or by St. Paul, on this subject is to be believed. We would here observe, that if every word of this were true, and the negro was proved to be of a different species, it would not release us from our obligations as men and Christians. That if they could even succeed in proving the negro of a different species, the South would gain nothing, whilst we would have abandoned all the strong arguments that are derived from the Scriptures, on the right of holding this species of property. It should be borne in mind, that when the most violent abolitionists of the North, Garrison, Abby Kelly, etc., were met by arguments from the Bible, in favor of our institutions, they openly renounced the Bible which taught this doctrine, and denounced all the institutions of Christianity. Thus our belief in the diversity of races brings us no advocates from the open infidel." * * * "Having gained nothing from those who discard the Bible as an uninspired book, what, we ask, has produced that unexampled unanimity of sentiment that now exists in the whole South on the subject of slavery? Our table is crowded with pamphlets and sermons, with speeches in Congress and dissertations by clergymen and laymen, on the subject of slavery. The teachings of the Bible are the most effective weapons that are used. There it is shown that the ancient Israelites were the owners of slaves. There the duties of master and servant are taught, and there is Paul's letter to Philemon, entreating him to receive back his runaway slave. Our representatives in Congress used the arguments contained in the Scriptures, and their opponents dared not tell them that the historical parts (and all that refers to slavery is historical) were uninspired and untrue. Moreover, it should be added, that the doctrine of the diversity of species can never be maintained. It is as contrary to science as it is to the Scriptures. The suspicion of interested motives will be excited against the South in supporting a false theory by a denial of the Holy Scriptures. We can effectually defend our institutions from the Word of God. When we abandon that strong tower of defense, we are left without weapons, exposed to the ruthless assaults of its enemies. In a political point of view, we regard the effort made by Nott and Gliddon, to establish their theory by a denial of the veracity of the historical Scriptures, as more dangerous to our institutions than all the ravings of the abolitionists."

THAT CYPRESS LOG.

THE HASTE OF SCEPTICS.

Mr. Editor—That Geology may with propriety be called a science, and have, of consequence, some fixed laws and principles, I shall not now attempt to controvert, but shall content myself with simply saying, that it is possible that the most acute and learned in this field of knowledge have, perhaps, not yet learned all the principles of the science, much less obtained an exact knowledge of all the exceptions to its rules that arise from the accidents and convulsions that the earth has been subjected to. From this cause the ipse dixit of geologists may without arrogance be sometimes questioned, without doing injustice either to the science or to some very complacent originators of opinions and theories. Especially is this the case when these opinions and theories go to overturn established systems of great moment to mankind, or to oblige us to torture the records that contain these systems into meanings and shapes entirely at variance with the common acceptation of the language and terms contained in the record upon which the system is founded, making what has heretofore been taken as a veritable record of facts and circumstances a mere myth, or fable, of no value or reliability as history, but only the crude legends of tradition, descending through countless generations of ignorant and highly superstitious and imaginative people, completely obscuring the real facts, and substituting in their stead mere fables and tales, alike untrue and unphilosophical.

Such is the teaching that modern Geology has sometimes, if not always, inculcated, and such the results we are driven to, if we accept the dogmas that are presented to us by some pretenders to this science. These dogmas, founded often on what the merest schoolboy or rustic can see at once, are mere ridiculous assumptions, or the most easily explained phenomena, are yet trumpeted forth as proofs indubitable of the truth of these modern geological theories, the design and tendency of which is to overture our chronology derived from the book of Genesis, and fix upon this book, and of consequence upon the whole of Divine Revelation, the stamp of falsehood and utter worthlessness, at least as historical records. For, it must be admitted, that if Genesis be false, or only a mere myth or fable, so is also the whole of what is known as the Bible, or, by way of eminence, the Book, it being so completely interwoven and dependant, one part upon another, that no one part can stand without the others, and the whole must stand or fall together. Furthermore, once destroy its credibility, and its doctrines and the moral sanction go with it; for it is impossible to give force and vitality to the doctrines and moral sanctions of a book whose historical credibility is destroyed; nor can it be told whether the doctrines and maxims of a work, whose history is only myths and fables, are not mere allegories or tales.

All this infidelity well knows; hence the unwearied attempts to discredit one part, so that all may share in the same ruin, and from this cause, the efforts of modern infidels, through Geology, to impeach the Mosaic records, and so effect the desired purpose.

But I have said that some of these dogmas of Geology were often founded on what the merest schoolboy or rustic could see was either ridiculous assumption or could be easily explained by the most common intellect. Of this character is a recent occurrence in your city, which has been seized upon and shouted abroad as conclusive testimony that the earth was in existence, and in a condition to bear cypress trees, some 24,000 years since.

It seems that in boring for an Artesian well in New Orleans, a little while ago, at a depth of some sixteen feet a cypress log was encountered. Forthwith one Dr. Usher, I think, announced, with a grand flourish of trumpets, here was conclusive testimony of the existence of the earth some 24,000 years past, (24,000 I think was the time,) and an echoing shout was returned—Great is Geology and Dr. Usher!

I said the merest schoolboy, or rustic, could often refute, or explain, the proofs brought forward by these pretenders as irrefragible evidences of the truth of their theories; and now for the proof that such is the fact:

1st. Every schoolboy who has read even a tolerable geography of Louisiana, knows that the Mississippi is constantly changing its bed, and that often heavy forests are now seen where but a few years since the heaviest laden steamers safely ploughed their way, and that these changes go on constantly now, and have ever since the Mississippi was known. Sometimes they occur by the earth washing away from one bank and filling up the other; sometimes the channel widens, sometimes contracts—cut-offs sometimes take place, leaving miles of the river channel to be filled up with logs, earth and trash in the latter case, and in the former forming new shores for miles in length and many feet in depth of like matter, so that in a short series of years the river not only has filled a small strip, but has mutually changed its whole width within the memory of living watermen, now on the river. These things have hardly escaped the notice of the dullest flatboatman that ever pulled an oar on the Mississippi. The merest dolt or old negro raised in New Orleans, and now fifty years old, will tell you that the pond that thirty years ago fronted a good part of the city, and in which the gamins, white and black, used to bathe and play pranks upon one another in, and in which the draymen used to water and cool their horses, is now the site of some of the best buildings and most active trade in the city, was evidently once a part of the river channel. Nay, what man that has been in the city twelve months, but knows that two or three whole streets in width fronting the river, and forming the celebrated "batture," the title to which has been the subject of the most intense legal interest and investigation, have been gained from the domain of the river by its own almost insensible action within the memory of living persons, and that where loaded steamers once rode in safety, the largest brick buildings now stand, the original earth on which their foundations were are filled in, deposited there by the river?

Again: What wood-chopper of raccoon-hunter that has lived seven years on the banks of the Father of Rivers, who can not point out some chute filled up, and where steamers used safely to pass with their freight, now filled up, a confused mass of logs and mud, interspersed with willows, and soon to be dry land, like the rest of the forest around? What fisherman but can show where some bayou was, where he used to angle for the big catfish, now choked up with earth and logs, and not enough of dead and stagnant water left to tempt the stay of a turtle or a bull-frog!

Now, that these are facts, obvious to the dullest comprehension, patent on the very face of them, no one can deny. Nor have these circumstances taken place under singular cases or states of the river, in merely shallow places or limited spots. These changes, on the contrary, have in many places filled up ten, fifteen or twenty miles of the whole channel of the river within the memory of living men, and are now clothed with timber, so that at least a common observer would not suspect that these places were once the bed of the river. It is said the average depth from New Orleans to Natchez is seventy to eighty feet, from Natchez to the mouth of the Ohio forty to fifty feet; yet in all this range, at almost every bend, changes have occurred, where logs have been buried by thousands, not sixteen feet only, but from thirty to eighty or a hundred feet; for it is well known that a cypress does not readily float with the root to it. The very "batture" itself now occupies a spot where loaded steamers once safely lay. And yet we are gravely told that because a cypress log is found sixteen feet below the surface of the earth in the city, every foot of the natural level of which is several feet below high water in the river, we must perforce, in the face of all the facts above stated, believe that this earth has been bearing cypress trees for some 24,000 years! when, in addition to all the foregoing facts, it is well known that for many years, if not ever since the city was settled, the river has been receding from the lake and going toward Algiers.

This is the instruction we get from a grave teacher in Geology, and it is clapped and lauded. Was ever any thing more ridiculously absurd than such teaching?—commendation of such a humbug, so transparently seen to be a blunder, such as the veriest blockhead could hardly have made its equal in ignorance or stupidity. From such men emanated the doctrine that Moses is an unfaithful historian, because their expositions of Geology do not agree with the account he gives of Creation. And we are seriously asked to believe this nonsense. What a tax on our credulity!

For true science and sound learning I have a high respect, especially when combined with good sense and modesty; but cut upon such stuff as this, attempted to be crammed down our throats by a presuming pretender, who gives his unsupported assertion as a demonstration, and straightway call you a fool or an ignoramus if you do not believe.

ISAAC DENTON.

THE GREYHOUNDS OF AFRICA.—Nothing evinces more the aristocratic tastes of the Arabs of Sahara than their treatment of their greyhounds. Here, as in all other Arab countries, the common dog, whatever the utility of his employment in protecting the tents and flocks, is still regarded as a contemptible and troublesome servant—a disagreeable necessity. The greyhound alone, as the companion of his chivalrous pastimes, is treated by the Arab with affectionate attention and respect. While, therefore, the faithful watch dog is driven forth from the tent, treated as a vulgar brute, and allowed to seek his food among the offal and bones that have been thrown out, the greyhound sleeps in the master's apartment, on a carpet beside his master, or even on his bed. He is abundantly but carefully fed with kooskoos; and in summer, cakes are made for him of milk and stoned dates, which are said to be highly tonic. If a thorough bred animal, he will not drink out of a dirty vessel, nor will he taste milk in which any one has put his hands. He is defended from the cold with coverlets like the horse, the Arabs having no objection to his being sensitive in this respect; it is an evidence of high blood. They delight in decking him with ornaments, and make for him collars of cowry shells, to which they attach talismans to secure him from the blight of an evil eye.

At the age of forty days the pups are removed from the mother, and fed with goat's or camel's milk, mixed with dates and kooskoos.

At the age of three or four months, the education of the greyhound is begun by the children starting jerboas, or small deer, and inducing him to give chase. He soon becomes so fond of this pastime that he will bark round the holes, to induce the youngsters to renew the sport. The next game on which he is tried is the hare, then the young gazelle. At the end of a year he has attained his full strength, and is advanced to be the companion of the master of the tent, who teaches him to hunt the full sized gazelle. The Arab talks to him, as a human being: "Listen to me, friend; thou must bring me some venison: I am tired of eating nothing but dates;" whereupon the dog leaps, wheels about, and intimates as plainly as possible that he understands his master's wish, and is abundantly willing to comply.

When the dog perceives a herd of thirty or forty gazelles he trembles with joy, and looks wistfully at his master. "Ha! young Jew," says the Arab, "thou wilt not say this time that thou hast not seen them." He then mixes an ox-skin, and refreshes the body of the dog with a sprinkling of water. The impatient animal turns on him an imploring eye; he is closed on the game, and bounds away; but yet conceals himself, crouches down if he is perceived; makes a zigzag course; and if it is not till fairly within reach that he darts, with all his strength, choosing the finest of the herd as his victim. When the hunter cuts up the gazelle he gives the dog part of the loin; if he were offered any refuse he would reject it with disdain.

A thorough bred hound will hunt with no one but his master; and humanity feels due self-respect in his choice of a prey. If, on loosing him, his master has pointed out a fine gazelle, and he has succeeded only in taking a small and middling looking one, he seems to feel the reproach that attaches to the failure, and slinks away ashamed, instead of claiming his accustomed share. He always accompanies his master when visiting, and shares whatever hospitalities he receives. By his extreme cleanliness, the kindliness of his manners, and his respect for the usages of society, he shows himself worthy of the attentions thus bestowed on him. When the Arab returns home, after a somewhat prolonged absence, his dog makes a single bound from the tent to the saddle, and welcomes him with caresses.

The greyhound of Sahara is very superior to that of the coast. He is tall and fawn-colored, has a thin muzzle, black tongue and palate, large forehead, short ears, muscular neck, very soft hair, no paunch, dry limbs, and the muscles of the croup well marked. A pretty good one is considered worth a fine camel; but those which take the largest gazelles will bring as much as a horse. A family hunter, however, is never sold; an Arab would almost as soon think of selling one of his sons. When he dies, it is a time of mourning in the tent; the women and children weep and lament as for a member of the family.

MRS. JANE LANGTON.—The following obituary notice from a London Journal, of "the last survivor of all the persons mentioned in Boswell's delightful biography," will be read with interest. It is but seldom, we fancy, that one survives one's correspondents for the tolerably long term of seventy years, as "Miss Jenny" survived the great moralist and "great man" whose memory the English still revere, notwithstanding his pretty numerous faults. He had, too, of a high coast, but he was rather feared than loved, for all his admirers and satellites, from the highest to the lowest, stood a little in awe of him. The truth is, he was more to be admired and respected than loved; for he was arrogant and dictatorial, and domineering, and captious to a degree that would not now be tolerated, and his political opinions were ultra Tory. He hated the Americans, he said. It was not, though, because they were Americans, but it was because he hated every thing that did not go to bled for Church and King:

On the 12th instant, at Richmond, Mrs. Jane Langton, last surviving daughter of Bennet Langton, Esq., of Langton, Lincolnshire, and of the Countess Dowager of Rothes.

Mrs. Jane Laegten was the god-daughter of Samuel Johnson. Her birth is mentioned in Boswell, under the year 1777. "Langton," says Johnson, writing to Boswell, "has another wench. Thrale is in hopes of a young brewer." How strange soever it may seem, Miss Jane Langton, who died at Richmond on the 12th inst., was the correspondent of Samuel Johnson, who died seventy years since. In "Boswell" may be seen a beautiful letter from Johnson to his little god-daughter, acknowledging a pretty letter he had just received from her. It begins, "My dear Miss Jenny;" is full of good advice for a girl of her years, conveyed in words exquisitely simple for the great lexicographer; and written with all, as Boswell tells us, in a large round hand, nearly resembling printed characters, that she might have the satisfaction of reading it herself. "When you are a little older, (it is thus the great man concludes his letter to Miss Jeney,) I hope you will be very diligent in learning arithmetic, and, above all, that through your whole life you will carefully say your prayers and read your Bible." Simple words these, but from how great a man! Miss Jenny remembered the injunction of her illustrious god-father, and was proud of showing the letter which the great moralist had sent her—framed and glazed in her favorite apartment at Richmond. Is Queeny Thrale, afterwards Baroness Keith, is no longer living, Mrs. Jane Langton, (My dear Miss Jenny,) was the last survivor of all the persons mentioned in Boswell's delightful biography.

"THE MAN WHO FIRED THE FIRST SHOT."—The first American who discharged his gun on the day of the battle of Lexington was Ebenezer Lock, who died at Deering, N. H., about fifty years ago. He resided at Lexington in 1775. The British regulars, at the order of Major Pitcairn, having fired upon the "few" rebels" on the green in front of the Meeting house, killing some and wounding others, it was a signal of war. "The citizens," writes one, "might be seen coming from all directions, in roads, over the fields, and through the woods—each with his rifle in his hand, his powder-horn slung to his side, and his pocket provided with bullets. Among the number was Ebenezer Lock. The British had posted a reserve of infantry a mile in the rear, in the direction of Boston. This was in the immediate neighborhood of Mr. L., who, instead of hastening to join the party at the green, placed himself in an open cellar, as a convenient distance for doing execution." A portion of the reserve were standing a little back, and Mr. Lock commenced firing at the [illegible] there was no other American in sight. He worked vellantly for some minutes, bringing down one of the enemy at nearly every shot. Up to this time not a gun had been fired elsewhere by the rebels. The British, greatly disturbed at losing so many men by the random firing of an unseen enemy, were noticed in discovering the man in the cellar, and discharged a volley of bullets which lodged on the wall opposite. Mr. Lock within—remaining unhurt—continued to load and fire with the precision of a finished marksman. He was driven to such close quarters, however, by the British on his right and left, that he was compelled at last to retreat. He had just one bullet left, and there was now but one way to escape, and that was through an orchard in the rear. The soldiers were all around him, one of them having even gained the orchard. Not a moment was to be lost—he levelled his gun at the man near by, fired, dropped the gun, and the man was through the hedge. The bullets whistling him, Lock reached the brink of a stone wall and threwing himself upon the ground rolled downwards, rolling, as if mortally wounded. In this way he escaped unhurt. At the close of the war he moved to New Hampshire, where he resided until his death, some twenty years after. He lived in seclusion and died in peace. [Boston Chronicle.

AFRICAN M. E. CHURCH.

This body was organized in Philadelphia, ... 35 years ago, by free negroes. Its ... first Bishop, Paul Quinn, is represented as ... tolerable in appearance, and in point of in- ... tellect on a level with Fred Douglass, though ... of a higher grade of moral character. It ... has operated in the free states and Canada, ... and now numbers about 30,000 members and ... three ... Bishops—all colored. The ... church or head quarters in Philadelphia, is ... called Bethel—hence the sect is some times ... known as "Bethelites." They publish a ... weekly paper, the Christian Recorder, in Phil- ... adelphia. The Recorder comes frequently ... though not regularly to our address. In the ... number 1st September, we find a rough ... statement against Canada and British equali- ty, as there manifested. But an apology for ... the British is given—they are exonered:—

"No colored man need go to Canada, ex- ... pecting that he is going to escape all the ... force of American prejudices, no such thing ... He will find them existing there equally as ... strong as he will find them existing in any ... part of the United States. * * * *

A vast majority of all the white inhabi- ... tants of that country may be justly charged ... with having this purely American feeling, ... under British rule. The class of persons ... in question look forward to a day when they ... will be fully able to throw off the British ... yoke, as this government has done, and ... when they will be able to assume a like ... form of independent government, or else be- ... come a part and parcel of these United States. ... The country is full of the spirit of annexa- ... tion to the United States. * * * * *

The population of colored to white per- ... sons, in this Province, is about as one to ... twenty; their political rights are equal. ... These two circumstances tend greatly to ... make colored men more the objects of deri- ... sion to the vulgar of that country, than what ... they are in this. The colored man becomes ... a full citizen of that country, and enjoys all ... the political rights and privileges of the ... same; but until American slavery is blotted ... out from under heaven, he will meet scenes ... like the one described in the article referred ... to in this place, even in in Canada.

It is a most humiliating affair, indeed, to ... be informed that a venerable old man, a ... Christian minister; a bishop of a very large ... and respectable connection of Christians; a ... well-dressed, noble-looking man in appearance ... as any one could well wish to see; a man ... who has been honored with marked attention ... from divines, jurists, politicians, statesmen, ... senators, governors and presidents—should ... be compelled to ride on the top of a stage- ... coach in a British Province, for no crime or ... fault whatever, save this, that the color of ... his skin shewed him to be identified with an ... injured, poor, down-trodden, and despised ... class of the human race! and that man the ... well-known William Paul Quinn, the Senior ... Bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal ... Church in America!

And how much less humiliating is it for us ... to be made acquainted with the fact that the ... polite, accomplished Bishop Daniel A. Payne, ... another Bishop of the same connection, and ... lady, were denied the benefit—the right of a ... seat in the public conveyance, for the same ... reason assigned in the case above?

We are not only mortified and wounded at ... this treatment of our bishops, but rather ... that any man, for the same reason, should ... be thus insulted and abused. But this has ... been done, and more, not only in St. Cathe- ... rine's, but in all the the principal cities and ... large towns in Canada West. Let us not be ... surprised, however, at these manifest work- ... ings of the slave-power in Canada; but ra- ... ther let us remember the source from whence ... they come, and labor most diligently to ... destroy the cause, and the effect will almost, ... if not quite, instantly cease."

The "article referred to," which gives an ... account of this indignity, is copied from the ... Provincial Freeman, headed, Disgraceful ... Outrage! It says:—

"For some weeks past it has been the po- ... licy of drivers of omnibusses belonging to ... the St. Catherine's House and the American ... Hotel, to exclude colored people therefrom; ... or, by special indulgence, allow them to ride ... outside. Some four weeks ago the Rt. Rev. ... Paul Quinn, of Philadelphia, Bishop of the ... African Methodist Episcopal Church of the ... United States and Canada, came to the St. ... Catherine's Depot, in a feeble state of health. ... This fine old gentleman, whose presence ... would honor any board of Bishops, was com- ... pelled to climb up and take his seat outside ... to ride into town.

"But a short time since, the Rev. John ... Garrow, a free colored minister from New ... Orleans, of the appearance and more than ... ordinary intelligence, came to the Railroad ... station; and here, for the first time upon his ... long journey of nearly 3000 miles, met with ... insult from carriers, being refused a seat in ... an omnibus. A colored gentleman of for- ... tune lately came from Mobile, who was here ... subject to like barbarity though able to buy ... out both of the principal hotels in the place. ... Time would fail," etc.

Then follows an indignation meeting ... among the head waiters (colored) of St. ... Catherine's. The "Rev. John" is the same ... known here as "Jack," who went "nor'ard" ... a few years ago, and upon whose reception ... a humorous paragraph was written at the ... time. The same who in his phrase "was ... charged like a white man and treated like ... a nigger." Jack is wont to be seen on his ... dray, with gentle mule, about Gravier street.

So it turns out, upon testimony from all ... quarters, and themselves testifying, that the ... condition of the colored people is most se- ... cure, contented, thrifty and well provided ... for in the Southern States—that nominal ... freedom, among the warmest abolitionists of ... the highest latitudes, is no boon.

An interesting fact may be stated. This ... organization has not extended itself below ... Mason and Dixon's line, except in one case—New Orleans. For four or five years a branch of it has been in operation here, numbering half a dozen preachers and several hundred members. It has been quietly yet industri- ously operating, and now has two or three ... posts in the city; the main one being a large ... brick chapel, built by themselves, in the Se- ... cond District, near the corner of Bienville ... and Claiborne streets. They make returns, ... and are under the jurisdiction of the Indiana ... (or Ohio) Conference, and receive preachers, ... (free negroes) from it. Their preachers liv- ... ing here go up for ordination. However, the ... Recorder, about eighteen months ago, con- ... tained a letter from Bishop Quinn himself, ... dated and written from New Orleans, in which ... he seems to have attended to ordaining dea- ... cons and elders on the spot. The letter al- ... ludes to Mobile also, and speaks encourag- ... ingly of the cause in the South. We should ... quote some significant sentences from this ... letter, but it is not before us. An ex-Alder- ... man borrowed it out of our office and has ... not returned it. One of the Bishops, in the ... Recorder, 16th inst., calling for aid to the Or- ... gan, uses this language—"Will not our peo- ... ple come up to the work, and help us? Show ... that this little sheet finds its way through ... God's kind Providence, to the far South, to ... the great joy and comfort of many precious ... souls!" We judge it has a pretty good cir- ... culation in the city.

Our reasons for stating these facts that ... have necessarily come under our notice are:

1. We would not hinder any that do good, ... but such an organization must, in this com- ... munity, exert more of a social than religious ... influence.

2. The effect upon other churches, legiti- ... mate to the country is evil. It breeds dis- ... content, impracticability of wholesome disci- ... pline and restlessness for ministerial orders ... where it would be inexpedient to confer ... them.

3. This society has established itself and ... is seeking extension in neighboring cities and ... villages, under the public opinion that it is ... in connection with the Methodist Episcopal ... Church, South. We give notice to all (long ... ago the authorities have been notified,) that ... the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is ... no way connected with nor is it responsible ... for this exotic. The Methodist Church, ... South, enjoys the confidence of the country. ... Her missions to the slaves have been carefully ... confided to safe men, and hence this confi- ... dence. Their sole function has been to preach ... the Gospel to bond and free; not meddling ... with their relations, but leaving them where ... the Bible leaves them. Over 150,000 colored ... people are under religious instruction. This ... confidence, so necessary to the moral welfare ... of thousands is periled, by having this ques- ... tionable organization operating under cover ... of her name. Methodists they call them- ... selves, and as such they pass—few persons ... taking the trouble to inquire further.

The originators and managers, the juris- ... diction and alliance of this African M. E. ... Church, alias "Bethelites," in our midst, are ... not here. They are in Indiana, Ohio and ... Philadelphia. Likely enough some white men ... (and that sort could be found here,) are aid- ... ing and counseling. Be that as it may—we ... repeat it—the Methodist Episcopal Church, ... South, is not responsible for it or any thing ... that may grow out of it. We have our ... fears, that like all abolition interferences, so ... this will end, to the injury instead of benefit ... of the slave. Our own colored congregations ... in this city, and those of the Baptist and ... Presbyterians, fill several chapels every Sab- ... bath. They are protected by law, and their ... conduct justifies the protection. If, how- ... ever, it comes to pass that under religious ... pretext, an incendiary faction has been fos- ... tered and a branch of the "under ground ... railroad" opened, there will be a reaction ... against the religious liberties of this class of ... the population, the country over, and the in- ... nocent will suffer with the guilty. The mis- ... sionaries now having access every where, will ... be looked upon with distrust; hundreds of ... conventicles will be closed; the public wor- ... ship put under such rigid restrictions as al- ... most to amount to prohibition; and the evan- ... gelization of this people set back a quarter ... of a century.

THE RATIONALE OF RIOTS.

Under the "citizen police," order has been ... restored to our city. Society resolved itself ... into its original elements for self defense. ... This secured, the municipal police are again ... in their positions as guardians of order, prop- ... erty and life. These transitions have been ... made with a facility that indicates the sound- ... ness of our social constitution. Now, that ... the killed in the late riots are buried, the ... wounded are cured or dead, suspected per- ... sons dismissed upon trial in the lower courts ... or sent up for criminal prosecution, the blood ... wiped from the streets, and the dust cleared, ... we propose some reflections on the whole ... subject.

The riots in this city, as our local record ... has kept our readers informed, begun at a ... trifling thing. An Irishman thrust a gun ... or pistol through the fence of a citizen and ... shot his dog. Citizen's son-in-law called on ... a watchman, also an Irishman, to arrest of- ... fender. Watchman refused, and was de- ... nounced for his conduct by the person, an ... American, calling on him for duty; where- ... upon watchman lodged him in the calaboose.

This was but the spark that kindled the ... magazine. The elements of riot were before ... prepared. As a proximate cause we may ... mention that an election for two members of ... the Legislature was appointed for the Mon- ... day following, and the liquor and liquorish ... voters had been pretty well plied. About ... the last of the week it was known that the ... election, owing to some informality, would ... not come off. But a head of steam had been ... got up and it had to be worked off some way.

Our authorities have passed through the ... late and disgraceful scenes, to learn one les- ... son, we hope; the impolicy of constituting ... the police, in the usual proportion of nation- ... alities. We would not call on them to ex- ... clude all foreign born from such places; but ... when two-thirds or three-fourths of the po- ... lice are Irishmen or Dutchmen, the conse- ... quences are matter of history and not con- ... jecture. A policeman, as in this instance, ... takes sides with his countryman. The diffi- ... culty he intervenes to quell, loses its munici- ... pal and assumes a national aspect. Sensitive ... on the point of nationality, and impetuous ... withal, the guardians of peace become parti- ... zans, and are found ranged on the side of ... rioters. In every such emergency the police ... is found liable to disorganization. Especially ... does such a disproportionate organization ... expose the city to peril of order and property ... and life, when the majority of its policemen ... are taken from that nationality which gives ... the police most of its employment.

But unfortunately, these riots are not local, ... and no local explanation will not meet the ... case. Our exchanges come to us marked ... with blood. National and religious preju- ... dices are disturbing the peace of society, in ... deeds of personal violence and desecration of ... churches. They are not sporadic, but epi- ... demic. In New York and Brooklyn riots be- ... tween Irish and Americans, between Catho- ... lic and Protestant societies are almost a ... standing item of local intelligence. Heads ... are bruised, bones are broken, shots fired, ... processions disturbed, people murdered. St. ... Louis too, and Cincinnati have recently had ... riots. Pennsylvania is no stranger to them, ... along the lines of the public works. Mon- ... treal and Terrehaute have witnessed the ... mobbing of a Protestant preacher, not time ... out of mind. Boston has had her disturb- ... ances, and more lately Newark.

These riots traveling South, have reached ... us in due form. In Mobile, at an election ... for Justice of the Peace, a few weeks ... since, in the Fifth Ward, a terrible riot oc- ... curred between the Irish and Americans. ... The Register says: 'That a party, composed ... wholly of Irish citizens of the ward, drove ... some dozen of the native population from ... the polls, but were afterwards repulsed by a ... reinforcement of Americans, and a great ... feeling of bitterness and hostility was engen- ... dered which it will take days, if not years to ... allay. For three days the excitement was ... kept up, during which time all the Irish who ... had been engaged in brick-batting the Amer- ... icans were hunted down, and many caught ... in the streets and elsewhere and severely ... handled.'

In our midst, we have seen an ex-Chief of ... the Police staff, an Irishman, under imputa- ... tion as a rioter, and the captain of an Irish ... military company arrested, and forbid by the ... Mayor an entrance into the armory. The ... redoubtable Dr. Meighan, who led on the ... assault in Camp street, in the neighborhood ... of St. Patrick's Church, was found after the ... rout, hid away in an alley loaded down with ... weapons, among which was a sword and re- ... volver, and a cross! The spiritual, no doubt, ... was intended to sanctify the carnal weapons.

These riots, occurring at different times ... and places, are marked with the same fea- ... tures, and a general philosophy underlies ... them all. Some will have it that it is the ... outbreak of hostility between the foreign born ... and natives. Now, it is not surprising a na- ... tive suspicion should be expressed, when a ... statistic of emigration is exhibited; nor is it ... a matter of wonder that native defenses ... should be examined, and, if needs be, repair- ... ed and extended, in view of the depopula- ... tion of Europe, and the emptying upon our ... shores of pauper parishes and prison houses. ... Nor is this anxiety confined to the natives of ... this country, but we believe a large majority ... of our settled naturalized citizens acknowl- ... edge the necessity of circumspection.

But this distinction is not maintained in ... these outbreaks. Why do we not read of ... Frenchmen, Spaniards and English engaged ... sometimes. They are never parties. They, ... tho' born abroad as much as others, are never ... found ranged against those to the manor ... born.

Others, would make it a war of faiths ... and of course raise a cry of persecution for ... the religion of the defeated party. This is ... a trick that has served a good turn for the ... Romanists. But it is being understood. These ... riots do not grow out of religious opinions ... purely. They do not present Protestantism ... and Catholicism at war. It is a libel upon ... the tolerant spirit and institutions of our ... country to suggest this interpretation. Are ... the Irish the only Catholics among us? Not ... by far. Other nationalities represent this ... faith, who are not represented in these riots. ... Chivalric and devoted sons of Europe are ... among us, becoming citizens, or already nat- ... uralized, who would die for their religion if ... occasion called. Yet they, intelligent adhe- ... rents of the Catholic Church, born, baptized ... and raised in it, are not counted among the ... belligerents. So then it cannot be made out ... a religious quarrel.

"It is the Irish as Irish, against the Amer- ... icans as Americans." Not that either, any ... more than Catholics as Catholics against ... Protestants as Protestants. An Irishman is ... not always a bully, a drunkard or brawl-head. ... Among Irishmen we find some of the best ... members of the Protestant churches. Some ... of them are intelligent, manly, thrifty,—or- ... naments of society. These are not to be in- ... cluded among the enemies of law. They ... have no sympathy with these Irish riots ... except it be on the American side—the side ... of order. They are staunch citizens, to be ... relied upon in any emergency. We cannot ... bear to have them stigmatized by these sweep- ... ing charges.

Finally, we reduce it down to this—Irish ... Catholics. Here you have the fermenting ele- ... ments; here you have the instruments of ... riots, the invariable parties. And why? ... Because, of all nations and peoples, they ... the Irish, by education, habit, and we may ... add by religious idiosyncracies, are most sub- ... ject to priestly power. The superstition, ... bigotry, intolerance and domination of the ... Roman Catholic Church culminates among ... them. The Germans, the thinking Germans, ... disgusted by the only specimens of religion ... before them in the old Catholic countries, ... may be nominally Catholic, but they tend ... practically to latitudinarian views and prac- ... tice in their emigrated state. The French ... will not submit to the grinding despotism of ... popery. They accept its cathedral manifes- ... tations as a grand religion. But the men ... care little about and seldom go to church—the women, who cannot raise riots on a large ... scale, are the main patronage of the confes- ... sion box and the altar. The Irish, however, ... seem to be ridden by a night-mare, hooted ... and spurred in shape of a priest. In this ... people is brought out fully and fairly, and in ... startling prominence the legitimate effects of ... popery. We see in them, an abused, be- ... nighted, naturally generous, enslaved people, ... the agreement of Romanism with Republican- ... ism. They come together, and this is the ... noise we hear, these the sights we see. The ... Irish are in the hands of the priests as clay ... in the hands of the potter.

For a purpose and by a regular scheme, ... they, even in America, are kept in isola- ... tion. As a writer in the Edinburgh Review ... expresses it, speaking of the Catholic Irish: ... "They change their soil but not their alle- ... giance—"their abode, but not their nature." ... They are segregated. In separate schools, ... despite the great free school system, the ... priests gather the children, there to grow up ... a distinct generation. Irish schools, societies, ... military companies, all these devices are ac- ... cessory. By them fusion is prevented. Thus ... a body of voters is held at the Church's bid- ... ding—a party for any needed service. Though ... they get the worst of it in these emeutus, it ... does not thwart the design. Their very de- ... feats keep up the useful feud and widen the ... separation.

From 1847 to 1850, according to the Eu- ... ropean census, there emigrated to the United ... States 833,692 Irish; 341,426 Germans. The ... American census corresponds to this. Now, ... the Germans are more energetic. Over half ... their number are spread over the Northwest- ... ern States. Many stay in cities as mechan- ... ics; but the larger proportion, if the census ... speaks truly, are to be found in the agricul- ... tural districts, felling forests and turning up ... the prairie. The Irish, however, tarry in the ... cities; mostly the sea-ports. One love is for- ... ever weeded from their hearts. Their expe- ... riences of the impoverishing potato patch ... seems to have given them a distaste for agri- ... culture. They do small jobs or day labor; ... are convenient for clubs and strikes; and ... continually under priestly surveillance. This ... is their situation. Such they are. In such ... numbers do they dwell. These are the in- ... fluences, of long operation and continually ... operating upon the excitable masses. Dema- ... gogues ply them, bid for them through the ... bishop or archbishop, and hurry them along ... to the ballot box. The shillaly and rosary, ... the club and the crucifix, ignorance and big- ... otry, indulgences and the confessional—put ... these all together, and it is a riotous combina- ... tion.

What is the cure for riots? These: 1. ... Modification of the naturalization laws. 2. ... Free Schools. 3. Bible—Open Bibles.

WHEREABOUTS OF THE BISHOPS.

These venerable overseers of our heritage ... are going to and fro upon their high errands.

Bishop Soule has returned from his visit ... North. He proceeded no farther North than ... Wisconsin, because of the illness of Mrs. ... Soule. The Bishop's health is very good, ... and that of Mrs. S. is improving since her ... return.

Bishop Paine spent Sabbath, 10th inst., in ... Nashville, preached at night, and left on ... Tuesday morning, in company with Bishop ... Soule, for Russellville, the seat of the Louis- ... ville Conference.

The degree of D. D. has been conferred ... upon Bishop Kavanaugh by the Indiana Uni- ... versity. Our last advices left him at St. ... Louis, ready for the rough tour of the trans- ... Mississippi Conferences. At St. Louis the ... Bishop had appointments for nearly every ... night in the week, to preach. He was also ... to deliver an address at a church-extension ... meeting.

Bishop Early is looked for soon in this and ... the adjoining State of Mississippi, where he ... has many friends and relatives. He presides ... over the Mississippi Conference, Jackson, ... La., November 8.

Bishop Capers, at last reports, was attend- ... ing good Camp meetings in the upper part ... of South Carolina, and no doubt looking ... after the Colored Missions, which are under ... his charge this year.

Bishop Andrew, since his wife's death, has ... resolved to break up house keeping, and ad- ... vertised his homestead at Oxford, Ga., for ... sale. We heard of him, attending protracted ... meeting in East Alabama, not long ago. He ... is preparing an outfit of preachers for Cali- ... fornia.

Bishop Pierce, as we learn from an ex- ... change, is not making a sinecure of the ... Episcopate. In fifty of the hottest days of ... this fearfully hot season, he removed his ... family from Oxford to Sparta; travelled 650 ... miles; preached 21 sermons, each from one ... hour to two hours in length; ordained four ... elders and five deacons—besides prayers ... many, exhortations not a few, and "altar ... work" not a little. He is preparing to set ... out on his tour of Conferences—the first be- ... long the Holston Conference, which meets at ... Cleveland, Tenn., October 11.

A drunken man named Welch was killed by ... falling into a well at DeKalb, Kemper county, ... Miss., on Tuesday, the 13th inst.

"PRINCE OF PROSELYTERS."

DIGNITY DECLINED.

"That was a center shot," said a reader of ... the Advocate to us a fortnight ago. "What?" ... replied we. "Why, that article on Bishop ... Green at Mt. Albion, signed by A Metho- ... dist."

The Bishop's organ and friends seem to be ... of the same opinion. The Herald, of 15th ... inst., devotes about six columns to repairing ... the damages, in the shape of answer, denial, ... defense, mitigation and what not. First, the ... editors make a drive at it, reciting, (for ... which we thank them,) a considerable por- ... tion of the article. We hope they will give ... their readers the rest of it, another time. It ... is as much as we could ask of them, to take ... such physic in broken doses.

Then comes Dr. E. H. Bryan, who makes ... a deposition that amuses us at its formality. ... Really it smacks of an affidavit. Hear him:

"Bishop Green came to my house on the ... Friday preceding his appointment at Mt. Al- ... bion; and in the afternoon of that day he ... started in my company and at my request to ... visit some of my neighbors and intimate ... friends. On that and the next day we had ... called on some twelve families, of whom but ... three could be called Methodists; and one ... of those three, one of the heads is not a ... Methodist. The other families called upon ... by me with the Bishop, are (save one, a Bap- ... tist family) unconnected with any Church ... denomination," etc.

We had no idea of tracking out the ... "Bishop of Mississippi" so closely as that. ... As a cross examination, however, is now im- ... practicable, the witness can come down.

Finally the "big gun" is wheeled out. ... Dion thunders largely but innocuously. The ... editors introduce him with a special flourish: ... "Dion, the name of the author which, how- ... ever, accompanied the letter, and will, we ... feel sure, outweigh in the estimate of his fel- ... low citizens and neighbors, that of the anon- ... ymous correspondent he assails, should the ... latter ever lift his incognito." We could ... safely accept that challenge, as no name mus- ... tered in the columns of our worthy contem- ... porary stands higher, weighs heavier, or goes ... further with the people of Mississippi than ... "A Methodist."

These writers, with the editors, are all try- ... ing, with their ingenious might, to draw on ... a false issue. "We submit," says Dion, ... "to the people whom Bishop Green visited, ... and to whom he preached, whether his con- ... duct throughout was not such as eminently ... becomes a Christian gentleman, and whether ... the attack made upon him through the col- ... umns of the Advocate, is not wholly unjust ... and ungenerous."

The last resort of weakness!! Has our ... correspondent questioned the conduct of ... Bishop G. as "a Christian gentleman?" Not ... at all; but as a Christian Bishop. And it is ... very questionable. Gentlemen, we cannot ... let you and "our diocesan" off on that mis- ... erable subterfuge—personalities. If two such ... lawyers, as we hear the editors are, were to ... give a case in court that turn, it would be ... taken as an admission of defeat.

That blister draws. The case is not hope- ... less. To be called the "Prince of proselytors," ... is felt to be bad eminence. So it is. Yet ... we, in the last few years, heard of an Epis- ... copal Bishop's saying, "Call me proselyter! ... Yes, I am. I glory in it." Now they are ... getting sensitive about it. Well, it is time. ... Our labor is not in vain.

PRACTICAL ETHICS.

Hugh Miller, the geologist of Cromarty, ... was much contributed to, both in his moral ... and mental greatness, by the example, con- ... versation and counsels of two uncles. They ... were strange, strong-minded men—one of ... them a harness maker. Speaking of the edu- ... cating circumstances of his early life, he ... reckons at a high rate a single rule of prac- ... tical ethics this Scottish uncle instilled into ... him. It was this harness maker's maxim ... that a man, in his business dealings with ... others, ought always as a matter of princi- ... ple, to give them, as he phrased it, "the ... cast of the hauk"—that is, in his calcula- ... tions of what was due to himself for services ... done, to bring the account sensibly within ... the proper mark, so as to give the other party ... somewhat more than full measure.

If men followed this rule, mutually, in es- ... timating their damages and affronts, it would ... be as easy to settle their personal difficulties ... as their business accounts. Let each give the ... other "the cast of the hauk."

What a broad foundation it lays for mag- ... nanimity of character—giving "the cast of ... the hauk." It is the last cent or two added ... on, that stamps the dealer a cheat, the ... money-lender a usurer, the workman an ex- ... tortioner. And so small a gain in the dollar ... never remunerates so great a loss in reputa- ... tion.

There is at the bottom of the public mind ... a principle of fair play, and a standing ... judgment upon selfishness. For him that ... claims less than his own, it claims more. Gen- ... erosity never loses anything. Here lies the ... power of what is called understatement, ... where one pleads his own wrongs. He ... gives his enemies "the cast of the hauk," ... and it is given back to him with interest.

Giving "the cast of the hauk" may be ... found in the Sermon on the Mount. Where ... you can be compelled by the letter to go a ... mile, go twain. And where a trial at law ... would take your coat, throw in your cloak ... also. Pity it is, that a rule of practical ... ethics, fruitful of peace and beauty, should be ... so little known and practiced in this world ... of ours.

Missionary Reports.

To the Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treas- ... surer of the Missionary Society of the ... Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

In this you have my first report for this ... Conference year. I was employed upon this ... mission by the P. E. Bro. Thompson about ... the middle of May, since which time I have ... been laboring to the best of my ability, but ... the future must reveal with what success.

The mission was necessarily in a state of ... moral dilapidation, having had but little ... preaching for several years past; also, little ... administration of discipline, or of the ordinan- ... ces of the Church. Under such circumstances, ... and other equally unfavorable, it could ... scarcely be otherwise than that there should ... be a falling away both in spirituality and ... membership.

My work, excepting a monthly appoint- ... ment, is upon plantations. I preach upon ... eight plantations—for four twice a month, ... for the others once. I found in all forty-one ... who wished to be recognized as members of ... the Methodist Church, and nearly twice as ... many who are members of the Baptist ... Church. There are also a few Presbyterians. ... There seems to be some of the life and power ... of religion among the people; but the major- ... ity, I fear, hold but a form, and many a very ... broken one at that. But they are seemingly ... anxious to hear, and the Word, I trust, finds ... way to their hearts.

The members seem to be waking up con- ... siderably, and others seem to be more or less ... deeply convicted. One or two have profess- ... religion, and many others profess to be seek- ... ing. May the Lord lead them by the way ... that they should go—bring them to His fold ... and to His eternal rest.

I have received twenty-eight new members ... —a few of these were or had been members ... of the Baptist Church—making in all sixty- ... nine.

Much more might be done in this depart- ... ment of the work, were it not for the many ... disadvantages under which we are compelled ... to labor. But these need not be mentioned ... you are aware of them.

There is room enough in this parish for ... one or two more men. Several planters were ... preaching who cannot obtain it. When ... shall the time come that even our own favor- ... ed land—the land of so many Christians and ... Christian privileges—shall be fully supplied ... with the Gospel? May the Lord hasten the ... time.

Yours, in Christ,

L. Cately.

THE GOSPEL FOR MEXICO.

We are not filibusters. Not by any means. ... Yet, we do not believe in any decree of Pro- ... idence by which the neighboring fair isle of ... Cuba is given over forever to the Pope and ... the Devil. Jealous States and alliances may ... plot against it, but it is bound to be opened ... sooner or later, to religious, if not civil lib- ... erty. Protestants are now training who will ... preach there.

In our neighboring Southern Republic, ... Republics, events are hastening faster and ... without hindrances. Though we can do no ... more, we like to keep attention awake in that ... direction. From all quarters accounts reach ... us of the disordered and anarchical condition ... of Mexico, and the approach of another of ... those turbulent revolutionary epochs.

The True Delta sums up the political pro- ... abilities thus, and warns us that the day of ... annexation and of trouble and responsibility ... is not far off:

"Should Northern Mexico succeed in its ... attempt at secession from the States of the ... Republic, and should the revolt of Alvarez ... be consummated by the separation of the ... territory on the Pacific, and the establish- ... ment of a new Republic therein, the author- ... ity of Santa Anna will be confined within ... narrow limits, but may still continue to ex- ... ist for some years longer, until the mes- ... senger of death summons the old chief from the ... country over whose destinies he has exercised ... so great an influence, and in the vicissitudes ... of whose fortunes he has so largely partici- ... pated. Should Northern Mexico succeed in ... its efforts to secede, there is very little ques- ... tion that at an early day its inhabitants will ... apply for admission into the Union, when we ... may expect a fierce congressional conflict on ... the question, inasmuch as it is well under- ... stood that the inhabitants of that country ... are adverse to slavery even where the em- ... ployment of a servile population is demanded ... by the character of the climate and soil of ... their country.

"This, however, would not be sufficient to ... exclude them, the feeling of this country ... ing decidedly and firmly bent on Southern ... and Western extension, leaving to circum- ... stances the settlement of the many matters ... of a disagreeable aspect inseparably con- ... nected with acquisitions of this character, ... the immense advantages of which cannot be ... overbalanced or set off by social drawbacks ... which time may destroy. Without dwelling ... upon subjects not immediately before us, or ... entering into arguments to show that this ac- ... quisition of more Mexican territory is expe- ... dient or advantageous, we are firmly im- ... pressed with the conviction that the annex- ... tion of Mexico is an event much more near ... than is generally supposed, and that it be- ... hooves our Government to give heed to the ... circumstance, and prepare for the event."

The Puritan Recorder, 7th inst., has a let- ... let from Mrs. Rankin, who is building up a ... Female Seminary in Brownsville, Texas, in ... aid of the old States, and has now a school ... of forty children, American and Mexican, ... quite a proportion of them from the Convent. ... This lady says:

"The different organizations for evangel- ... ing a fallen world seem to have forgotten ... that Christ is to have Mexico for his inher- ... tance, as well as the uttermost parts of the ... earth for his possession. While Burmah, In- ... dia, China, and the far off islands of the sea ... are commanding Christian sympathy and ... aid, I would fain present the cause of the ... thousands of benighted Mexicans, scattered ... at different points on the Rio Grande. "EARLY MISSISSIPPI METHODISTS."

Mr. Editor: I find in your paper of Sep- ...mber 9, an article under the above, which ...doubtless interest many of your readers. ...e writer gives no dates, and he is inac- ...rately in error as it regards some historical ...ts. Tobias Gibson was the first pioneer of ...ethodism, who, at great hazard, visited the ...limited settlement designated by the ...eral term Natchez, not, however, "about ...e close of the revolutionary war," but ...e seventeen years after that close, in 1799 ...1800. Neither did he settle or remove, as ...an of family; he never married, nor did ...e to, "an advanced age, leaving a nu- ...rous family." He was strictly a traveling ...acher until his death, which occurred on ...fifth day of April, 1804; he was born in ...uth Carolina, November 10, 1771—aged ...ost 33 years at his death.

Tobias Gibson was admitted on trial, 1792; ...was my colleague on Holstein Circuit, in ...e western part of Virginia, in 1795; a ...re deeply devoted and ardently pious man ...ever knew, but was there worn down by ...rdship and labor, and in the language of ...e obituary notice—"he appeared to be su- ...annuated a few years before he went to ...e Natchez country."

His adventurous trip or voyage to Natchez, ...thus described in the volume of hound ...notes: "After traveling 600 miles to Cum- ...berland, he took a canoe and put his saddle ...d equipage on board, and paddled himself ...f of Cumberland into the Ohio river, and ...ok his passage 600 or 800 miles in mean- ...s of that great river." Having raised ...me societies and opened the way for itine- ...ant operations, he traveled some 600 miles ...rough an Indian country, to meet Bishop ...bury, at the Western Conference, which ...as held in Sumner county, Tenn., in Octo- ...er, 1802. Hoping to obtain help in his new ...eld of missionary toil, Moses Floyd, a young ...reacher returned with him. In the fall of ...803, Hezekiah Hanyman and Abram Amos ...olunteered to go to the aid of Gibson. In ...804 Learner Blackman and Nathan Barnes, ...ndertook this toilsome and hazardous mis- ...ion, they took their outfit in Williamson, a ...rontier county in Tennessee, for a journey of ...00 miles through a wilderness to Nntchez. ...Some dried beef, biscuit and parched corn- ...eal, with corn for their horses, constituted ...heir outfit. In 1805, Blackman and his co- ...aborers had succeeded in forming a district, ...composed of the following circuits, to wit: ...Natchez, Wilkinson, Claiborne and Appa- ...oosas. Blackman was the presiding elder, ...and the following additional preachers were ...sent from the Western Conference, to supply ...the circuits, viz: Thomas Lasley, Caleb W. ...Cloud, William Putterson and Elisha W. ...Bowman. These young men, deeply imbued ...with the spirit of their mission, took their ...plain outfit for a long, gloomy and perilous ...journey, at the same point, and after the ...same manner of the former—the love of ...Christ, and souls induced them to endure ...hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ.

These were plain unsophisticated Metho- ...dist preachers. I know them well. Distin- ...guished from others, by plainness of dress, ...grave deportment, and simplicity and earn- ...estness in their public ministrations. They ...labored for two, and some of them for three ...years in this region of country. Their hard- ...ships and privations, as well as their achieve- ...ments, were only known to God and them- ...selves; eternity alone will reveal what they ...endured, or the good they accomplished. ...The indefatigable Learner Blackman, toiled ...for three years in this work. His useful, pop- ...ular talents, his polished, plain manners, his ...affable but grave deportment, and his unti- ...ring zeal, gave tone to Methodism. Of him ...it might have been said, "he was cheerful ...without levity, serious without melancholy."

A few words more about Tobias Gibson, be- ...fore we close this communication. He had ...relations settled in the Natchez country prior ...to his visit, from whom has sprung a numer- ...ous progeny, and this, perhaps, is the ground of "John Bunyan's" error.

When Bro. Gibson and the writer were col- ...leagues in the mountains of Virginia, we had no private rooms in which to read, study and pray, our leisure hours were spent in the woods, with our pocket Bibles, then the con- ...stant companion of Methodist preachers—to become biblical scholars was then deemed in- ...dispensable. Gibson was given to reading ...and much prayer, affable and mild, but al- ...ways serious. I have seen him smile, but never saw him laugh; he would gently re- ...buke laughter in others. Such men were well adapted to the great work of spreading ...scriptural holiness.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

On and after the 1st November next, the subscription price of the New Orleans Christian Advocate will be $2 per annum in advance; if payment be delayed six months, $2 50; at the end of the year, $3.

After a fair and full experiment of two years, it is ascertained that the paper can not be supported at $1 50 per annum. This will be to all our friends and patrons, and to every reasonable person, a sufficient cause for the change. In labor and material there has been a change to higher rates. The price of printing is now 25 per cent. higher in this city than it was a year ago.

This arrangement has the unanimous recommendation of the Publishing Committees. It puts the New Orleans Advocate at the same rates with the family of Advocates, and cheap still.

General Intelligence.

Charity Hospital.—The following is a weekly report of the Charity Hospital, for the week ending on Saturday evening, the 23d instant:

Admissions	424	Discharges	316
Died	163	Died of yellow fever	147
Total remaining	701

From the above report it will be seen that the fever is still on the increase in the hospital, and we learn from various sources that there is no abatement of its virulence in private practice.

Interments.—The following are the returns of the number of interments in the several Cemeteries of the city for the week ending at 6 a. m., Sunday morning, 24th:

	Fever.	Other diseases.	Total.
Protestant, Girod street	7	8	15
Odd Fellows' Rest	3	4	7
Cypress Grove No. 1	1	3	4
" " 2	35	16	51
Charity Hospital	138	13	151
St. Patrick's	55	30	85
Catholic No. 1	3	6	9
" 2	3	14	17
St. Vincent de Paul	53	34	87
Lafayette, Fourth District	43	35	78
Total	341	163	504

The total number of deaths per last report was 530, of which 340 were from yellow fever. It will be seen that there is a slight decrease this week in the total deaths, but an increase in those from fever.

Health of Alexandria.—The Red River Republican of the 16th inst. says:

"The most deplorable reports we understand are in circulation in the country with respect to the health of Alexandria. We are happy to say they are without the slightest foundation. Instead of sickness, the most perfect health prevails here. Not a single case having the most remote resemblance to yellow fever has occurred, and no other kind of sickness prevails here."

Health of Mobile.—There was a further increase in the list of interments at this place for the week ending Saturday the 23d inst. There were 135 deaths 6 of which were from yellow fever. The Advertiser of Sunday says:

There is no doubt of the existence of yellow fever to a slight extent in the city, but so far it is mostly confined to the Hospitals, and shows little inclination to spread. An illustration of this may be seen in the fact that there is so slight an increase over the deaths last week by ths disease, and ihis, notwithstanding the weather was so unfavorable to the sick. We have made some inquiry, and are satisfied there is no ground for apprehension of the fever spreading to any extent, and we have strong hopes the present invigorating weather will banish it speedily. At all events frosts may soon be expected, when all apprehensions will depart from ths most timid.

No Postponement on Account of the Weather.—A Syracuse paper says that the Millerites have recently been holding a series of meetings in that city, and have labored somewhat earnestly to make converts. The day now fixed for the end of all things earthly is the 19th of May, 1855.

The Birds.—A friend of ours has for some time past had a number of singing birds, belonging to his daughter, caged in the shop of a barber here, for care and preservation. The birds made new friends but always remembered the old, and flew with much music and melody to the bars of their cage whenever our friend entered. The fire that burst out the other evening on Gravier street burned through to where the birds were kept and commenced consuming the barber's furniture. Unmindful of property much more valuable, he rushed up, caught and caged the birds and conveyed them safely away. Other instances of bravery, humanity or kind-heartedness might undoubtedly be cited that surpass this; but it is rarely that a man will allow his property to be destroyed from considerations so slight and yet so honorable.

Sudden and Awful Death.—On the 20th inst. a negro woman, aged about 30 years, while picking cotton on a plantation belonging to Mrs. E. R. Williams, in the Parish of Rapides, La., was bitten on the hand by a snake, supposed to be a "Blind Moccasin," and in five minutes was a corpse. It is seldom that death so suddenly follows the bite of a snake, and probably the wound was inflicted upon a vein or artery.

The McDonogh Legacy.

The Mayor of Baltimore has nominated two citizens of New Orleans, to represent, in conjunction with a citizen of Baltimore, the interest of that city in the administration of the property bequeathed by the late John McDonogh to the cities of New Orleans and Baltimore. Our Baltimore co-legatees appear to attach a great deal more importance to their legacy than we do. There has been, we learn, a great struggle and scramble in relation to the mode of appointing these representatives, and then as to the proper persons to be appointed. Campbell the poet assures us

"'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view

Fifteen hundred miles intervening distance have doubtless augmented to a prodigious extent the value of the vast expanse of swamp and prairie lands, and of the miserable shanties in the city, which John McDonogh bequeathed to the cause of public education. Our Baltimore friends have no doubt fallen into the common delusion of persons who have been left fortunes abroad and think they have only to send on here and load a half a dozen of their fast clippers with the golden proceeds of this immense legacy, to render their city easy and comfortable for the remainder of its corporate existence. Infatuated legatees! In the first place you have not got out of the hands of the executors and lawyers yet. It is true the United States Supreme Court has decided in your favor against the heirs at law, but the executors still hold on—their lawyers still receive their handsome salaries, and the property remains in the same hands that have managed it for the last three years.

It is true this city has given its bonds ($100,000) to the lawyers who so successfully argued the case before the Supreme Court; it has appointed commissioners who have made repeated inquires for "the legacy,"—"the estate." But there is something more to be done before they can get the property—the cities of Baltimore and New Orleans must organize their alms house, their school farm and other institutions contemplated by Mr McDonogh, before they can enjoy the legacies bequeathed by him. They must get these institutions incorporated by their Legislatures. Besides, they must comply with various other conditions, precedent fully declared in his very complex will, before they can enter upon these legacies.

When they set to work to carry out all the eccentric and fanciful schemes of this very peculiar old man, they will experience difficulties which they did not imagine, difficulties which will bring them to that point, that they will find it necessary either to renounce the legacy altogether, or evade its conditions. One thing we hold to be pretty certain, and that is, that the city of New Orleans ought never to consent to permit so large an amount of porperty as that included in Mr. McDonogh's will, and in its corporate limits, to be leased out for a term of years and to be for ever withdrawn from absolute ownership. The city already suffers from absenteeism to a frightful degree. It would greatly augment this evil if the corporation allowed so large a portion of its property to be leased out for short terms and to be built up consequently in an insecure, frail, temporary and unhealthy manner. In such an arrangement as this, our co-legatee, Baltimore, would experience all the benefits and New Orleans all the evils. Far better would it be for both cities to sell out the property, disregard the cranky and impracticable conditions with which the legacies are shackled, and apply the proceeds as near as possible to the objects contemplated by the testator. We can see no reasonable objection to such a course.

The McDonogh Will Case.

We publish with pleasure the statement which follows, from the executors of John McDonogh, relative to their willingness and desire to surrender the estate of the deceased into the hands of the duly appointed commissioners. This statement is full and satisfactory on a point in regard to which the public needed and had a right to expect information. It will be seen, by reference to the quotation from our remarks, that we do not, as the executors intimate, charge them with any reluctance to deliver over the estate, but simply state the fact that the estate has not been surrendered, and that there are parties whose interest is opposed to such surrender, not the executors, who, being paid out of the proceeds of the personal property, have rather an interest to be relieved of the charge.

We further learn, by reference to the records of the courts, that in May last the executors filed their final account and petitioned to be discharged, which was opposed by Messrs. Durant and Horner, attorneys for absent heirs, upon the ground that Baltimore not having appointed its agents, the property in such case would be without any one to take care of it. Baltimore has, since then, appointed its representatives, and there is no longer any reason or desire upon the part of the executors for withholding the property.

With not the slightest desire to do injustice to any parties, we are pleased to have afforded an opportunity of eliciting information upon a subject of so much interest to our community.

To the Editors of the New Orleans Crescent—

Gentlemen: The undersigned have read with regret an article in your paper of the 27th inst., under the head of The McDonogh Legacy, in which, among other things, you observe, in speaking of the legatees under the will of the testator: "Infatuated legatees! In the first place you have not got out of the hands of the executors and lawyers yet. It is true the United States Supreme Court has decided in your favor against the heirs at law, but the executors still hold on—their lawyers still receive their handsome salaries, and the property remains in the hands that have managed it for the last three years."

This statement is without the least foundation in fact, so far as it intimates, or rather asserts, that the executors will throw any obstacle in the way of the legatees to obtain the possession of the estate. The undersigned are, and have always been, ready and anxious, to deliver up the property to the cities of New Orleans and Baltimore; and they have been compelled to administer the estate, first on account of the protracted litigations which were carried on against them by the States of Louisiana and Maryland, in the State tribunals, and of the legal heirs in the Federal Courts; and secondly, because since the termination of these suits in favor of the will, the appointment of the agents for the city of Baltimore has been delayed until recently, and now there is no reason whatever for withholding the property from those to whom it belongs, for a single hour; and we beg leave, Sirs, to assure you, that neither the executors nor their lawyers ever entertained the remotest idea of preventing the Commissioners and Agent, from taking immediate possession of the property.

Under these circumstances we trust that you will promptly correct your erroneous statement in relation to this matter by publishing this letter.

We are, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

C. Roselius,
A. D. Crossman,
Wm. E. Leverich.

Narrow Escape.—The Putnam County Courier states that as Mr. Smith, of Peekville, N. Y., was crossing a bridge in the town of Patterson, near the line of Kent, in that county, on Wednesday of last week, he was thrown from his wagon in consequence of his horse taking fright at an opening in the bridge. His wife and infant child were with him, and all escaped without injury, although the child and buffalo robe were precipitated into the stream, the child falling on the robe which floated down the stream, and bearing its precious little burden onward until both were drawn ashore by gentlemen who were returning from a pic-nic excursion. The horses sheared off and went over the bank of the stream down a precipice of thirty feet, and were drowned. They and the wagon was drawn out about an hour after the occurrence.

"Hydrant Water."—Some say one thing and some say another—only Solons say all things well and wisely. We have of late been sent in disagreeable haste to our pile of dictionaries, by city contemporaries, in search of terms of art and profound Johnsonianisms, with a rapidity and frequency wholly undesirable in such hot and feverish weather. Webster had to be consulted as to "pleaginous, lacteal-essenced nourishment," and Lindley Murray as to the "dog and relative of a city alderman." We turned hopefully and hurriedly to Richardson, Booth, Brand and the Penny Cyclopedia concerning "oviparous products." To-day we are driven to fresh researches in Agassis, Araga, and sundry other classic authors, regarding "oscillarine and infusarine," a style of animals generally pronounced invisible, but clearly discerned by the sense and spectacles of our neighbor of the Picayune. "It seems that these microscopic mullgrubs have been disturbing the stomach of some one of the corps editorial of that journal, and he is down upon them and hydrant water in terms particularly profound and unintelligible. If the "oscillarine and infusarine" don't give up to such an artillarie of big words and bomb shells, there is no virtue in adjectives—no force in highfalutin. The "critters" ought to give in.

There can be no doubt that our hydrant water has stunk like seventy decomposed wildcats for more than a week preceding, and been prejudicial to health and an average state of happiness among the people. Without going into the scientific analysis of Prof. Riddell and all his elaborate remarks concerning a stomach full of grub-worms, we think that the presence of a Nuisance-bust right under the nose and entrance of the grand suction performance of the Water Works, and the negligence of the Water Works Company may be as likely to have accomplished some thing detrimental to the City health and taste as invisible animalcule—whether "oscillarine or infusarine." The latter beasts are not of the dictionary tribe, though some thing approaching thereto, under the style of infusorire, may be discovered. The names approach so closely, however, and our ignorance of animalcular is so profound that both get classed together and equally damned.

A great deal more could be pertinently said concerning animals, hydraut water, hygiene and stomachs. Enough of such nauseousness has, however, been already committed, and we are certain that total abstinence from water and a confirmed course of brandy or claret would speedily eradicate the difficulty. Our own opinion is not as tentotal as that of our neighbor, but infinitely more agreeable, popular and effective. We sum up—after grubs, brandy and water. Ilis "summary is appended."

The oscillarine, then, are as likely to be the cause as any other of the infusorie; and certainly we think no reasonable mind could avoid coming with us to the conclusion that large quantities of them could not but provoke injurious effects.

We should, therefore, strongly advise our fellow-citizens not to use the hydrant water until they are assured that the recommendations of Prof Riddell that they be supplied direct from the river are duly observed. We hope the Superintendent of the Water Works Company will at once see this done. [Crescent

We fully confirm our advices in regard to the growing crop transmitted per Asia 5th, and Europa 11th instant. For your perusal we have selected from numerous letters to hand since our last, the annexed, knowing them to be reliable.

Montgomery, September 7.

Dear Sir:—We have now to assume a more decided position as to the cotton crop of this section, for that it will be short of last year is no longer a matter of doubt. As to the great South Western crop, we are at a loss in forming an opinion; for though it is generally represented as promising a large yield, yet we cannot divest ourselves of the idea that, to a greater or less extent, the same influences of weather and temperature must have extended to and produced a like effect upon that, as our crop, with this advantage however in its favor, the lands are fresher.

The crop of this, and all higher latitudes, is irreparably injured, unless we shall have such a season as in 1839, the probability of which is of course very remote. A very early killing frost would convert the brilliant prospects of July into a short crop.

Columbus, Georgia, Sept. 7

Dear Sir:—Thinking you would like to have correct information as to the condition and prospect of the growing crop, I have concluded to write you.

The drought which has prevailed over all the cotton country since the 1st of July has been of a most blasting and destructive character, parching and withering up the plant as if a fire had passed over it, killing it entirely in many places, causing a general shedding of small bolls, shapes and blossoms. Nothing has been making for a long time except on the river bottoms proper and the wet spots on the creeks, which in comparison to the uplands is one in a thousand. All the uplands have failed signally, worse even than in 1854. This crop per acre is no better than that, the total yield will be the difference in planting. You can safely act on a short crop. The picking will begin to close next week; half the planters in this part of Georgia and Alabama will finish by the end of this month, (September.)

The extravagant estimates of crops, against which we cautioned you per Pacific, August 4, are no longer indulged in, and even when referred to, none seem anxious for the credit of paternity. It is to be regretted that they exercised any influence in Liverpool, made up as they were, hastily, on a superficial view of the subject, by estimating the yield from the sudden and luxuriant growth of stalk and leaf, the result of fine, forcing weather during May and June, following the frosts of April, which rendered replanting necessary.

A Cool Spot.—The summit of Mount Washington, in New Hampshire, is decidedly a cool place. The highest point reached by the thermometer away up there in the last half of our hot August was 60 degrees on the 31st. On the 25th it fell to 35 degrees. On the morning of the 23d there was plenty of ice, one-fourth of an inch in thickness. During the evening of the 25th, there was a magnificent display of the Aurora Borealis, which lighted up the heavens most brilliantly for several hours.

The citizens of Itawumba county, Mississippi, held a public meeting at Fulton, on the 28th ult., on the day of the meeting of the Probate Court, and passed resolutions requesting the Probate Judge, Mr. T. W. W. Pulliam, to resign his office, on account of his habitual drunkenness and neglect of the duties of the office.

James B. Clay, son of Henry Clay, in a note to the editor of the Lexington Observer, contradicts the report published in one of the papers, that Mr. George Law, of New York, had sent an agent to Kentucky to purchase Ashland, the home residence of Henry Clay, and which now belongs to his son, J. B. In his note Mr. James B. Clay says; "Never having offered Ashland for sale, I presume neither Mr Law, nor any one else, would venture to offer me the insult of proposing its purchase."

Quarantine at Woodville, Miss.—The town council at Woodville, on the 19th inst., established a quarantine of twenty-one days against all persons coming from places where the yellow fever prevails, and of five days exposure in open air against all goods, etc., from such places. The penalty for a violation of the ordinance is fifty dollars fine, and imprisonment for ten days. A committee of five physicians were appointed a Board of Health, and a constabulary force employed to enforce the quarantine regulations.

The coast of Texas was visited by a most disastrous gale, commencing on Sunday, the 18th, and lasting until Thursday night, the 21st inst.

It would be almost a matter of impossibility to imagine even a greater destruction of life and property by such an occurrence.

In the Lavaca and Matagorda Bays there was much suffering and loss.

At Lavaca not much damage was sustained, other than the schooner Pantio going through one of the wharves, with little injury, however, to herself.

The gale visited Matagorda with almost unparalleled fury, destroying nearly all the buildings in the place, those of Col. Williams, Mrs Sartwell and one or two small ones, being all that escaped prostration or unroofing. The stocks of goods of the merchants have been mostly ruined, with one exception, Messrs. Sheppard & Barkhat, whose store only was unroofed, but goods materially damaged. Four lives were lost in the town: Mrs Duffey, Mr Merriman, and a negro woman and child.

The steamboat Kate Ward was entirely wrecked near the town, Capt. Ward, his brother and nine of the crew perishing. But three only escaped by clinging to one of the wheels and were taken off on the 22d.

The new steamer Colorado, built at Matagorda and nearly finished, lies high and dry in the prairie, 300 yards from the bayou.

Crops of cane and cotton are blown down and nearly ruined. In fact, it is said not a bale of cotton is left in the country.

Tres palacious, and the houses on the peninsula opposite, were all swept away, except Col. Lewis' and two others not recollected. Several lives are reported to have been lost, among which were two children of Capt. John Rugley, an old and much esteemed planter, who were killed by the house being blown down upon them.

An eyewitness to the devastation of Matagorda, says that he never could have conceived of such a sight as he witnessed between 4 and 5 o'clock on Monday morning; houses crushing and breaking up, their materials flying through the air, women and children screaming and running whither they knew not, seeking protection, and when found, only to be driven forth again after a short lapse of time to find a new one, and in many instances in nearly a denuded state.

Corpus Christi and other places westward remain yet to be heard from, as also the country.

The fever was decreasing at Galveston. From the 19th to the 21st there were 19 deaths.

The Houston Star, of the 23d, has the following additional items of the storm:

Every day we hear of other disasters occasioned by the storm of Wednesday night. Both the Buffalo Bayou bridges in this city were swept away on Wednesday afternoon at night. Mr. L. C. Stanly lost about 2500 soft brick, in the kiln, ready to burn. Several hundred cords of wood floated off from wood yards below town. At Harrisburg, the new bridge over Bray's Bayou was carried away, and the water did considerable damage to other property. It is reported that the wind has prostrated a large quantity of timber near the bayou below the city. Mr. Halley says that a hurricane passed over his forest in a westerly direction, throwing down timber for several hundred yards.

The freshet in Buffalo Bayou reached its highest point Thursday morning, being at least five feet higher than was ever previously known. The water is receding but slowly, having fallen only eight feet when we went to press.

A negro man, the property of Mr. Robert Lockhart, of this city, was drowned at Harrisburg on Wednesday.

The loss sustained by Mr Hogan by the blowing down of the frame of his new hotel will not be less than $2500.

The cupola of the Baptist church sustained considerable injury from the storm. A part of one side was carried away.

BY THE STEAMSHIP NAUTILUS.

The steamship Nautilus, Capt. Auld, arrived yesterday morning from Brazos Santiago via Galveston. She left the Brazos on Saturday evening, and Galveston on Monday at noon. The Nautilus brings $161,311 in specie. She experienced the late gale on Sunday, the 17th inst., between Galveston and the Brazos, from the N. E., and on the 18th and 19th off the Brazos, from N. W., the sea breaking in eight fathoms water. The Nautilus received no damage. She was offside five days before she could enter. Brazos and Padre Islands partially overflowed. No loss of property. The schooner L. F. Rodgers had not arrived.

By this arrival we have received the Brownsville Flag of the 9th and 16th. In the number of the former date we find the following:

By an arrival in Matamoras last evening, we learn that the insurgents are still active. The day before yesterday a party of them, under Gen. Capistran, entered the town of San Fernando, ninety miles south of Matamoras, and rumor says made prisoners of the civil officers of that place. This town of San Fernando had joined the revolutionary movement in "pronouncing" against the present Government, but the near approach of Government forces induced them to change their ideas and swear fealty anew to the rule of the despot. This the insurgents were not disposed to allow, and hence the visit of Colonel Capistran.

The insurgents seem to be as sanguine as ever, though they have changed their plan of operations somewhat. The better to maintain themselves, it is said, they have divided into several parties and commenced a system of guerrilla warfare, one of which it was that gained the victory spoken of in another place. In this manner they are confident of both maintaining themselves and harrassing their enemy for years, if necessary.

Colonel Cruz, who left Matamoras six or eight days ago, with a command of three hundred men, is said to have been quite unsuccessful in his pursuit. The almost incessant rains have so filled the country with water that he has been forced to wade his men and horses continually, and the continual surveillance of the enemy prevents his grazing his horses, so that the whole command is represented as being in great suffering from both hunger and disease.

It seems that a party of several Government troops under the command of an officer named Paulin, was disarmed entirely by the Democratic forces, who, after condemning their chief to be shot, a punishment he deserved for more than one deed, turned the soldiers free; since then, we are informed, very few have joined the regular army.

Latest News.—Just as we are going to press we have received information from a reliable source, that a party of the Insurgents under the command of Colonel Capistran have taken the city of Linares. We abstain from mentioning the place where they are to go next for fear of publishing part of their future operations.

The Flag of the 16th says:

The revolutionists across the Rio Grande seem to be gradually gaining ground. In the early part of the week we learned of their having possession of the towns of Linares, Montemorelos and Cadareyta, in the State of Nuevo Leon, and yesterday and to-day the report is accredited that the capital of Nuevo Leon, Monterey, had fallen into the hands of the patriots, by invitation of its inhabitants. If this latter report be true, and we believe it is, the revolutionists have now possession of the strongest position North of the Sierra Madre mountains, with arms and munitions in abundance. As to the fact of their being in Monterey, however, there may be some doubt. The last reliable information we have from them, they were at Linares and Montemorelos. It was known, however, that Monterey was without soldiers. Gen. Ampudia had sent the force garrisoning that place, 300 men under Col Ormos, against the rebels at Victoria, and the latter by stratagem placed this force in their rear and occupied the towns on the road to Monterey.

in Galveston last year was 450. The N... the 19th, says:

It is with great satisfaction we report a material decrease in the list of deaths in our city. In the early part of last week the average was about twelve interments each day. For the last four days there has been in all, twenty-eight burials, and of these a large proportion were infants, most of whom, if not all, died from other causes than yellow fever.

The number of burials, yesterday, fell off to four, and we infer that the epidemic is steadily decreasing, as we hear of very few new cases. The storm, though unfavorable to invalids, will probably benefit the general health, temporarily, at least, for we cannot determine what will be the effect, hereafter, of the overflow and heavy rains.

We have been informed that on Friday night last, there were as many as five bodies taken to the grave-yard after ten o'clock at night, and after the sexton had left the place. These bodies were left upon the ground, and remained unburied until yesterday morning.

The same paper says:

Sailors, who are yet to sail from Northern ports for Galveston, will probably have the fever after their arrival, even if the epidemic shall have subsided among our citizens. Of the vessels now in port, the following is the result thus far:

The Austin, out of ten sailors, has six in the Hospital. Both mates attacked, and one died.

The Helen, out of eleven sailors, has six in the Hospital.

The Trinity has three, out of six sailors, sick.

The Captain of the Mary is sick, with three of her crew, out of eight.

Thus far there have been but few deaths among sailors in the Hospital.

The Daily Times suggests that "Sisters of Charity" might be obtained from New Orleans to wait on the sick of Galveston, and says:

The scarcity of competent nurses is seriously felt during such an epidemic as the present, and the charges of those who can be had are most onerous. Negro women receive, in some instances, four and five dollars a night.

Several of our most respectable citizens offer to accommodate the "Sisters of Charity" in their private houses, and the same parties believe that they will come, if requested by our citizens.

For the last three days we have been visited by a violent gale, attended with a very heavy rain, which from its direction has blown the water out of the bay up into the city. On Monday the tide took a clear sweep across the Island, and it is said to have been the highest rise in the bay since 1842. The merchants on the Strand, and up as far as Market street, have suffered much loss from the damaging of their goods by the water. We cannot give an accurate estimate of the amount of damage done, but suppose it must be considerable, the storm at this time (7 o'clock Tuesday evening) is on the increase, but the tide is falling.

Since the commencement of the gale and its accompanying overflow of our streets, we have heard of no new case of yellow fever.

The wind had abated on the 21st, and the waters had receded. The damage was estimated at a very high figure.

The crops in Fayette, Washington, Brazos, Grimes and Walker counties, we learn from our exchanges, will fall short at least one-third of an average yield. The Houston Star says that in Austin the prospect is better, but in Fort Bend the crop will be short. The late rains, it seems, have been injurious rather than beneficial.

Yellow Fever in Houston.—The Telegraph of the 16th inst. has the following paragraph in relation to the yellow fever in that city:

Up to the hour of going to press last evening there had been only three deaths from yellow fever, as far as we could learn, in the city. We indulge the hope that the disease will not assume an epidemic form. Thus far it seems to yield quite readily to medical treatment.

The Stato Gazette says:

The beautiful valley of the Atascosa is rapidly filling up with an intelligent and enterprising people. It is as but yesterday that we passed over its rich and sweetly blooming solitudes; and yet such are the rapid strides of emigration, that we would not be surprised to see at the next Legislature an application for a new county, to be laid off in this very region.

Religious Revivals.—The Red Lander says that there has been a great revival at San Augustine, during the protracted meeting at the Methodist Church.

Gen. Rusk, says the same paper, passed through San Augustine looking in finer health than the writer had ever seen him. General Houston did not look as well as usual, having suffered from severe indisposition since leaving Washington.

One hundred and three persons attached themselves to the M. E. Church during the late revival in the county of Navarro. The town of Corsicana should certainly be considered a moral and religious place, as by far the larger proportion of its citizens are members of the church.

Health of Charleston and Savannah.—There were 19 deaths from yellow fever in the city of Charleston for the 24 hours ending at 9 P. M. of the 21st. The News of the 21st says:

The Council has summoned our people to-morrow from the walks of business and spheres of general industry, to unite in prayer and supplication, deprecatory of the Divine displeasure, and in mitigation of the physical evils by which we are afflicted.

The official report at Savannah shows a total of 16 interments, 12 of which were yellow fever cases. The Georgian of the 23d says:

The foregoing is the most favorable report published since that of the 3d of this month. Our information assures us that the new cases of sickness are daily becoming less numerous.

The Mayor of Mobile purposes to send two physicians to Brunswick, which offer the Mayor pro tem. has accepted by telegraph.

From September 2 to the 18, $20,123 00 had been received by the Mayor pro tem. for the relief of the sufferers.

Fatal Accident.—An interesting boy, son of Dr. R. Howard of Tuskegee, Ala., was instantly killed; a few miles from that place, on the 18th inst., by falling under the wheels of a wagon loaded with corn.

Charitable.—The citizens of Philadelphia have sent three thousand dollars to Savannah for the relief of the sufferers by the yellow fever, and seven hundred dollars for the relief of Columbia, Pa., where the cholera has been raging with such violence.

Boston a Hundred Years Ago.—In 1754 there were nearly as many colored persons as there were houses in Boston, the number of each being 1600. The number of slaves at that period was 980. About 40 Indians of all ages resided in the town.

There were eighteen deaths from yellow fever at Charleston for the twenty-four hours ending the 20th. The Standard says:

By the report of the City Registrar, the mortality of yesterday was considerably below that of the preceding one; and were it not for the heavy and continued rain which set in last evening, we might, as we remarked a day or two since, look daily for a continued decrease and early disappearance of the prevailing disease.

this occurred in perhaps less time than I taken to tell it; yet rapid as was the transI saw that, between the squall with its sails, and the revolt with its raving blacks, we would soon be in a desperate plight, unless I gave the order to shoot. According I told my comrades to aim low and fire at once.

Our carbines had been purposely loaded with buck-shot to suit such an occasion, so that the first two discharges brought several of the rebels to the deck. Still the unharmed neither fled nor ceased brandishing their weapons. Two more discharges drove them forward, among the mass of my crew, who had retreated toward the bowsprit; but being reinforced by the boatswain and carpenter, we took command of the hatches so effectually that a dozen additional discharges among the ebony legs, drove the refractory to their quarters below.

It was time; for sails, ropes, tacks, sheets and blocks were flapping, dashing and rolling about the masts and decks, threatening us with imminent danger from the squall. In a short time every thing was made snug, the vessel put on her course and attention paid to the mutineers, who had begun to fight among themselves in the hold.

I perceived at once, by the laforiate sounds proceeding from below, that it would not answer to venture in their midst by descending through the hatches. Accordingly, we discharged the women from their quarters under a guard on deck, and sent several resolute and well-armed hands to remove a couple of boards from the bulkhead, that separated the cabin from the hold. When this was accomplished, a party entered on hands and knees through the apartment, and began to press the mutineers forward towards the bulkhead of the forecastle. Still the rebels were hot for the fight to the last, and boldly defended themselves with their staves against our weapons.

By this time our lamed cook had rekindled his fires, and the water was once more boiling. The hatches were kept open but guarded, and all who did not fight were suffered to come singly on deck, where they were tied. As only about sixty remained below engaged in conflict, or defying my party of sappers and miners, I ordered a number of auger holes to be bored in the deck, as the scoundrels were forced forward near the forecastle, when a few buckets of boiling water, rained on them through the fresh apertures, brought the majority to submission. Still, however, two of the most savage held out against water as well as fire. I strove as long as possible to save their lives, but their resistance was so prolonged and perilous that we were obliged to disarm them for ever by a couple of pistol shots.

So ended the sad revolt of "La Estrelia," in which two of my men were seriously wounded, while twenty-eight balls and buckshot were extracted, with sailor's skill, from the lower limbs of the slaves. One woman and three men perished of blows received in the conflict; but none were deliberately slain except the two men who resisted unto death.

I could never account for this mutiny, especially as the blacks from Ayudah and its neighborhood are distinguished for their humble manners and docility. There can be no doubt that the entire gang was not united or concerned in the original outbreak, else we should have had harder work in subduing them amid the risk and turmoil of a West Indian squall.

There was very little comfort on board La Estrella after the suppression of this revolt. We lived with a pent up volcano beneath us, and, day and night, we were ceaselessly vigilant. Terror reigned supreme, and the lash was its scepter.

At last, we made land at Porto Rico, and were swiftly passing its beautiful shores, when the inspector called my attention to the appearance of one of our attendant slaves, whom we had drilled as a sort of cabin-boy. He was a gentle, intelligent child, and had won the hearts of all the officers.

His pulse was high, quick and hard; his face and eyes red and swollen; while, on his neck, I detected half a dozen rosy pimples. He was seat immediately to the forecastle, free from contact with any one else, and left there, cut off from the crew till I could guard against the pestilence. It was small-pox!

The boy passed a wretched night of fever and pain, developing the malady with all its horrors. It is very likely that I slept as badly as the sufferer, for my mind was busy with his doom. Daylight found me on deck in consultation with our veteran boatswain, whose experience in the trade authorized the highest respect for his opinion. Hardened as he was, the old man's eyes filled, his lips trembled and his voice was husky, as he whispered the verdict in my ear. I guessed it before he said a word; yet I hoped he would have counseled against the dread alternative. As we went aft to the quarter-deck, all eyes were beat upon us, for every one conjectured the malady and feared the result, yet none dared ask a question.

I ordered a general inspection of the slaves, yet when a favorable report was made, I did not rest content, and descended to examine each one personally. It was true; the child was also infected!

For half an hour I trod the deck to and fro restlessly, and caused the crew to subject themselves to inspection. But my sailors were as healthy as the slaves. There was no symptom that indicated approaching danger. I was disappointed again. A single case—a single sigh of peril in any quarter, would have spared the poison!

That evening, in the stillness of night, a trembling hand stole forward to the afflicted boy with a potion that knows no waking. In a short time all was over.

[From the New York Courier and Enquirer]

Railroad Sketches.

There were in conveyance across the Erie Railroad some valuable horses. They formed part of the burthen of a long and ponderous cattle train which was bearing to market—to that extraordinary city market which never seems to be so full as to be cheap—a drove of which, before the railroad era, would have, with slow delays, been driven on foot over the long and weary ways, pasturing for the night wherever chance shelter might be available, and subjected to all the losses and casualities of a laborious travel. They were now in comfortable cars, resting even while they journeyed, wondering, if that emotion is known beyond the circle of man, that they were the passive instead of the active, in transportation. Not having a clear perception of the future, the brief and conclusive calamities of the abattoirs were hid from them.

It was a night of intense cold, and however luxurious to cattle, whose experience of floor and roof is limited to the attendants, the crevices and openings of the cars let in entirely more of the wild north-wester than was agreeable. The owner of the horses in the car near the tender had an apartment rather better guarded, and as he understood the ways of his animals, he was not in the same fear which others less experienced would have of being with them. Nor is it without real danger to ride in a car with a horse. The sudden start may break the halters, and in the fright a scene of plunging and trampling takes place, in the midst of which the presence of man might, for his own sake, be well spared. He who rides with his horse in the car must have courage and energy, so that he shall not be spalled at a false alarm, and that if he is in danger he can mount and keep his perilous position unharmed.

The train was approaching the long seven miles down grade which occurs just before entering Deposite from the Westward. At the last station the Superintendant had deemed it best to have two very heavily burthened cars affixed to the rear of the train. They greatly augmented the load, and the Engineer demurred, but the discipline was good, and the order was obeyed. It gave the engine enough to do on the level grade, and all it wanted on an ascent. What precisely it was to do when the heavy grade was to run down, was not quite clear. The Engineer had nerve, however, and, while he doubted the safety, he did not falter. The cars coupled, the slight blow was given to the starting-bars, and the train was off. The engine gave forth its exhaust (as the word is quaintly phrased of engines that know no exhaustion) with a vigorous whistle, and over the level the wheels rolled sharp and hard in the bitter frost.

The train was due at Deposite at such a time as would cause it to meet another, which by that time was to be on the switch—awaiting the passage of the Western Cattle train in a few minutes my informant found that the down grade had been reached. He had with him several of his friends who were in the same business, and who had left their uncomfortable cars for his pleasanter one. The tremendous pressure of the load soon bore upon the engine. The stout cattle, the heavy and weighty cars, and the great additional burthen which had been added at the last station, crowded on the machine, from which the engineer, soon realizing the condition of his train, had withdrawn the steam, so that it moved by its own momentus alone.

Another and more appalling truth soon manifested itself, that with the increase of cars additional brakemen had not been sent, and that the brake force was becoming powerless. Powerless! It soon became as a velvet touch, rather than a grasp on the wheels. The loe on the rail rendered even the force that was applied useless, and each instant increasing, that train first rolled, then tore along; my informant says he knew of no gradation of speed. From the moment that the down grade was reached, it seemed to him and his companions, shut up as they were in that close apartment with animals whose strength would at the first terror arouse to destruction—to him that sensation was as if the train fell! It had that peculiar motion, not contiuuous or regular, as in the rapid roll of the wheels, but as if all else but the train were away, and it was going at the speed of a huge mass falling, and the acclivity of descent increasing each second—and all this fearful time that train at Deposite was to be met!

They knew it was to be met. Engineer, and firemen, and brakemen, and conductor, and the hardy drovers that were the passengers, knew it, and in their terrific speed they feared less, if it might be, for themselves than for the doomed train, through which, and over which, amidst dead and mangled men, and crushed fragments, never stopping for shriek or sorrow, their train would go. The miles they were passed over, no man thinking of their existence. The train tore onwards. The men upon it intensely conscious, and even the cattle appalled by a new sensation. The engineer stood on his platform, knowing that the wildest and most appalling danger was about him, in shape or form irresistible if the thread of safety snapped. The speed made a leap for life but in more rapid rush to death. Ils could not retreat. The wheels refused the least adherence to the brake. The ponderous train drove itself madly on, and in an instant more, Deposite was to be reached.

Perhaps every man's experience shows, it is most probable, that on the train coming westward, there were those who were provoked at the delay which prevented them from reaching deposite. It was, they said, too hard to be behind time, (as if time was not often our shield from sorrows). The train ought to be at its ord place. Indeed, if they were the managers of the road the trains would never be out of the minutes. Every car usually has on it some of these safe reformers, who accomplish all impossibilities, if being so safe and easy to theorise. It did not arrive, the grumblers were not yet on the road. Well was it for them that they failed; for when the descending train reached deposite it no more stayed on stopped than the emerald water do in their fall at Niagara. It would have pulverized another had it encountered collision. On it went—the engineer feeling as if his heart might throb once more, when he saw that the truth he expected to have crushed was out of his way and unharmed.

The level reached, the awful speed slacked, and though it was not brought up under control until it had run miles beyond the place of stopplag; yet the journey—the flight—the seven mile leap had been accomplished safely.

The command being with the engine again, the train was backed up, and when they who were late arrived, they had the blessed opportunity of theorising about what might have happened, their sage conclusions occurring in parenthesis of the courses of a nice hot supper, keenly enjoyed in that bleak and cold night, instead of struggling for delivery from the wreck of life and limb, and property. Long was that fearful ride remembered. Even now in the memory of my narrator, he can recall that fall down the mountain.

We strongly suspect, from the "hand of write," that the ensuing "court-scene" comes from the fucile pen of our old friend the author of "The Puddleford papers:"

Litigation about title to pigs; the pigs having run wild all summer.

Lawyer: Do you know plaintiff's pigs?"

Witness: Hn? (very loud.)

Witness: Yes.

Lawyer: How long have you known them?

Witness: Ha?

Lawyer (louder still): How long have known them?

Witness: Fed 'em nli last spriag.

Lawyer: Were they nll about of a size?

Witness: Hn?

Lawyer: Were they all about of a size?

Witness: Ha?

Lawyer (rises on his feet, petulantly, and shakes his fore-finger at the conclusion of each word, at witness): Were--they--all--about--of--a--size?

THE HIGH PRICE OF PAPER.—We must confess we are astonished beyond description, either in prose or poetry, at the high price of paper being still maintained. We should have thought that the numberless dispatches and interminable autograph letters which have been flying backwards and forwards between St. Petersburg and Berlin, and the endless diplomatic notes that have been exchanged between Austria and those States, would have lowered the value of waste paper so considerably as to have lessened the value of paper at least one-half. There ought have been no want of materials for making paper, when we think of the extensive correspondence that has been going on for months in relation to this still unanswered "Eastern question." What has become of all this correspondence? As for its value, it cannot be of the slightest worth to any one, excepting to hutter men and trunkmakers; and it is high time that the notes and letters, being completely such dead letters, were sold. What has become, also, of all the Emperor of Russia's "ultimatums"? In waste paper alone they would be a small fortune to the holder of them. Whoever is the lucky proprietor should come forward and throw them into the scales of public competition. [Punch.

CAPTURE OF AN EAGLE IN THE BALTIC.—As H. M. S. Amphion was cruising in the end of May in the Gulf of Riga, a fine eagle, which had flown too far from the land and got tired, was seen at daybreak one morning resting on the flying jibboom. He was captured, and a wooden house made for him, to which he was attached by a strong brass chain; but as the sails were letting fall one day, he got frightened at the noise, and striking out with his wings to the full length of his chain, such was his strength that he wrenched the brass bolt from the wood, and the Emperor (as the sailors had named him) soared away, chain and all.

One day Henderson, the actor, met Dr. Johnson, in Bolt Court, and being introduced to him, the conversation turned on dramatic subjects. Henderson asked the Doctor's opinion of Mr. Reed's "Dido," and its author. "Sir," said Johnson, "I never did the man an injury, yet he would read his tragedy to me."

BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast, trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or, combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a time yhas at length been found which can be relied on to cure the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

August 4, 1853.

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your CHERRY PECTORAL in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of parents for all affections of the Throat and Lungs. I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect,
J. D. POWELL, Supt. Trans., L. R. R.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefi it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours, with respect, JOHN C. WHITLOCK.

P. S. Almost any number of certificates can be sent you, if you wish it.

REV. E. D. PHILS, A. M., Principal.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL.

THOS. C. BRAGG, A. M., Principal.
——, Assistant.

This Institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty, to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the Institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the Institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar Institution in the country.

B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to a dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

Marion Female Seminary,

MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALA.

THE EXERCISES of this Institution will be resumed on Monday, the 2d day of October, under the charge of the Rev. Jas. K. Armstrong, as Principal, assisted by nine Professors, Teachers and Officers.

It has just closed its present session with one hundred and thirty-three students, seventy-seven of which number were boarders. There is but one session of nine and a half months.

Pupils can enter at any time during the session, chargeable from the beginning of the month in which they commence, to the close of the session. No deduction will be made but at the discretion of the Principal.

The Principal, with his family, resides in the building. The female teachers also reside in the Seminary. Boarders in the institution are under the control of the Principal at all times. A Steward, in the employment of the Principal, of experience, urbanity of manners, and faithfulness to his duties, a Matron who constantly and kindly administers to the private wants of young ladies, and especially in sickness, a Governess who directs them in their exercises and amusements, superintends the order of their private apartments, instructs them in certain domestic duties, and guards their private, personal habits, manners and morals, always aided by the presence and active co-operation of the female teachers. The Principal and his lady secure to those committed to their charge every necessary and proper comfort and kindness. Here they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations respecting neatness, order, punctuality and economy. They have regular hours for study and recreation, for rising and retiring, for eating, domestic duties, and social enjoyment among themselves.

The Institution is furnished with a new and superior apparatus in the departments of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. There is also a large collection of Maps, Charts, Plates, Diagrams, Globes, etc., for simplifying the principles of Geography, Physiology and Astronomy.

In the department of Drawing, Painting and Embroidery there is a fine collection of Drawing Cards, Engravings, Pictures, Paintings, Patterns, and every other convenience important in the prosecution of these departments.

There is in connection with the institution a Library of more than one thousand volumes, and a Cabinet of several hundred specimens.

The institution is furnished with six Pianos, five Guitars, and one Harp.

MUSIC.—The Professor at the head of this department is equal to any in the country. He is a superior vocalist, a fine performer on the Piano, Harp, Guitar, Violin, Violoncello, etc. He has enjoyed ten years experience as a teacher of music in the best institutions in the Union, is profoundly versed in the principia of harmony, and is a real amateur of the sublime science to which he has devoted himself.

LOCATION.—Its salubrity, intelligence, morality and public spirit are unsurpassed.

PERMANENCY.—Parents may send their daughters here with confidence in their completing their education under the same course of instruction and system of discipline. Every thing conspires to make the permanency of the Principal a matter of duty, pleasure and interest.

TEACHERS.—The Principal, himself a native of Alabama, surrounds himself with a corps of teachers of known efficiency and tried success, nearly all of whom have been reared in the South, thus ensuring a better acquaintance with Southern peculiarities and sympathy with Southern views and interests. Thoroughness is our motto in teaching. We ascribe the true importance to the harmonious development of the physical, intellectual and moral nature.

Reports are sent to patrons once every two months, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and conduct of the pupil. In our system of merits and demerits scholarship and conduct are connected.

The Principal regards it as his most important duty to attend to the moral habits of his pupils, and to imbuing their minds with proper religious principles.

The facilities for acquiring the French and other modern languages are superior.

There are daily exercises in Orthography, Reading and Writing. Great attention is bestowed on letter-writing and composition.

Lectures are delivered weekly to the junior and senior classes on various subjects of Science and Literature, on which they take notes and are subsequently examined.

The Principal will be assisted in the Collegiate department, the ensuing session, by a gentleman, a Professor of long experience, of the purest scholarship, and the most superior qualifications as a teacher. He will take charge of the department of Mathematics and some of the higher English branches, and the control of the main study hall.

Visitors are not received by boarders except with suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.

No accounts will be opened in Marion. Money must be deposited or forwarded for all necessary and proper purposes. Let pupils be supplied from home as far as is practicable.

All sums of money for the use of pupils must be deposited with the Principal.

One hundred and forty-five dollars will pay the board and tuition of a young lady for the entire session in the collegiate course. $175 will embrace the languages. $235 will embrace board, tuition in the collegiate department, on the Piano, and in the languages.

Books, Stationery, Sheet Music, Drawing, Painting and Embroidery material is furnished by the Principal. The cost of these articles varies with the advancement of the pupil. Every effort will be made to secure economy in their use.

For further particulars or catalogues, apply to the Principal.

Medical Card.

W. BODENHAMER, M. D., still continues to devote his whole attention to the Medical and Surgical treatment of Chronic Diseases, especially those of the Rectum, Anus and Urinary Organs, such as Fistula, In Ano, Piles, etc. He will also treat the various Chronic Diseases of the Womb.

He may be seen and consulted in New Orleans at the St. Charles Hotel, from the 1st of December to the 1st of May; and in New York City at No. 37 Irving Place, from the 10th of May till the 20th of November of each year.

W. BODENHAMER, M. D.—The card of this gentleman will be found below. Having known the Doctor for a number of years, and the singular success attending his peculiar practice in the diseases named in his card, it affords us great pleasure to add our own testimony to that of the following, from one of the leading journals of Louisville, Ky.:

[From the Louisville Journal, May 30, 1854.]

Dr. W. Bodenhamer, a distinguished gentleman in his profession, from Louisville, Ky., has settled in our city and has rooms at the St. Nicholas Hotel, office No. 37 Irving Place. Dr. B. is well known throughout the South and West for the successful and skillful treatment of diseases mentioned in his card. [N. Y. National Democrat, May 23, 1854.

It seems from the notice above that Dr. Bodenhamer has established himself in the city of New York. We can not commend him too strongly to the people of New York city and of all that section of country. He has devoted about fifteen years in Louisville and New Orleans, to the treatment of the diseases named in his card, and we have always understood that, in the cure of these diseases, he is wholly without a rival anywhere. We know that he has treated not only hundreds but thousands of aggravated cases, and we are assured that, in every instance, he has succeeded in effecting a perfect cure, and that too without pain to the patient. He is a skillful physician, and one of the best of men. sept 23

"EARLY MISSISSIPPI METHODISTS."

Father Gibson — Bishop McKendree in Washington—Recollections of his Discourse—Judge Alexander Covington—Atheism Rebuffed — The Truth of Christianity Illustrated — Singular Vision—Habitual Incredulity, no Evidence of Wisdom.

In my previous statement I should have inserted the name of Randal Gibson, as the oldest of the pioneer preachers in Mississippi. The first sermon I ever heard was delivered in the old meeting house in Washington.

He was truly a man of God; humble, self-denying, devout, full of good works. He died a few years since, in Warren county, at the head of a numerous and most worthy family, the patriarch of the church, and the father indeed of all around him.

The first conference that ever assembled in Mississippi, was held in Washington, Bishop McKendree presiding. He was a man of venerable and commanding presence; his voice was sweet and persuasive; his manner solemn and impressive. His fame, and the interest excited of so large a body of ecclesiastics, had invited an immense congregation. His discourse occupied two hours. It was earnest, forcible, closely-reasoned and compact, yet full of that pathos which makes so deep an impression on the young and imaginative. He represented God, not as an implacable Judge, but as the Father of mankind, deeply concerned for the welfare of the whole human race, and delighting in his favorite attribute of "long suffering and tender mercy." Even when the earth shook and entombed the venerable orator—when the face of Heaven was darkened — when the veil of the temple was rent, and the groans of nature announced the just anger of God—a voice of mercy was heard amidst the clamors and agonies of the Universe—"To-day thou shalt be with me in Paradise," and the Son of God ascended to his Father, not dragging at the chariot wheels the proud and the powerful, but bearing in his arms one poor, repentant sinner rescued from the Cross.

He replied to the celebrated argument of Hume against miracles, and demonstrated that the sceptics had no fixed principles; that they made assertions unsupported by evidence, drew conclusions unwarranted by the premises, and wandered in a region cold and desolate, enveloped in eternal clouds and darkness. He showed the incapacity of any other than the Christian faith, to secure even the temporal and social happiness. Pantheism was better organized, better understood in the palmy days of the Greek republics than at any other period, and civilization and the arts were far advanced; yet, politically, their history is but an epitome of murder, insurrection, sedition and war; socially, of tempered libertinism and intrigue in early life, with an old age powerless and imbecile impotent to derive comfort from itself, and without attraction to draw it from others. Such were the moral effects of the doctrines of the Portico and Academy. The soothing consolation which Christianity offers, by means of a Mediator between human infirmity and Eternal perfection, was unknown to antiquity. The Greek mythology bound its half-divine being, who attempted to ameliorate the lot of humanity, to a rock, and scorched and blasted him with consuming fires.

Addressing himself to the youthful portion of the congregation, the Bishop showed that there was nothing repulsive in religion; that it is full of human sympathies; that it widens the circle and increases the sum of our pleasures. It is the car of superstition, not of religion, which crushes under its wheels the kindly feelings of our nature. The power, the wealth and the grandeur of others are not objects of envy. If you would choose what will be most delightful and useful, a firm religious belief is better than any other blessing. It makes life a discipline of goodness; creates new hopes when all earthly hopes vanish; and throws over the decline, the destruction of existence, the most gorgeous of all lights; awakens life even in death, and from corruption and decay culls beauty and divinity; makes an instrument of torture and shame the ladder of ascent to paradise; and far above all combinations of earthly hopes, calls up delightful visions of palms and amaranths, the gardens of the blest, the security of everlasting joys, where the sensualist and sceptic view only gloom, annihilation and despair!

Such was, substantially, the discourse of the first Bishop that preached in Mississippi. I have often heard the late Judge Covington (then of Washington, afterwards of Warren county,) speak of the effect that sermon had upon the congregation. The Judge was an humble, ever-zealous member of the Church, and one of the most acute dialecticians I ever met with. The argument he had with Mr. McAlister, at that time President of Jefferson College, a man of many virtues and much learning, but professing the philosophy of the French encyclopedists, is well remembered.

"Let me suppose," said Judge Covington, that one of you, gentlemen, who believe that the world is the production of chance, were to go to a gaming table, and that your adversary were to throw siege—ace once, twice, thrice, four, five and six times running, our friend McAlister would lose his money, and think the devil was in the dice. Very well; the game proceeds, and your adversary still goes on throwing his main of seven, and without variation or interruption wins every stake. Dr. McAlister will now lose his temper as well as his money, and will swear that the dice are loaded—that his adversary is a blackleg, and that the house is a hell! Ah! Mr. Philosopher, because the same sides of two dice come uppermost ten or a dozen times, and you lose a few dollars, you firmly believe it is caused by a trick, an art, a combination, and cannot possibly be the result of chance. And yet, seeing in the universe around you, millions of millions of combinations, more regular, more difficult, more complicated, and all certain—all beautiful—you never suspect the dice of nature are loaded; that there is, indeed, an art, a combination, and a Master Intelligence above, who regulates the great play according to His will, and confounds the science and philosophy of such short-sighted gamesters as you."

A singular incident happened to Judge Covington, which I heard from his own lips. His brother, Leonard Covington, was with the American army in Canada, during the last war with the British. On the night of the 13th November, 1813, when the Judge was sitting alone in his study the figure, semblance or phantom of his brother, stood before him, in full uniform, the blood gushing from his breast. It gazed at him with a look of sorrow, and vanished. The circumstance made a deep impression on the Judge; and when his friends, observing his dejection, inquired the cause, he related what had occurred. Several weeks thereafter a letter was received from Major Gen. Wilkinson stating that, on the night of the 11th November, while bravely leading a charge against the enemy, Gen. Covington received a ball in his chest, and expired on the night of the 13th, at the moment, it would seem, when the apparition appeared to his brother.

Those who habitually discredit the supernatural may sneer at this, though a great master of human nature has said, "there are many things in Heaven and earth not dreamed of in our philosophy." One of the closest observers of moral and natural phenomena, Sir Humphrey Davy, sharply rebukes the vulgar incredulity which is disposed to disbelieve all which it can not understand. The fact is, it is not the profound mind, but the pert, superficial thinker who is generally strongest in every kind of unbelief. The real philosopher sees chains of causes and effects so wonderfully and strangely linked together, that he is usually the last person to decide upon the impossibility of any two series of events being independent of each other; and in science, so many natural miracles, as it were, have been brought to light; such as the fall of stones from meteors in the atmosphere, the disarming a thunder-cloud by a tiny metallic point, the production of fire from ice, and the conversion of electricity into a medium of intelligence; that the physical inquirer is seldom disposed to assert, confidently, on any abstruse subject belonging to the order of natural things, and still less so on those relating to the more mysterious relations of moral events and intellectual natures.

John Bunyan.

GOSPEL OR NO GOSPEL.

To this some of our Episcopal exchanges think the controversy in that communion is narrowed down. The Southern Churchman (Va.) says:

"We notice the fact that none of our High Church papers have ever had a word of condemnation for the Bishop of Exeter, although he has publicly and formally avowed his agreement with the doctrine of the Church of Rome respecting baptismal regeneration. Little has been said by them in denunciation of Archdeacon Wilberforce's views of the 'Real Presence' in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, while his work on Baptism, which forms part of an uniform system with his later publication, is still by many cherished and recommended. Perverts to Romanism, in our own country, have been upheld by their party up to the last moment of their continuance with us, and any notice of their 'consistent progression' previously has been denounced by the ultra charitable among us as uncharitable and injurious to the interests of the Church."

The Episcopal Recorder (N. Y.) under this heading enunciates wholesome sentiments:

"Between the sacramental theory and that which teaches we are justified by faith only; that the solemn ordinances of religion, however necessary of observance as means of grace, do not of necessity confer grace; that the preaching of the Cross, and not a well-ordered and carefully observed ritual, is the great instrument for the conversion of the world, there ever must be a wide separation in truth, they are antagonistic systems, and have nothing in common. We believe that those who carry out these views to their legitimate conclusion, find the atmosphere of our Protestant household too oppressive for further continuance, and that their progressive development always terminates in Romanism.

"Every pervert to Rome has scarcely been given up, or his course denounced, until he was fairly numbered among the salutations of the Pope. Dr. Newman was praised and upheld until he had thrown off the mask, while a suspension of opinion was asked in relation to the Bishop of North Carolina, although his sermons and actions, for previous years lauded and praised by those who now denounce him so fiercely, could have left no doubt in the mind of any Protestant that he was a Romanist, except only in name. The tastes, too, of these extremists is pandered to in various ways. Occasional flings are made at the free circulation and free interpretation of the Bible; at any study of the evidences of Christianity, the decision of the Church being the only ground of belief; at the hymns which, added to our Prayer-book, kindle the devotion of many an humble believer; at the Sunday-schools, as encouraging an unauthorized exposition of God's Word; at the Puritanic observance of Sunday, and a total separation from worldly amusements, as being righteous overmuch; at the fearful guilt of delaying infant baptism, and the doubtful doom of the innocent dying unbaptized; at the inefficacy of that Sacrament administered with non-episcopal hands; at the fearful condition of the members of other denominations as destitute of all grace. * * *

It is time, too, that the Church understood this matter, notwithstanding that the cry is raised that religious papers disturb her harmony, and mar the peace that some seem to love, although such peace be the stillness which precedes dissolution. It is well to inform the laity of what is doing, for the real strength of the Church is with them. They should be aware what our brethren, calling themselves High Churchmen, are upholding, and let the force of their opinion be felt in the right direction. It is time to point out growing practices which will, if unchecked, peril our existence, and by making our Church obnoxious to those around, narrow the circle of her influence, and limit her capacity for good at the present time. One Bishop amuses himself by searching out those who have not been episcopally baptized, and reiterating that sacrament in opposition to the declared judgment of the Church, while another, etc.

"The contest, then, is Gospel or no Gospel, and let those who are not willing to give up the pure Word of God seriously reflect whether consorting with Anglo-Catholicism in the manner we have spoken, is not virtually accomplishing that which we are persuaded they have no actual intention of doing."

ONLY ONE LIFE.

'Tis not for man to trifle! Life is brief,
And sin is here.
Our age is but the falling of a leaf,
A dropping tear.
We have no time to sport away the hours;
All must be in earnest in a world like ours.

Not many lives, but only one have we;
One, only one—
How sacred should that one life ever be—
That narrow span!
Day after day filled up with blessed toil,
Hour after hour still bringing in new spoil.

THE CITY ON A HILL.

"How did Roger Sherman vote?" inquired Mr. Jefferson once, as he entered the hall of Congress while a question was being taken; and, as the story goes, he recorded his vote on the same side, without knowing much of the merits of the question itself. This was a high tribute to the Connecticut shoemaker, and proved him to be a man for others to steer by.

Now, it is probable that our Saviour had reference to the same thing in morals when he told his disciples that they were "cities on a hill." The idea seems to convey something more than mere prominence. When the great Teacher first pronounced his comparison of a righteous man with a conspicuous city, his eyes may have been looking to the ancient town of Saphet, which stood on an elevation high above the waves of Galilee. It was in full sight from the "Mount of Beatitudes," where the Redeemer was delivering his memorable sermon. The city could be seen from afar. It was as Jesus had said, "Ye are like yonder city of Saphet, set upon a hill." That city is always in one place, lifting its white domes to the morning sun, and flashing back its evening rays from its high battlements. It is an object to take the points of the compass by—an object by which the traveler from Syria may guide his steps. The fisherman as he pushes his light skiff over the placid bosom of Genesareth, knows which way to steer his little boat, for yonder looms up Saphet, the "city on a hill." The dwellers in that region knew which way was north and which was south by looking out toward the lofty city. It was always on its hilly throne.

So it is with a man of courage and steadfast religious principle. He is a moral Saphet. Other men can steer by him. Other men judge of the questions of the day by the position which he occupies in regard to them. They say, "We know that is right, for Mr. A. advocates it;" or else, "We fear that is wrong, for Mr. A. opposes it." He is on a hill, firm and well established, not seeking to be conspicuous, and yet not afraid to be looked at. To be such a man in the pulpit, or such a man in society, requires a sound conscience. It requires genuine grace. It requires holy and consistent living. It requires good sense. This controlling godliness of character is only by much prayer, by watchfulness, by firmness, by self-denial, by boldness for the truth, and a steadfast walk with the God of hosts.

SYDNEY SMITH'S WIT.

One of our London contemporaries, in noticing a new edition of Rev. Sydney Smith's Works, thus takes occasion to speak of the incompetency of his wit to accomplish his work as a minister of Christ: "From the influence which they have exerted, as well as on other grounds, the productions of the witty canon of St. Paul's possess an enduring interest. Worthy as they all are of the highest praise for their admirable style, they differ widely in intrinsic moral worth. Sydney Smith did good service as a writer against political tyranny and social injustice. When, however, he touched that subject with which his vocation should have made him best acquainted, but of which he really knew least, he showed how utterly incompetent is the keenest wit combined with the most genial humor, yet unaided by personal piety, to appreciate emotions and efforts which have their source in the spiritual perception of the eternal and invisible."

The whole number of Churches in the U. States in 1850 was 38,061, of which more than 36,800 were Protestant places of worship.

LETTER FROM CENTENARY COLLEGE.

Jackson, La., Sept. 21, 1851.

Mr. Editor: Supposing that it may afford information to hear from our "little Athens" at this time, I offer you the following communication:

Churches.—Our new Methodist church is now nearly completed, and is unsurpassed in appearance by any like edifice in the State, outside of New Orleans; it will be ready for dedication at the coming session of the Conference in November next.

The Episcopalians, we understand, are likewise taking measures for the speedy erection of another fine structure; the Baptists are already provided with a house of worship; the Presbyterians have for some time been occupying their handsome edifice; and the Catholics, we think, intend soon to finish their building.

Schools, Health, etc.—Our College, and other fine male and female schools, all provided with competent faculties, are expected to open promptly on the first Monday of October next. The town, comparatively, is healthy; and a reference to statistics will show that no epidemic, save perhaps the almost harmless dengue, and a few sporadic cases of yellow fever, I at Summer—believed by some to be endemic—has ever originated within its limits. But when our contiguity to New Orleans is considered, as well as the unprecedented virulence of the epidemic throughout the length and breadth of our land, it is only surprising that we were not more fatally visited.

The moral attractions of our town are, by no means, inconsiderable. The inebriate who may venture within our midst must now expect to drink "in a hore!" for groggshops have been generally abolished; and parents may rest assured that every conceivable barrier is here opposed to the contamination usually so incident upon their existence. We have Churches of different casts, and schools of various characters; so that patrons may follow out their predilections, and side by side educate their sons and daughters; while students themselves may suit their individual preferences.

Should the young men of the College desire, they may indulge at evenings in a delightful walk to the "Cold Spring," some mile distant from town, and drink at its delightful fountain, or lave in its limpid waters, or, should they come within our midst enervated by sickness, they may find in the chalybeate of some mineral waters, within purview of our village, an effectual reviving agency; their properties have been tested and approved by some of our eminent physicians.

That the advantages here presented have been measurably appreciated is evident from the unusually large attendance at our College Commencement, and other recent school exhibitions; at which, it has been estimated, there were over 2000 persons present, the spacious College Chapel being entirely occupied by ladies. In view of these many inducements we must express surprise at Southern gentlemen for continuing to send their sons and daughters to Northern schools and colleges; however, we will indulge no argument against what we conceive to be their self-robbing. If they will continue this self-robbing practice, this placing in Northern hands, by virtue of their support, a cudgel of annihilation with which to slay the rising energies of our home institutions, let them do so; their money is their own; but we must be allowed to commend them to "prudent husbandry of their resources," in order to foot something like the following estimate of expenditure at a Northern University. We quote from the Philadelphia Ledger: "It is perhaps not generally known that the medical students who formerly assembled in Philadelphia, spent, on an average, seven hundred thousand dollars ($700,000) in books, board, clothing, etc., in addition to the orders for goods obtained by others through them."

"THE PROMISE AND ITS FULFILLMENT," AGAIN.

Mr. Editor: The notice taken of the Catalogue of the "Judson," has brought out its Principal with considerable warmth and energy; for much of which I see no occasion. This sensitiveness and vehemency affords confirmation to my allegations.

Does Mr. Jewett intend to convey the impression that "Observer" had no ground to go upon—that he has written merely monitions! I understand him to put in a general denial of all and singular of the allegations made, viz: that there had been attempts at proselyting in that Institution; and that young ladies from Methodist families attending and boarding at the Judson, never attend the Methodist Church regularly, though they may be members of the Church. This is evidently what he intends the public shall understand him to do, though he does not venture to affirm such an attendance on the part of any boarder: he dare not do it. He takes refuge in the declaration that he does not violate the instructions of parents and guardians. This may be; I did not pretend to say what directions had been given, but I did say, and repeat it, that it is passing strange that no Methodist parent ever desired or expected his daughter to attend his own Church while at the Judson! Directions have not been given—they were rendered unnecessary by the volunteer proffer of the President, supposed to have been given in good faith. If directions have not been disregarded, expectations have been disappointed.

A few testimonies and facts will show that "Observer" had some ground to go upon, and that moderation would be becoming under the circumstances.

A letter from Marion informs me that "the prevalent opinion here is, that there is nothing stated by 'Observer' that is not strictly true." So, observing people in M. do not think with Mr. J. Information from that place says, further, that "no one here has any recollection of a single instance in which a girl who was a boarder at the Judson, has been a regular attendant at the Methodist Church;" and yet not a few were members of the Church! The reason of this will be inferred from the following statement of one who was formerly Pastor of the Methodist Church in Marion. He says: "I called on two young ladies there and asked them why it was that they never attended our Church. The reply was, that they did not like to ask for permission to do so, as they had once asked and been refused. And, besides, it was stated that none of the Teachers were willing to accompany them! They were both members of our Church." This statement could be substantiated by a dozen other testimonies. But young ladies who have boarded there, and who have given the facts to their friends, do not wish to appear before the public in the case. Yet "the instructions of parents and guardians on this subject have always been conscientiously and faithfully obeyed." As Mr. J. is so emphatic and punctilious, I hold him to the letter of this statement. Have, then, all these Methodist parents instructed you to take their daughters to the Baptist Church nine-tenths of the time! No sir. Their silence, the result of a misapprehension of your Catalogue, has been misconstrued by you, and here are your "instructions."

As Mr. Armstrong never has been introduced, I will just inform you that he employs his Teachers with the understanding that they are to attend other churches with the boarders wishing to go there. Does Mr. J.?

Mr. J. "spurns the insinuation with contempt" that efforts are made to proselyte pupils "to the Baptist faith." Very well; the conduct ought to be spurned as well as the "insinuation." On this point we have a few items to offer, as—

1. Among the text books of the Judson I find the works of Bonnard, Hague, Ripley, Malcomb, etc. Those gentlemen are all Baptists, I think. Is I ere no sectarianism in their works! and is it not very much like an attempt, to proselyte to teach this sectarianism?

2. Is there not a supply of "Jewett on Baptism," always about the Judson, and within the sight and reach of the pupils? Is it not furnished to them? And have not Methodist parents been displeased to find this work among their daughters' books when they returned from school? Yes sir.

3. Eight years since there was a revival in the Judson, and some members of Methodist families were among the converts. To them the importance of being baptised and of joining the Church at an early day, was mentioned more than once by Teachers in the Institution, while to the members of Baptist families nothing was said. So said the young ladies.

4. Romanists think it a successful way to proselyte, to furnish pupils with denominational books—keep before their eyes and minds the forms, opinions, and technicalities of their Church, and cut off all intercourse with those who differ from them.

I close this by affirming that the restrictions thrown around pupils at the Judson, and the means used to keep them under the operation of a denominational influence, are such as exist in no Methodist institution in the land.

SECTS BEFORE THE REFORMATION.

To Romanist writers, who say there were no disputes about religion at the time when the Reformation brought sects and heresies into the Church, Archbishop Whately replies:

"On the contrary, there never was such a swarm of sects in the world as then prevailed. Not to speak of Wycliffe, and Huss, and Jerome of Prague, and the Waldenses, who were endeavoring to reform the Church, there were strange sects, and heresies without end, such as have scarce ever been heard of since the Reformation—so wild in their opinions, and so abominable in their practice. There were Municheans, and Fratricelli, and Turlupins, and the Brethren of the Free Spirit, and the Apostolicals, and myriads more besides; and though the Church of Rome bestirred itself to the utmost to put down these sects by fire and sword, massacring them often by thousands at a time, yet it could never wholly root them out, because the ignorance of the people left them open to be imposed upon by crafty and fanatical teachers.

"Let not Roman Catholics, then, pretend that it is the reading of the Scriptures that has brought in wild and extravagant sects among us; they had a thousand times wilder sects among themselves long before the Reformation; and though we have different sects among us, yet our old extravagant sects have either soon become quiet and rational, or else quite disappeared; and the new ones do not, generally, rely on Scripture at all; but, like the Southcottians and Mormons, on new Revelations. Now, as for new Revelations, the Church which sanctions the Revelations of St. Bright, and St. Simon Stock, and St. Catherine, has no right to laugh at Protestants as enthusiasts when they talk of such things."

PERTINENT SAYINGS.

"A person," says Mr. Erskine, "who had been at public worship, having returned home perhaps somewhat sooner than usual, was asked by another of the family, who had not been there, 'Is all done?' 'No,' replied he, 'all is said, but all is not done.'"

Antonio Guevara used to say: "That Heaven would be filled with such as had done good works, and Hell with such as intended to do them." A very suitable hint to those who put off their convictions to what they think will be a more convenient season.

The Closing Verse. By T. Buchanan Read.

The North British Review pronounces this poem the best that has ever been written by an American author:

Within this sober realm of leafless trees,
The russet year inhaled the dreamy air,
Like some tanned reaper in his hour of ease,
When all the fields are lying brown and bare.

The gray barns, looking from their hazy hills
O'er the dim waters widening in the vales,
Sent down the air a greeting to the mills,
On the dull thunder of alternate flails.

All sights were softened, and all sounds subdued,
The hills seemed farther, and the streams sang low;
As in a dream, the distant woodman hewed

The embattled forests, erewhile armed in gold,
Their banners bright with every martial hue,
Now stood like some sad beaten host of old,
Withdrawn afar in Time's remorseless view.

The dove scarce heard his sighing mate's complaint,
The village church-vane seemed to pale and faint.

Crew thrice—and all was stiller than before—
Silent till some replying warder blew
His sounding horn, and then was heard no more.

Where erst the jay within the elm's tall crest
Made garrulous trouble round the unfledged young;
And where the oriole hung her swaying nest
By every light wind like a censer swung;

Where sang the noisy masons of the eaves,
The busy swallows, circling ever near,
Foreboding, as the rustic mind believes,
An early harvest and a plenteous year;

Where every bird which charmed the vernal feast
Shook the sweet slumber from its wings at morn,
To warn the reapers of the rosy east,
All now was voiceless, empty and forlorn.

Alone, from out the stubble piped the quail,
And crooked the crow through all the dreary gloom;
Alone the plaintive mourning of the dove,
Made echo to the distant cottage loom.

There was no bud, no bloom upon the bowers,
The spiders wove their webs around night by night;
The thistle-down was the only ghost of flowers,
Sailed slowly by—passed noiseless out of sight.

And where the woodbine sheds upon the porch
Her crimson leaves as if the year stood there,
Firing the floor with his inverted torch—

Amid all this, the centre of the scene,
The white-haired matron, with monotonous tread
Plied the task-wheel; and, with her joyless mien
Sat like a Fate, and watched the dying thread.

She had known sorrow. He had walked with her,
And in the dead leaves still she heard the stir

While yet her cheek was bright with summer bloom,
Her country summoned, and she gave her all,
He gave the sword, to rust upon the wall.

Re-gave the sword—but not the hand that drew
And struck for liberty the dying blow;
Nor him who to his sire and country true,
Fell 'mid the ranks of the invading foe.

Long, but not loud, the droning wheel went on,
Like the low murmurs of a hive at noon;
Long, but not loud, the memory of the gone
Breathed through her lips a sad and tremulous tune.

At last the thread was snapped, her head was bowed;
Life dropped the distaff through his hands serene;
And loving neighbors spanned her careful shroud,
While Death and Winter closed the autumn scene.

Anxieties of the Sailor's Life.

By the Rev. Mr. Abbot, of Nantucket.

A man was speaking a few days ago of the emotions with which he was overwhelmed when he bade adieu to his family on his last voyage. The ship in which he was to sail was at Edgartown on Martha's Vineyard. The packet was at the wharf which was to convey him from Nantucket to the ship. He went down in the morning and saw all his private sea-stores stored away in the sloop and then returned to his home to take leave of his wife and children. His wife was sitting at the fireside, struggling in vain to restrain her tears. She had an infant a few months old in her arms, and with her foot was rocking the cradle in which lay another little daughter about three years of age, with her cheeks flushed with a burning fever. No pen can describe the anguish of such a parting. It is almost like the bitterness of death. The departing father imprints a kiss upon the cheek of his child. Four years will pass away ere he will again take that child in his arms. Leaving his wife sobbing in anguish, he closes the door of his house behind him. Four years must elapse ere he can cross that threshold again. One sea captain upon this island has passed but seven years out of forty-one upon the land.

A lady said to me a few evenings ago, I have been married eleven years, and counting all the days my husband has been at home since our marriage, it amounts to but three hundred and sixty days. He is now absent, having been gone fifteen months, and two years must undoubtedly elapse before his wife can see his face again, and when he shall return, it will be merely a visit to his family for a few months, when he will again bid them adieu for another four years' absence.

I asked the lady the other day how many letters she wrote to her husband during his last voyage. "One hundred," was the answer. "And how many did he receive?" "Six." The inevitable rule is to write by every ship that leaves this port, or New Bedford, or any other port that may be heard of for the Pacific Ocean. And yet the chances are very small that may two ships will meet on this boundless expanse. It sometimes happens that a ship returns, when those on board have not heard one word from their families during the whole period of their absence. Imagine then the feelings of a husband and a father, who returns to the harbor of Nantucket, after the separation of forty-eight months, during which time he has heard no tidings whatever from his home. He sees the boat pushing off from the wharves which is to bring him the tidings of weal or woe. He stands pale and trembling, pacing the deck with emotions which he in vain endeavors to conceal. A friend in the boat greets him with a smile, and says, "Captain, your family are all well." Or perhaps he says, "Captain, I have heavy news for you: your wife died two years and a half ago."

A young man left this island last summer, leaving in his quiet home a young and beautiful wife, and infant child. The wife and child are now both in the grave. But the husband knows not, and probably will not know of it for some months to come. He perhaps falls asleep every night thinking of the loved ones left at his fire side, little imagining that they are both cold in death.

On a bright summer afternoon, the telegraph announces that a Cape Horn ship has appeared in the horizon, and immediately the stars and stripes of our national banner are unfurled from our flagstaff, sending a wave of emotion through the town. Many families are hoping that it is the ship in which their friends are to return, and all are hoping for tidings from the absent. Soon the name of the ship is announced. And then there is an eager contention with the boys to be the first bearer of the joyful tidings to the wife of the captain, for which service a silver dollar is the established and invariable fee. And who can describe the feelings which must then agitate the bosom of the wife? Perhaps she has heard no tidings from the ship for more than a year. Trembling with excitement, she dresses herself to meet her husband. "Is he alive?" she says to herself, "or am I a widow, and the poor children orphans?" She walks about the room, unable to compose herself sufficiently to sit down; eagerly is she looking out of the window and down the street. She sees a man with hurried step turn the corner, and a little boy hold of his hand. Yes, it is he. And her little son has gone down to the boat and found his father. Or, perhaps, instead of this, she sees two of her neighbors returning slowly and sadly, and directing their steps to her door. The blood flows back upon her heart. They rap at the door. All is the knell of her husband's death. And she falls senseless to the floor, as they tell her that her husband has long since been entombed in the fathomless ocean.

This is not fiction. These are not extreme cases which the imagination creates. They are facts of continued occurrence—facts which awaken emotions to which no pen can do justice.

A few weeks ago a ship returned to this island, bringing the news of another ship, that was nearly filled with oil, that all on board were well, and that she might be expected in a neighboring port in such a month. The wife of the captain resided in Nantucket, and early in the month, with a heart throbbing with affection and hope, she went to greet her husband on his return. At length the ship appeared, dropped her anchor in the harbor, and the friends of the lady went to the ship to escort the husband to the wife from whom he had been so long separated. Soon they sadly returned with the tidings that her husband had been seized with the coast fever upon the island of Madagascar, and when about a week out, on his return home, he died and was committed to his ocean burial. A few days after I called upon the weeping widow and little daughter in their deathed home of bereavement and anguish.

"Putting the Question."—British Parliament.

Although the old rule of turning strangers out of the House during the mystic process of division has been rescinded, it is with an exception as regards those who sit in the Speaker's Gallery, and who might cause inconvenience by getting among the members. So, that the declaration, "Strangers must withdraw," though in button fulmen for the strangers above, turns Ingenuous out. He must, therefore, hasten up stairs and watch the proceedings from the privileged gallery.

There is a sand-glass on the Speaker's table, and this is turned over when the debate concludes, and during the few minutes that the sand is running, members, duly warned, hurry up from the library, smoking-rooms, dining-rooms, and the Timons procrastinate, where, at high-water, and when the wind does not bring over the reek of those foul manufactories, a Senator's lounge is not unpleasant—the access series of the scene being the sparkling lights, dashing river, and a good cigar. The time is up; every body has been whipped in; and see how the bar is crammed, and how the far most ranks press forward to the center of the House. The Speaker orders the door to be closed. He then puts the question. Its form in mystic, as are many things here, but there is no great danger of a mistake, whippers in being alert, and members knowing the advantage of following their leaders. The proposal was that the Criminals' Enfranchisement bill should be read a second time. Sir F. Thesiger's amendment was, that instead of the words "a second time," there should be inserted "this day six months." The question is, whether the words proposed to be left out, namely, "a second time," shall stand. "Those who are of that opinion say, Ay."

"Those who are of a contrary opinion say, No."

"No!" comes in thunder from the Opposition, who have better lungs than the Ministerialists.

The Speaker then usually remarks: "I think the Ayes have it."

He is, however, instantly and flatly contradicted by various Noes, and, without contesting the point, exclaims: "The Ayes to the right, the Noes to the left."

All the members come down from their seats, and the floor is crowded. They are making their way slowly to the lobbies appropriated for them. The Speaker nominates two tellers on each side, whose business it is to ascertain the numbers—a couple of Government men, and the mover and seconder of the amendment. While the House is clearing, the four tellers linger and exchange jokes. A member in taking the opposite side to that of his party, and a teller calls after him that he is going the wrong way. A young gentleman with a large palatot has arrived in a Highland dress from some masked ball, and one of the four, as he passes, invites him to take off the palatot in order to delight the Speaker's eyes with a view of his costume. As soon as the House is reported clear, the tellers follow to do their work.

Now the members, having voted, begin to re-enter in single file, and return to their seats. A clerk in wig and gown goes to the Opposition green box to be ready to take the numbers. Sir Frederic Thesiger comes in, looking quite triumphant, walks up to the clerk and speaks—a sensation round the House, and then a tremendous Opposition cheer. Enter Mr. Hayter, the Secretary to the Treasury, not looking quite so well pleased, and he also approaches the clerk. The four tellers then form in line, and retire, backing. As they do so, their position indicates the victory. The right hand man of the four belongs to the winning side, and in that station is the tall form of Sir Frederic Thesiger. Another tremendous Opposition cheer, and the four go bowing up to the table, and Sir Frederic reads from a paper: "The Ayes to the right were 220, the Noes to the left 234." Terrific cheering—Government beaten by 14, and the Criminals' Enfranchisement bill lost.

For a few minutes business is suspended; members laugh over the victory and defeat, and ministers are seen in converse. Ingenuous may suppose that they are consoling one another under the painful catastrophe; but it is more probable that they are arranging what other business shall be taken that night. The door having been reopened, members depart, though so large a House usually leaves a pretty large fragment up to the time of adjournment.

Appearances After Death.—It frequently happens that the features of the dead retain their entire form and individual likeness for many years after burial. Experience, however, has proved that on exposure to the air, for some minutes, dust returns to dust again. The following circumstances occurred at the disinterment of the body of Robert Burns, the poet, some time in the year 1815, for the purpose of being entombed beneath a splendid monument.

A report having been spread that the principal coffin was made of oak, a hope was entertained that it would be possible to transport it from the north to the east corner of St. Michael's without opening it or disturbing the sacred deposit it contained. But this hope proved fallacious. On testing the coffin, it was found to be composed of the ordinary materials, and ready to yield to the slightest pressure, and the lid removed, a spectacle was unfolded which, considering the fame of the mighty dead, has rarely been witnessed by a single human being. There were the remains of the great poet, to all appearances nearly entire, and retaining various traces of vitality, or rather exhibiting the features of one who had newly sunk into the sleep of death—the lordly forehead arched high—and the teeth firm and white. The scene was so imposing that most of the workmen stood bare and uncovered, as Doctor Gregory did at the exhumation of the remains of the illustrious hero of Bannockburn, and at the same time felt their frames thrilling with some indefinable emotion as they gazed on the ashes of him whose fame is as wide as the world itself. But the effect was momentary; for when they proceeded to insert a shell or case below the coffin, the head separated from the trunk, and the whole body with the exception of the bones, crumbled into dust.

Lord Nugent, on unsealing the coffin containing the body of John Hampden, found it entire, after a burial of two hundred years! Even his features were preserved. His hair of raven blackness, came off at the touch of the hand, and then were discovered an infinite number of little red worms of great activity playing upon the cranium. No insects were found in any part of the body; as if the brain contained within itself a living principle which was engendered by its own corruption.

Yellow Fever in Vicksburg.—The Jackson Mercury learns from reliable authority that there were seven or eight new cases of fever in Vicksburg on Wednesday last. The Vicksburg Whig complains that the physicians do not report their cases to the Board of Health.

Christian Advocate.

Terms: $1 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7.

Rev. J. M. Hoyer, German Missionary, returned last week from a short tour among the Churches in Alabama. He speaks in the kindest terms of the reception given him by the brethren. His collections for the Mission Chapel will appear in the Report.

Congressional favors.—Judge Perkins, of La., has brought us under repeated obligations by his favors. The last is a bound copy of the Constitution.

We are pleased to see that Mr. H. D. McGinnis, sole proprietor of the Book Store, 36 Camp street, has returned from New York, where he has laid in a full supply of Books and Stationery.

Our new Bible House.—This building on Camp street is taking a goodly shape fast. Inside and out carpenters are pushing the work. It will soon be complete. We understand the Young Men's Christian Association have engaged the third story hall for their meetings.

Speaking of the house, reminds us of the good agent, Dr. Thweatt, by whose collections this cause has been forwarded. We have a letter from him, dated Minden, La., Sept. 18. He says: "I leave here to-morrow for Shreveport, on my way to Texas: hope to be in New Orleans by December. I have not been able to do any thing in my Agency since June. At Camden, Ark., I suffered a severe and protracted sickness. I owe a thousand thanks to numerous kind friends there, especially our Brother, Rev. W. P. Radcliffe and his excellent family, while confined in his house for two months. Heaven abundantly bless them."

No License.—A friend writing us from Minden, La., says: "On Saturday last, the 16th Sept., an election was held to decide the question of "License or No License," for the retail of "ardent spirits" within the corporate limits of the town of Minden. The result was a perfect triumph to the cause of Temperance. Out of sixty votes polled, forty-six went for "No License." So the days of "tippling" are numbered here. May the ball still roll over the State."

What would John Wesley Say?—A magnificent cathedral is about being erected in Washington by the Methodists. It is to be one of the most costly and elegantly finished church edifices on the Continent. [Philadelphia Ledger.

We guess he would say—be sure and pay for it. He would say, that as meanness is no part of worship and stinginess of piety, so a graceful and grateful magnificence is not, as a matter of course, indicative of impiety or irreligion. Is art to be forever wedded to heathenism? Never! John Wesley would say, "I forbid those bans."

Jesuits.—These politico-religious intriguers are edging their way into the South American States. A bill has been presented in the Chilian Senate to re-establish the Jesuits in that Republic, and it was sustained by fourteen votes. Much public interest seems to be manifested in the movement.

Rev. George Hastings, for many years Chaplain of the American Legation at Rome, died last week in Tennessee.

RIGHT SORT OF A SUBSCRIBER.

Newspaper prices have an upward tendency. Prices must go up or the papers go down. The proprietors of four of the Cincinnati dailies, namely, the Inquirer, Times, Commercial and Columbian, have changed the price of their respective papers, from ten to twelve cents per week. Reasons assigned, the increased expenses of labor, material, and the necessaries of life. The N. Y. Tribune has met the crisis by lessening its size. Not a few have been unable to meet it at all—they have stopped.

We have made no parade of words over the change of the Advocate. The thing had to be done. It was not a question of profits, but existence. And even now, our friends must be more prompt than some of them have been, in paying their dues, and Agents more active in collecting and forwarding funds, to enable us to maintain our ground. We will not, as the preacher is sometimes accused of doing, scold those who are at Church on account of those who are not; but with grateful remembrance of those who have done well, confine our allusions to those only who have failed to do so.

Thus far we have not had a single discontinuance in prospect of the increased price, nor heard a complaint. The following comes the nearest to complaining of any thing yet to hand. We wish we had six thousand such subscribers.

P. J. T. says: "I have been a subscriber from the first number until the present time, and always paid in advance." Clerk refers to his book and affirms the same. "I am now making arrangements to pull up my stakes and be off to the West. When I stop I will inform you of my post-office. Send me all the back numbers. I am sorry the subscription had to be raised, but I am in for it, and will send you the $2 before this volume is out, for the next."

THE NEW DISCIPLINE.

This quadrennially revised Book is before us, with the imprint of the new publishers. The print is larger, and there are 267 pages of this to 209 pages of the last edition. There has been a good deal of change in temporals, some in rituals, and none, of course, in doctrine. We think the Church will accept the difference as in favor of sound progress.

The section on Slavery will be missed and not regretted.

The constitution of Quarterly Conferences adds to the preachers, exhorters, stewards and class-leaders the superintendents of Sunday Schools. This introduces a useful set of men into that responsible body. It also recognizes the Sunday School as a part of the Church' machinery, and the work of Sunday Schools as the Church' work. This is in the right direction.

The directions on dress are few and Scriptural. Those quaint specialities about "high heads, enormous bonnets, ruffles and rings," are gone. Joy go with them.

Episcopal decisions have been reduced to order. They will not hereafter be given on supposable cases; if so, not binding. Questions to be proposed in writing; and they with the Bishop's decision to go on the Conference journals. Not to be published in papers until the Bishops have held their annual meeting; compared notes and settled on authoritative decisions; the digest to be published in such form as they direct. This will avoid any clashing, and give the Bishops' bench a distinct function.

The Ritual has been carefully purged of every word hinting at baptismal regeneration, in infants or adults. With what was done before, this work is now complete, though a good while in being done. In the Lord's Supper, the marginal directions as to manipulating the bread and wine, are left out. The Ordination of Bishops has been retouched. In the old ritual (the elected person kneeling) the Bishop and Elders imposed hands, saying—"Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Bishop in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands," etc. That form savored too strongly of Prelatical pretension; so it has been altered to an unambiguous supplication, as in the ordination of Elders—"The Lord pour upon thee the Holy Ghost for the office," etc.

A good many of these verbal reformations have been long meditated. On the last day of General Conference the Committee on Revisals were ready and ripe with their reports—Dr. Hamilton, chairman—and they were passed upon heartily. The animus of the liturgical reformation was to get as clear as might be of any thing like sacramentarianism.

Is it not a striking fact, that in the latter part of the last century Mr. Wesley compiled a liturgy and ritual for the Methodists in America from the Prayer Book of the Church of England. With the lights of sound experience and Scripture, our successive General Conferences have touched it here and there. It is now felt to be unexceptionable; not barren, not complicated, not ambiguous. We note here a striking coincidence, and leave the reader to his own reflection—There has been laid before the House of Commons a copy of the alterations proposed in the Book of Common Prayer by the Bishops and others appointed by the Crown to revise the Book of 1689. The alterations suggested by the commissioners were no less than 598 in number. Many, though decidedly improvements and quite unobjectionable, were merely of a verbal nature.

Methodism has silently worked out the "alterations" which the sounder portion of the Anglican Church, one hundred and fifty years ago, desired, but were prevented from adopting then as now by High-Church influence. Among the proposed alterations in the baptism of children, the words "by baptism regenerate," were displaced by the single word "regenerated."

The following from the Morning Herald will give the anti-Puseyite view of these proposed changes:—

"The Book of Common Prayer.—The daily organ of the Tractarian party is sorely annoyed at the appearance of a document which has strangely been permitted to repose for more than a century and a half in Lambeth Palace. It has now been printed by order of Parliament, and is accessible to the whole community at the charge of a few pence. It contains a "Copy of the Alterations in the Book of Common Prayer, prepared by the Royal Commissioners, A. D. 1689." On the accession of King William and Queen Mary, one of the first steps taken in order to bring back the Nonconformists into the bosom of the Church, was to appoint a Royal Commission "to prepare such alterations and amendments of the Liturgy and Canons as may be expedient." The Commissioners consisted of ten bishops, six deans, four professors, four arch-deacons, and six of the London clergy. And among them we find the names of Burnet, Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Patrick, Tenison and Beveridge. The result of their labors may well shock Tractarian nerves. These excellent men desired to regain the Nonconformists to the Church. Our modern Romanizers show no such desire; their apparent wish being to reunite the Church with Rome, but to keep as far as possible from the dissenters. In order to meet dissenting prejudices, the Commissioners of 1689, comprehending two who were afterwards Archbishops of Canterbury, agreed—

1. To exclude the Apocryphal lessons from the Church services.

2. To permit those to receive the sacrament without kneeling who scrupled to use that posture.

3. To allow the sign of the cross in baptism to be omitted in similar cases.

4. To remove all the Romish saints' days from the calendar.

5. To substitute the title "minister" for "priest" in many parts of the Book of Common Prayer.

6. In lieu of Benedicite omnia Opera Domine, to insert the 148th Psalm.

7. The rubric allowing the Litany to be sung, to be wholly struck out.

8. The title "most religious and gracious King," altered to "Sovereign."

9. The positive declarations in the Burial and Baptismal Services, greatly modified.

10. In the Ordination Service, the imperative mood "receive the Holy Ghost," altered into a prayer "that he may," etc.

Here were, indeed, enough of alterations to fill the soul of a Bennett or a Liddell with horror. Yet it may be conceived possible that those who gravely proposed these amendments—the Burnets, Beveridges, Patricks and Stillingfleets—will be remembered by the Church with honor when the very names of Bennett and Liddell are forgotten.

This publication, however, places the question of Liturgical Revision in a new point of view. Hitherto, owing to the oblivion into which the movements of 1689 had fallen, those who in our time ventured to suggest that some few phrases in the Prayer Book might be modified with advantage, have been treated as disloyal sons of the Church—as men who were at heart dissentors. But the fact is now made public to all the world, that a commission of ten bishops, six deans, four arch-deacons, etc., has already taken this matter in hand, and has seriously prepounded a larger and wider scheme than any reformer of our day has ventured to contemplate. No longer, then, may the Tractarians revile those who dare to propose something less than a whole board of bishops and learned divines have long since positively recommended. On the contrary, we may say, that this important and timely publication makes it at least probable that before any very long time has elapsed, a portion at least of the recommendations of Beveridge, Burnet and Stillingfleet will actually be adopted."

A. B. C. F. M.—ABOLITIONISM.

By the Report of the Treasuror of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, made at its forty-fifth annual meeting, lately held in Hartford, it appears that "the entire expenditures of the Board for the year were $322,141 92; and their receipts $310,099 43—debt $12,042 49." These figures naturally excite anxiety in all our Missionary Societies, lest they too fall behind in footing up the current year. We hope the friends our own (especially the preachers who are the collectors) will improve the few days yet remaining to them before the balance sheet is struck.

During the last thirty-two years the annual receipts of the Board have risen from $60,000 to $300,000; and the total receipts of the Board from $100,000 to $6,000,000. It is supported mainly by Congregationalists and Presbyterians (the latter mostly New School.) For the intelligence and compassing sweep of the direction of its Missions abroad, as also their success, this Board has ranked front. Its home work or truly American, has not amounted to much. Much has not been attempted.

It seems from the minutes of this last meeting, that the New England Anti-Nebraska Abolition party of pulpit politicians have got this Society thoroughly into their hands. The conservatism that remained and for several years has feebly characterized its management, offended the ultras, and they got up, and have been sustaining the American Missionary Board. But the great A. B. C. F. M. has been brought over; the A. M. B. will, doubtless, be merged.

The Board came face to face with the subject of Slavery, in the Report on the Choctaw Mission. Rev. Mr. Treat, one of its Secretaries, wrote a letter of instruction, 1848, to its Missionaries there employed. The main points of the letter are—That domestic slavery is "at war with the rights of man and opposed to the principles of the Gospel." Also, that the Gospel, which is opposed to slavery, must be preached in all its requirements, and that the time for such declaration by the Choctaw Mission has come, though it might not have been prudent to do this in the early days of the Mission; that it "might be proper to say little or nothing" about the "legitimate bearing of the Gospel upon slavery" when the Mission was weak, but now that it has "gained a strong hold upon the Choctaw nation," the Missionaries should speak out upon the subject. Further, that converts among slaveholders, after being conversed with upon the subject by the Missionary, voluntarily remaining "involved in a system that is unchristian and sinful," may not be admitted to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

It appears the agents of the Board have been carrying out these instructions. This led the Choctaw Council in November last to protective legislation on the subject:

"The Council enacted laws, one of which forbids that any slave, or the children of slaves, shall be taught to read or write at any school or academy in the nation, by any person whomsoever, or connected in any manner whatever, either a superintendent, missionary, teacher, farmer, matron, pupil, or otherwise, with any school or academy in the nation, under pain of dismissal from such school and removal out of the nation, in case the person offending is not a citizen of the Choctaw nation."

Another provision of the same law is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the General Superintendent and Trustees of schools to be vigilant in the performance of their functions, and promptly remove, or report to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for removal, according to the nature of the contract between the Choctaw nation and the different Boards of Missions having charge of public schools and academies, any and all persons who may be connected therewith, who is or are known to be Abolitionists, or who disseminate, or attempt to disseminate, directly or indirectly, abolition doctrines, or any other fanatical sentiments, which in their opinion are dangerous to the peace and safety of the Choctaw people."

The Board heretofore staved off this subject, referring it to the Prudential Committee. But the Committee, backed by the present abolition spirit, and having the Board in the heart of New England, hemmed in by its sentiment, refused to bear the responsibility longer and threw it upon them.

The A. B. C. F. M. endorsed the Treat letter, by a vote of 58 to 19.

Of course great rejoicings in Abolition dom! We need not argue before our readers, the unsound and unscriptural position this body has suffered itself to be put into. So acted not the Saviour, nor his apostles, nor his disciples. By doggedly meddling with a disputed point (slavery) they cut themselves off from an undisputed duty (preaching the Gospel). For they say expressly in the report adopted, referring to the legislation of the Choctaw Council:

"These provisions, it should be remarked, do not restrict the missionaries in their preaching. They are still permitted to declare the whole counsel of God, on all subjects and to all individually, without any interference by legislation or otherwise; neither are we authorised to affirm that any such interference is contemplated."

But, if the American Board's Missionaries can not teach, they shall not preach! French brandy and Romanism were offered to the Sandwich Islanders. The Choctaws are offered a purer Gospel and Abolitionism. Both, or nothing. This is a stretch of prerogative. Perhaps conscience, ingenious as elastic, may consider this compensated for in the increased energy of their protest against slavery.

The schools must now be abandoned though established at much cost, and prospering. The Church disappears. The people, slaves and all, live unbaptised and die unblest. The Nation rests under an anathema!! So it would be if Abolitionists had their way. What is it all about?—Why the Church (!) has come in conflict with the State. Produce the Church's Charter. Does it cover the American Board's position? It does not. Produce the Lord Jesus' instructions to his missionaries. Do they agree with Mr. Treat's? No—but this is a progressive age.

Revival Intelligence.

Homer, La. Con.—We have been engaged for the last five or six weeks in protracted meetings in Homer and the adjoining neighborhoods. The displays of divine power in this work of God are greater than we have ever before seen in this country, or witnessed in any place since our boyhood. During the time above named, we received in Capt. Coleman's neighborhood (just organized) twenty-one members on probation, and fourteen professed conversion. At Walnut Grove received twenty-three; about the same number professed faith: a number of blacks received. At Philips' house (just organized) received twenty-three; the number that professed religion something over that: a number of blacks added to the Church. At Forest Grove about twenty joined the Church, and thirty-five or more found favor with God. The accessions at Homer between thirty-five and forty; those who professed to find peace not quite so great.

During this time other places have shared to some extent in this gracious visitation. Since the first of August our accessions to the Church, besides blacks, have been not less than a hundred and thirty, and that number or more have professed to obtain pardon: a few received by letter also.

Our Church is greatly strengthened, builded up and rejoiced. All render thanks, giving to God the glory for his wonderful goodness: and, from the signs before us, expecting greater things. Bless the Lord for his great mercies.

Macon Ct., Ala. Con.—This is a pleasant work of ten appointments. We have had refreshing seasons at five of them, and anticipate one at the others in their turn. Have received seventy-eight whites and twenty-five colored (not included in this mission) on probation, during the last seven weeks.

May the Lord more abundantly revive his work among us.

Sept. 19. William Vaughan.

New Iberia Ct., La. Con.—There are some signs of life in New Iberia Circuit. Over and above the general interest, we have occasional accessions to the Church marked with courage and resolution.

We were not favored with the presence and labors of our Pres. Elder at the third quarterly meeting, and were sorry to learn that the disappointment was caused by the death of his horse on the way. Had a large congregation—a number of weeping penitents, and four accessions.

On the 16th and 17th inst. we had a two days' meeting in New Iberia: Bro. Cravens was with us. Had fifteen accessions, and some of them men of influence, that will, I trust, do themselves credit and the Church valuable service. Would have protracted our meeting but for the unfavorable state of the weather.

We were interested and profited by the labors of Bro. Cravens, and look upon him as no inconsiderable embodiment of Itinerant Methodist Preacher—energy and efficiency. His bold style of preaching is opportunely calculated to arouse from the slumbers of a dead formality to a life of faith and zeal.

Sept. 21. Samp. Hawes.

Hillsboro Ct., Miss. Con.—We have had several good meetings on our circuit within the past four weeks, and have just closed one at White Plains, Newton county, which lasted eleven days. The power of the Holy One was with us during the whole progress of the meeting, and the work of the Lord went gloriously on. We regard this as a special victory gained in one of the enemy's strongholds. The membership at White Plains numbered just six—a faithful, chosen band, whose strong cries and tears went up to God and entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabbaoth. In answer to their prayer and faithfulness, we have had many bright conversions, several backsliders reclaimed, and thirty-four accessions to the Church. We are much indebted to Bros. Tiner and M'Curdy for their efficient labors during the course of the meeting.

Sept. 15. Edwin Mortimer.

Covington Dist., Miss. Con.—Rev. J. Lusk, P. E., writes, Sept. 18th: "Most parts of the district appear to be in a prosperous condition. I think there will be a decided increase on the report of last Conference. The accounts I hear from many circuits are truly encouraging."

Centra Ct., Ala. Con.—We hear of a strong and sustained work of grace in this circuit, with special reference to the spirituality of the membership. Most of the accessions of last year's revival prove firm. The pastors write:

"Within the last two months we have received ninety members; and there have been as many conversions. There is an awakening influence throughout the whole circuit. To God be all thanks and all the glory, 'for He hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad.' John W. Braxson,

Revival in Tuskegee.—"Our town has at length been visited by a most gracious outpouring of the Spirit of God. Meetings are held night and day at both the Methodist and Baptist Churches. Within the last week not less than thirty conversions have occurred at the Baptist Church. The meeting has been in progress at the Methodist Church something over two weeks. We have not learned the number of conversions, but presume that they are equal to those which have occurred at our Church. On last Sabbath we had the pleasure of baptising fourteen into the fellowship of the Church. Others are standing over until next Sabbath, and still others are expecting to unite with the Church soon. The meetings at both Churches still continue with unabating interest."

Montgomery, Ala.—The Weekly Mail of the 28th ult. reports: "The revival still continues at the Methodist Episcopal Church. Much interest is yet manifested; there being on last evening, Sunday, quite a large number at the altar, asking an interest in the prayers of the Church. The congregation was unusually large, more than could be comfortably seated in their large and capacious new church edifice. Such a congregation, after so long a continuance of the revival, certainly betokens a degree and generality of interest that is quite unusual, even under such circumstances. The sermon on the occasion was delivered by Rev. H. W. Hilliann, from the language of Paul to the Romans: "For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, how much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." It was shown that all who have not been renewed by grace, were in a state of revolt and rebellion against the Prince of peace, and that all such were exposed to the dangers and horrors held in reservation for the ungodly and finally impenitent. To reconcile and make possible the salvation of all so revolting against the dominion of him to whom the right of scepter belongs, the only plan had been adopted which infinite wisdom could devise, making him just and yet the justifier of the ungodly. The plan adopted, continued the reverend speaker, was clearly revealed in the Gospel, and was argumentatively shown by the Apostle in his letter to the Romans, to be, by a principle of faith and not by the law of works, the Jewish ritual, as some of the members of the Church at Rome seemed to suppose. None are saved because they are, according to the flesh, the descendants of Abraham, nor by the observance of the ceremonial law, imposed under the Jewish dispensation; but because of faith in the atoning blood of our Lord Jesus Christ are we ransomed from death and an everlasting banishment from the Majesty on high. Being saved by the death of Christ, when we were enemies to God, aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, even without hope and without God in the world, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life. The God whom we adore, love and worship, has life and a power that overrules all in heaven and earth, and if He be for us, who can be against us. The sermon was concluded with an exhortation, full of zeal, earnestness and love, to his unconverted hearers to make haste and secure the friendship of him who controls the destinies of the world, and who so loved us that while we were yet enemies, he died for us."

The Southern Sun, Miss., 23d ult., gives this item:—

Liberty Chapel Camp Meeting.—We find ourself under the necessity of rendering an apology to our readers this week for the meagerness of our editorial columns; and we trust our excuse will be regarded as amply sufficient when we announce the fact that we have been for several days away from our "sanctum" in attendance of the Methodist Camp Meeting at Liberty Chapel, and our only regret is that we are not there now enjoying the society of our friends and hearing the eloquent and instructive sermons delivered by the different talented ministers present, of whom there is a number in attendance. Among these names we remember were Rev. Mr. Woodward, Wiggins, Shrock, Harrington, Clark and Rainy—all displaying commendable zeal in the "good cause." The meeting was attended by large numbers, and especially on Saturday, Sunday and Monday, all of whom found a hospitable reception in the tents of those who were encamped on the ground. Among these who were tented on the Camp-ground, and who spared no pains or exertions to make welcome and happy their visitors, we can not omit the names, among others, of Messrs. John A. Warson, J. C. Lucas, James Woodward, and James Mathis, whose hospitalities were largely enjoyed and bountifully bestowed. We have much reason to hope that the meeting has been productive of great good. On Sunday night and Monday night, crowds pressed into the altar for prayer. Great and intense excitement prevailed! Many who before had joined the Church as merely probationers, rejoiced in the hope of "sins forgiven," and some who before had manifested no concern about religion, were aroused to the importance of the subject and made to rejoice in Hope! We are not apprised of the number who professed religion, but think it considerable, and have no doubt it will still increase. We can only wish that such meetings may often occur and be as happily managed and as profitable and happy in their results as the Camp Meeting at Liberty Chapel has been.

Holmes' Ct., Miss.—It affords us matter of gratitude to be able to inform you that we have an interesting religious state on the Holmes' Circuit. During the last month or two we have had an addition of some eighty members to our Church, many of them very substantial citizens; and most of them gave satisfactory evidence of sound conversion. I am greatly indebted to Prest. T. C. Thornton for his aid at several of my meetings; also to that ancient servant of God and the Church, Peter James, and J. H. Stone, a local preacher, with others. In all the course of my ministry, I have never witnessed such entire order and gentlemanly deportment as have been observed at my protracted meetings. I have the honor of occupying a most interesting and important field of labor, and have spent a very agreeable, and, I trust, a profitable year. I have one more round to make on my circuit.

P. S.—While writing, permit me to say that Bro. T. C. Rayner, a local preacher in the bounds of my circuit, commenced a meeting on the border of my work where there has never been any preaching, or but very little; and in a week or two had forty or more members and conversions, with subscription to build a good Church. Bro. Rayner goes in for building on his own foundation. J. M.

Minden, La.—You will certainly be pleased to learn that the work of God is prospering in this portion of our State. We have lately had very interesting times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, both on the Minden and Jackson Circuits. A week ago we closed our camp meeting at Bossier Point, which resulted in the conversion of some fourteen souls, and eleven accessions to the Church; at the same place held a Missionary Meeting, and after addresses delivered by the Rev. Joel Sanders, P. E., and your humble servant, we took a collection amounting to ninety-two dollars, including four life memberships to our parent society. I have just returned from Sparta Camp-Meeting, (Jackson Circuit.) At this meeting the Lord visited us with power; a more thorough and powerful revival I scarcely ever witnessed; the old as well as the young were alike benefitted. Fifty-six professed the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ, and forty-three connected themselves with our Church, and some few professed the blessing of entire sanctification. The preachers are all at their posts, and laboring for the promotion of God's glory, and the salvation of souls.

Our membership is waking up; class and prayer meetings are well attended; and the word of God is producing a revolution throughout this entire community. The Lord's name be praised. The New Orleans Christian Advocate was not forgotten; our old and valued friend, Col. King, secured you some twenty paying subscribers, by a very little effort. The list of names and money will be forthcoming.

Butler Ct., Ala.—We are having some seasons of grace in this Circuit. I think within the last two months there has been between eighty and one hundred conversions; besides our Baptist and Protestant brethren are having a good work. We are trying to do something in the way of Sunday Schools, but the difficulty of procuring books hinders greatly. This is a large circuit, and hitherto sparsely populated, though it is filling up rapidly. There is plenty of territory for two circuits, and ought to be so arranged the next year. On some parts of the circuit we have done but little, but we are still trying. Pray for us. Thos. Killough.

September 22, 1854.

Farmerville Ct., La.—Rev. E. W. Griswold, pastor, writes, September 21:

"I send you half a dozen new subscribers under the $2 arrangement, some of the effects of a good meeting lately held. On my last round, 7th inst., I closed a six days' meeting at Tennessee appointment, with eight conversions among the whites and accessions; also eight accessions among the blacks, and several conversions."

OCTOBER MAGAZINES.

Harper is freshly to hand, and the contents invite. The staple articles of this Magazine have been strong and unmasked in favor of Protestantism and the Biblical interest, not to mention its geographical and scientific contributions to the general intelligence. The making up of its "Current Events" is understood to be by Mr. Raymond, editor of the N. Y. Times. This has done its Southern circulation damage. Not that ability is wanting, but the genius loci rules the writer, and that evidently and offensively.

Putnam is as neat a specimen of typography as one could wish; but Putnam is done for in the South, and he "done it" himself. Leaving the purview of a literary publication, this Magazine has gone into free-soil politics. We have these last two from McGinnis, 36 Camp street.

Graham and Godey—Blackwood, (September.) Have'nt we a bill of fair to sit down to?

Death of a Roman Catholic Bishop.—Francis Xavier Gartland, died at Savannah, last month. He was the first Roman Catholic Bishop of Savannah, and was formerly pastor of St. John's Church, Philadelphia. He was born in Dublin in 1808.

Benevolent Institutions.—The revenues received during the past year by the various religious societies having their center of operations in London, amounted to about six millions two hundred and eighty-four dollars.

Missionary Reports.

To the Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Arcola and Cottonwood Mission, Alabama Conference.

The statistics of the above Mission for the Third Quarte shows some improvement: one hundred and nine have been received on probation: four by letter: baptised, one hundred and fifty-four adults, and twenty-one children: died, four; expelled, six.

Of those that died I would say, "We have good hopes that some at least, if not all (and we have no reason to fear that all did not die right) now rest from their labors," "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

We are frequently struck with the change that often takes place in the character of the black man's religion in the estimation of some masters and overseers, when death lays his body in the tomb, and removes his spirit to its resting-place beyond the grave. Previous to this event, one would suppose from their conversation that they had no confidence either in Cuffy's religion, or in the effort of the Church to save his soul. But now he is gone, they speak of his redeeming traits, the charge for the better in his character, the mantle of charity is thrown over his weaknesses and foibles, and the strong conviction is that he has gone to Heaven.

Yes, he has gone to Heaven! And, bless God, if all concerned will do their duty in the premises, many more of this portion of the race will be among the redeemed in the day of God Almighty.

Provincial Council.—Archbishop Hughes has summoned a council of the Bishops of his province, and the heads of religious orders to assemble at the cathedral on the first Sunday in October. This call brings together many Bishops and "heads." The papers guess that the important business is about the Know-Nothings.

The death of Bishop Wainwright, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, occurred in New York city, September 21. He was elected Provisional Bishop during the great excitement which prevailed two years ago in regard to Bishop Onderdonk. His age was sixty-one years. He was a plain, unostentatious, and laborious man. Onderdonk though convicted we believe of gross immoralities at the time, is still in the receipt from the Church of some $2,500 per annum.

EDITORS AT PLAY.

The editors of two Baptist papers amuse their readers and tickle their own vanity with a game of battle-door and shuttle-cock. It is edifying, very. The Recorder, is of Kentucky, the Tennessee Baptist, of Nashville:

"It strikes us with some surprise that Methodists in Kentucky are not favored with a single Advocate, while their brethren in Tennessee are blessed with three only." [Western Recorder.

"Those familiar with the Tennessee Baptist, are at no loss to divine. They will yet need another paper, besides the "Southern Book Concern." [Tennessee Baptist.

"A few months ago, we had a Methodist Advocate and the Methodist "Southern Book Concern," in Kentucky. We have neither at this time, and perhaps never shall have again. They have retreated to a more healthful climate and a more congenial soil. Now unto us or the Western Recorder, but unto the Lord be the praise and the glory now and world without end. Amen.", [Western Recorder.

New Mexico.—The Santa Fe Gazette, 23d ult., implores Government protection, in additional troops. The old last enemy of American civilization is pressing sorely upon them:

"The situation of New Mexico is one of extreme peril, and we are almost at the mercy of the murderous savage tribes that surround us on every side. We have within our limits about thirty thousand wild Indians, among the fiercest and most cruel of all the North American tribes. They roam throughout the extent of the Territory at their pleasure, and can, at any moment, pounce down upon the unprotected settlements and murder the inhabitants, or carry them into captivity.

On the East, the entire frontier, from the peaks of the Rocky Mountains to the line of Texas, is without protection, and the settlements are daily in danger of being cut off by the savage hordes that swarm along the region. The northern, western and southern frontiers are in a similar situation, but more exposed than on the east. Now, for the protection and security of the whole Territory both in peace and war, there are two regiments of troops of all arms. They occupy several posts in different sections of the country, and one or two companies at a place, and are so remote from each other, that there is no possibility of their concentrating in case of emergency, and acting in concert."

The Gazette gives an item of religious interest—"The Rev. Mr. Talhurst and wife and wife's sister, who came passengers in the July mail, left Santa Fe Tuesday last, for Zuni, in company with the Rev. Mr. Shaw. It is contemplated to establish a Baptist Mission at this point, which will be under the charge of these two gentlemen."

BEGINNINGS OF GREAT THINGS.

As one traces back great things to their beginnings, he is admonished—Despise not the day of small things. It is the part of practical philosophy, its greatest reach, to recognize the germ of greatness, the capacity for development. An interesting history could be written by searching out and describing, with life-like minuteness, the men, the impulses, the places, the times where were originated every one of those benevolent institutions that shaped the moral world.

Such a life is the best comment upon her profession. Only a few moments before she was called away, she asked if she "could live!" she was told, "If certain conditions could obtain in her case, she could." To which she replied: "I can not live; I will soon—very soon—be in a camp-meeting in Heaven that will have no end!" And, although her pulseless arm and icy sweat indicated approaching death, her strength and voice seemed to return, and with a countenance lit up as it were by the Light of Heaven, she shouted and praised God!

Notices.

To Members of the Alabama Conference.

BRETHREN: It is due to all, and important to some of our body, to have it known that at the last meeting of the Trustees of the Centenary Institute a change was made relative to Beneficiaries. Two years since, when Dr. Mitchell took the entire charge of the Institution he agreed to receive and instruct all the children of Traveling Ministers sent there, upon condition of receiving the due proportion of the Educational Collection, thus making that collection seem to be taken up for his benefit, though it was really for the benefit of the Trustees charged with furnishing gratuitous instruction to this class. This plan was found to be attended with inconveniences, and at the late meeting it was rescinded; the Trustees agreeing to pay for all such pupils, both male and female, and receive the collection. Thus, all ground of delicacy and objection, which might exist in the former arrangement, has been removed; and the Trustees have assumed a responsibility, which makes it important that this collection be laid before all our congregations, and its bearing and importance explained. Will brethren bear this in mind, and not suffer the Board to become embarrassed in carrying out the wishes of the Conference.

September 26. J. HAMILTON.

To Preachers of Mississippi Conference.

DEAR BRETHREN: The Mississippi Conference, as you are aware, will convene in Jackson, La., on the 8th day of November next.

Those Preachers who come by water will land at Bayou Sara, where they will find, on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, private conveyances to bring them to Jackson, a distance of twelve miles, without charge.

Those who come by land will find arrangements made for keeping their horses during the Conference.

On arriving at Jackson, you will please call at Dr. JONES' Drug Store, from whence you will be conducted to your lodgings.

Oct. 4, 1854. A. T. M. FLY.

Board at Centenary Institute, Alabama.

Board is twelve dollars per month, including washing. Some, persons, perhaps, are asking more, but they are such as do not wish boarders. I hold myself responsible to provide board for all that come at twelve dollars, and as good board as this place or the surrounding country can afford; and if any give more, it is because they prefer it greater to a less price.

A. H. MITCHELL,
Oct. 3. Pres't. of Cent'y. Inst.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

On and after the 1st November next, the subscription price of the New Orleans Christian Advocate will be $2 per annum in advance; if payment be delayed six months, $2 50; at the end of the year, $3.

After a fair and full experiment of two years, it is ascertained that the paper can not be supported at $1 50 per annum. This will be to all our friends and patrons, and to every reasonable person, a sufficient cause for the change. In labor and material there has been a change to higher rates. The price of printing is now 25 per cent. higher in this city than it was a year ago.

This arrangement has the unanimous recommendation of the Publishing Committees. It puts the New Orleans Advocate at the same rates with the family of Advocates, and cheap still.

General Intelligence.

QUARANTINE AT WOODVILLE, MISS.—The town council at Woodville, on the 13th ult., established a quarantine of twenty-one days against all persons coming from places where the yellow fever prevails, and of five days exposure in the open air against all goods, etc., from such places. The penalty for a violation of the ordinance is $50 fine, and imprisonment for ten days. A committee of five physicians was appointed a Board of Health, and a constabulary force employed to enforce the quarantine regulation.

From a statement furnished by the New York Journal of Commerce, it appears that, since the middle of May last, 12,621 persons have died in that city; of which number 2263 were from cholera, against 5015 that died from the same malady during the corresponding period in 1849.

ANOTHER PHILADELPHIA AND NEW ORLEANS PACKET.—A new clipper bark, called the Chas. B. Truitt, of over four hundred tons, was launched at Port Richmond on the Delaware, a few days ago. She is owned by Messrs Heron & Martin, of Philadelphia, and intended for their line of New Orleans packets.

RESUSCITATION BY WATER.—Under this head the Louisville Courier notices the saving of the lives of three men who had become apparently lifeless in a foul well, from the happy forethought of a man who poured down a cask of water in a stream. The press should have long ago made the fact public, (as it is well established) that water poured into a foul well will produce the effect above described.

FRAUD IN COAL.—The manner of selling and delivering coal in cities, is a matter that is exciting some attention. As the custom is, the purchaser possesses no means of determining whether he has good weight of measure, having to rely entirely on the honesty of the seller and his employees. The Boston Advertiser, speaking on the subject, says:

It is the practice, we understand in England, to send the coal to the purchaser in large bags, made of some stout material adapted to the purpose. The bag is intended to contain a given weight, say 200 pounds—a pair of scales is sent with the load of coal, and the purchaser, if he pleases, can weigh every bag; but he generally contents himself with weighing one or two taken at a venture out of the wagon load.

The City Council of Columbus, Georgia, have lately offered a subscription of $100,000 towards inducing the people of Eufaula, Ala., to connect with that city by uniting with the Mobile and Girard Road. To this proposition the Mayor of Eufaula has replied that it has been duly considered, and its purport submitted to the citizens generally—and that the people of Eufaula and county of Barbour, have been discussing for the last three years the subject of a railroad and the most advantageous route to Savannah, to advance and maintain the true interests of the town and county, and surrounding country, and such is the unanimity of our people in favor of a direct communication via Americus, that the proposed route by Columbus receives no favor whatever.

The New York Star says that it should be known to every suttler that late changes in the laws have modified their rights in the settlement of their accounts somewhat. The regulations of the War Department, (par 195, et seq.,) edition of 1841, gave facilities to the sutlers in the collection of debts due them from soldiers. But the eleventh section of the act of March 3, 1847, abrogates the regulations on this subject, and since that act a sutler can not acquire a lien on any part of a soldier's pay, by furnishing supplies to him; nor has he any right to demand payment of the debt from the Paymaster on the soldier's account. The sutler now stands in these respects on the same ground as any other citizen.

The Angel Gabriel, who was arrested in Philadelphia a few days ago, when taken before Mayor Conrad made a statement, in which he said that he had supposed, as Independence Square was a place for the holding of public meetings, he had a right to speak there. The Mayor said that what might be a trifling matter under one state of circumstances, under another would assume a very grave character.—With a knowledge of the result that had attended the speaking of the prisoner in other places, he could not permit such fearful experiments to be made within the bounds of his jurisdiction. He was in duty bound to preserve the peace of the city, and he would do it at all hazards. He should require the prisoner to enter into bonds in $1000 for his future good behavior. Orr said that he would leave the city in the morning if the Mayor desired it; and the Mayor replied that whenever he had assurance that he would leave the city, he should be liberated. The Angel, it is said, was seen strolling about the streets of Baltimore the next day.

Mr. Deville, whose discoveries in relation to aluminum have recently created quite a stir in the scientific world, has for a long time been engaged in the preparation of a work upon the pure metals, produced and melted by processes of his own. In the course of his researches he has discovered that two metals nickle and cobalt possess, contrary to the general belief, the useful properties of malleability and ductility in a very remarkable degree, and also an extraordinary tenacity, far superior to that of iron, which has hitherto been supposed to possess this quality more perfectly than any of the metals. From M. Vertheim's experiments on wires of equal diameter made of iron, nickel, and cobalt, it appeared that the weights which determined the rupture of the several wires were respectively as the numbers 60 for iron, 90 for nickel, and 115 for cobalt. This would establish for cobalt a tenacity almost double that of iron.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL.—Among the many nostrums that are daily heralded forth to the public as panaceas for nearly all the ills which afflict humanity, there are, no doubt, many entirely worthless, and others that possess all the merit which is claimed for them. Among this latter class stands foremost the invaluable family medicine the name of which heads this paragraph. This is no idle puff. We speak knowingly, having tested its efficacy on several occasions within the last year, in our own family. At this season, when colds and influenza are so prevalent, we confidently recommend the free use of this preparation. It will be found equally efficacious in diseases of the throat, and in all pulmonary affections. [Virginia Recorder, Buchanan, Va

The Mayor's Message.

The Message which was communicated to the City Council Tuesday evening by the Mayor is a document of very considerable local importance. It touches upon, at least, two topics that closely affect the welfare of our citizens and the interests of our city, and that deserve to be carefully and coolly considered before they are acted upon. We refer to the recommendations for remodeling the Fire and Police Departments.

The recommendations are in both instances radical, and the changes advised of a character that would abrogate all existing arrangements and replace them with new.

The Message says that "the system on which our Fire Department is based is defective, and there is no reason why the lives and property of our citizens should be in the hands of an irresponsible department, composed of volunteers. . . . The absence of proper control and direction of the Fire Department was glaringly manifest, on the occasion of the late (August) fire. Much valuable labor was thrown away uselessly on that occasion from the want of proper direction and combined action, showing the necessity for the creation of a competent and skillful person as Chief Director of the Department."

The Message assumes three things concerning the Fire Department: first, that it is defective as it is; secondly, that a regularly organized and paid body would be an adequate remedy; and lastly that a Chief Director is needed in either case. We do not feel altogether satisfied of the correctness of the first opinion. There are errors, faults and defects appertaining to the Fire Department, beyond a doubt, but whether they are not such as can be pruned from it without an entire rooting out is a matter for deliberation. Our firemen are certainly prompt in their appearance when summoned to duty, and no one can contest their courage and activity when engaged. There are defects incident to all such organizations; defects that none of all the arrangements tried by other cities have been able to eradicate. We suffer as little from them as any place. We seldom have firemen's fights; people are not insulted in passing engine houses, and the proportion of boys running with the machines is very small and might be reduced to nothing. A paid department could undoubtedly be enlisted, but is the city in condition to pay it? With some millions of dollars of bonds going a begging; with heavy debts and heavy taxes, are we prepared to incur any expenses not immediately and absolutely necessary? It is a practical question, and one that, to our thinking, should determine the whole subject. The recommendation of a Chief Director of the Department we consider eminently proper and expedient. As it is, Companies are left to their own judgment in choice of place and time of playing on the fire, which ought to be remedied.

We agree with the Mayor also in his remarks concerning a steam fire engine. It has been tried and approved in Cincinnati; St. Louis has ordered one, and other cities taken measures to secure them. They would probably be more available and of greater use here than elsewhere. There are no necessities to be surmounted, and during the hot weather there is a sun which wilts men like weeds, but would be ineffectual upon machinery. Let the proposal be examined.

In order that the police of a city should be efficient, it is essentially necessary that it constitute one body, directly under one head and control, and amenable to that head for its acts.

As at present organized, the police force of this city is divided and local. There does not exist in its composition that consolidated and uniform spirit of obedience to its constituted head which is vitally necessary for the proper government of a body of men; the spirit of insubordination is too rife in its midst. This difficulty must inevitably exist to a greater or less degree so long as the present system of appointment is preserved. The police should be organized on a different footing altogether. It should be the police of a consolidated city, and not a district one; there should be but one head to it, who should be held responsible for its acts; the rank and file should be better paid, and more stringent formalities required from parties desirous of becoming members.

The propriety also under certain exigencies, of arming the force, merits due consideration; at present the law forbids their being armed. In cases like those which have recently occurred it is hardly fair to require unarmed men to muzzle up and quell a mob or riot, and be met by an array of deadly weapons in the hands of their opponents.

We are inclined to agree more entirely with the Mayor's recommendation and opinions concerning the Police than concerning the Fire Department. The late riots, as well as many other occurrences, have sufficiently proved the incompetency and inadequacy of our present arrangements. Let us, even at an increased cost, have a capable and vigilant police, responsible and well-officered. Let us have a police that will arrest murderers, detect robbers and defend peaceable citizens. If higher salaries are needed to that end, let them be paid.

The Mayor's message is an important paper, and deserves the careful consideration of the City Council. We do not refer to the portion relative to the Board of Health, as it is now unseasonable; nor to those having reference to many minor matters; but trust that all will be candidly and thoroughly examined, and what is best for the city adopted. WINTER AND WEATHER.—The advent of fall was thoroughly and satisfactorily demonstrated yesterday, by weather almost cold enough to beget a frost. For a number of days it has been evident that summer was only a tenant by courtesy, and liable, at any moment, to be evicted. His reign has been growing gradually weaker, and the paraphernalia and accompaniments of his presence, one by one, passing out of sight. Linens and light dresses, muslin and white clothing, no longer flaunt on the pavements, as in months gone by, but give place to soberer colors and warmer textures. There is the assurance of a steadily increasing business in the streets, the puff of more frequent steamboat arrivals at the Levee, and a thicker forest of masts rising up by the side of our wharves. We publish, daily, longer reports of produce importations and longer lists of passenger arrivals. One after another old firms are sending in advertisements of fall trade, and new firms notices of their existence. One after another familiar faces become visible along the streets, and resume their wonted place in our daily welcome.

At the present time there is every favorable indication of an immediate commencement of the season, and its long and profitable continuance. The yellow fever deaths decreased very considerably last week, and had a still larger diminution this. Moreover, the present cold weather, though exceedingly dangerous and trying to those now suffering, is inimical to its stay, and the best possible preventive against further cases.

The rivers—whose shallow condition last year so materially retarded the year's business, have been rising throughout all the country above, and enabled numerous boats to escape from the embargo of low water. If they will continue for a few days, at their present stand, and then wash somewhat more nearly the tops of their banks, trade will receive an unwonted impulse.

Produce will be rolled out of creeks and bayous, and piled up along our Levee and within our ware-houses. Planters will come down with their families, and give a joy to the amusements of the city, which we confidently expect are to be numerous and very attractive. Already the little flags are flying freely from many cotton consignments, and big barrels, baskets and sacks of one thing and another are being rolled from the steamboats to the drays. "The better time coming" has dawned, and we only desire to hurry it into mid-day and maturity. [Daily Crescent, Thursday.

Later from Texas.

In addition to the particulars of the late gale, which we have already published, we take the following from the correspondence of the Galveston News. Speaking of the destruction of Matagorda, the writer says:

Such a scene of distress and suffering I hope I shall never witness again, and which language fails to even give you the most distant idea of. I saw one lady who was driven into the streets, with four little children, come staggering in (where several of us were trying to take shelter) with every thing she had on blown from her body and from that of her little daughter. The infant she held in her arms alone retained its clothes; the other two, one three and the other five years old, were torn from her, and are supposed to be lost. Nor was this the only case of the kind; for I am informed by Mr Powell and others, that there were, perhaps, a hundred others who were picked up in the open streets and yards early in the morning. But enough of this.

The loss of property is estimated to be "the entire value of every species of personal property in the place."

Speaking of the loss of life, the writer goes on to say:

The number of lives lost is not yet known. We only know positively of six, the names of whom I have not yet ascertained. The mother of Gen Gordon has just been taken out of a mass of fallen lumber, and is expected to die soon. Mr. James Selkirk had his arm broken, and a large number of other persons were badly hurt. There would have been a much greater number of lives lost, but for the untiring energy of a few young men, who, throughout the whole entire storm, encountering the crash of buildings and flying missiles, were engaged in visiting from house to house, extricating those who were buried beneath the ruins.

The Doctor had taken a great fancy to a lad who had been in his service three or four years; he was much pleased with his management of a garden which was attached to his house, and of which he was particularly fond. A cherry tree, which had been planted some time, and which should have produced very choice fruit, had constantly failed. To the Doctor's great delight it at last showed signs of bearing, and about a dozen cherries after a while began to assume a tempting appearance. Returning one day from his ride, he missed some of his cherries, and accused the boy of having taken them. "I have not touched them," replied the boy, "as true as God's in Heaven," a very common mode of assertion among inferior people at that time. "Sit thee down, and I'll give thee a glass of wine, for thou wouldst not tell me a lie!" Going to his closet, he put a pretty strong dose of nutmoniat wine into a glass, which the boy drank off; and was preparing to leave the room, but his master kept him in conversation. At length the boy was making a hasty retreat, saying he did not feel well. "Do not quit the room," said the Doctor, "sit thee down; thou will soon be better," and ringing the bell, he ordered a jug of warm water, which he administered very freely; at the same time providing a basin. The cherries soon made their appearance, to the great consternation of the lad. "Where's the God in Heaven?" said the Doctor. "Thou miscreant, get thee out of my house!" He quitted it the same day, but not until the Doctor had shown him the will, in which he had left him £200.

UTAH.—According to late advices Utah is getting along flourishingly. The wheat fields promise an abundant harvest. Salt Lake City is getting along finely; paper is now manufactured there, and the Deseret News is printed upon the home-made article. Brigham Young's policy has been to have every thing made in the settlement which could possibly be produced. A ferry-boat now plies on the Jordan, on which Salt Lake is situated. She is forty-six feet long, will have a stern wheel propelled by horse power, and is destined to be used mainly for the transportation of stock to and from Great Salt Lake City and Antelope Island. A bridge has been built over Jordan. The News states that goods to the value of one million dollars are on the road from Missouri to Deseret. At a meeting of the Saints on the 28th of June, missionaries were appointed to many distant lands, and John Smith, the eldest son of Hyrum Smith, was voted to be ordained the Patriarch over the whole Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

THE KANSAS SEAL.—We have just seen the seal of the Territory of Kansas, engraved by Robert Lovett, of Philadelphia, according to the design of Gov. Reeder. It consists of a shield with two supporters and surmounted by a scroll motto, and is emblematic of the life of the pioneer and the agriculturist. The lower compartment of the shield contains the buffalo and the hunter; the upper contains the implements of agriculture. The left hand supporter is a pioneer with his smock frock, leggings, rifle and tomahawk; while on the right is the Goddess Ceres with her sheaf, and at their feet and between them, lie a fallen tree and axe. The motto is a beautiful and striking allusion to the principle on which the Territory was organized, and consists of the "Populi voce nata," translated—Born of the popular voice. The whole design is, we think, well devised, highly suggestive, and in excellent taste. [Easton (Pa.) Argus.

Books not weighing over four pounds may be sent in the mail, pre-paid, at one cent an ounce, any distance in the United States under three thousand miles, and at two cents an ounce over three thousand miles, provided they are put up without a cover or wrapper, or in a cover or wrapper open at the ends or sides, so that their character may be determined without removing the wrapper; if not pre-paid, the postage under three thousand miles is one cent and a half, and over three thousand miles in the United States, three cents an ounce.

It appears from the Trade and Navigation returns of Canada for 1853, recently submitted to the Canadian Parliament, that the exports for the last year amounted to $23,801,303, and the imports to $31,981,436. The exports to Great Britain were $11,455,468, and the imports therefrom, $18,489,121; exports to the United States, $10,725,455; imports from do., $11,782,147. Exports to North American Colonies, $1,380,465; imports, $632,050; to British West Indies, $20,184; from do., $3479; to other countries, $264,791; from do., $1,074 029. The increase of the aggregate imports and exports since the preceding year was fifty-seven per cent.

There never was, perhaps, such a hard time to get any thing to eat in New Orleans as the present. There is literally nothing in the markets fit to be eaten. The meats are poor and scarce. Eggs are out of the question, and command from four to six bits a dozen. Beef, mutton and poultry are of the very poorest possible kind. Potatoes are "small," and command $8 to $9 per barrel. What business is that of yours, Mr. Standard? There may be some truth in your melancholy statement, but that is no reason why you should taunt us with our misfortunes.

A PUBLIC SPIRITED FIRE COMPANY.—A paragraph in a recent St. Louis paper informs us that Union Fire Company, No. 2, of that city, having sent a committee to Cincinnati to examine and report on the merits of the steam fire-engine, and received a favorable report therefrom, has resolved to disband its own organization, sell out its engines, other apparatus and real estate, and give the proceeds to the city government, to be expended in the purchase of a steam fire-engine.

A CHINESE AMERICAN CITIZEN.—To-day there was issued at the State Department a passport for Yong Wing, Esq., who has just graduated at Yale with the highest honors. Mr. Wing is a young Chinese gentleman with fine talents and great learning for his age, and has been eight years among us. He is about returning to China to see his friends for the first time. The Franklin (St. Mary's) Banner, of the 28th, says:

Many of our planters look rather "blown in the mouth," their former bright anticipations having been clouded by the late heavy rains. What the future may have in store for them time alone can reveal, but at present their prospect is rather cheerless. Three weeks since the crops were really fine and promising throughout the parish; now, on many plantations, the cane is so prostrate as to render the injury occasioned by the storms irreparable.

The Southern Sentinel also says:

We think it highly probable that the late rains and storms that have occurred here within the last ten days, have injured considerably the cane crop, which, from all accounts, will make a considerable less yield than last year. The same cause has certainly injured the cotton also to a considerable extent. There will be plenty of corn, peas, etc., we have no doubt. It is to be regretted, as much for their own interest as the interest of the public, that our planters do not give more of their attention to the cultivation of grain, potatoes, etc.

We hear of some of our planters who intend to commence rolling as early as the 10th of next month.

The Concordia Intelligencer, of the 29th ult., has the following:

We are compelled to herald discouraging intelligence respecting the cotton prospect in this region. The equinoctial storm, which lasted a week, from Sunday to Saturday, ending on the last, with violent wind and rain, beat down an incalculable quantity of the opened and unpicked cotton in the land. On many of the plantations exposed to the furious gale, it is estimated, that from one-third to one-half the yield has thus been destroyed. The old and well cleared plantations on Lake Concordia and in Adams county, Miss., have suffered much the worse, while in the woody and sheltered districts and low lands of the Ouachita, the Tensas and the Black Rivers, the damage is not so apparent.

We are sorry to record a very prevalent sickness among the negroes and the few resident whites on the large plantation of S. H. Lambdin, Esq., in this parish, eight or ten miles below Vidalia. It will be recollected that this plantation was seriously afflicted with cholera last spring.

The Alexandria Republican of the 30th ult. has the following:

Last week we announced an unprecedented rise in the river, and now we have to announce an equally unprecedented fall. The rise could not have been less than 14 feet in five days. During the last five days, it has fallen ten feet or more, and the ripples on the falls are becoming visible. Though boats can still pass over them, they are afraid to do so, for fear of being unable to get down again.

Mobile Items.

In regard to the subject of quarantine, the Evening News, of Saturday, says:

These sanitary measures must be absolute or they are futile. The present quarantine laws are farcical. A sailing vessel and steamboat start the same day from New Orleans, the one with a crew only, the other with a crowd of passengers. The former must come to anchor for six days, and the latter shows a clean bill of health and goes to the wharf. There is no safety in this, and the question of justice needs no discussion. The object of quarantine is to give sufficient time for the development of disease. No one acquainted with the captains of the New Orleans mail boats will suspect them of introducing yellow fever patients by design; but it is no reflection upon their judgment to doubt their capacity to read the interiors of every passenger, and decide as to the existence of disease. A man leaves New Orleans to-day, and arrives in Mobile to-morrow. Who knows his condition? Who can vouch for his health? The physician of the quarantine ground may, by a detention of six days, but surely the officers of a steamboat, associated with him a few hours, cannot. The commercial interests of the city would not advocate a change in the present rules, but the public health does remonstrate. A rigid enforcement of the quarantine laws will attack private interests, but they must make compromises.

The same paper has the following:

The receipts of staple produce by the Mobile and Ohio Railroad this week, are as follows: 41 bales cotton, 78 bbls. turpentine, 2 bbls. tar, and 51 bbls. rosin. This is only a foreshadowing of what the weekly receipts by this road will be during the winter months.

The Advertiser of Sunday has the following items:

It is with great pleasure we chronicle a large decrease in the mortuary list for the week ending last evening. As we suggested in our last report would be the case, the health of the city has much improved since then. We are just entering upon the pleasant month of October, with signs north of us of an early frost, and we now confidently look for an agreeable and healthy fall season, and the early opening of business.

We regret to learn that on Monday evening last, Mr. James McCartney, an engineer on board the steamer Orion bound for, New Orleans, fell overboard at Dog River bar and was drowned. He formerly lived in Pittsburg, but for several years past was a resident of Mobile.

CHEESE AS A DIGESTER.—As a digester, as some not inappropriately call it, cheese—that which is decayed and mouldy being preferred by connoisseurs—is then eaten after dinner. The action which experience seems to have proven it to possess, in aiding the digestion of what has previously been eaten, is both curious and interesting, and has had some light thrown upon it by recent chemical research. When the curd of milk is exposed to the air in a moist state for a few days, at a moderate temperature, it begins to gradually decay, to emit a disagreeable odor, and to ferment. When in this state it possesses the property, under certain circumstances, of inducing a species of chemical change and fermentation in other moist subjects with which it is mixed, or is brought in contact. It acts after the same manner as our leaven does when mixed with sweet dough.

Now, old and partially decayed cheese acts in a similar way when introduced into the stomach. It causes chemical changes gradually to commence among the particles of food which has previously been eaten; and this facilitates the dissolution which necessarily produces digestion. It is only some kinds of cheese, however, which will effect this purpose. Those are generally considered the best in which some kind of cheese mould has established itself. Hence, the bare eating of a morsel of cheese after dinner does not promote digestion. If too new, or of improper quality, it will only add to the quantity of food with which the stomach is already overloaded, and will have to await its turn for digestion by the ordinary process. The ladies North are introducing what is called an "Ugly," as a compensation for the ineffectually small bonnets now worn. The "Ugly" is nothing more than what years ago used to be termed a "calash." The "Ugly" is to the head what a top is to a gig or chaise. The "Ugly" lets up and down like one of those tops. The "Ugly" is of a different color from the bonnet, and might be called a parasol, a veil, or any thing else, descriptive of what hides or shades the face. Ladies, hence, now often wear two bonnets on their head instead of one!

A correspondent of the Kingston, Jamaica, Journal, writing from London, says:

The general opinion in England is that the United States will have Cuba. She will either pay or fight for it, but have it she will. So think the thinking men in England.

The United States have done a deed which has made England ashamed. She has consented to be brought to England the quickest mail from Australia ever known. The West India mail steamer Magdalena arrived at Southampton on Monday last, with an Australian mail landed at Panama from the American steamer the Golden Age. This steamer has proved that the Pacific and Panama route is the best to Australia, and she has performed a feat which will interest the world, for she has shown that paddle-wheel steamers can navigate the great oceans and go round the world.

Roman Tesselated Pavement,

Proceedings were commenced on Monday last for the removal of this pavement, under the direction of Mr. Minton, its destination being, we understand, the new Crystal Palace at Sydenham.

This relic of the ancient splendor of London, at the time when it flourished as a Roman colony, under the title of Augusta, was discovered about the beginning of last month, at a depth of about fifteen feet from the surface, and about two feet lower than the foundations of Gresham House, on the site of which the Excise Office was built. The extent of the pavement comprises a square of twenty-eight feet. It is composed in a geometrical pattern of broad lines, forming intersections of octagon and lozenge compartments. The octagon figures are bordered with a cable pattern shaded with gray, and interlaced with a square border shaded with red and yellow. In the centers, within a ring, are expanded flowers shaded in red, yellow and gray; the double row of leaves radiating from a figure called a "true-love knot," alternating with a figure something like the tiger lily. Between the octagon figures are square compartments bearing various devices; that in the center of the pavement being decorated with the figure of Ariadne, or Bacchante, reclining on the back of a panther, the remains of which indicate spirited action; but only the fore paws, one of the hind paws and the tail remain. Over the head of the figure floats a light drapery, forming an arch, which she retains with the right hand, while the left appears to have rested on the panther's neck. Another square contains a two-handled vase. In the demi-octagons, at the sides of the pattern, are lunettes, one of which contains a fan ornamented; another, a bowl crowned with flowers. The lozenge intersections are variously embellished, with the figures of leaves, shells, true-love knots, checkers, and an ornament shaped like a dice-box. At the corners of the pattern are true-love knots. Surrounding this pattern there is a broad border, composed of a cable pattern, broad bands of blue and white alternately, then a bold inclosure of a floral scroll; and beyond this an edge of demi-lozenges in alternate blue and white. An outer border, composed of plain red lozenges, surrounds the whole.

The ground of the pavement is white, and the other colors are a scale of full red, yellow, and a bluish gray; agreeing with the description by Lucretius, of the decorations of a Roman theater;

The theater, whose awnings tread,

This pavement is evidently of late workmanship, but it is probable that, on its removal, another, or vestiges of another, of earlier date will be found. This is indicated by an edge which appears at about a foot lower, and is to be perceived a little off at the side. Various Roman and medieval articles have been turned up in the same excavation. Among these are a silver denarius of Hadrian, several copper coins of Constantine, a small copper coin, bearing on the reverse the figures of Romulus and Remus suckled by the traditionary wolf, under the fig tree at the foot of the Palatinate Hill, and several Roman and medieval tiles, a small glass of a fine

THE DEATH OF KILDARE.

The following poem, wherever it has been seen, has been attributed, we believe, to Sir Walter Scott, although we are not aware that it appears in any edition of his works We are indebted to a friend for a manuscript copy, who relates the following circumstances as attending its composition: While on a visit to a Scotch gentleman, the great author was shown a painting by Cooper, representing the death-scene of the faithful hound, the agony of the hunter, and the wondering attention of the noble steed as he gazed upon the struggles of his old companion. The scene and its attendant circumstances could not be lost upon Sir Walter, and hence, it is said, the poem. We invite the attention of persons fond of literary research to the apparently obscure history of this production. It is probable there are persons in this country who are well acquainted with it:

Up rose the sun o'er moor and mead,
Up with the sun rose Percy Reed;
Brave Kildare from his couple freed,
Careered along the lea.
The palfrey sprang with sprightly bound,
As if to match the gamesome hound—
His horn the jolly huntsman wound;
They were a jovial three.

Man, hound or horse of higher fame,
To wake the wild deer never came
Since Alrick's Earl pursued the game
On Cheviot's rueful day.
Kildare was matchless in his speed;
Than Tarras ne'er was stauncher steed;
A peerless archer Percy Reed,
And right dear friends were they

The chase engrossed their joys and woes;
Together at the morn they rose,
Together shared the noon's repose,
By fountain and by stream.
And oft when evening hours had sped,
The heather was their common bed;
Which each as wild'ring fancy led,
Still hunted in his dream

Now is the thrilling moment near
Of sylvan hope and sylvan fear;
Yon thicket holds the harbored deer.
The sire the hostess know.
With eyes of flame and quiv'ring ears,
The brake suspicious Kildare nears—
The gallant palfrey paws and rears;
The archer strings his bow.

The game's afoot, halloo! halloo!
Hunter and horse and hound pursue,
But woe the shaft that erring flew
That e'er it left the string.
The stag bounds scathless n'er the dew,
And gallant Kildare's life-blood true
Has drench'd the gray goose wing.

Dilated nostrils, staring eyes,
Marked the poor palfrey's mute surprise;
He knows not that his comrade dies,
Or what death is, but still,
His aspect hath expression drear
Of grief and wonder mixed with fear,
Like startled children, when they hear
Some mystic tale of ill.

But he who bent the fatal bow
May well the sum of evil know,
And o'er his favorite bending low
In speechless grief recline;
May think he hears the senseless clay
In unreproachful accents say:
"The hand that stole my life away,
Dear master, was it thine!

And if it were, the shaft be blessed,
For sure some erring aim addressed,
Since in your service prized, careered,
I in your service die;
And you may find a fleeter hound
To match the dun deer's merry bound,
But by your couch shall ne'er be found
So true a guard as I."

And to the last stout Percy rued
The fatal chase; for when he stood
Against fearful odds in deadly feud,
And fell amid the fray,
E'en with his dying voice he cried:
"Had Kildare but been at my side,
Your treacherous ambush had been spied—
I had not died to-day."

Remembrance of this erring bow
Long since had joined the tides that flow,
Conveying human pride and woe
Down dark oblivion's river;
But art can time's stern doom arrest,
And snatch the spoils from Lethe's breast,
And in her Cooper's colors drest,
The scene shall live for ever.

In my peregrinations in and around this immense city, I used to like, and frequently did drop in auction rooms—particularly at times when, to use the popular phrase among auctioneers, "great sacrifices," are to be made, "peremptory sales of household goods" were to take place, and all the articles mentioned in the catalogue are "to be sold without reserve to the highest bidder," etc, etc. And on such occasions I used frequently to indulge in purchases in which I confess I was often victimized. Indeed, at one period of my life it was almost a passion with me to attend all the auctions I could conveniently, and invest all my loose funds in articles that I never required, and never afterwards need. And in short, I was not at all unlike Billy Simpkins, of Connecticut. Billy (it is an old joke but rather good) was constantly lumbering his premises with what his good wife used to term "trash."

Every week a cart was certain to back up before the door, loaded with dilapidated furniture—such as old stoves, doorless and legless; baskets of unmatched and cracked crockery, old picture frames, etc., which Billy would inform his wife had been bought at auction. At last his wife got angry, told Billy not to bring another auction-bought article into the house, if he did, she threatened to send them all back. But Billy didn't heed her; in fact he couldn't, he was so used to it. He continued to attend auctions, and, of course purchase, purchase His house became so lumbered up with trash that his wife and family could scarcely move about in it. So what does the old lady do, one day, but load up a cart full as it could hold with the aforesaid trash, with the exclamation:

But the next day convinced the good lady that she was mistaken; for what did astonish her eyes but to cart backing up to her door loaded with the identical articles she had sent to auction the day previous. Billy had popped in at the auction and bought them all without knowing that he had ever before seen them, much less owning them! A good joke, wasn't it?

Well, as I said before, I was almost as bad as my friend Billy. Buying goods at auction had become almost a mental malady with me. But I finally recovered from it; and for my recovery I am indebted to what I once saw in an auction room.

One day while sauntering down town, my ears were attracted by the familiar cry:

"N'half! n'half! n'half! five dollars n'half! are you all done?"

In I popped of course. Just as I entered a trim, starched up, dapper little gentleman stepped up and handed me a catalogue which informed me that among other things a collection of paintings, some of which were supposed to be productions from the old masters, belonging to a gentleman about to leave the city for Europe, were to be sold.

"Gentlemen," said the auctioneer, "what's bid for this beautiful rosewood table? Am I offered ten dollars?"

"Ten!" said rather a faint voice.

"Ten I am only offered. Ten dollars!—twelve dollars! twelve n'half! n'half!"

"Put up the pictures," suggested a voice in the crowd.

"The paintings will be sold at twelve precisely: Twelve dollars and a half is all that I am offered for this beautiful rosewood table—twelve n'half—n'half!" And while the auctioneer was "going on" I took a look at the oil paintings. I am a great admirer of the fine arts, and I flatter myself something of a critic; therefore expected a rare treat, when ushered into a dark back room among the pictures, but was sadly disappointed. Instead of seeing a fine collection of fine old paintings, the property of some millionaire who was obliged to part with them on account of his departure for Europe, as I inferred from what the catalogue said, I could discover nothing but a dozen or so highly-colored landscapes and other pictures with immensely blue skies, great lights and very green pastures, in large, brightly-gilded frames, and one or two rather large, old worn out and defaced pictures, that looked as if they had done service on a pole at some country inn for centuries.

There was several in the room examining the rare productions. Among the rest was a rather finely-dressed, genteel looking, middle-aged gentleman, who with a golden framed eye-glass was examining one of the oldest, and in my estimation, poorest looking daubs in the whole collection.

A short distance from him, and within hearing, were two other individuals, who seemed equally interested in the same picture; they were both well-dressed, clean-shaved, and had a "natty" appearance. Says one of the two, pointing with his cane to the picture:

"Pshaw!" says the other, "you're joking."

"No I'm not. You know I ought to know what's what in the way of pictures."

"Oh! I don't doubt—I don't mean—but pshaw! a Correggio! you're surely joking".

"Well you'll see when it is put up—and by the way it's within twenty minutes of the time"—so saying he left his friend.

The old gentleman immediately addressed the other.

"Pray sir excuse me, but who is the gentleman who jus left you? He seems to be a judge of paintings."

"Well he ought to be;" said the interrogated person. "That is Caverdonno, the distinguished Italian artist.

Twelve o'clock came, and the pictures were put up.

The first was a landscape in gaudy colors This was knocked down for a trifle more than the cost of the frame And another was put up, and another, and another, and finally the old picture we have alluded to. It looked like a piece of smoky canvas, and of course attracted but little attention from the crowd; therefore considerable astonishment was manifested at the first bid, which was five dollars This bid was made by the person designated as Caverdono.

"Five dollars I'm offered for this picture," says the auctioneer. "Gentlemen, I don't know who painted this picture; but the fact of its having been owned by one of the most distinguished connoisseurs in the fine arts is evidence that it is a most valuable production. Five dollars is all I'm offered; five dollars, six—seven—eight—ten dollars I'm offered"

The bidding was confined to the individuals of which we have been speaking, the latter being the old gentleman.

"Twenty dollars," says the other.

"Twenty-five," said the old gent.

There was a murmur through the crowd, and then a pause, occasioned by the younger bidder requesting a closer inspection of the picture. Being apparently satisfied,

"I'll give forty," says he.

"Fifty dollars," says he.

"Fifty dollars I'm offered; fifty, fifty, fifty dollars; are you all done? Fifty dollars, going, going at fifty, gone! What's the name sir?"

"Cash," says the old man.

The picture was sold, and so was the individual who bought it—and most effectually, for being in the immediate vicinity of the reputed Caverdonno and his friends who had joined him, I heard the other remark after the picture was knocked down to the old gentleman:

"Ha! ho! ain't old Pap stuck this time? He! he! ,tain't worth two shillings."

"You done it well that time, Phipps. I was almost sure he had you on the forty."

I was astonished some, and nothing shorter, and determined in my own mind never more to patronize auctions, and I haven't.

Reader, look out for mock auctions.

The Ancient Tombs.

They rise on isle and ocean's shore;
They stand by lake and stream,
And garnish many a shepherd's tale,
And many a poet's dream.
Where darkly waves the northern pine,
Where bright the myrtle blooms,
And on the desert's trackless sands,
Arise the Ancient Tombs.

The hands that raised them, long ago,
In death and dust have slept,
And long the grave hath sealed the fount
Of eyes that o'er them wept.
But still they stand like ocean rocks,
Amid the passing waves
Of generations, that go down
To their forgotten graves.

For many an early nation's steps
Have passed from hill and plain;
Their homes are gone, their deeds forgot,
But still their homes remain;
They tell, when time hath left no trace
Of towers or storied page,
To latest times, how glorious was
Earth's early heritage.

They tell us of the lust and mourned,
When earth was new to tears,
The bard that left his tuneful lyre,
The chief that left his spears;
Ah, where their lights of love and fame,
On those dark altars shed,
To keep undimmed through time and change,
The memory of the dead.

If so, alas for love's bright tears
And for ambition's dreams,
For earth has kept their monuments,
But lost the sleepers' names;
They live no more in history's scroll
Or song's inspiring breath;
For altars raised to human fame
Have turned to shrines of death.

Hut from your silence, glorious graves,
What mystic voices rise,
That thus through passing ages speak
Their lessons to the wise
Behold how still the world rewards
Her brightest, as of yore;
For then she gave a nameless grave,
And now she gives no more.

[Translated from the German of Paul Kloh.]

THE ADVANTAGE OF LEGAL FORMS.

In a small town of Saxony lived three young men, whom we will call George, Ernest and Lewis; and who from their infancy were strongly attached to one another. George and Ernest were merchants; Lewis studied the law, and practiced in his native place.

One summer's day Ernest and George set out on horseback for a town about thirty miles off, where they had business to transact. Ernest was weak enough to be fond of discoursing with his friend on religious subjects, on which they were of different opinions, and had often had warm disputes, though George was as irritable and passionate as he himself was obstinate in maintaining his notions. During the journey Ernest led the conversation to this unlucky topic They fell as usual into altercation, which was kept up till they reached the inn where they had agreed to dine The dispute was continued over a bottle of wine, but with temper on both sides, and the travelers pursued their journey Ernest renewed the subject of their former conversation, and both being rather elevated with the wine they had taken, the dispute became more and more violent as they proceeded; so that by the time they had entered a wood through which their road led, it had degenerated into downright personality and abuse

George's passion knew no bounds, unconscious of what he did, he pulled out a pistol, and presented it at his companion's The pistol went off and Ernest fell from his horse, which, frightened by the report and relieved from his rider, scampered away into the wood

George, pale as death, immediately alighted to assist his friend, who was weltering in his blood; the paroxysm of passion was over, and had given place to bitterest repentance. He stooped trembling to Ernest, who just then breathed his last sigh

Overwhelmed with despair and anguish, he tore his hair, and afterwards galloped back to the village, to surrender himself into the hands of justice as the murderer of his friend, that he might put a speedy end to a life which was now the most oppressive burden to him The officers to whom he delivered himself up sent him under a guard to the town where the friends resided. The body of Ernest, whose pockets were found rifled, was also conveyed thither and interred

The legal proceedings against George commenced He repeated his confession before the judges, and implored a speedy death His examination was closed, and he was informed that he was at liberty to choose an advocate to defend him, as the law requires; but he declined to avail himself of this privilege, and with tears besought the Court to hasten his execution.

Being, however, again urged to appoint an advocate to conduct his defence, he named his friend Lewis "At the same time," said he still, "there needs no defence I wish only for death; but I submit to the required formality My friend may undertake the hopeless task, and thus show his attachment to me for the last time"

With profound emotion, Lewis entered upon the most painful duty that had ever fallen to his lot in his whole professional career. Though he despaired of being able to save his unhappy friend, he determined of course to make every possible effort to accomplish this end

With this view he objected that Ernest's body had been committed to the earth without any previous judicial examination and dissection The judges replied that this ceremony seemed unnecessary and superfluous, as the murderer had voluntarily confessed the deed, but if he (the advocate) insisted on the examination of the body, it should be taken up By the desire of Lewis, this was accordingly done The town surgeon attended, and declared that as the ball had passed right through the heart, death must naturally ensue. Lewis wished to know if the ball were still in the body; the surgeon sought for and found it; upon which the advocate sent for the pistol with which the deed had been perpetrated, and tried to drop the ball into the barrel It seemed too large he accordingly tried it in all possible ways—still it would not go in That this ball could not be fired by that pistol was evident to every observer; the judges looked at one another and shook their heads There was not a person but had completely made up his mind respecting the guilt of the prisoner; but this circumstance quite confounded them all The confession of the prisoner, made without the employment of the slightest fear or force, was corroborated by every circumstance that had previously come to light; the ball alone seemed to proclaim his innocence

Lewis began to conceive the strongest hopes, and was nearly overpowered with the excess of his joy; his judgment He proposed that the proceedings, together with the ball and pistol, should be sent to the supreme tribunal, that it might decide in this extraordinary affair. This proposal was the more readily accepted, as the local court was puzzled how to act, and absolutely unable to pronounce any judgment whatever

While the papers were in the hands of the supreme tribunal in the metropolis, a highwayman, who had shot and robbed a traveler on the road not far from the birth-place of the friends, was brought to that town. Convicted by sufficient evidence, he acknowledged his crime; but this was not all: he confessed, on further examination, that two months before, he had murdered another man on the same road. This circumstance had excited suspicion, and being still further questioned, he related the following particulars:

"About that time I happened to be in a village public-house. Two men on horseback came in after me; I remarked that one of them had a heavy girdle filled with money, fastened round his body underneath his waistcoat. I began to consider whether it was not possible to possess myself of this rich booty; but then, how was this to be done, as he had a companion? However, thought I to myself, I have a brace of good pistols. If I shoot one, the other will probably run away in a fright, and before he can give the alarm and fetch witnesses to the spot, my fleet horse will have carried me far enough out of their reach; if, contrary to expectation, the survivor should stand by his companion, what hinders me from giving him the other ball? Such was my determination, which I resolved immediately to execute I had overheard them talking of the way they should take, rode off before, and having tied my horse to a tree, concealed myself in a thicket by the road-side. No sooner had I taken my station than the travelers approached. They were quarreling violently. I had already taken aim at the man with the girdle, when the other took out a pistol and discharged it at his companion. I fired at the same moment My man fell just as the other's ball whizzed past my ear; he then sprung from his horse, was engaged for a short time with his dying fellow-traveler, and at the instant when I was going to fire at him, he mounted again and galloped away I had now time to rifle the pockets of the deceased, and having done this, I rode off as fast as I could."

He described the time, the place, and the two travelers so minutely, that there remained not the slightest doubt of his having actually committed the murder of which George accused himself. The latter, trembling with rage, had fired at random, and was innocent of the death of his friend.

The local tribunal transmitted all these particulars to the Supreme Court: the proceedings, with accompaniments, were returned, and the ball exactly fitted the pistols which were found upon the murderer at the time of his apprehension.

Let the sympathizing reader now endeavor to form some conception of the transport of Lewis on having saved his friend! Let him figure to himself the joy of George, when the painful consciousness of an atrocious crime was thus removed from his bosom! He was unanimously declared innocent of the murder: his passion cost him two months' imprisonment; and it was long before his tears ceased to flow for his departed friend. Lewis begged the ball, the instrument of George's deliverance, as a memorial of this extraordinary event.

The forms of legal proceedings may often seem troublesome or useless, but let them not be arraigned on that account. Now and then, indeed, a criminal may through their means escape the punishment due to his guilt, but if, in the course of a century, they save the life of only one innocent person, the wisdom of the legislator ought to command our gratitude.

LIFE IN THE PACIFIC.—Among the myriad islands which dot the surface of the South Pacific Ocean is a little island, about ten miles in diameter, lying near the Fejee group, called Horne Island Its climate and productions are nearly similar to those of the Sandwich Islands. Its inhabitants are dark complexioned, and are said to be the most ferocious and savage of any in Polynesia Until very lately they were cannibals A correspondent of the Picton Chronicle, writing from a whale ship in the tropics, gives the following description of a visit to these interesting people for the purpose of procuring wood, water, yams, etc:

"On our approach, we were immediately surrounded by twenty or thirty canoes filled with the most hideous looking wretches I ever beheld. Their hair, which is long and very coarse, stands erect, giving them a most ferocious appearance, and they kept up such an unearthly yelling, being overjoyed to see us, that we finally came to the conclusion that we might possibly by mistake have discovered a small corner of the infernal regions After satisfying their curiosity and ascertaining our wants, they immediately returned to the shore to satisfy them, in a short time several canoes came alongside filled with the choicest productions of the island, consisting of hogs, fowls, yams, cocoanuts, and fruit of all kinds

Then commenced a trade unsurpassed by any rag fair in Europe; but we were not a little surprised to find that our money was of no value to them, and they refused to take it; therefore a regular barter commenced. Old shirts, handkerchiefs, pipes, tobacco and fancy trinkets took well with them Our captain being an old Cape Cod Yankee, who had been seafaring for forty years, understood well what was required for traffic with the natives, and having, of course, come prepared for the occasion, laid in forty hogs, two hundred fowls, a large supply of yams, cocoanuts, etc., in exchange for what cost him not over fifteen dollars, in the shape of red flannel, knives, hatchets and beads It was quite amusing to see him bargain for his supplies, especially the yams, which grow here to a size weighing fifteen to twenty pounds One persuasion cap was to be given for one yam, but the old sea cock, not being satisfied with taking small and great as they came, would repeatedly impress upon the natives the necessity of bringing large yams, by saying: "One cap's the yam, boy yam" at the same time stretching his eyes and extending his hands to describe the size I must say, although he treated us very well during the passage, if he ever had any conscience, it had little to do in the trade with the natives of Horne Island.

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, there is its equipment, and even probing the form of human existence, none really named of more real value to mankind than the contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art A vast trial of its virtues throughout this great country has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so entirely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a Remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any of the certificates we have in use but we would present the following and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free wherever he will call with parties, and indispensable proof of these statements

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir My little son four years old has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten and every person the vaunted bitts pronounced him a dead child Hearing used your Cherry Pectoral in Baltimore in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis with entire success I was induced to try it on my little boy I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours commencing on the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better, and after three days use he was about and drank without pain

His use in the above named disease will save many a child from a premature grave and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. PREPARATORY SCHOOL

This institution is located in Summerfield Alabama—a healthy location, we believe, as there is in all the South It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty No one of the Professors or Teachers whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation

Heretofore all the departments have been under the supervision of Dr Mitchell—but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction Accordingly Dr Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many ladies as the circumstances may require

Time of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the coming session by some gentleman of established reputation

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters with those afforded by any Female College in the South

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts aided by Professor Tumblin, (and others if necessary) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute A new building for it is already under contract The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved, Scanty or ornate thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them

The Trustees and friends of the Institute have resolved to spare nothing requisite to place it above every similar institution in the country

B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper from motives of economy to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

THE WILBERFORCE FAMILY.

The family, and even the first generation of that pious, evangelical and philanthropic stock, have turned out singularly bad, in a religious way. "It is an affecting thing," says an English paper, "to find one son of the venerable WILBERFORCE after another, thus consummating his abandonment of those Scriptural views of Christianity which their honored father inculcated with so much force and earnestness in his writings, and illustrated, in life and death, by a holy example. Of the four brothers, William, the eldest, has disappeared from public life; and his wife, at least, has fallen into the toils of Rome. Henry is an ultra-montane Papist. Robert, the Archdeacon, appears to be in a transition state. Samuel, the Bishop, the most favored, occupies the unenviable position of being admired for his eloquence, and utterly distrusted as to his principles."

This is said on the occasion of the Archdeacon's resignation of his preferments. He has written a book on the Eucharist. But his last difficulty and insuperable was the Royal Supremacy—Queen or King the head of the Church. He desires to fall into a mere laymen.

The London Watchman sums up the Romish points of the book and gives the pith of that "sacramental system," for the sake of which the doctrine of justification by faith is cast aside, spiritual communion with Him who seeks to be worshipped in spirit and in truth discouraged, and the central doctrine of the Atonement is overshadowed and displaced by that of the Incarnation:

"But even what one might be disposed to admit in Archdeacon Wilberforce's scheme, is never marred by some singular abuse. All becomes confused when the separate materials have to be built into his system. When you get to the heart of this, it is like the stone in the nectarine, hard, indigestible, fit only to be cast away. After reading the opening chapters of his earlier work, all that is well and profoundly said of the "Incarnation," you find intended only to conduct you to the disappointing issue of "impanation." The Eucharist is an extension of the Incarnation;" that is his text and his conclusion. Our Lord's natural body is in heaven; but it is besides its one natural presence, numberless spiritual presences. The spiritual presence can be localized within the small dimensions of the wafer, whose substance it displaces, retaining its form, its sensible properties, and its bulk. Chewing the wafer you manducate the spiritual presence. Thus, by a mechanical process, is accomplished the organic union between the naturnl body of Christ and His mystic body the Church. But it is only a Priest who, by the words of consecration, as by a spell, can bring down the spiritual presence, and hide it under the species of the bread and wine. He alone can instrumentally convert the substance of matter into divine substance. Then, after this process, the Priest, travestying the one offering, presents the host as a true sacrifice to Deity. This is sacerdotalism. If such mystic powers and prerogatives were but believed to be possessed by a line of men officially descending from the Apostles, the submission of those who are considered as 'mere lay members' of the Church, must of course be complete.

"We can not parse to point out all the inconsistencies of this representation. A little reflection will show that the mechanical manduction of a spiritual presence is a contradiction in terms. The necessity appears to be throughout assumed of some physical contact; whereas, in natural bodies, actual contact of particles never occurs. Or, if only the union of organization is intended, such as exists between the vine-stem and the furthest branches, the head and its remotest members, this may be effected by an identity of the living principle, without local proximity. Further, the intervention of the elements, if considered as media, certainly facilitates nothing. Repeatedly, in that chapter of St. John's Gospel to which reference is so properly made on this mystery, is the act of faith identified with that of the reception of the true bread; so that it is plain no physical process or material vehicle can be necessary in order that the recipiente should become 'members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones.' Moreover, while dwelling upon the Humanity of our Lord, it appears to have been too little regarded that often in Scripture the nexus of the organic union is declared to be His indwelling Spirit, interfused throughout the whole mystic body. As for the conception of a divine presence latent beneath the species of the elements, this, which would be, most strictly speaking, a metamorphosis of our Lord's Humanity, is only a priestly theory which vainly urges faith to over-leap the evidence of sense, and appears, like all the rest of the speculation, a materialistic degradation of a spiritual verity."

A letter from Berne, of the 7th, informs us that Mazzini has been arrested at Basle, where he had spent some days in the house of a patrician, to whom he described himself as an Italian Count greatly attached to Austria, and driven into Switzerland by the fear of the cholera. According to our correspondent, the police had discovered his residence and was preparing to apprehend him, when he absconded and left for Basle under a false name. The Government gave notice to the authorities of his arrival, and he was arrested on alighting from the diligence.

D. D.—DECLINED.

The modesty with which this honorary degree is in the habit of being declined, is well hit off by an exchange:

"It appears to us that two very important facts touching this matter have been entirely overlooked. One is, that the individuals who have seen fit to decline the honors to which we allude, and whose letters of declination have been blazoned forth by the press, have pursued the very course to make the most of the crumb that has fallen to them, and in the very act of signifying their non-acceptance to the faculty, take particular care to let all the world know that a diploma has been proffered them. In short, the only difference between their acceptance and non-acceptance is, whilst in the one case they would put away the parchment and be content with the formal announcement of the University that an honor has been conferred upon them, in the other, they hold it up with their own hands that all eyes may look upon it before it is returned, and take in the full measure of their GREATNESS. Whilst the truly deserving would regard it as a small matter, and rely rather upon their own intrinsic merits as, after all, the true index of their literary attainments, the would-be eccentric prefer to have a little noise about the matter, for fear that some body should not be apprised that they have become for the time, at least, a D. D.

"It is not enough with them simply to decline the honor in a private note, but a long letter, commenting upon errors into which colleges have fallen—their degeneracy and the worthlessness of degrees in consequence, must accompany their refusal to accept, and be furnished to the press, that the world may laugh at the folly of the institution, and admire their independence and originality. And the world does laugh, at least the 'groundlings,' who, failing to comprehend the true merits of the case, and being ever ready for a joke, make capital subjects upon which to palm off such humbuggeries as this.

"But does the abuse of a thing fairly argue against its use? The affirmative seems to have been assumed by these declining college honors, who allege that they have been conferred upon unworthy recipients, and therefore they are worthless. And this is the other fact to which we alluded in the outset.

"That some of our colleges have been far too lavish of their degrees, is, perhaps, true; but that is by no means a fatal error; it only serves to show that colleges like all other institutions, are defective in some particular, and can not, therefore, claim infallibility. But for any one, on that account, to decline an honor voluntarily conferred by an institution of learning, is, to say the least, the quintessence of affectation, and equally as ridiculous as it would be for a collegiate to refuse his degree of A. B. because there were some in his class who would receive the same honor with less merit.

"We hope, however, that good will result from this declinatory movement, and that colleges will be more particular hereafter not to honor those who are not only undeserving as persons of distinction, but also deficient in that characteristic of the gentleman which leads him to acknowledge even an unnecessary service with courtesy and kindness."

LOCAL PREACHERS' APPOINTMENTS.

The inefficiency of the Local Preachers in the bounds of the St. Helena Circuit, Mississippi Conference, as well as many other regions of the work, has been deeply lamented by many. To remedy this evil, has given rise to considerable thought on the part of our worthy Presiding Elder, Bro. J. LUSK and others. The subject was presented by the P. Elder to the first Quarterly Conference for the year 1854, holden for St. Helena Circuit, where a resolution was gotten up and passed by that body, that there should be a committee elected by the Quarterly Conference, consisting of three of its members—one of whom should be the preacher in charge of the circuit. This committee thus elected should have the power to point out the places where each local preacher should labor, and that every effective man should attend to at least three appointments in the month—thus leaving him only one Sabbath in each month to dispose of as he may think proper.

The committee has, no doubt, acted correctly toward the local preachers in the circuit in making out their appointments—have studied the convenience of each, and their adaptation to the work assigned them.

The Quarterly Conference of St. Helena Circuit, Miss. Con., would be one of the last to conflict with the Discipline of the Church, or make any innovations upon her usages; but as we could not see that any of these would be involved in adopting this measure, we thought we would try it at least for one year. Our last Quarterly Conference sat the 16th of September; at which time a report was read drawn up by the preacher in charge, Bro. SHARSHOUGH, and such was the favorable light in which the workings of this plan was viewed by the report, that the report was adopted by a vote of the conference unanimously.

It is believed that this plan will effect the equal distribution of the labor of the local preachers in the circuit better than any other that could be devised. If this plan is faithfully executed, there will be no chance for two, or three, or more of the local preachers to be at one place on the same Sabbath.

If this plan is carried out, the Gospel will be preached in many neighborhoods on the Sabbath that can not be reached by the traveling preachers on the circuit; and the great amount of good that might result to those neighborhoods, is incalculable.

A great many of the colored people of the circuit might be reached in this way that hardly ever get to hear preaching; and this is a matter of great importance in our estimation—their souls are equally precious with the white people in the sight of that God who declares that he is no respecter of persons. Our local preachers by being industrious, may become coworkers with the Itinerancy, and greatly sustain and encourage them; and in taking this course we are quite certain that they will enjoy much more of the comforts of religion in their own souls.

AWFUL EFFECTS OF A THUNDERBOLT.—The Peoria (Ill.) Republican, of the 25th ult., gives the following account of the terrific havoc made by a stroke of lightning in that town on the previous night:

Last night, a little after 12 o'clock, those of our citizens who had retired were startled from their slumbers by one of the most deafening peals of thunder that, we candidly believe, ever reverberated through the firmament. It was not particularly sharp, but was rather a collected roaring, as if a million pieces of artillery had been discharged at once; and the sound seemed in no direction or locality, but to fill all space, in fact, it seemed as if the entire universe united in the terrific utterance. The lightning which preceded the explosion, (strictly speaking, although it appeared to us in the same instant,) was as intensely vivid as it is possible to conceive. It must have been one of the most voluminous bolts of electricity that ever descended, for its effects were amazing and almost unprecedented. It seemed to burst in all its fury upon the residence of Capt. Morrison, on Third street, and left in its trace a sad record. The house was a story-and-a-half brick. The bolt first struck the east chimney, and passed down the same to a bar that passed through the building to secure the walls, where it forked, one of the forks ripping up the roof on the south side of the building, tearing apart the east wall, and running along the earth in the back yard to the privy; another fork passed down the dining room, shattering the ceiling, and finally took the same shoot as the other, running nearly parallel with it to the privy, where they met. A third fork passed into the second story, where it branched in two opposite directions—one branch streaking through the chambers, shattering into fragments a door which was closed, and passing out through the west side of the house, after which it ran over the ground in the adjoining yard in a singular manner; and the other branch passed down the stairs into the hall and out at the front door, tearing up the outside steps and coursing about the front yard and tearing up the earth in the same manner as the other forks did back of the house. At the foot of the steirs two sons of Capt. Morrison were lying in the hall, having chosen that place on account of the warmth of the night. The oldest of these received the whole force of the electric stream, and was rendered senseless and incapable of speech, only giving utterance to his sufferings in a few feeble groans. Instant efforts were made to restore him, but they were of no avail, and in half an hour life was extinct. The body, to all appearance, was not injured in the least, there not being even a fracture of the skin. This morning the face wore an expression as natural as life, and presented the appearance of calm slumber. The other brother was terribly lacerated, both thighs being furrowed vertically to the bone by a number of frightful gashes. The physician who is in attendance upon him has but little hopes of the sufferer's recovery.

Capt. Morrison was sitting in the dining-room at the time of the catastrophe, looking out of the south window, and he describes the impression produced upon him as similar to being struck upon the head with a brick. But in a moment he recovered from the shock, and discovering the room filled with dust and the wreck of the wall lying around him, he immediately proceeded to look after the safety of his family, who were uttering frightful shrieks from all parts of the house, when the sight of his two sons, one in the last agonies of death and the other weltering in blood, struck his stout heart with terror and completely unmanned him. His daughter, a young girl, narrowly escaped injury, although she was considerably shocked. She slept in the chamber, the door of which was shattered as above stated. She said that her first idea was that the house had been blown up with powder.

There were two other ladies sleeping in the house at the time, neither of whom was seriously injured.

The building presented this morning a frightful appearance, having been completely riddled from the roof to the cellar. The steps to the upper chambers, as well as those which led to the cellar, were thrown some ten inches from the walls and so shattered as to render them unsafe to use. One of the iron rods, used to fasten the carpet to the steps, was taken by the electricity and hurled up through the stairway with such force that it penetrated one of the rafters of the roof to such a depth as to require the weight of an ordinary sized man to pull it out. The atmosphere in the vicinity was strongly impregnated with sulphur, as if there had been an immense powder explosion.

In conclusion, we may safely say that this occurrence is one of the most wonderful and terrible phenomena of electricity on record.

THE UNAPPRECIATED DANGER.

The following is taken from a speech of ex-Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts, when and where delivered we know not. We copy it as furnishing striking illustrations of a truth that cannot be too often impressed upon those who fancy that they "can drink, or can let it alone;" that the growth of the drunkard's appetite is imperceptible to himself, though painfully evident to his friends and associates. Were this truth more generally appreciated, fewer cases of hopeless intemperance would occur to challenge the public sympathy, or pity, or scorn. The path of safety is found in entire abstinence alone, and multitudes who have fancied that they could walk securely in the way left intact by drunkenness, have found, too late, that "wine is a mocker," which, at the last, biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

Says Gov. Briggs:

"I recollect one member of Congress who was always rallying me about our Congressional Temperance Society.

"'Briggs,' he used to say, 'I am going to join your Temperance Society as soon as my demijohn is empty.' But just before it became empty, he always filled it. At one time, toward the close of the session, he said to me:

"'I am going to sign the pledge when I get home. I am in earnest,' continued he; 'my demijohn is nearly empty, and I am not going to fill it again.' He spoke with such an air of seriousness as I had not before observed, and it impressed me; and I asked him what it meant: what had changed his feelings.

"'Why,' said he, 'I had a short time since a visit from my brother, who stated to me a fact that more deeply impressed and affected me than any thing I recollect to have heard upon the subject in any temperance speech I have ever heard or read.

"'In my neighborhood is a gentleman of my acquaintance, well educated, who once had some property, but is now reduced—poor! He has a beautiful and lovely wife, a lady of cultivation and refinement, and a most charming daughter.

"'This gentleman had become decidedly intemperate in his habits, and had fully alarmed his friends in regard to him. At one time, when a number of his former associates were together, they counseled as to what could be done for him. 'Why don't you send your daughter away to a certain distinguished school?' which he named.

"'O, I cannot,' said he, 'it is out of the question. I am not able to bear the expense. Poor girl! I wish I could.'

"'Well,' said his friend, 'if you will sign the temperance pledge, I will be at all the expense of her attending school for one year.'

"'What does this mean?' said he. 'Do you think me in danger of becoming a drunkard?'

"'No matter,' said his friend, 'about that now; but I will do as I said.'

"'And I,' said another, 'will pay the rent of your farm a year, if you will sign the pledge.'

"'Well, those offers are certainly liberal—but what do they mean? Do you think me in danger of becoming a drunkard? What can it mean? But, gentlemen, in view of your liberality, I will make an offer. I will sign if you will.'

"This was a proposition they had not considered, and were not very well prepared to meet; but for his sake they would and did sign, and he with them.

"And now for the first time the truth poured into his mind, and he saw his condition, and sat down bathed in tears.

"'Now,' said he, 'gentlemen, you must go and communicate these facts to my wife—poor woman! I know she will be glad to hear of it, but I cannot tell her.'

"Two of them started for that purpose. The lady met them at the door, pale and trembling with emotion.

"'What,' she inquired, 'is the matter?—What has happened to my husband?'

"They bade her dismiss her fears, assuring her they had come to bring her tidings—but good tidings, such as she would be glad to hear.

"'Your husband has signed the temperance pledge; yes, signed it in good faith.'

"The joyous news nearly overcame her—she trembled with excitement—wept freely, and clasping her hands devotionally, she looked up to Heaven and thanked God for the happy change.

"'Now,' said she, 'I have a husband as he once was, in the days of our early love.'

"'But this was not what moved me,' said the gentleman. 'There was in the same vicinity another gentleman—a generous, noble soul—married young—married well, into a charming family and the dower of it. His wine-drinking habits had aroused the fears of his friends, and one day, when several of them were together, one said to another: 'Let us sign the pledge.' 'I will if you will,' said one to another, till all had agreed to it, and the thing was done.

"This gentleman thought it rather a small business, and felt a little sensitive about revealing to his wife what he had done. But on returning home, he said to her:

"'Mary, my dear, I have done what I fear will displease you.'

"'Well, what is it?'

"'Why, I have signed the temperance pledge.'

"'Have you?'

"'Yes, I have, certainly.'

"Watching his manner, as he replied, and reading in it sincerity, she entwined her arms around his neck, laid her head upon his bosom, and burst into tears. Her husband was affected deeply by this conduct of his wife, and said:

"'Mary, don't weep; I did not know it would afflict you so, or I would not have done it; I will go and take my name off immediately.'

"'Take your name off!' said she, 'no, no! let it be there. I shall now have no more solicitude in reference to your becoming a drunkard. I shall spend no more wakeful midnight hours. I shall no more steep my pillow in tears.'

"Now for the first time, the truth shone upon his mind, and he folded to his bosom his young and beautiful wife, and wept with her. Now, I can't stand these facts, and I am going to sign the pledge."

THE RESCUED CRIMINAL.

FROM BLACKWOOD'S LADY'S MAGAZINE

A great number of persons who know the celebrated Dr. H——, a Professor of the College of Surgeons, have often heard him relate the following anecdote:

One day that he had procured the bodies of two criminals, who had been hung, for the purpose of anatomy, not being able to find the key of the dissecting-room at the moment the subjects were brought, he ordered them to be deposited in an apartment contiguous to his bedroom.

During the evening Dr. B—— wrote and read as usual previous to retiring to rest. The clock just struck one, and all the family slept soundly, when all at once a dull sound proceeded from the room containing the bodies.

Thinking perhaps the cat had been shut up there by mistake, he went to see what could be the cause of the unexpected noise. What was his astonishment or rather his horror, on discovering the sack which contained the bodies was torn asunder; and, on going nearer, he found that one of the bodies was missing.

The doors and windows had been fastened with the greatest care, and it appeared impossible that the body could have been stolen. The good doctor appeared rather nervous on remarking this, and it was not without an uneasy sensation that he began to look about him, when to his horror and amazement he perceived the missing body sitting upright in a corner.

Poor Dr. H.—— at this unexpected apparition became transfixed with terror, which was increased by observing the dead and sunken eyes of the corpse fixed upon him; which ever way he moved, those dreadful eyes still followed him.

The worthy doctor, more dead than alive, now began to beat a quick retreat, without, however, losing sight of the object of his terror; he retreated step by step, one hand holding the candle, the other extended in search of the door, which he at length gained; but there was no escape; the specter had risen and followed him, whose livid features, added to the lateness of the hour and the stillness of the night, seemed to conspire to deprive the poor doctor of the little courage he has left; his strength fails, the candle falls from his hand, and the terrible scene is now in complete darkness.

The good doctor has, however, gained his apartment, and thrown himself on his bed; but the fearful spectre has still followed him—it has caught him, and seizes hold of his feet with both hands. At this climax of terror the doctor loudly exclaimed, "Whoever you are leave me!" At this the specter let go his hold, and moaned feebly these words: "Pity good hangman! have pity on me!" The good doctor now discovered the mystery, and regained by little and little his composure. He explained to the criminal, who had so narrowly escaped death, who he was, and prepared to call up some of his family.

"Do you then wish to destroy me?" exclaimed the criminal. "If I am discovered, my adventure will become public, and I shall be brought to the scaffold a second time. In the name of humanity, save me from death!"

The good doctor then arose and procured a light; he muffled his unexpected visitor in an old dressing gown; and having made him take some restoring cordial, testified a desire to know what crime had brought him to the scaffold.

He was a deserter.

The good doctor did not well know what means to employ to save the poor creature. He could not keep him in his house, and to turn him out would be to expose him to certain death. The only way, then, was to get him into the country; so having made him dress himself in some old clothes, which the kind doctor selected from his wardrobe, he left town early, accompanied by his protege, whom he represented as an assistant in a difficult case upon which he had been called in.

When they had got into the open country, the wretched orsature threw himself at the feet of his benefactor and liberator, to whom he swore eternal gratitude; and the generous doctor having relieved his wants by a small sum of money, the grateful creature left him with many blessings and prayers for his happiness.

About twelve years after this occurrence, Dr. B—— had occasion to visit Amsterdam. Having gone one day to the bank, he was accosted by a well-dressed man—one who had been pointed out to him as one of the most opulent merchants of the city.

The merchant asked him politely if he was not Doctor B——, of London, and on his answering him in the affirmative, pressed him to dine at his house; which invitation the worthy doctor accepted. On arriving at the merchants' house, he was shown into an elegant apartment where a most charming woman and two lovely children welcomed him in the most friendly manner, which reception surprised him the more, coming from persons he had never before met.

After dinner the merchant having taken him into his counting-room, seized his hand, and having pressed it with friendly warmth, said to him—

"Do you not recollect me?"

"No," said the doctor.

"Well, then, I remember you well, and your features will never be obliterated from my memory—for to you I owe my life! Do you not remember the poor deserter? On leaving you I went to Holland. Writing a good hand and being a good accountant, I soon obtained a situation as clerk in a merchant's office. My good conduct and zeal soon gained for me a confidence of my employer and the affections of his daughter. When he retired from business, I succeeded him. Without your care, without your generous assistance, I should not have lived to enjoy so much happiness. Generous man! consider henceforth my house, my fortune and myself as wholly yours.

The kind doctor was affected even to tears, and both these happy beings participated in the most delightful expression of their feelings, which were soon shared by the merchant's interesting family who came to join them.

A correspondent of the Newark Advertiser, writing from Florence, says:

Another notoriety here, is Byron's "Guiccioli," now married to a rich old Florentine Marquis, whose peacock-tread through the halls of fashion, with the beauty (of sixty) on his arm, denotes how proud he is of being husband of the poet's mistress, which honor, it would seem, is deemed enviable by the crowd of courtiers that surround the Marchioness, who, if not as fair as the Countess Guiccioli, still holds her own artistically; her blond ringlets being no whiter for her years, and who carries in her march a queenly consciousness of superiority among high women. Indeed, in coming to Florence she knew her sphere, and revolves gloriously in it. Many other lesser stars of fashion—fallen stars in their native spheres—find here also the most favorable positions; among them are several English "lights in their own right," i. e. without their lords. Truly Florence is a motherly hospital for suffering reputations, and it is wonderful how soon desperate cases come out whole again. A Florentine himself remarked the other day of a great lady who had lost caste even in another Italian city, "Why don't she come here? Florence would receive her with open arms, and put her in position again."

A LIVING DEATH!

In various works describing savage life, and the barbarities attending it, which it has been our fortune to read in the course of the last few years, we have met with nothing more truly horrible than the following account of the Fetish-like cruelties practiced by the Kaffirs toward their own race and kindred. The details are given by Capt. King, of the British army, who took a prominent part in the late Kaffir war. After giving several instances of butchery toward such of the soldiers as were unfortunate enough to fall into their hands, Capt. King says:

"When a chief or a great man of a tribe is with sickness, the 'witch-doctor,' with forms and incantations, dooms some poor wretch to death, on pretence of his having bewitched the ailing man. His flocks and herds are forfeited to the chief, and his children left beggars and fatherless. One instance may suffice to give an idea of their savage ferocity, and spare the repetition of outrages on the poor settlers, or those unhappy enough to fall into their hands.

The son of a chief named Macomo having fallen sick, a "witch-doctor" was according to custom consulted, to ascertain the individual under whose evil influence he was suffering; and, as usual, a man of property was selected and condemned to forfeit his life for his alleged crime. To prevent his being told of his fate by his friends, a party of men left Macomo's kraal early in the morning to secure the recovery of the sick young chief by murdering one of his father's subjects. The day selected for the sacrifice appeared to have been a sort of gala day with the unconscious victim; he was in his kraal, and just slaughtered one of his cattle, and was merrily contemplating the convivialities of the day before him, over which he was about to preside. The arrival of a party of men from the "great place" gave him no other concern than as to what part of the animal he should offer them as his guests. In a moment, however, the ruthless party seized him in his kraal. When he found himself secured with a rheim around his neck, he calmly said: "It is my misfortune to be caught unarmed, or it should not be thus."

He was then ordered to produce the matter with which he had bewitched the son of the chief. He replied: "I have no bewitching matter; but destroy me quickly if my chief has consented to my death." His executioners said they must torture him until he produced it—to which he replied, "Save yourselves the trouble, for tortures as you will I cannot produce what I have not." He was then held down on the ground, and several men proceeded to pierce his body all over with long Kaffir needles. The miserable victim bore this with extraordinary resolution—his tormentors finally tiring, and complaining of the pain it gave their hands, and of the needles and skewers bending. During this time a fire had been kindled, in which large flat stones were placed to heat. The man was then directed to rise, and they pointed out to him the fire, telling him it was for his future torture, unless he produced the bewitching matter.

He answered: "I told you the truth, when I told you to save yourself the trouble. As for the hot stones, I can bear them, for I am innocent. I would pray to be strangled at once, but that you would say that I fear your torture." Here his wife, who had also been seized, was stripped perfectly naked, and cruelly beaten and ill-treated before his eyes. The victim was then led to the fire, where he was thrown on his back, stretched out with his arms and legs tied to strong pegs driven into the ground, and the stones, now red hot, were taken out of the fire and placed on his naked body on the groin, stomach and chest, supported by others on each side of him, also heated and pressed against his body. It is impossible to describe the awful effect of this barbarous process. The stones slipped off the scorched and broiling flesh, and being only kept in their places by the sticks of the fiendish executioners. Through all this the heroic fellow remained perfectly sensible, and when asked if he wished to be released to discover his hidden charm, said, "Release me."

They did so, fully expecting they had vanquished his resolution, when to the astonishment of all, he stood up a ghastly spectacle, broiled alive! his smoking flesh hanging in pieces from his body! and composedly asked his tormentors: "What do you wish me to do now?" They repeated their demand, but he resolutely asserted his innocence, and begged them to put him out of his misery; and as they were now getting tired of their labor, they made a running noose on the rheim around his neck, jerked him on the ground, and savagely dragged him about on the sharp stones; then placing their feet on the back of his neck, they drew the noose tight and strangled him. His mangled corpse was taken into his own hut, which was set on fire and burnt to ashes. His sufferings commenced at 10 A. M., and ended only at sunset!

SWEDENBORG ON THE SPIRITS.—In Bush's New Church Repository we find the following authoritative testimony from Swedenborg, as to the value of "Spiritual Communications." We hope that those who put faith in "manifestations," as being the veritable work of spirits, will listen to the very chiefest of mediums, as to the reliance to be placed upon their revelations:

"That spirits relate things exceedingly fictitious, and lie.—When spirits begin to speak with man; he must beware lest he believe them in any thing; for they say almost any thing; things are fabricated by them; and they lie; for if they were permitted to relate what heaven is, and how things are in heaven, they would tell so many lies, and indeed, with solemn affirmation, that man would be astonished: wherefore, when spirits were talking, I was not permitted to have faith in the things which they related. For they are extremely fond of fabricating; and whenever any subject of conversation is proposed they think they know it, and give their opinions in one way or another, altogether as if they knew; and if a man listens, and believes, they press on, and deceive and seduce in divers ways; for example, if they were permitted to tell about things to come, about things unknown in the universal heaven, about all things that whatsoever that man desires, (they would tell) all the things falsely, while from themselves; wherefore let men beware lest they believe them. On this account, the state of speaking with spirits on earth is most perilous, unless one is in true faith. They induce so strong a persuasion that it is the Lord himself who is speaking, and who commands, that man cannot but obey and believe them."

IMPURE LANGUAGE.—There are some habits which we can never entirely annihilate, after we have once formed them. The use of impure language is one of these habits. It may be subdued and slumber for years, till its existence is almost forgotten; and then in the delirium of fever, it may suddenly burst forth, to the astonishment of all who listen. Many a devoted Christian, in the delirium of a sick bed, has shocked his friends by the use of profane or obscene language, which could be explained only by the fact that his had been familiar with such language in early life. In reading the memoir of Dr. Grant, the missionary to the Nestorians, I was struck with a fact relating to his late illness. For seventeen days previous to his death, he was in a delirium, but, says his biographer: "Though speaking almost constantly on many topics, in three different languages, that is, English, Turkish and Syriac, he did not ut

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14.

YEAR OF CALAMITY.

The year of mercy and judgment. The past year will be signal in history for its disasters. Drouth, in the best agricultural districts, cutting off millions of produce. Fires in extensive forests; mountains in a blaze. Cholera sweeping from the sea-coast to the mountains. Yellow fever raging as never before. Disasters by railroads, and greater ones by rivers and by sea. Sailing vessels lost; steamers, fast and staunch, foundering mid-ocean, or in tempting view of shore; or burning in hopeless distance of rescue. Thousands of families: moaning and wailing fill all dwellings. Such events show us that God does not need wars, foes of steel and iron, nor ranks of invading hosts, and armed powers, like those that distress the other hemisphere, in order to reduce the proud to humility, or make His Sovereignty known.

Mr. James Wright, a native of Dutchess county, N. Y., and for the last fourteen years a citizen merchant of New Orleans, died, after a lingering illness, on Monday, 9th inst.

Bro. W. has, from his youth, been a worthy member of the Methodist Church, and, since our knowledge of him, an efficient steward. He has made liberal contributions for Church extension in this city. The superannuated and worn-out preachers' fund of this and adjoining Conferences, has been in the annual receipt of a $50 donation, by "Jeems of N. Y." He was the anonymous contributor.

SOUTHERN MEDICAL COLLEGES.

We doubt not the Yellow Fever visitations of the South and Southwest, will redound to the patronage of Southern Medical Institutions—especially that of Louisiana, here located. For the most part, it has found the physicians totally unprepared to meet it. Educated at the North, they had learned to treat such disease as there arise. This was a stranger. Not only this, but other southern diseases, it seems to us, can only be studied in southern latitudes. In the Charity Hospital, thousands are prescribed for every year. Every phase of disease is seen. The physician is formed for his work. He is introduced to it directly, and not at second hand. Practice is better than theory.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Our readers, visiting the city on business, will find in the advertising columns a valuable directory. T. H. Jackson & Co., excellent and accommodating Clothiers, have changed their sale rooms from 83 Canal to 82 Common street. We could well afford to say a good word for Mr. A. J. Tully, who has begun the per cent. career in which many have made fortunes, and made themselves influential men besides. He deserves, and we hope may have large success. Nothing will be lost in making purchases and dealing with Commission Merchants, by consulting the list of stores and offices.

School advertisements deserve to be consulted weekly by those having children to educate, or desiring situations as teachers.

Lady Huntingdon and her friends.—This book will pay its price and the time it takes to read it. We obtained a copy the other day of Mr. Packard, under Odd Fellows' Hall. He keeps it for sale. One is introduced to close and real acquaintance with such men as the two Wesleys, Whitefield, Romaine, Berridge, Venn and others. Lady H. had about her a rare society. Nobly she used her rank, by introducing such preachers to the world. Whitfield writes to her about 1756—"I am delighted to hear of the increase of your ladyship's spiritual roots."

The Rev. Wm. H. Benton, a clergyman of the Methodist Church, died near this city on Tuesday morning, the 3d inst., in the 63d year of his age. We have known Mr. Benton for many years, and can bear witness to the faithful, earnest, and devoted manner in which he discharged his duties. He was a sincere and single-minded Christian, who seemed to have but two objects in view: the salvation of his own soul, and of the souls of other men. He was advanced in life, which he had lived carelessly, when he became a Christian, when, like the Apostles, he abandoned his temporal business, then in a prosperous condition, and left all to follow Jesus; and we doubt not, that like the Apostles, he will receive "in the world to come, eternal life." A Gown in the Kirk.—What doth this mean? A correspondent of the Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer, Oct. 3, writing from Marietta, Ga., says:

"As this is the 'age progressive,' perhaps every thing seen should not be recorded; but I noticed one thing to-day that struck me as new, if not novel—and that was the Presbyterian clergyman clothed, during service, after the style of an Episcopalian minister, with black silk gown and white lace cravat appendages. As much as I dislike unnecessary innovations, especially in religious customs, I can see at present no very cogent reason why [illegible]ty in dress should not be [illegible]ly by clergymen, as prevailing [illegible] re followed by the congregation. But I can not discuss this subject here, I'll pass——down the Road."

ORPHANS' HOME.

We had the pleasure on Wednesday afternoon of meeting a number of Protestant friends at this Asylum, situate in Fourth District, New Orleans, and bounded by Magazine, Live Oak, 7th and 8th streets. The lady managers were heartily congratulated on their success; a few speeches were made; the children sang, and all partook of a well arranged collation.

It will be remembered that the Orphans of last year's epidemic were the beginning. This year has added more. Boys and girls, in separate departments, are received, so that the members of the same family need not grow up strangers. An excellent feature this, and the distribution is just such as long has been needed. It is one of the noblest charities in the State.

STATISTICS.

The Society commenced operations one year ago, by purchase of six lots and improvements, including a cottage and outhouses, for $7500.

They have since purchased six other lots for $4400, making 12 lots they now own, on which they owe $2550, and they have cash on hand to meet the same when due, $2300

They have built a large brick two story house, at cost of $8000, and made other improvements in additions and out-houses, amounting to $1400; for all which they have paid. Making the whole amount of outlays in properties and improvements (exclusive of furniture) $21,300; all which has been paid, except the amount of $2550, against which they have $2300 cash on hand

They have received during the year 165 children, and put out 30. Several were sick when received, and 35 have died during the year. They have now in care 101.

THE HARTFORD PLATFORM.

A. B. C. F. M.—AGAIN.

We can not but regard the late action of this Board with interest. In addition to the result laid before our readers last week, we now publish something of the process. Though of little consequence practically, it is consequential, nevertheless; for the Hartford action was a step in the progress of fanaticism, an apostacy from Old Testament and New Testament principles. If they are right, we are wrong. The report at home will be prejudicial; abroad, anti-American. The leagued influence of Northern freesoilism and British-ianity is palpable and triumphant. "Blue-stocking" ecclesiastics have achieved a victory on the old chosen ground of "blue-light" politicians.

The Hartford platform will enter, henceforth, into missionary nomenclature. By it will be designated those who refuse to have Churches in a place and among a people, unless they can have A. B. C. Schools also; who will not proclaim the Gospel of Christ, unless permitted to proclaim their own "notions." The fairest lands the sun shines upon may be left without a Christian ministry! Hundreds of thousands of precious souls for whom Christ died, may be abandoned to darkness and the shadow of death! What cares the Hartford platform—the Commission of the Christian Missionary is by it defined as exceeding broad. Going into all the world, he may take along his "notions" and peddle by the way. Knocking at the door of States, or Indian Councils, with his Bible, Spelling-book, Reader, Uncle Tom's Cabin, and Connecticut clocks, he demands admittance in the name of the Lord. The Bible meets no difficulty. Its authority is undisputed; its ministers welcomed. But there is a difference of opinion about the others. Wherenpon our redoubtable Missionary "shakes off the dust of his feet."

This is a favorite text of the Hartford platform: as if any where in the Scriptures our Saviour or his Apostles, or early preachers, made an issue with the local authorities on slavery, which prevailed in their day and before their eyes in a severer type than in the Choctaw Nation or any Southern State. Much less did they ever "wipe off dust" as preachers, against city or country for such a cause.

But we come to the discussion. The Report and Resolutions came before the Board on the third day of its session, Sept. 14th. We quote from the New York Commercial Advertiser:—

"The Rev. Dr. Dwight reported on missions to North American Indians, No. 1. He spoke of the recent laws of the Choctaw Council respecting their schools forbidding any teacher to be employed who holds or propagates abolition sentiments, and forbidding the teaching of slaves. This regulation leaves the missionary free to preach the Gospel and establish private schools; but how long they will be able to do so, we can not tell. The report condemned the acts of the Choctaw Nation, and approved the action of the Board refusing to conduct the boarding schools under the new regulations. Dr. Dwight accompanied his report with some explanatory remarks, in which he laid this action to the influence of white men. He animadverted upon this legislation as wicked, unjust and unchristian, and compared it to the injunction of the Jewish Sanhedrim, forbidding the Apostles to preach the Gospel.

"The Rev. Dr. Parker did not feel justified in presenting a minority report, but after the remarks of the chairman, he would state that while leaving the prudential committee free to act, he was opposed to endorsing their action at present. He did not approve of the animus of Dr. Treat's letter. He did not think this Board should array itself against the action of any legislative body. Though prohibited from teaching slaves to read—which was wrong the world over—they were still free to preach the Gospel to them—to carry forward the whole civilization of the Choctaw Nation.

"The Rev. Mr. Read, of Richmond, Va., thought that the principles of freedom in New England and elsewhere, allowed every people to say who shall teach their children. This Board is free to preach the Gospel to the Choctaws, and should not assume to dictate who should be their schoolmasters. Preach the Gospel, and get the schools if you can.

"Ex-Chancellor Walworth deplored the introduction of these resolutions and the discussion. Similar debates came near rending the Board in twain a few years since, and their revival is unhappy now. The Board was proceeding happily, and exerting a powerful influence for good. But if this discussion be continued, our work is done."

The lone voice from the South was heard with impetience, but forbearance, as the Independent informs us. Dr. Bacon "was gratified that the brother had been permitted to speak and vindicate his orthodoxy to his people." In the evening session, Dr. B. gave this Richmond brother what the Japanese call the "hariskari"—ripped him up:

"Dr. Bacon called attention to the fact that the board had had trouble from the employment of slaves by the missionaries in that nation. He saw no objection to this course by the missionaries, but others have had scruples—and hence, the board have suggested their declining such services. They found it necessary to use them—this law is aimed at such cases to prevent the missionaries from teaching the slaves they employ and their children to read and write. This is the historic interpretation of the law—he was willing the report should be so amended as to remove all inncouragies. He could not see how any man could object to the passage of this resolution—we are responsible for the action of the prudential committee—they have acted openly on this subject, for years past, and have been annually re-elected, and by that act this board has endorsed their proceedings—they must not disown them now—he would not compromise with slavery, would not be influenced by motives of expediency—he wished to see the right and follow it; and if others were not satisfied with our course, let them organize another channel for their contributions. We must look at our constituents, and not be guided by the views of objectors whose contributions fall far short of those of the Sandwich Islands. (Sensation.) We must be governed by the views of those who furnish our funds!

"The speaker here endeavored to explain the imputation he appeared to cast upon his Richmond brother, but to the minds of the whole audience the apology was worse than the insult—was much like putting Cayenne pepper into a mustard plaster.

"This discussion, he continued, would not interrupt our devotional feelings, but doing our duty is worship, and duty here is as important as it is to sing psalms and to pray.

"The Rev. Mr. Read felt an inward consciousness of innocence as to the imputations cast upon him which made him say to himself "Let him take his arrow back again." The apology was a worse injury than the original imputation. He was under no necessity of being endorsed here in order to bind his people to him. The importance of the South to this Board is rated by their contributions. What we give is given as freely as what is given by any part of the Church. The Choctaws are condemned for violating compacts, and yet here is an open recommendation for this Board to violate its compact with the Southern Churches. Though their interest be small, yet it is sacred. If not, then beware all small stockholders in monied corporations! How do you know that these laws are not agreeable to the Choctaw people? Are not the Council elected by the people? And here you propose to array this Board against the Legislative action of the nation. Why not do the same in Turkey and elsewhere? We are bound to believe that this people had good reason for their action.

"The Rev. Dr. Taylor thought a little candor and a little concession would restore harmony. He would wish the resolutions omitted, and then he thought all objection to the report would be obviated. He moved the striking out these resolutions, which was seconded.

"The Rev. Mr. Patton thought that would be like striking out the application to a sermon. The resolutions were necessary to the perfection of this report, and the report without them would not satisfy the Christian people and ministry of New England. This Board owes a duty to the country, which she should not hesitate to discharge.

"The Rev. Dr. Riddle thought that the position of the Board, when it met in Brooklyn was, that they would not sanction the views of Secretary Treat's letter. Now there is an effort under the opprobrium of objectionable legislation of the Choctaw nation, to procure the sanction of the Board to principles which they would not endorse at that time. This Board must not be influenced by temporary opinions and political agitations, or she may take positions she will repent of. He would vote for striking out the resolutions.

"The Rev. Dr. Starrtevant, of Illinois, showed reasons why the resolutions should not be stricken out. The Western Churches distrust the position of this Board respecting slavery. She should avow the ground on which she stands, and she must stand on the ground of these resolutions if she would retain the Western Churches. There is a higher principle than dollers and cents here. We had a practical exhibition of the principles of unity and love here this day. He should join no denominational Board, nor a free Board. He loved this Board and should always advocate this, but if driven from it by its indefinite attitude on slavery, should organize another conducted like this."

The President, Hon. Theo. Frelinghuysen, seeing the end, made a last effort to stave off suggesting reference of the whole subject back to the prudential committee with confidence in their action.

This suggestion was acted upon. The resolution for striking out was withdrawn, and one referring the subject to the prudential committee brought forward.

"Dr. Lyman Beecher knew the West were watching the action of this Board, and if you do not pass these resolutions now, you will never have another chance.

"The Rev. Mr. Holbrook, of Chicago, thought the popularity of this Board at the West depended upon their defining their position in some way similar to the passage of these resolutions. He had come to secure this action."

The test vote to refer was taken at 11¼ P. M., and as we have reported, lost by 58 to 19.

A significant fact, while summing up influences and outside pressures, must not be omitted. An "Association in aid of Evangelical Missions in Western Asia and the East of Europe, especially those of the American Board," has been formed in England. Its officers are, Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury, President; Sir E. N. Buxton, Bart., M. P., and Sir C. E. Eardly, Bart., Vice Presidents; Hon. Arthur F. Kinnaird, M. P., Treasurer; and Rev. Cuthbert G. Young, Secretary; with a Committee of twenty-four members, J. W. Alexander, Esq., Chairman.

The Senior Secretary of the Board has had a meeting with the British Association in England. The alliance is noble forsooth, and promises fuads. Dr. Pomroy stated that "They are taking measures to interest the British public in our missions in Western Asia, and a subscription, that promises well, has been commenced." Earls and Lords and Barts. and M. Ps. do not contribute mites; and according to the principles laid down by Dr. Bacon—"We must be governed by the views of those who furnish our funds." An anti-slavery crusade and an anti-American position is, therefore, just the thing.

On this Hartford Platform the Northern Methodist Church can take her place as soon as she likes.

It behooves those who, in the language and spirit of St. Paul, feel themselves debtors to bond and free, and who in fulfilling their great commission, are willing to know nothing but Christ and him crucified, to gather up their strength in prayer and hope and faith. A great work is theirs. Already in the bounds of the Southern Methodist E. Church, there are six times more Christians—in church-membership—among the negroes of the Slave States, and ministered to by her missionaries, than the A. B. C. F. M. numbers in Africa, Greece, Syria, Judea, Armenia, Nestoria, Micronesia, China, and the Sandwich Islands and America, all put together. That fact is worth six Hartford platforms.

The end may be predicted. This Society, fallen from its high position, and circumscribed in its operations, will lean to and serve Britishianity more and more. Many valuable members—the conservatives—disgusted at the insulting intolerance characteristic of the majority, of which we have a sample in the favorite spokesman and champion, Dr. Bacon, toward a moderate Southerner, will withdraw. No more connection with slaveholding communities, either for labor or contributions. Rabid anti-Nebraskaites will accept it as a feeble revenge on that score. The temperate and patriotic will deplore it as hasty, hot, ill-advised and unscriptural. And in less time than has elapsed since the first famous Hartford platform was set up, the framers of this will be held in equal contempt, and their associates ashamed to own their work.

WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

"Bishop Early presided with a great deal of dignity, and did the business of the Conference with energy and dispatch. He succeeded most effectually in winning the hearts of the preachers and people. He preached three times with wonderful success; not only did he preach, but he exhorted and went out into the congregation and invited mourners to the altar. This was something new for a Bishop, at least to us. It had its effect. Numbers came forward; the altar was crowded, and the house was filled with the cries of penitents. We never witnessed such a scene at Conference, or any thing like it. Several were happily and powerfully converted to God. Such was the religious interest wakened up, that several of the preachers remained after Conference closed, and kept up the meeting. The preachers all caught new fire and took new courage. One thing which contributed greatly to this was, the "Conference Prayer Meetings," held every morning by the Bishop, before commencing the business of the day. Long will the people of Louisa bless the visit of the Bishop, and preachers of the Conference.

"The missionary anniversary was held on Monday night. Speeches were made by Bishop Early, Bros. Burwell, Spurlock and S. K. Vaught. The collection was the best ever taken up since the organization of our Conference.

"The missionary money reported from the circuits and stations was more than in any previous year.

"The Conference is also increasing in point of numbers. Five men were received into the traveling connection, on trial, this year: Elias Kendall, Richard E. Graves, G. S. McCutchen, William Downtain and William Y. Shaw."

The two Sons of Zebedee.—The "apostolic succession" shows a tendency to run in the blood. This must strengthen its claims greatly. Two brothers, Onderdonk, were bishops of the dioceses of New York and Pennsylvania. They were both unfortunate, and got deposed for immoralities. The successors of these two brothers are, also, brothers. The Commercial Advertiser remarks upon the recent election to the New York Episcopate of Rev. Horatio Potter, D. D.:—

"For the last twenty years or more he has been pastor of the oldest Episcopal parish in Albany, where he is greatly esteemed and beloved. We believe he graduated at Union College in 1826, and is now over fifty years of age. His brother, Right Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D. LL.D., is Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the diocese of Pennsylvania; and it is a remarkable coincidence, that the two important dioceses of New York and Pennsylvania should, for the second time, be placed under the Episcopal charge of brothers; formerly, the two bishops Onderdonk, and now the two bishops Potter."

Missionary Board.—The meeting of the Bishops and Missionary Board of the M. E. Church, South, for making appropriations for the coming year, was appointed for 30th September, at Louisville, Ky. We learn that Bishop Early, only, of the Bishops, was present. $132,000 were appropriated—same as last year.

LETTER FROM YORK.

BY A LADY.

[The following letter is by the hand and from the sentimental heart of a fair lady of this city, now on a bridal tour, visiting husband's relations, in England. It is a gem of freshness and beauty. Though not written to be published, it is published as written. We happened to hear it in a circle of friends, and following the editorial instinct, craved it for "copy." There are many Grace Greenwoods in the South, if they would only write. [Ed. N. O. Ch. Adv.

My dear Aunt M. and Uncle D.:

In my last I gave you my impressions of Bolton Abbey; and in this letter I must try to tell you, as far as words will do it, how I felt in York Minster. I had just sealed my letter to you on Thursday night, as the mail here closes on Friday, and Friday morning before I was up, Margaret came into my room to know if I would go with her and her husband John, to York, as it contained one of the finest Cathedrals in England.

Of course I jumped at the proposal; and in half an hour was dressed and riding with them down to the Lodge to take the coach. Upon the top of this we get on—it is quite common here for ladies to ride there—and had a fine view of the country for miles around us. The air was cool and bracing, but yet warm enough to be pleasant; and the novelty of being on top was so great to me, that I enjoyed it exceedingly. At the railroad station, as they call them here, we had a long flight of steps to go up—for all the tracks are laid upon viaducts or stone bridges over the towns and villages; and it gives one a very queer feeling to look up and see the cars running over your head.

(I am afraid you can not read my writing now; it is so dreadfully cold that I can scarcely guide my pen.)

A short ride brought us to the once-important city of old York. How strange and great a contrast it is to its namesake in America! I was all at one time-worn and ancient, so grotesque and novel in its buildings and streets, that I felt as in a dream. We passed by old houses with the upper story hanging far over the little, dark, narrow street, and drove several times through the old gates and towers, which were the mode of ingress and egress when the city was walled. Upon one of these "bars," as they are called in York, the heads of malefactors were hung, and it gave me a very curious sensation to be looking upon the very spot where gory heads swayed to and fro in the breeze. I should not like to live in the place at all, for my imagination would be continually calling up all these horrible associations.

It was to the Minster or Cathedral that our eyes were chiefly directed. How to give you any conception of its grand proportions I know not, nor how to convey to you some portions of the awe-struck feeling that filled my whole soul, as I entered with bowed head into the solemn old pile. It does not look as ancient as it is, for parts of the interior have been recently burnt and restored; and as it was originally built of a species of limestone, it has never got that dark, moldy, dirty look that nearly all buildings, even of recent date, have here.

On the very spot where the present church now stands, a cathedral was erected by one of the Saxon Kings in A. D. 627. In 1137, the present building was erected, and parts yet remain as they were then, especially the stained-glass windows and the stone screen before the choir.

Of the exquisite and softened beauty of this glass, I can give you no idea: there are no great patches of glaring colors, as with us, but such a mingling and harmony of shades, that at first you have no idea of any color, but only that the light is subdued and mellowed, and that your eyes are pleased by something you know not what. Upon a closer examination you find that each vast window is composed of millions of little pieces, some not larger than your finger, and none exceeding the size of your hand. All the glazing is done on the outside, and is not perceptible, even there, until you look very closely, as it is done with a kind of black putty that approaches nearly to the color of the glass.

They show you at one end of the church five windows, called the five sisters, from the patterns having been first embroidered in wool by five sisters, then painted from the embroidery, and then put in, in glass. This was done in the beginning of the 13th century, and still it remains. Another window at the east end of the church is said to be the largest and finest in all Europe, and is so immense that our church would pass through it, with steeple and all; and yet it seems small, so much grander are the proportions of the cathedral. The compartments are filled with scenes from Scripture History, and nearly all is represented in it.

The stone screen, or partition dividing the choir from the nave or people's division, is most wonderful: 200 years' work was spent upon it; nor do you wonder at it, when you see the myriads of minute faces, angels, musical instruments and gothic points and arches that are sculptured there most delicately in the hard stone.

In niches in this stone partition are statues of fifteen Kings, from William the Conquerer to Henry VI. Even upon their robes the delicate chiseling is wonderful—every little embroidered flower is faithfully copied, and you are lost in wonder and admiration of the patient endurance of toil that has produced this most curious screen. In the interior of the choir (about the center of the cathedral, and which is now used as a chapel for morning and evening prayers) may be seen the same carving as on the exterior, only that it is of oak without polish or oil.

Into this we went at 4 o'clock, after two hours patient wandering over the church, trying to comprehend its size. When the organ burst forth into a voluntary, and the sweet, soft voices of the children chimed in with it, and the whole harmonious sound went floating and filling the arches and aisles, I was overpowered and subdued, so that the tears filled my eyes again and again. I never felt before the insignificance of a human being as I did, excepting at Niagara. Something of the same yearning filled my soul in listening to the voice of the mighty waterfall, as impelled me now to join in, with all my being, in the solemnly sweet chanting. I wanted to fall upon my knees and weep, unnoticed and undisturbed, for hours.

One little boy near me had a voice that was so full and deep, yet so soft and flute-like, that it reminded me of a bird singing its morning hym of praise, or of an angel before the throne. I could only think of Heaven, and felt that I was indeed in the presence of my God. I was under the very shadow of His throne, and listening to the rapturous chanting of the heavenly host, and with closed eyes I sat breathless, lest some glimpses of the unearthly glory should burst upon my unhallowed sight. No language can describe my deep emotion. You must see and feel it for yourself, to know how strange and awful it is. I could not speak when all was over, and quietly stepped out to a corner that I might indulge in the tears that were overflowing my eyes. It did not seem to me that this was the workmanship of mortals like myself, but that it must have come, as it was, fresh from the hands of the Creator, just as our Niagara did. We looked like babes walking about, and those but a few paces, apparently, from us were but motes in the grand pile.

On all the pillars and projections, both inside and out, are the most demoniacal and yet grotesque figures I ever saw. Some of them are human bodies, stretching out the chest and arms with hideous, mocking, luring faces, and all have so fierce and terrifying an aspect, yet are so attractive from their very hideousness that I could not keep my eyes off of them, and every new one seemed even more horrible than the last; my brain was filled with them; and when we got back to the hotel, I was trembling and excited, so that I could not rest. I became a coward for the first time; and before going to sleep, had to look under the bed and toilet-table;—now don't laugh at me when I confess that I expected to see one of the stone-demons from the cathedral, with its most horrible face staring at me.

During the night the sweet chiming of the church bells every half hour soothed and composed me; otherwise I could not have slept.

We climbed up a long winding stone staircase to the top of the center towers, 213 feet high, and had an extensive view of the country for many miles around; but it scarcely repaid one for the excessive fatigue, as the land was all flat. So often is that stairway passed up and down that hollows are worn in each step. I was terrified, too, by the intense darkness of the ascent in many places; and when a ray of light did come in to us, it only revealed some heavily-chained, mysterious-looking door.

We were shown the little narrow space upon the leads where the monks used to walk in the olden time; and below, in a little gallery far above our heads in the nave, is the place where the poor nuns were only allowed to come, and from there got their only view of this world. It was very sad and gloomy to remember that aching hearts and disappointed hopes had been carried about, year after year, up and down those dreary steps and dark aisles by those who in other positions might have made a little heaven of sunshine and happiness about them.

Outside of the choir is the place where the dead have their resting place. Here are monuments to the archbishops from 1315 down to the present day, almost. One stone statue is now shown as the monument erected to the second son of Edward III, and brother to the Black Prince: it is now over 600 years old, and is much defaced by time.

I have only this half sheet more to put all I wish for this week; and it seems hard, for I have so very much to say. Don't imagine that I shall ever think America a wilderness; the more I see of this land, beautiful as it is, the more I pine for the wild freshness and freedom of my own. I am longing for a glimpse of our rivers and lakes, and for the shadows of our grand old forests.

As far as I have seen, there are no hotels as beautiful as the "St. Charles;" for comparison to it, they are village inns. Nor do I look with a prejudiced eye upon every thing here; I am as ready to admit its beauties as even the most bigoted Englishman can desire, but I can not forget my own glorious home, with its unrivaled sunsets and gorgeous sky. There is nothing left here for the imagination to do;—every thing is finished and complete; and I sometimes long for a little roughness, that I might amuse myself by seeing how it could best be polished. * * *

A gentleman dined one day with a dull preacher. Dinner was scarcely over, before the gentleman fell asleep; but was awakened by the divine, and invited to go and hear him preach. "I beseech you, sir, excuse me, I can sleep very well where I am."

Missionary Reports.

To the Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

WALTON MISSION—ALA. CON.

I herewith transmit for publication the report of the Walton Mission.

My dear Brother I feel delighted to communicate to you the state of this Mission. I received eleven appointments on the place: four of which was organized. I have now eighteen places for preaching, and have organized six classes this year, dropped none, expelled none, and received ninety-six on probation, thirty-five by letter, and thirty-two in full connection. I attend my appointments regularly every four weeks. I have not ascertained the precise number of converts, but can safely say between fifty and one hundred. There are very interesting meetings in many places, and increasing. I have in general large and attentive congregations; and the people appear to take more interest than could have been expected for this section of country, the country being thinly inhabited.

Brethren, I request an interest in your prayers for Walton Mission. I have enjoyed good health this year, and am well pleased with the country and people.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

COLUMBUS CIRCUIT—ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

As I am about to close my labors on this circuit, I wish to dot down a few items in relation to it. This is the third year I have labored on this circuit. The first year I was employed by the Elder, Rev. George Sheffield, as junior preacher; Rev. J. A. M'Cotcheon, P. C. Second year I was sent back as P. C. by bishop Capers; and this, the third year, I was again returned as P. C. by our efficient pro tem. bishop, Rev. G. Garrett. Rev. J. W. Cook was also put on this circuit this year as my associate.

With willing hearts and minds we set to work and filled our regular appointments punctually, holding class-meeting every time we preached, if not hindered by more pressing duties. Our conference collections were taken up early in the year, and we have made assessment all ready. We endeavored to work our field of brush and rubbish, and break up the fallow ground as we went; and even were dropped, and some expelled; others came and had their names erased from the class-books, saying they were not willing to keep the rules of our Church. Many disaffected Church members joined with the world and the doleful lamentation went up—"The ruin—the Church is ruined. Some were exceedingly mad against us, and threatened to bruise our poor, lean backs with the rod; but our God suffered them not to lay the weight of their finger upon us. Many of the good brethren and sisters stood by us in our troubles, and we humbled ourselves and prayed unto our Heavenly Father, and the victory was ours.

We commenced our protracted meetings in June; and have held six, from eight to ten days each. We have held four camp-meetings, and the results have been glorious—two hundred and forty-eight have professed religion, several the blessing of holiness, and the Church has been revived generally.

There are nine local preachers on this circuit; and they have come up to our help in the help of the Lord, in our contests with the enemy of souls—may the good Lord reward them according to their works. A more efficient corps of local ministers, we think, is not to be found on any circuit. Some of them will knock at the door of our next conference for work; and they will be found efficient workmen, let them go where they may.

There are five other young men on this circuit who think they are called to the ministry of the Word, and will fall into ranks as soon as they have sufficient education to qualify them for the work. I also received a letter a few days since from a young man who was converted at our first protracted meeting, and was transferred to another circuit, stating that he felt himself called of God to the ministry, and asking advice, etc. So you see the Lord is raising up laborers for his vineyard in these ends of the earth.

Our stewards have at heart the interest of their preachers; and judging from their zeal and efficiency last year in raising their quarterage collections, we confidently rely upon them this year also. Their hearts have not been warm toward us; and when we have been endeavoring to endure hardness as good soldiers, they have lightened our burdens, and lifted up our drooping hands. May our God bless them, their wives and their children, and bring them all into his eternal rest, is the prayer of one that loves them much.

Our missionary collections have been good, and I expect to carry up to conference at least one thousand dollars, as the free-will offerings of the good people on this circuit.

Bro. Cook expects to leave about the first of November for the State of Missouri, on a visit to his wife's relations. He has been found at his post in every conflict. The Lord go with him and his companion in their journey through life, is the prayer of their fellow laborer.

May the blessings of Heaven rest upon the good people of Columbus circuit: they have fed us, clothed us, and helped us by their prayers and counsel, to do our Master's work, and their kindness will be remembered by us through life.

JACKSON C. H., MISS.

A very interesting camp-meeting has just closed near Jackson C. H., in the bounds of the Ala. Conference. There were several conversions and seventeen accessions to the Church. Bro. Garrett, the Presiding Elder, labored very successfully during the meeting. There was a great deal of old-fashioned Methodist and camp-meeting joy. Bro. Garrett baptised fifteen children and four adults.

Do you suppose that the Bishop of the Church has administered this ordinance to a greater number in all his benevolent journeyings through the State during the year? If the Bishop of the Church intends rebaptising all who join the "Scots," he will have his hands full. More than seventy children have been baptised in the county of Hancock, Miss. Conference, this year, by a preacher of the Methodist "Scot."

CORPUS CHRISTI—TEXAS.

Permit me through the Advocate to acknowledge, and render my thanks for the receipt of five dollars, which you forwarded to me on the 31st August, A. D. 1854, from some unknown friend in Arkansas, for the benefit of the Methodist Church in Corpus Christi, Texas. I have many friends in Arkansas, and some in Louisiana, who would no doubt assist me if they knew my embarrassments and labors, to build a house for the Lord, and plant the Gospel standard in the far Southwest. May the Lord abundantly bless the donor of that five dollars, and incline the hearts of many more to go and do likewise.

Sept. 23. H. S. LAFFERTY, Missionary.

ORION CIRCUIT—ALA. CON.

We have to say, while the Lord is blessing other portions of the land, we likewise have an occasion of much rejoicing, as He has also visited us with much mercy and grace.

We have just closed a meeting, long to be remembered, at Union Chapel. Some thirty-five were added to the Church. Bros. Loflen, Roper, Ozier, More, and Urqhart were all at their post—whose ministry was owned and blessed of God. We also have had interesting meetings at Cannon's Chapel and Rocky Mount. A happy spirit of interest pervades our circuit; and as we have other important appointments ahead of us, we anticipate still more glorious results. Peace and harmony once more pervade our host.

NOTE FROM "JOHN BUNYAN."

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of the 30th ult. I find a letter from the venerable LEWIS GARRETT, pointing out an error in my first sketch of the early Methodists of Mississippi. In my second sketch (if it has reached you) it will be seen that I had corrected the error myself. Randal Gibson was the pioneer I attempted to describe. Tobias Gibson I knew only by tradition. He died in 1804, which was several years before I was born.

Writing only from recollection, and without notes, I may hereafter fall into some anachronisms, and write down names erroneously. These I hope some friend, better informed, will correct; and I shall not regret the error, if it be the means of eliciting a communication of so much interest as that of Mr. GARRETT. I presume there is no other man living who could have given those interesting details of Tobias Gibson, and the devoted young men who followed him to the then wilderness of Mississippi. The memory and portfolio of the venerable gentleman must be full of these valuable reminiscences, the materials of history.

He mentions the names of CLOUN and BOWMAN. I can remember a minister by the name of Cloud, but he was an Episcopallan. He resided in Jefferson, and preached in Natchez. I have, likewise, the journal of a Mr. Bowman, who came from Tennessee to Mississippi in very early times; but my impression always has been, that he was a Presbyterian. I will, however, look it up, and transmit it to you.

Yours truly, JOHN BUNYAN.

DECREASE OF ROMISH PRIESTS IN IRELAND. According to the Rev. R. Bickersteth, there were, about six years ago, upward of 5,000 priests in Ireland. Last year, as appeared from a return, there were only 2,366.

OBITUARY.

At a called meeting of the Dialectical Society of LaGrango College, relative to the death of JOHN ROWLAND, who graduated with honor at this Institution in July last, and who died of Cholern near Vickeburg, on his return home, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, Almighty God has seen fit to remove from earth our esteemed friend and former fellow member, JOHN ROWLAND, who was an agreeable and entertaining companion, a refined scholar, and a faithful and consistent Christian; but who—loaded with the honors of his Alma Mator, and returning to the bosom of his family to receive the approbation of his father, the smiles of his mother, and the caresses of his brothers and sisters—was stopped in his earthly career by the palsying hand of death;—therefore, be it

Resolved, That while we humbly bow to the mysterious dispensation of Allwise Providence, and are deeply sensible that the country has lost one of its most promising citizens, the Church one of its brightest ornaments, and his parents a dutiful and affectionate son, we do sincerely mourn the death of one so young and promising.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathise with the bereaved parents and relatives, and recommend to them, for consolation, Him who was his guide and support in life and comforter in death.

Resolved, That as a mark of esteem and respect, we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days, and request our sister Society to unite with us in the same.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the parents of the deceased, to the Nashville and New Orleans Christian Advocates, and to the Tuscumbia papers for publication.

La Grange College, Sept. 27, 1854.

The subject of this notice was born Nov. 7th, 1829; married to J. M. Whorton, Nov. 7th, 1844; with whom she lived ten years without giving or receiving an unkind word. She professed saving faith in Christ in 1846, and in 1850 joined the M. E. Church, of which she lived an acceptable member until called on the 22d August, 1854, from her labors on earth to her higher rest and refreshment in Heaven.

She affectionately exhorted her husband and friends to meet her in that better world where parting is not known. And after providing for the welfare of her daughter, Eunice, about eight years old (her only child,) she folded her arms and calmly awaited her call which released her from her sufferings, and introduced her to that rest that remains for all God's people.

In this mournful dispensation the husband has lost a wife in the strictest sense, the earth an inhabitant, but Heaven has gained an angel; the Church militant a member, but another accession is gained to the Church triumphant; for she left this witness—She lived right, and no fears are entertained that she died right. F. WALKER.

DIED—October 1st, 1854, at his residence in Harrison county, Miss., Rev. JOHN ALEXANDER, a local preacher in the Pascagoula Circuit, Ala. Conference.

Brother Alexander was born in Penalton county, South Carolina, February 7th, 1796, and was married to Rebecca King in the year 1820. He was a class leader and exhorter for many years in the Methodist Church; but feeling it to be his duty to call sinners to repentance, he received license to preach about 13 years ago, and continued to be a faithful servant in the vineyard of the Lord until death took him away from the walks of men to dwell with angels in the spirit-world. He has left behind him a large family, many brethren and friends to mourn his loss. Though his affliction was severe he murmured not. He said to his wife—"I have many ties of nature to bind me to earth, but I am willing that God's will should be done. All is well. There is nothing between me and my God."

I stood at his head, and saw him draw his last breath. Though he was speechless and in great misery for 36 hours before his death, yet I saw a pleasant gleam pass over his countenance a few minutes before he died.

"The pains of death are past,
Labor and sorrow cease;
And life's long warfare closed at last,
His soul is found in peace.
Soldier of Christ, well done!
Praise be thy new employ;
And while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Saviour's joy."

JAMES L. SAMPEY.

Brickley, Miss., Oct. 4.

The subject of this sketch, Dr. BENJ. D. THOMPSON, died in Camden, Ala., on the 8th of September, 1854, aged 36 years.

In his death the community has been deprived of an energetic and enterprising citizen, and hence his loss is deeply felt. The Methodist Church, of which he has been a member from his youth, will find it no easy task to supply his place. He discharged with energy, the duties of Steward in the Church for several years past. He was also a member of the Financial Board of the Ala. Conference, in whose doings he felt a lively interest. His afflicted wife and seven children, more than all, mourn the sad bereavement.

We mourn not, however, as those who have no hope. During his illness, which lasted more than thirty days, he gave us the strongest assurance that the religion he professed in health was all-sustaining in sickness and death. We trust that his dying admonition to his family may prompt his children to be pious, that they may meet him in Heaven.

Notices.

BRETHREN: It is due to all, and important to some of our body, to have it known that at the last meeting of the Trustees of the Centenary Institute a change was made relative to Beneficiaries. Two years since, when Dr. Mitchell took the entire charge of the Institution he agreed to receive and instruct all the children of Traveling Ministers sent there, upon condition of receiving the due proportion of the Educational Collection, thus making that collection seem to be taken up for his benefit, though it was really for the benefit of the Trustees charged with furnishing gratuitous instruction to this class. This plan was found to be attended with inconveniences, and at the late meeting it was rescinded; the Trustees agreeing to pay for all such pupils, both male and female, and receive the collection. Thus, all ground of delicacy and objection, which might exist in the former arrangement, has been removed; and the Trustees have assumed a responsibility, which makes it important that this collection be laid before all our congregations, and its bearing and importance explained. Will brethren bear this in mind, and not suffer the Board to become embarrassed in carrying out the wishes of the Conference.

DEAR BRETHREN: The Mississippi Conference, as you are aware, will convene in Jackson, La., on the 8th day of November next.

Those Preachers who come by water will land at Bayou Sara, where they will find, on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, private conveyances to bring them to Jackson, a distance of twelve miles, without charge.

Those who come by land will find arrangements made for keeping their horses during the Conference.

On arriving at Jackson, you will please call at Dr. JONES' Drug Store, from whence you will be conducted to your lodgings.

Oct. 4, 1854. A. T. M. FLY.

On and after the 1st November next, the subscription price of the New Orleans Christian Advocate will be $2 per annum in advance; if payment be delayed six months, $2 50; at the end of the year, $3.

After a fair and full experiment of two years, it is ascertained that the paper can not be supported at $1 50 per annum. This will be to all our friends and patrons, and to every reasonable person, a sufficient cause for the change. In labor and material there has been a change to higher rates. The price of printing is now 25 per cent. higher in this city than it was a year ago.

This arrangement has the unanimous recommendation of the Publishing Committees. It puts the New Orleans Advocate at the same rates with the family of Advocates, and cheap still.

Dr Pellman, who was confined 14 years in a mad house in England for the gross offence of pressing a claim against Queen Victoria's husband, has been at length set at liberty under a solemn promise to leave the country and never return. He went to Germany.

The gentlemanly clerk of the Hospital, Mr. Louis O'Hlard, has furnished us with the following interesting tableau, showing the increase and decrease of the yellow fever deaths for every five days from the 14th of July (first case) to the 7th of October:

July 14 to 18	1	Aug. 28 to Sept. 1	67
" 19 to 23	2	" 2 to 6	72

From what we learned yesterday of the returns from the different Cemeteries for the past week, we are led to the conclusion that there will be a decrease of one-third on the last report.

BURNING OF THE STEAMBOAT PRINCESS—Loss of Life.—The officers of the steamboat Frank Lyon, which arrived yesterday morning from Ashton, report the burning of the Princess, Captain Holmes, with the melancholy sacrifice of four lives, and the total destruction of a heavy cargo of cotton.

The Princess was on her way down from Vicksburg, with 3,300 bales of cotton on board, and had reached Fort Adams Sunday morning, when, as she was backing out from the landing a little after daylight, she was found to be on fire. All efforts to check the progress of the flames were unavailing, and she burnt to the water's edge, not a single bale, as far as we have yet learned, being saved.

Unhappily, we have to record the loss of the lives of four of those who were on board at the time. Two of them were lady passengers whose names we have not yet been able to ascertain; the others were two negroes.

Fortunately Capt. Holmes and the crew were all saved, and may be expected down on the Cora No. 2, during the day. On their arrival, we shall be able, we presume, to give fuller particulars of this sad catastrophe.

The officers of the Cora No. 2, arrived at this port last evening, have furnished the following additional particulars:

The steamer Princess took fire in the woodrack, directly below the clerk's office, at about 5 o'clock A. M., while backing out of Fort Adams Landing. She had on board 3039 bales of cotton. The steamer Cora left her burning all her upper works being destroyed. The flames spread so rapidly that every thing in the office, baggage, mails and valuable letters and moneys were lost, with the following persons, as far as could be ascertained:

Lost.—Mrs Wise and child, Miss Wilson, one boy, from St. Louis; Andy Thompson, Jr., pilot; George Barrett, first engineer; two negro women and about fifteen hands and negroes belonging to the boat.

The boat and cargo will nearly be a total lose. Most of the crew and officers came down on the steamer Cora No 2.

BURNING OF THE STEAMBOAT WM. GASTON.—We learn from the Savannah Republican that on Tuesday evening last a fire broke out in the hold of the steamboat Wm. Gaston, then lying at one of the wharves, and that it could not be extinguished until the boat was scuttled and sunk. The Gaston was formerly employed in the Florida trade, but of late has been used as a towboat on the Savannah River. Mr. J. Cunningham, of Savannah, owner of the boat, sustains a loss of $10,000 by this occurrence, as he had no insurance on her.

LOSS OF THE MALTA.—The following are the particulars of the sinking of the steamboat Malta, in the Lower Ohio, and the attendant loss of life, a brief notice of which we published a few days since:

"The steamboat Malta, Capt. Frazer, from Louisville to Memphis, with about 250 passengers on board, struck a snag at the head of Hurricane Island, about fifty miles above Paducah, on the morning of the 29th ult., when she immediately sunk in about twelve feet water.

"Most of the cabin passengers rushed on the hurricane deck, while the deck passengers commenced jumping on a flatboat swinging at the time, and threatening to capsize. From information derived from one of the passengers, the number drowned must have been between thirty and fifty, all except two being deck passengers, among whom were several women and children. An old gentleman, called Baronet, from Indianapolis, who was on his way to White River, was drowned in attempting to jump on the flatboat. The name of the other cabin passenger was not known.

"About fifty of the passengers saved came down to Paducah on the Ruvea, the balance remaining on the William Thomas, which happened to be lying at the time near the scene of disaster, and rendered some service in landing those on the flatboat, by sending out a yawl. Some of the cabin passengers' baggage was lost, and all lives might have been saved had they stuck to the boat. About twenty of the passengers came to Cairo on the Emma Brown, when they got on board the Alock Scott."

The Louisville Courier, noticing the telegraphic report of the sinking of the Malta, says:

"The boat was on her way to Cairo and Memphis, from this port and Cincinnati, with a cargo of dry goods. She received considerable freight here, which was, we understand, covered by $20,000 insurance in the various local offices. A portion of this cargo was for Memphis, Hickman, and Osceola, Ark."

THE LATE JUDGE RUST.—It is with deep regret that we announce to-day the death of our esteemed friend and citizen, the Hon. Edwin Rust, who expired on Friday night, after a painful and lingering illness. [Mobile Register.

STEALING YANKEE THUNDER.—A "clipping" to the following effect accidentally crept into our paper a few days since, minus the due portion of light which we might have threw upon the subject:

"Telegraphic experiments were recently made at Portsmouth, England, with perfect success, at a mill-dam five hundred feet across, by which, with ae operating battery on one side, and the correspondieg dial on the other side, a telegraphic message was conveyed through the water without the aid of connecting wires. An electric wire from each side was submerged, terminating in a plate construoted for the purpose."

This paragraph is now going the rounds of the American press, but there is nothing new in the experiments made by some of John Bull's folks—it is an attempt to steal our thunder. Prof. Morse made the same experiments nine years ago with success, in communicating across the Susquehanna River, and has been for some time perfecting his discovery with the view of forming a telegraphic connection between the United States and Great Britain. Pacific Trade.

It is only within a recent period—since the repeal of the British Navigation Laws—that the attention of American merchants and business men has been closely directed to the immense field open to competition and activity in the Pacific.

Previously, our merchant ships were accustomed to round the capes and do a profitable carrying trade between New York, China and Europe, and our whale ships to find a rich return for their voyages and ventures in the North Pacific; but whatever commodities of Western America, the Sandwich Islands or China, were to be transported either to Europe or this country, doubled Cape Horn as the only feasible route. The carrying trade was almost entirely in English hands—the China trade exclusively. A few years since, however, American vessels entered into competition—clipper ships were built, and the sway departed from Great Britain. Our tonnage in those waters soon equaled, if it did not excel, that of any other nation But still the course of trade was westward, and Cape Horn remained a point and sometimes a port.

The discovery of gold in California operated almost miraculously upon the commerce of the Pacific. The treasure there was discovered and dug out by Americans, and sought an American market. Its transportation around three-fourths of the globe seemed unnatural and unnecessary. Moreover, the immense emigration from this country thither could neither afford so long nor so costly a route. The old ideas of a transit across Panama were accordingly renewed and carried into effect. First came mule paths, then plank roads, and finally railroads Steamships were sent to run between Panama and San Francisco conjointly with others running from New York to Aspinwall. A new route to the Pacific was opened, and every day has proved it more and more feasible, expeditious and desirable. Cargoes can be transported from Canton to New York by the way of Panama with infinitely more rapidity than by Cape Horn—can, indeed, be sent to Liverpool by the same route in a less period than by any other. If a line of steamships were in operation from Canton to San Francisco, the navigation of the globe would be reduced from months to weeks as it already has been from years to months.

This is a view of the comparative time necessary to be employed in carrying off the commerce of the Pacific, and on it depends much that interests the people of this country as well as—more particularly—the people of this section. If the present immense trade of the Pacific can be more expeditiously and cheaply conveyed to its destination by an eastern than a western route, under all the existing disadvantages, how much more expeditiously could it be carried were there a railway leading from one ocean to the other and bringing the Atlantic and Pacific into connection! Time is money—it was the superior speed of our ships that took the tea trade from the English—what, therefore, would be the result to us, and to commerce in general, could the present time between China and Liverpool be reduced one-third? And it can. It is possible, in every sense of the word, for the American people to put themselves on the highway between Asia and Europe. A railroad from San Francisco to the Mississippi would accomplish all this.

The opening of Japan to our trade has strengthened the arguments hitherto urged in favor of such an enterprise. By so much as this event increases our business in the Pacific and our commerce along these far off shores, by just so much it increases the strength of the arguments in favor of a speedier means of communication with that portion of the republic that lies nearest to the Celestial Empire. As trade increases so will travel. If Europeans find they can more quickly reach Bombay and Canton via America than by any other route, they will be apt to adopt the most expeditious way. The greater current always draws in the less; and if once the tide of business is so changed as to flow towards the east rather than the west, it will suck in the commerce of all America bordering upon the Pacific, from Patagonia to Behring's Straits.

The immensity of this traffic may, perhaps, be imagined, but cannot be clearly stated, nor, consequently, the profits that will result from it. Enough is apparent, however, to satisfy every one that wealth and prosperity lie along its pathway, and that our own best interests are intimately connected with it. The Pacific Railroad is the means we look to for securing an end that daily grows more and more desirable and important, and whose value has been doubled by the opening of Japan. If this highway of travel can be led through New Orleans—as it more easily can than through any other great place—it would be of incalculable value to us. May not something be done to render it more certain and more speedy?

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.—The Rev. Dr. Thomas M. Clarke was on the 28th elected by a large majority of clergy and laity. This election was had to supply the vacancy caused by the decease of the lamented Bishop Henshaw, formerly of Baltimore.

Bishop Wainwright, during the past year, confirmed 1427 persons, delivered 248 addresses, preached 23 parochial sermons, ordained 25 deacons and 6 priests, and performed numerous other labors. During the whole twenty-two months of Bishop Wainwright's certificate, he confirmed 4127 persons, delivered 699 sermons and addresses, ordained 87 deacons, ordained 12 priests, consecrated 15 churches, and laid the corner stones of 12 churches.

The Diocese of New-York, P. E. Church, was, in 1838, divided, and formed into two, Eastern and Western. At that time, the whole number of clergymen in the State was 245. In 1841 there were in the Eastern Diocese, 200 clergymen, and at the present time there are 300 clergymen and 20,000 communicants.

The Roman Catholic Council called by the Pope is not to discuss the immaculate conception of the Savior, but of the Virgin It is a doctrine of some powerful sects of the Catholic Church, and especially the Jesuits, that the mother of Christ was conceived without sin, but this has never received the sanction of the highest authority; and it is to discuss and settle this question that the council is called.

The Protestant Episcopal Diocesan Convention in New York balloted for a Provisional Bishop on the 20th ult. On the first trial there were twenty-one candidates, the most prominent of them being Rev. Francis Vinton, D. D., who received 52 clerical and 46 lay votes; Rev. B. J. Haight, D. D., who received 31 and 35; Rev. H. Potter, D. D., who received 29 and 22; and Rev. R. W. Harris, D. D., who received 28 and 30. Number of clerical votes taken, 182; necessary to a choice, 78. On the second ballot there were 178 clerical and 162 lay votes taken. Dr. Vinton received 60 of the former and 59 of the latter; Dr. Haight, 37, 37; Dr. Potter, 34, 33; and Dr. Harris, 28, 31. The third ballot resulted as follows: Vinton, 69, 58; Potter, 52, 32, Haight, 36, 39; and Harris, 12, 10. Number necessary to a choice, 91 clerical, 77 lay. Those were the only ballotings had up to 2½ o'clock yesterday afternoon, when the New York evening papers went to press. A telegraphic dispatch announces that the Convention, after taking a recess until 7 o'clock, again assembled, and on the eighth ballot elected Rev. H. Potter, D. D., of Albany, he receiving 172 votes; and on motion of Dr. Vinton, his election was confirmed by acclamation.

Steamer Burned—Loss of Life.

NEW YORK, October 9.—Dispatches from Detroit state that the steamer Collins has been burnt on the Lake. She was full of passengers at the time, and twenty-three of them lost their lives.

Dr. Graham's Case.

NEW YORK, October 10.—Dr. Graham's counsel have moved for a delay of judgment, to allow their time to make up and file a bill of exceptions, and the Court has granted them twenty days for that purpose. The punishment for manslaughter in the second degree is imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than four, nor more than seven years.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER UNION.

Awful Loss of Life.

NEW YORK, October 11.—The New York and Havre steam packet Union has arrived, with dates from Liverpool to the 23d ultimo. She brings the following heart-rending intelligence:

The Collins steamer Arctic, bound from Liverpool to New York, on the 27th ult., (one week out,) ran into a steam propeller, and, leaking very rapidly, soon began to sink, and extinguished the fires under the boilers. Five boats were launched with all expedition, and were filled with the crew and a few passengers, Captain Luce, the commander of the Arctic, and the mates remaining with the rest of the passengers and crew, and set about the construction of a raft, only one boat remaining with the ship Before the raft was thirty completed a sudden panic seized the passengers, who rushed into the boat and on the raft. In three minutes afterwards the Arctic went down. All in the boat were saved, but only one out of seventy-two that were on the raft escaped Among the last persons seen on the deck of the Arctic before she went down were E. K. Collins (principal owner and agent of the Collins line,) and his two children, Mr. Brown, (a relation of the principal partners of the firm of Brown, Shipley & Co.,) and his family, the Duc de Grammond, (of the French Embassy at Washington,) and J. Cook, of Opelousas, Louisiana.

There were four hundred and thirty-one persons on board the Arctic at the time of the collision, and of these only thirty-one are known to have been saved. These thirty one were in the sixth boat, the last by the ship, and were picked up by the bark Huron, some time afterward. The passengers in the boat were subsequently transferred to the ship Stag, bound for New York. The fate of the five other boats is unknown. Most of those in the boat saved by the Huron belonged to the crew of the Arctic.

The propeller with which the Arctic came in collision was filled with passengers. She received much damage, but her fate is unknown.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE EUROPA.

NEW YORK, October 11.—The Cunard steamer Europa has arrived at Halifax, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 30th of September—one week later than the accounts brought by the Canada. Her accounts embrace the following commercial intelligence:

Liverpool Markets.

LIVERPOOL, September 30.—The demand for Cotton in this market has been rather animated since the departure of the Canada on the 23d inst., and the sales of the week embrace 54,000 bales, of which 2000 have been taken for speculation and 8000 for export, leaving fully 44,000 bales for the trade. Prices have been generally very firm, and a slight improvement has been realized for the lower qualities, though there is not sufficient change to require any alteration in the quotations. Milligan, Evans & Co. quote as follows: Fair Orleans 6¼d; Middling Orleans at 5¾d: Fair Uplands at 6, and Middling Uplands from 5 to 5 1-16d

Flour has been in good request at firm prices, and closes at 31s. 6d. for Western Canal and 34s. 6d. per bbl. for Ohio brands. Wheat has further advanced, and White is quoted at 10s. 11d. per 70 lbs. Indian Corn has been in request and closes at 30s. per quarter for Yellow and White alike. [If this quotation is correct, Corn had advanced no less than 3s. per quarter during the week, the rate reported by the Canada being 30s per quarter. Wheat was quoted at 9 to 10s. by the Canada. Eds.] Lard is without change, and closes at 52s per cwt.

Money and Trade.

The Money market at London has been steady, and Consols are yet quoted at 95¼. Trade in the manufacturing districts has slightly improved during the week.

General News.

LATEST FROM THE CRIMEA.—The latest advices from the Crimea state that the Russian army at Sebastopol, under Prince Menschikoff, had taken position at the river Alma, between Kayalon and Sebastopol, which must be crossed by the allied Army, and was preparing to contest their advance. A battle was probably fought on the 20th of September; and intelligence of the result was hourly expected at Vienna.

Louisiana Items.

The Vermilion Echo, of the 7th, learns that a strict quarantine is established at Opelousas, and that no one will be permitted to enter or remain in the town of Opelousas until ten days shall have elapsed since he was in Washington. The Echo further states that there is no sickness at Vermilionville.

The Pointe Coupee Echo, of the 7th, notices the adjournment of the District Court held there. Ossmacht, convicted of shooting Mr. Bassa with intent to kill, was sentenced to the penitentiary for life. The Echo adds that the Grand Levee there is about being repaired under the direction of the Swamp land Commissioners of that District, and has the following notice of weather and crops:

"On Wednesday last we had an agreeable change in the weather. For the two weeks preceding, a great deal of rain had fallen, injuring the cotton crop very much. We are now in the enjoyment of fine, clear, cool weather, with a north wind. We notice that some of our sugar planters have already commenced cutting their cane, which is quite forward. We think that this latter crop will give a more than average yield in Pointe Coupee, this season.

About 12 o'clock yesterday morning, a fire broke out in the building occupied by the post-office, and every thing belonging to the office was totally consumed. [Covington Adv., 7th.

BLACK VOMIT.—The Buras settlement, generally renowned for the salubrity of its climate, has been visited lately by the black vomit. The fell disease has been raging with fury among children, five or six cases having terminated fatally. This plague has made its appearance in the above named vicinity in its most malignant form. Several families have abandoned their houses and taken refuge in the vicinity of Pointe a la Hache, which continues to be as healthy as ever.

At the last news from Buras' settlement, the disease had lost a great deal of its intensity. [Plaquemine National, 8th.

Further from Texas.

We received our files of Texas papers yesterday morning, from which we make the following extracts:

It is reported in Western Texas that several hundred deserters from the Mexican army have crossed the Rio Grande, and are now scattering throughout different sections of Texas. The Texan recommends that some way be devised by which the names of the citizens can be registered in each county, after giving satisfactory testimonials that they are citizens, so there may be some way of distinguishing them.

The three Mexicans who killed Graham on the Medina, some weeks since, have been acquitted, says the Texan. They were tried before the District Court of Bexar county, Judge Devine presiding, Messrs. Tunstall and Wilcox appearing for the defence.

MESILLA VALLEY EXPEDITION.—We learn from Lieutenant Palfrey, stationed at this place, that Company A, of the 6th Infantry, had arrived from Fort Bolknap, and is expecting orders to proceed at once to San Antonio to meet Major Emory. This company is intended to accompany his expedition to the Mesilla Valley. It numbers twenty-five men. We hope that Major Emory will be provided with an adequate force to protect the commission in its very important labors. Major Emory must have been a passenger in the last steamship. His arrival at San Antonio is daily expected. We have every confidence in this gentleman, to accomplish successfully and promptly the objects of his commission. We have before given testimony of our high appreciation of his appointment. [Austin State Gazette.

CROPS.—The recent heavy wind and rain have injured the cotton crops in this country to such an extent, that our best farmers now are of opinion that not more than a third of an average crop will be raised this season. This great injury has resulted not only from the blowing out of that which had already opened, but also to the rot, which, in consequence of the long wet spell and cloudy weather, has seized upon the green and growing bolls.

Our corn crop has been tolerably good, yet in view of a heavy emigration this fall, and an increased demand, bolders are indifferent about selling. It is now worth seventy-five cents per bushel. [Central Texian.

The pecan crop on the Brazos River is represented to be very abundant this season. The Planter says of this nut, "last year there were scarcely any at all. It is very seldom that they are plenty here two years in succession. But in the Western portion of the State it is a crop which seldom fails."

The Nueces Valley of the 20th has the following items:

INDIANS NEAR FORT CLARK.—By the U. S. expressman, who rides between here and Fort Clark, we learn that not long since a party of Camanche Indians, having in their possession horses and mules to the number of about three hundred, passed within a few miles of the Fort, driving into the latter place detachments of the Tonquewa Indians, between whom and themselves there is a warfare. The Camanche party was represented as quite large and well armed The direction from which they came, and the number of horses in their possession, leads to the conclusion that the horses are those taken a short time since from the Aransas River; on account of which we gave in a previous number. Some six or seven days elapsing after the thefts on the Aransas, before this party passed Fort Clark, tends further to the supposition that they are the same; and the Aransas settlers may feel pretty well assured that their property is now beyond their reach, in the mountain retreats of the Camanches.

Mr. Robert Hord, who has just arrived from Brownsville, informs us that the revolution is still going on in the State of Tamaulipas, Mexico; the particulars we have not time to give in this paper.

RANGERS.—We understand that an order has been received from the Secretary of War at the Adjutant General's Office in this place, relative to the requisition of Gen. Smith upon the Governor of Texas for Rangers. It appears that Gen. Smith has misconstrued the meaning and intention of the Secretary of War, who indicates that no law exists authorizing the calling out of the militia of any State, unless on account of an invasion from a foreign State, or the Indian tribes, and then not for any particular period. The censure that has been cast upon General Smith, from many portions of the State, will now be removed. Our impression is, that a new order will be issued before the organization of the Rangers called out under the present order will take effect.

SUMMARY PUNISHMENT.—A Mexican was arrested a few days since in Goliad, charged with attempting to entice a negro woman belonging to the place, to run away from her master. A trial of the fellow before a general court of the citizens, convened and organized for the especial purpose, revealed that he had fully persuaded the woman to run away, and made all preparations and set a time for their departure. He was found guilty, as charged, and sentenced to be whipped and branded. We learn the sentence was executed with much severity.

The Telegraph, of the 7th, says:

There were but four deaths in all from yellow fever on Wednesday and Thursday, and we have heard of none since, up to the hour of going to press. We heard of but one new case on Wednesday, and after diligent inquiry of physicians and others could hear of no cases on Thursday and Friday. There are now but a very few cases under treatment, and there is good reason to hope that fever has about run its course.

The Galveston Times, of the 4th, says:

The health of our city, we regret exceedingly to state, has not continued to improve as was hoped for some days since As will be seen from the sexton's report, published this morning, there has been an increase in the number of interments—11. Although this is but a slight increase, still it is sufficient to show that the fever has not left the city, and that it is not as healthy as was hoped for. We were informed by a physician that new cases had developed themselves yesterday.

Since the above was in type, we are happy to learn from the sexton that there was no interment yesterday.

Late from California.

The United States mail steamship Empire City, H. Windle, commanding, left New York on the 21, and arrived at Havana on the 9th. After landing mails and passengers, she left again the same day, with the California mails and passengers from the United States mail steamship Falcon, Capt. Gray, from Aspinwall. The United States mail steamship Crescent City, Capt. McGowan, left for New York, on the morning of the 9th inst. The Falcon was to leave with the California mails and passengers, hence per Crescent City, early the next morning for Aspinwall.

The Empire City brings one hundred and fifty-seven passengers, and a cargo of merchandise. She arrived at Pass a l'Outre last evening, and crossed the bar at 0 o'clock this morning.

By the arrival of the steamship Empire City we are in receipt of late and interesting news from Havana, Panama, California and Oregon.

California.

The miners are represented as doing well in every section of the State. The ravages caused by the recent conflagrations throughout the State have in a great measure been repaired. It is now well known that the wheat crop this year will be greatly in excess of the consumption, and it is expected that large quantities of flour will be exported. Eastern shippers will please bear this fact in mind.

The General Jesup, employed in transporting Government stores from the month of the Colorado to Fort Yuma, on her first trip up with freight taken from the General Patterson, about 15 miles below Ogden's Landing, one of the stay bolts in the boiler front, connecting with the firebox, gave way, which, by increasing the strain on the remaining six, carried them away also, allowing all the steam and water to escape. Mr. Jackson, Second Engineer, being in the immediate vicinity, inhaled the steam, and survived but a few hours The wheelsman, Mr Alleff, was also badly but not dangerously burnt. The boat and cargo are not insured.

Another swindle has recently been perpetrated on the city by which it has been mulcted in property valued at $200,000 or $300,000. Some astute individuals hunted up a debt of the city for the sum of $172, obtained a judgment, advertised that certain property of the city would be sold if the judgment was not satisfied, in an obscure corner of a morning paper, and on the 2d of August sold the Kansas Territory.

As the settlement of this Territory is occupying a large share of the public mind throughout the United States, we cannot better occupy our columns than in giving a brief outline of its geography, soil and productions. The boundaries, as given in the law organizing Kansas, are as follows:

"Beginning at a point on the western boundary of the State of Missouri, where the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude crosses the same; thence west on said parallel to the eastern boundary of New Mexico; thence north on said boundary to latitude thirty-eight; thence following said boundary westward to the east boundary of the Territory of Utah, on the summit of the Rocky Mountains; thence northward on said summit to the fortieth parallel of latitude; thence east on said parallel to the western boundary of the State of Missouri; thence south with the western boundary of said State to the place of beginning."

The limits give an extent of about 210 miles from North to South, and about 680 miles from East to West, making an area of nearly 140,000 square miles. The Missouri River, for a distance of 150 miles, including its meanderings, forms the north-eastern boundary of the Territory; that is, constituting four or five miles above the mouth of the Big Nemaha and running with the Missouri River to a point near or perhaps at the mouth of the Kansas. The Kansas, from the junction of the Smoky Hill and Republican Forks, flows almost due East for 180 miles, and divides the Territory for that distance into two parts nearly equal. Almost all the tributaries of the Kansas flow into it from the North side, and their general course is from North and North-west to South and South-east. These tributaries are very numerous, the most important of which are the Grasshoppers, the Big Vermillion, Little Vermillion, Big Blue, Little Blue, the Republican and Solomon's Forks. Nine-tenths of the waters of the Kansas are received from its north side. The lands in the vicinity of these streams and their numerous branches, are well wooded with a heavy growth of oak, black walnut, hickory and other valuable timber. The soil of both prairie and timber is a miracle of fertility, being the rich, dark mould known as mulatto land. The waters of these streams are pure and clear, running over pebbly beds, and affording a constant and almost unlimited water power.

In the extreme northern part of the Territory there are some streams flowing into the Missouri, among which are Independence Creek, Wolf River, and a portion of the Big Nehama and all its tributaries from the south. These, too, are well timbered, and have a constant supply of water contributed by thousands of never failing springs. An easy access to the immense bodies of timber on the Missouri, will afford inestimable advantages in building up towns and cities, and opening farms in the portions of the Territory adjacent to that river. The soil of the entire northern half of the Territory for one hundred and fifty miles west of the Missouri is of the very best quality, and as well supplied with timber as any prairie country of equal extent. For pure spring water it will rival any portion of the United States. This is the region of country that for some years past has excited the cupidity of the frontiersmen; and more recently that of the California emigrants. Its fame has gone abroad through every neighborhood in our broad land, as an almost fabulous paradise.

On the south side of the Kansas River, the Waukaruesa is the only tributary of note, the general course of which is nearly parallel with that stream. The dividing ridge between the waters of the Kansas and Arkansas, is very near the former. The Waukaruesa is well timbered and will afford some water power. Almost the whole of this region is drained by the minor tributaries of the Arkansas and Osage. These are small, remote from each other, destitute of timber, and frequently dry. Immediately below the mouth of Kansas, the eastern boundary line of the Territory leaves the Missouri river and runs due south. In the angle formed by this line and the Kansas is the Shawnees' permanent reservation of 200,000 acres, embracing all the good timber and choice lands for forty miles up that stream. The Osages, Kansas, and other Indian tribes, also have large reservations in the eastern portion of the Territory south of Kansas, which circumstance will retard for some time the settlement of that region. Along the north side of the Kansas the Wyandottes and Delawares have a reservation ten miles wide and extending forty miles up the stream. The soil in the south half of the Territory varies greatly in quality. A narrow strip of land on the Kansas and Waukaruesa is good and well covered with timber, while those on the tributaries of the Osage and Neosho are thin, gravelly, and badly timbered. The country suitable for cultivation south of the Kansas extends about one hundred miles from the eastern boundary, including the Shawnees' reservation.

All these facts, in connection with the great advantages the navigation of the Missouri for nine months in the year will give to the northern half of the Territory, will throw the great center of its business and population considerable north of Kansas River. The great military road, used by the Government, for the transportation of supplies to the posts in New Mexico, on the Arkansas, and Fort Riley on the Kansas, is on the north side of that stream and is said by those best acquainted with the different routes, to be forty miles shorter than any other. The Kansas River is navigable for a small class of boats far a month or more in the spring, but will not afford sufficient facilities of transportation for the country upon its banks.

The Government posts, and the Santa Fe, Utah, California and Oregon trains will offer an excellent market for the surplus grain and stock produced in the Territory for years to come. Besides these, the Indian tribes will be large consumers of the agricultural products of Kansas. Under the new treaties they will receive larger annuities than heretofore, and while these continue, labor with them is out of the question.

The soil on the Missouri, the Kansas, and its tributaries in the northern part of the Territory, for one hundred and fifty miles west, is admirably adapted to the growth of hemp, being the rich porous, "mulatto" mould. The peculiar nature of this soil makes it very desirable for farming. In very wet seasons the water sinks readily into its almost boundless depth, and leaves the surface dry enough for the plow in a short period after the heaviest fall of rain. For this reason, it washes very little, and the running water in its vicinity is clear. From its open then treasured up, it feeds the spriage that abound in a soil of this kind. From the same treasury is drawn the moisture that imparts life and verdure to cultivated crops, wild grass and vegetation of every kind, when those of other soils are burnt up by long drought. The same soil produces corn, wheat, oats, and the cultivated grasses in the highest perfection.

Our space forbids a further consideration of this subject in the present number; we shall continue it, however, in our future issues, until we have given our readers at a distance what information we possess or can acquire in regard to Kansas Territory.

INDIAN MOTHER'S AFFECTION.—The ensuing incident is related in the National Magazine, in its Editorial Jottings in the West:

A chief and his two wives were converted and wished to join the church. He was a truer man and had a warmer heart than was usual among his race. It was necessary that one of his wives should be put away; they themselves, as Christian converts, saw and considered the necessity, but the process of effecting the separation was heart-rending. The details of the process could not be determined in the wretched family, and the missionary was sent for. He found them in the deepest grief. One of the wives was young and beautiful, both in person and character; the other was aged and infirm, but equally esteemed for her virtues. It was settled that the latter should be retained; the other bowed her head and consented; it was right; it was the most merciful arrangement.

But a fearful struggle remained; the young wife was a mother; she had an only child, an infant. The chief loved it; it was, perhaps, to be the inheritor of his authority and his honors; he could not part with it. "Never," said the missionary, "did I witness a more affecting scene than now followed. No possible terms could be agreed upon between the contending affection of the two parents. The mother sat on the ground heart-broken; her tears dropping upon the child that lay in her arms; the chief stood off agonized and weeping, and the elder wife shrunk away from the scene." This missionary proposed at last, I think, that it should be decided by lot, and the child fell to the chief, but the mother clung to it. The missionary urged her to carry it to the arms of the chief, but she could not; her sobs were her only reply. He then directed the chief to take it, but the latter, overcome at the grief of its heart-broken mother, could not step forward to do so. What was to be done? The agreement was binding in Indian life the father was the only cure protector of the child; the mother's own future marriage and protection would be affected, too, by the result. It was a painful, a heart-rending case, but had no alternative. The missionary had to advance to the prostrate woman, and take the child himself. She reverenced his office; she believed the act necessary; and with irrepressible tears and sobs yielded the child; but no sooner had he taken it from her bosom, and placed it in the arms of the father, than the women leaped towards it, and with outstretched hands, struggle to regain it, crying frantically "Give me my child! Oh, give me my child. Do what you will with us, but give me my child!"

I saw the retained wife of the chief at the camp; she bears the highest Christian character, and her husband has; I understand, maintained his Christian integrity. The broken hearted mother has found a refuge in the grave.

Spain and the United States.

The following letter will give our readers some idea of the opinions entertained of us at the present time by one class of English letter-writers. It is, however, merely a harmless and amusingly ridiculous tirade of gasconade and abuse:

Home politics have of late caused the dangers to Cuba from American aggression to be almost lost sight of here, but Mr. Pierre Soulé's recent proceedings and departure have served as a reminder. I have reason to believe that the Spanish Government considers the affair of the Black Warrior as virtually settled. Mr. Soulé, indeed, admitted as much verbally, but on being asked to make a written and official communication on the subject, he postponed doing so, and went away leaving it undone. But there can be scarcely a reasonable doubt that the disagreeable affair has been settled between Senor Cueto and the American Government; and even if it had not been so, the recent removal of Gen. Pezuela from his post of Captain-General of the Island of Cuba would greatly facilitate its amicable adjustment.

No pretext existing, therefore, for open war, piratical expeditions, of the nature of that which so clumsily failed under Lopez, are known to be apprehended. With respect to such illegal and unjustifiable enterprises, I can inform you that the Espartero-O'Donnell Government is without uneasiness. It considers the Island in a state of perfect defence, and is quite tranquil as to the result of the attempts that may be made by the "Lone Star" association, or any other buccaneering band at whose preparations President Pierce may connive, or have connived. It knows the island to be well garrisoned, and believes the spirit of its inhabitants to be generally good. Of this latter point there can be few better judges than General O'Donnell, who so long commanded in Cuba. The troops at present there are upwards of 20,000 infantry, 1,000 cavalry, and five or six batteries of artillery. The infantry are among the best in the Spanish army, and the whole force is composed of men inured to the climate. Of the 6000 infantry ordered to Cuba about three months ago, only 4000 went, owing to the events that have since occurred here. These 4000 were sent to Porto Rico, whence a like number were transferred to Cuba, that no part of the garrison of the larger island might risk being captured by the effects of the change of climate from taking the field if required. Besides the five or six batteries of field artillery, I mentioned some months back, when first the Black Warrior question arose, that in the course of last year a large number of Paixhans guns were sent out to strengthen the batteries of the island.

These, I am assured on excellent authority, are fully armed, and the fortifications in good repair. Then, by far the greater part, indeed, nearly the whole, of the Spanish naval forces are at present at Cuba. Without entering upon the question as to what chance this fleet would have against that of the United States, it is hardly permitted to doubt that it would be able to render an excellent account of any piratical force that the Filibustero party could get together (including even the much bragged of Grapeshot,) and with which it had the fortune to fall in.

There can be no doubt that, if the Americans succeeded in landing in Cuba, they would be joined by some of the inhabitants, but the best information I am able here to obtain induces me to disbelieve that the some would be many. There are about 60,000 Spaniards in the island, the majority of whom have gone thither with a view to acquiring fortunes, and with the intention of returning to Spain. It is clear that every consideration combines to induce these men to resist invaders, and that strong bodies of volunteers well acquainted with the country would turn out, determined to fight to the last in defense of their property and prospects. Among the white men born in the island, there are doubtless annexationists, and also malcontents, who, without being particularly anxious to become citizens of the United States, would like to be rid of Spanish rule. But I am assured that the number of those thus disposed are inconsiderable, and, moreover, the Spanish Creoles are a pacific, indolent race, deficient in energy and daring, and it is likely that the Americans would fion among them more well-wishers than active allies.

It is certainly hard upon Spain that she should be put to constant and heavy expense by the conduct of a Power that professes to be at peace with her. There must be something very faulty in the organization of the United States Government if it cannot enforce its laws and proclamations, and that too, when, as we are informed (and the refusal of the $10,000,000 to the President seems to confirm the truth of that information,) a large majority of the population of the States is opposed to the annexation of Cuba. If things be so arranged in the great American Republic that an unprincipled minority may set law, right, and the wishes of the remainder of the nation at defiance, and prosecute, by means differing in no way (excepting in the greater magnitude of the enterprise) from those employed by the daring pirates, the Blackbeards and Kidds, who formerly infested the Spanish main and lurked in West Indian creeks and inlets, if this be the case, the United States will become a public nuisance, and other nations will be compelled to combine to check her encroachments.

The inordinate self-conceit of the Americans seems to blind them to this. The rifle-shots from behind the cotton-bags of New Orleans, although they killed Packenham and repulsed his men, had, perhaps, for America's own sake, been better never fired. That affair, and some other trifling successes during the short war have largely contributed to inflate our brethren across the water with an exaggerated idea of their own importance and invincibility. What is now passing in Eastern and Northern Europe, might, one would think, make them reflect on the great changes that have occurred during the last forty years. The single word "steam" should suffice to remind them that the same fleets and armies which now check, and probably soon will humble the Colossus of the North, might with equal facility be transported across the Atlantic. It would be deeply to be deplored that such an expedition should ever become necessary; but it is impossible not to foresee the possibility that when the Eastern question is disposed of, there may be a Western question to settle.

Looking at things in a practical light, and putting aside the fictitious prestige which America owes, in great part to American boasting, what could the United States do to prevent a combined English and French fleet from steaming across the ocean, destroying or seizing her navy, and capturing and garrisoning some of her seaboard cities? Should not the possibility of such humiliation and damage suffice to deter the Americans from the course they are pursuing with respect to Cuba? The statistics I have given prove that nearly the whole of the Spanish navy, and at least one-fourth of the whole effective force of the Spanish army, are now required for the protection of Cuba, while the revenue drawn from the island by the mother country is enormously diminished by the expenses of warlike preparations, and trade is injured by a state of anxiety and doubtful security. If the holders of the repudiated Spanish Compons could prevail upon England and France to guarantee Cuba to its present rightful possessor, it would be their best chance of an early adjustment of claims which otherwise, I fear, must yet for a considerable time stand over.

THE EXPERT SMUGGLER.

A few years since, before the French had awakened to the importance of railway communication, the transit from Brussels (noted for its manufactures of lace, carpets and tapestry) to Paris was made by those cumbersome modes of conveyance yeleped diligences. In the year 18— I found myself located in the coupe of one of these vehicles, bound from the former to the latter city, with a middle-aged gentleman and quite a dashingly dressed lady, who might have seen some thirty winters, as my companions. We appeered alike strangers to each other, and the conversation was but slight for several miles. My own knowledge of their language, for they were both French, was but little, though I readily comprehended all that was said, but lacked the power of fluent response. A French woman's tongue, however, is rarely quiet, and soon it pleased Mademe to become communicative, which was the signal for a free interchange of sentiment, in which, it may well be supposed, I was not over boisterous. Encouraged, however, by the lady, for such she was in appearance and address, I did manage to reply to her many interrogatories respecting the United States. The gentlemen also indulged freely in his jokes, and we reached the frontier town, and were summoned to descend, and allow the French Custom-house officers to inspect our bags and baggage, ere we were aware of the distance we had traveled. I gave my arm to the lady, and walked into a room provided for passengers, and was returning to look after my own baggage, when the gentleman who had been with us came back, accompanied by an officer.

"Madame," said the officer, raising his hat, "has a little package of lace, I believe, which I will trouble her to deliver to me."

I must admit that my lady friend underwent a change of the sceasons most rapidly. "Monsieur," said she, "is mistaken. There is my card."

"I have proof," replied the officer, "that you have a package of valuable lace."

"The best in the world. Here is a gentleman who has seen it," and our friend of the coupe, who had stood in the background, was pointed out.

"Yes, Madame," said he, "my respect for the laws of my country obliges me to obey every requirement, and to render assistance to the proper officers in enforcing others, who are so forgetful of their duty, to do the same. Your traveling bag, you may remember, fell from your hand, and, while I stooped to pick it up, I discovered under your mantilla a package which I am sure contains laces. I know that you will—"

Madame here interrupted him with a perfect volley of abuse. She denounced him as no gentleman, and fripon, coquin and coleur were freely poured out. She concluded her essay on his rascality by throwing the package alluded to, and was about honoring him with a Dutch blessing, when he reminded her that were he to put the law rigorously in force, her personal liberty would be in danger.

The officer bowed, and went out with the informer, whom I concluded was a spy, and I attended to the inspection of my trunks, from which a loaded pistol was confiscated as not en regle. I then returned to the room, and there found Mademe, just recovering from that invariable relief to a wounded spirit, a good cry.

"Is it possible," said she, "that we have been traveling all the morning with a Government spy? Three thousand francs of lace gone, Dieu only knows where! What villain customs!"

I alluded to the necessity of such laws, and hinted, delicately as I could, at the impropriety; but political economy is not a subject in which the sex that dreams of laces are deeply versed. The diligence was again packed, and the conductor's horn summoned me to take our places.

The informer was in his place, apparently little troubled by the scene which he had caused. I looked at him, and wondered if his nation boasted of many such law-abiding citizens. I turned the question over in my own mind, whether I could possibly ever arrive at that pitch of patriotism which would induce me to make complaint of a lady who was indulging in such a natural freak of fancy. I freely admit that I set the informer down as a vile spy, and felt very much inclined to intimate that wolves in sheep's clothing were more plenty than they ought to be. If the officer had discovered the lace I should have bowed; but that a fellow-passenger, one to whom a lady had devoted many precious hours of conversation, should thus against her was a step beyond what I conceived politeness or necessity. Not a word was spoken for nearly three leagues. Madame sobbed and sighed. The spy hummed an air with perfect nonchalance, and I meditated. Three leagues more were passed in an equally quiet way, and I began to anticipate with pleasure our arrival at Valenciennes, where I was to pass a few days.

As we approached that city the spy broke the monotonous silence, by gruffly saying: "Madame, of what value were the lace taken from you?"

Madame deigned no reply, and the question was repeated. "Monsieur," she said, "the value of them is more than I can afford to lose. Dependent upon my own exertions for the support of my fatherless children, I am engaged in trade, and, though upon reflection I think I have done wrong, your conduct is most base. It was my first, it shall be my last offence."

"What value, Madame, would the laces have been to you, had you carried the package safely to Paris?"

"I gave in Brussels 5000 francs for them: in Paris I should have sold them for nearly 8000 francs," muttered Madame.

He quietly took out his pocket-book, and counted out ten bills of the Bank of France, of 1000 francs each. "There," said he, "is double the value. Take the money, for it is not tendered as a compliment, but as an equivalent for services rendered. Do not ask me to explain; and in return I merely ask your card."

There was a stoguiarity about the proceeding which excited my curiosity, and on my arrival at Paris, three weeks afterward, I called upon Madame, who kept a very neat lace store in Rue St. Honore. As I entered she recognized me, and in her back-parlor, where her two daughters were busily engaged in giving the finishing touches to some articles of novelty, perused a letter which she had received but a few days previous:

PARIS, April, 18—.

MY DEAR MADAME: As your companion on a recent trip from Brussels to Paris I found myself obliged to turn informer—I say obliged, and I will show you why. I am largely engaged with a house in Paris in importing laces, and by a system of bribery I am sometimes enabled to pass large quantities duty free. On the occasion when I met with you, I had in my different valises, trunks, and on my person, laces valued in Brussels at 200,000 francs. I expected to meet at the frontier a Custom-house officer with whom I had an understanding; but, on arriving, I found he had been located in a different section of the country. As I stated at the time, I saw the package of lace in your possession, and the idea at once occurred to me that, by informing of you I might so obtain the confidence of the officers as to allow my own trunks to pass in without inspection. Finding my friend had been removed, I inquired for the officer is command, and to him I made the disclosure. I was right in my conclusions; for, when I began to open my own trunks, he at once assured me it was useless, and affixed his official seal to my 200,000 francs of laces. I made you restitution, and have now given you an explanation. My name and address I must still conceal, but I will sign myself

One of the citizens of Nashville was thus accosted by his landlord: "As every thing is on the rise, I feel it my duty to raise your rent." "Sir," said the tenant, "I feel truly grateful, for times are so hard, that it is really impossible to raise it myself."

DRY WIT.—Dr. Jasper Main, who lived in the reign of James I, of England, was celebrated as a scholar and a wit. He displayed through life a strong propensity for innocent raillery and practical jokes. Just before he expired, he told his servant, who was sadly addicted to intemperance, that he had bequeathed him "something that would make him drink." The servant, as soon as his master was dead, impatiently opened the legacy, expecting, of course, to find a heap of treasure; but alas! his disappointment was great in findieg nothing but a red herring!

DEATH OF AN EDITRESS.—Mrs. Ann Royal, the well known editress of the "Huntress," published in Washington city for many years, died on Sunday the 1st inst., at a very advanced age.

FOR THE CURE OF

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,

BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,

CROUP, ASTHMA AND

CONSUMPTION.

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a Remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

August 4, 1853.

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your CHERRY PECTORAL in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. Affecting the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect,

DR. J. C. AYER: Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefit it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours, with respect, JOHN C. WHITLOCK.

THE Rev. P. J. ECKLES having resigned the Presidency of SHARON FEMALE COLLEGE, for the purpose of settling the estate of his father, recently deceased, the Board of Trustees wish to procure the services of some gentleman suitably qualified to take charge of said Institution.

The qualifications necessary are—ripe scholarship, unimpeachable character for morals and piety, and membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. A married gentleman, whose lady could take charge as teacher and governess, would be preferred. The President, by the rules of the Institution, is authorized to employ his Assistants (subject to the approval of the Trustees). His family will have the privilege of residing in the College buildings; and the Teachers receive the entire tuition fees of the Institution—numbering from sixty to eighty—with a fair prospect, at present, of one hundred students. Additional buildings are now upon the eve of erection for the accommodation of the teachers and students.

Letters addressed to Rev. H. H. MONTGOMERY, and others, Sharon, Madison county, Miss., will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

N. B. The public are hereby assured that the exercises of the Institution will be opened, as usual, on the First Monday in October next, by competent persons temporarily employed until a regular engagement can be made.

THOS. C. BRADD, A. M., Principal.

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages now presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Bunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

D. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

Marion Female Seminary,

MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALA.

THE EXERCISES of this institution will be resumed on Monday, the 2d day of October, under the charge of the Rev. Jas. R. Armstrong, as Principal, assisted by nine Professors, Teachers and Officers.

It has just closed its present session with one hundred and thirty-three students, seventy-seven of which number were boarders. There is but one session of nine and a half months.

Pupils can enter at any time during the session, chargeable from the beginning of the month in which they commence to the close of the session. No deduction will be made but at the discretion of the Principal.

The Principal, with his family, resides in the building. The female teachers also reside in the Seminary. Boarders in the institution are under the control of the Principal at all times. A Steward, in the employment of the Principal, of experience, urbanity of manners, and faithfulness in the duties, a Matron who constantly and kindly ministers to the private wants of young ladies, and especially in sickness, a Governess who directs them in their exercises and amusements, superintends the order of their private apartments, instructs them in certain domestic duties, and guards their private, personal habits, manners and morals, always aided by the presence and active co-operation of the female teachers. The Principal and his lady secure to those committed to their charge every necessary and proper comfort and kindness. Here they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations respecting neatness, order, punctuality and economy. They have regular hours for study and recreation, for rising and retiring, for eating, domestic duties, and social enjoyment among themselves.

The institution is furnished with a new and superior apparatus in the departments of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. There is also a large collection of Maps, Charts, Plates, Diagrams, Globes, etc., for simplifying the principles of Geography, Physiology and Astronomy.

In the department of Drawing, Painting and Embroidery there is a fine collection of Drawing Cards, Engravings, Pictures, Paintings, Patterns, and every other convenience important in the prosecution of these departments.

There is in connection with the institution a Library of more than one thousand volumes, and a Cabinet of several hundred specimens.

The institution is furnished with six Pianos, five Guitars, and one Harp.

MUSIC.—The Professor at the head of this department is equal to any in the country. He is a superior vocalist, a fine performer on the Piano, Harp, Guitar, Violin, Violincello, etc. He has enjoyed ten years experience as a teacher of music in the best institutions in the Union, is profoundly versed in the principle of harmony, and is a rare master of the sublime science to which he has devoted himself.

LOCATION.—Its salubrity, intelligence, morality and public spirit are unsurpassed.

PERMANENCY.—Parents may send their daughters here with confidence in their completing their education under the same course of instruction and system of discipline. Every thing conspires to fix the permanency of the Principal a matter of duty, pleasure and interest.

TEACHERS.—The Principal, himself a native of Alabama, surrounds himself with a corps of teachers of known efficiency and tried success, nearly all of whom have been reared in the South, thus ensuring a better acquaintance with Southern peculiarities and sympathy with Southern views and interests. Thoroughness is our motto in teaching. We ascribe the true importance to the harmonious development of the physical, intellectual and moral nature.

Reports are sent to patrons once every two months, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and conduct of the pupil. In our system of merits and demerits scholarship and conduct are connected.

The Principal regards it as his most important duty to attend to the moral habits of his pupils and to imbuing their minds with proper religious principles.

The facilities for acquiring the French and other modern languages are superior.

There are daily exercises in Orthography, Reading and Writing. Great attention is bestowed on letter-writing and composition.

Lectures are delivered weekly to the junior and senior classes on various subjects of Science and Literature, on which they take notes and are subsequently examined.

The Principal will be assisted in the Collegiate department, the ensuing session, by a gentleman, a Professor of long experience, of the ripest scholarship, and the most superior qualifications as a teacher. He will take charge of the department of Mathematics and some of the higher English branches and the control of the main study hall. Visitors are not received by boarders except with suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.

No accounts will be opened in Marion. Money must be deposited or forwarded for all necessary and proper purposes. Let pupils be supplied from home as far as is practicable.

All sums of money for the use of pupils must be deposited with the Principal.

One hundred and forty-five dollars will pay the board and tuition of a young lady for the entire session in the collegiate course. $175 will embrace the languages. $235 will embrace board, tuition in the collegiate department, on the Piano, and in the languages.

Books, Stationery, Sheet Music, Drawing, Painting and Embroidery material is furnished by the Principal. The cost of these articles varies with the advancement of the pupil. Every effort will be made to secure economy in their use.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY ARGUMENT.

In his famous letter to the Missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M. among the Choctaws, the Rev. S. B. Treat, Secretary of the Board, dogmatically pronounces upon the sinfulness of the "System of Slavery," and employs some very extraordinary arguments to sustain his decision. As we propose to criticise these arguments, we present them to our readers in his own words.

He thus sums up his arguments:—

"I have already said that we regard domestic slavery as at war with the rights of man, and opposed to the principles of the Gospel. We do not claim that Christ or his Apostles expressly condemned this system in the New Testament. But we do claim that they said and did much that, by fair implication, bears strongly against it; while on the other hand they said and did nothing that, by fair implication, gives it the least sanction. Suppose, for example, that brief but comprehensive injunction of our Saviour, 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,' to be carried out to its legitimate results. What would become of slavery? In all its essential features it would cease at once. Whatever might be the result as to the legal relation, its spirit would die. And then the Scriptures invest every man with privileges and responsibilities, which are utterly inconsistent with his remaining in a state of servitude. The slave can not receive the fruit of his toil according to the Divine arraagement. He can neither enjoy all the rights nor perform all the duties of a husband or parent, as set forth in the Bible. He can not develop his intellectual powers which, as seen in the light of revelation, are a treasure beyond price. Above all, he can not in most cases have that untrammeled access to God and his holy word, which is worth more to him, as a lost yet immortal and accountable being, than any thing else.

"It is not our design to go into any extended argument on this point; and still it may be well to make a passing allusion to the reference which is often drawn from the instruction in the New Testament, addressed to masters and servants. The question is—Do these injunctions concede or recognize the right of property in a human being? For it does seem to us, that every thing which is said to masters or servants, is consistent with the hypothesis, that the Apostles regarded the general relation as unnatural and sinful. Any one at the present day, who believes the system to be wrong, and labors, however diligently for its termination, may with perfect propriety use the same language. Besides, if these directions of which we are speaking, prove that slavery is right now, they prove that this institution as it then existed in the Roman empire, giving the master the power of life and death over, was also right; a proposition, we presume, that no one will undertake to defend."

To attempt the refutation of an argument, that concedes in the very second sentence the whole ground in dispute, appears to be a work of supererogation. Its endorsement by a large body of the learned and influential men of the North, is our only apology for its consideration. Mr. Treat, and the Board by their endorsement, "do not claim that Christ or his Apostles, expressly condemned this system." It is condemned only by implication. This then is their strong position. They infer—and upon that inference they charitably assign a large portion of the American Church over to a state of voluntary sin. If they are not expressly condemned, either by Christ or his Apostles, what right have they to go beyond the record, and condemn the sentiments of Christ? To our own Master we must stand or fall. It is a tremendous usurpation of the Divine prerogative for them to snatch the thunder-bolts of heaven, and hurl them at the heads of those who have not been condemned by the Judge. We regard such rash denunciations as bordering upon the most offensive sins which any creature can commit. This system of abolitionism, in its spirit, its language, and denunciations, is, then, far more sinful in the sight of God, than the system of slavery.

But why do they attempt to confine the argument to the New Testament Scriptures? Is not the Old Testament a part of Divine Revelation? Are not its teachings authoritative as those of the New? It is an ugly thing for professed Christians to ignore the Word of God. Does not that fact create a strong presumption that Mr. Treat and the Board knew that their whole proceedings were contrary to the Bible? The Old Testament is of equal authority with the New. It is that standard of Divine truth to which Christ always appealed, and to which he directed his hearers in their search after truth. We greet many things in the Old Testament as too knotty for "higher law" faith and practice; hence it must go by the board. It is decidedly too antiquated for our "fast age." If Mr. Treat, instead of Moses, had been the amanuensis of the Holy Ghost, he would have ventured to suggest a change in the language of the fourth and of the tenth commandments, so that they should not so plainly teach that we may lawfully have property in our fellow men. We fear he could not have mentioned the fact that Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, and the "Friend of God", was a slaveholder, had slaves bought with his money. If Mr. Treat had been then, as now, the Law-giver to the people of God, we should never perhaps have heard of such a law as this—Exo. xxi: 20th and 21st. "And if a man smite his servant or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished; for he is his money." Than this, no language can more clearly and explicitly teach the very thing condemned by Mr. Treat and the A. B. C. F. M. It is not only lawful to own slaves, and hold them as property, as "money." It surely very unbecoming in professed Christians to undertake the enactment of purer than those of the Bible. We would rather not do so. The Bible standard is high enough for us. We want no "higher law."

Again, if Mr. Treat had been called upon to decide who should eat the passover, as he has now attempted to say who ought to partake of the Lord's Supper, his sympathies would have been very unlike those of the divinely inspired Moses: Ex. xii: 44. "But every man servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof. v: 45. A Foreigner and a hired servant shall not eat thereof." Slaveholders may remain well satisfied, when thus sustained by Heaven's law-book, however much Mr. Trent and his coadjutors may condemn. But we hasten on to consider his great proof-text.

"Suppose," says Mr. T. "for example, that brief but comprehensive injunction of our Saviour, 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' to be carried out to its legitimate results. What would become of slavery? In its essential features it would cease at once." This argument proves too much, and of course is worthless; for example, if a man is rich, he should divide with his poor neighbor, because if he was poor and his naighbor rich, he would desire his neighbor to do so to him. Mr. Treat has entirely misunderstood the law he has quoted. He would cause our Saviour to teach that covetous desires are lawful, and should be satisfied. If I desire to have my neighbor's property without giving an equivalent, he is bound, according to Mr. T., to give it to me.

We will not stop to notice the slanderous misrepresentations of slavery. Every one conversant with our domestic relations, knows that those assertions have no other source than the heated imaginations of Abolitionists.

But the most monstrous and wicked position of the whole argument, is contained in the following words:

"But why did not the Apostles, directly and unequivocally, affirm the sinfulness of slavery? Why did they not insist upon the duty of emancipation? Simply because (if we may venture to give an opinion) they saw that such a course, in their circumstances, would not soonest and best extirpate authority in the dealings of God with his covenant people, and in the life of Christ."

This is neither more nor less than an assertion, that Christ and his Apostles for fear of man suppressed a part of the will of God. Oh! how unworthy, how blasphemous the intimation. Surely, Mr. Treat will one day repent that he ever made it, and the A. B. C. F. M., that they ever endorsed it. The vilest infidel never made an assertion more dishonoring to Christ. Professed Christians are in an awful condition, when they can consent to vilify the Saviour in order to sustain their rash judgments.

The amount of the whole argument is this: Christ and his Apostles did not condemn slavery, but they would have done so, if they had not been afraid of men. Can any other instance be cited in which they timidly kept back a part of the Divine Testimony? On the contrary, were they not remarkable for their bold and fearless condemnation of vice in every condition of society. Surely Paul exhibited no signs of fear when he stood before Festus Agrippa. The doctrines he taught every where exposed him to persecutions, sufferings and death; and greater evils could not have befallen him by the condemnation of slavery. But according to Mr. Treat, Paul "did not insist upon the duty of emancipation, because he saw that such a course in his circumstances would not soonest and best extirpate the evil." Well, slavery has continued from that day to this, and Mr. Treat thinks that Paul's method of getting rid of the evil is too slow, and therefore he will adopt the opposite plan—condemn slavery and insist upon emancipation. The result of the mad interference of himself and his abolition coadjutors, is simply to retard, if not totally counteract every effort for the amelioration of the condition of the slave. Such men are the slaves' worst enemies. Such emancipation as they desire, will only be effected by as large a waste of human life, and as large waste of property as the wars of Bonaparte cost Europe.

Mr. Treat says that the injunctions of the New Testament are "consistent with the hypothesis, that the Apostles regarded the general relation as unnatural and sinful." We will quote some things said and done by the Apostles, that our readers may judge for themselves. "Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart as unto Christ; not with eye-service as men pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart, with good will doing service as to the Lord and not to men: knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord whether he be bond or free. And ye Masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening, knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is their respect of persons with him." Eph. vi: 5, 9. Similar language the Apostle addresses to the Colossians: chap. iii: 22, 25, and chap. iv: 1. In writing to Titus, he says "Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them in all things, not answering again; not purloining, but showing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things." Tit. chap. ii: 9, 10. In a like spirit, Paul sends back to Philemon, his fugitive slave Onesimus. How unlike the teachings and actions of the Apostles of Abolitionism. Paul was no teacher of "higher law:" was no advocate of "under-ground railroads." He was strictly honest, strictly just. The Apostle Peter wrote thus, "Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward. For this is thankworthy if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully. For what glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults ye shall take it patiently? But if when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God!" 1st Peter, chap. ii: 18, 19.

Now it seems to us that these injunctions of the Apostles are utterly irreconcilable with the idea, that they regarded slavery as sinful, and the slaveholder as a man-stealer. But what will decide the matter in the mind of every honest seeker after truth is, that these exhortations and injunctions for the regulation of these relations which are acknowledged to be lawful; with exhortations to parents and children. Here the Apostles ever given rules for the regulation of the conduct of men in any other sinful relation? If not, then the assumption that this relation is sinful is wholly gratuitous. Mr. Treat says our argument proves too much, for it would prove, that the institution as it then existed in the Roman empire, giving the master the power of life and death even, was also right. We say by no means. The Roman laws gave power to the parent over the life of his child—that does not prove the relation wrong. The Romans may have erred in placing such a power in the hands of the master, but self-interest in 999 cases in every 1000, would make it safer there than in the hands of an uninterested magistrate. But that law is not the institution, is not the relation of master and slave any more than some of our laws, enacted for our defense against foreign incendiaries. Besides, these very injunctions of the Apostles show that they were disposed to correct all the evils which had attached to slavery, just as they corrected all the evils which had attached to the relation of parents and children, and remove all suspicion that they would have failed to condemn the institution if it had been sinful.

But our remarks are already too extended, and we can not close them better than in the language of Paul to Timothy. "Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honor, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren, but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort. If any man teach otherwise and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing gain is godliness; from such withdraw thyself." 1st Tim., vi.: 1-5.

"EARLY MISSISSIPPI METHODISTS."

MR. EDITOR: When I wrote an article dated September 20th, which I mailed to you, I thought of writing more, but advanced age and infirmities forbid promises. I live a day at a time. In 1807 Elisha W. Bowman and Thomas Lastley crossed the Mississippi river in quest of souls. Bowman went to New Orleans, but the then state of things were so repulsive that he left and explored the swampy regions of Louisiana. In these detached and sparse settlements, Thomas Lastley toiled, swimming the bayous, and suffering in various forms, until his scant store of clothing was exhausted, and no means to replenish. I saw and conversed with these pioneers after their return to Tennessee. Their personal appearance, their thread-bare garments and worn state of their equippage, evinced that they had performed hard service, and that without the most distant prospect of worldly honor or emolument.

These devoted men were succeeded in 1808 by Jacob Young, P. E., Richard Browning, John Travis, Z. McMinn, James Axley and Anthony Houston. Washataw and Appelosas, in Louisiana, were added to the district. Here Axley labored, and here he raised a monument to his name by erecting a log meeting house, principally by his own hands, subsequently known as Axley's chapel.

These were the earliest Mississippi Methodists, as far as the preachers were concerned, up to 1808. The number of church members reported by Tobias Gibson in 1802, was 100 whites and 61 colored. These were scattered in small classes through the then limited settlements from Natchez to the Walnut Hills, now Vicksburg. The number had slowly and gradually increased in 1808 to 293 whites and 92 blacks. The obstructions to a rapid and large increase were at that period in south-western history, multiform and serious, and what was gained to the Church, was, by the divine blessing, effected by much personal sacrifice and indomitable perseverance. The Western Conference continued to supply preachers for this hard service; many of whose names, as well as their "deeds of noble doing," have passed into oblivion. In 1810 Miles Harper and Samuel Sellers came to Mississippi, and labored several years with some success. In 1811 or 1812, Thomas Griffin, Richmond Nolly, Drury Powel and Lewis Hobbs, were sent from the South Carolina Conference. Their journey through a savage wilderness, when the Creek Indians were hostile, was indeed full of hardships and peril. Thomas Griffin was destined to Washataw. In this solitary region and about Alexandria, then little better than a savage wilderness, he spent two years of extreme suffering, encountering the most serious obstacles, amidst the troubles of an existing war, until his clothing was exhausted, and he far from home, poor and penniless. On entering on his second year, himself and Richmond Nolly, in feeble health, crossed the Mississippi in January, and in the midst of storm—traveled through the swamp eased in steel—found no shelter them at night—parted in the morning to fill appointments in different directions. Poor Nolly, a feeble man, in attempting to swim a creek, became entangled in the brush—he and his horse parted; he was found lying by the side of the path dead. A faithful Indian took care of his horse, etc.

These were some of the things endured by early pioneer missionaries.

RELIGION IN THE SOUTH.

The Am. Messenger, published at Philadelphia, surveys the field and its means of Grace:—

"The population of the South and Southwest is nearly ten millions, (9,664,656,) of which 6 460,343 are white and free colored, and 3 204,313 are slaves. The number of buildings used for public worship is stated by the census at 17,924, affording accommodation for 5,546,434, or 300 persons each. Of the whole number of churches, 7,017 are Methodist Episcopal, 5,661 Baptist, 1,860 Presbyterian, 585 Protestant Episcopal, leaving 2,801 for all other sects. Of the 1,706 Congregational churches in the United States, only two are in the South—one in South Carolina and one in Georgia.

"These important statistics show that church accommodations are afforded in evangelical places of worship for about one-half the aggregate population, a large a proportion, perhaps, as in almost any other part of the world. But they are liable to deceive the reader, unless he bear in mind the fact that more than any where else the South is an agricultural region, and the population is dispersed over an immense territory, and that multitudes live at a wide distance from the place of worship. It should also be remembered, that in large districts of the South, almost universally indeed, out of the cities, and the comparatively few villages and towns, public services are held but once in two or four weeks, and even less frequently in many instances; so that the apparent adequacy of the means of Grace comes, on examination, to be unreal, as to hundreds of thousands of the population, if stated Sabbath services be the standard.

"One great fact respecting the field before us is worthy of consideration, as bearing on the feasibility of generally evangelizing the South; the preponderance of evangelical sentiment, and the freedom from fatal doctrinal errors. Organized error has but a feeble foothold there. With the exception of a few hundred 'anti-missionary,' churches, and about three hundred Roman-catholic churches, chiefly in the States ceded from France and Spain, the number of heretical bodies is very insignificant, and the masses are unprejudiced against the Gospel. Thus one of the greatest obstacles to the conversion of men, such as the prevalent superstition of the Irish Papists and the infidelity of German emigrants, and the various errors in religion of many parts of the country, do not seriously hinder evangelising movements there.

"Consequently there is almost unrestricted access to rich and poor, bond and free, for kind, single-hearted efforts to win souls to Christ."

DISCIPLINE AND RESTRAINT FOR THE YOUNG.

The eldest son of President Edwards, congratulating a friend on having a fine family of sons, said to him with much earnestness, "Remember, there is but one mode of family government. I have brought up and educated fourteen boys, two of whom I brought, or rather suffered to grow up, without the rod. One of the-s was my youngest brother; and the other Aaron Burr, my sister's only son," both of whom had lost their parents in their childhood; "and from both my observation and experience, I tell you, sir, 'male-pig-sugar government'—will never answer. Beware how you let the first act of disobedience in your little boys go unnoticed and, unless evidence of repentance be manifest, unpunished."

Of all the sermons I ever heard, long or short, this has been among the most useful, so far as this world is concerned. It is a solemn lesson, to be prayerfully pondered by all parents and guardians. The Bible lays down four great rules, involving the four great elements of the successful religious training of children—prayer, instruction, example, and restraint. And it is doubted if a solitary case can be found where all these have been united, where the child has not followed in the footsteps of the pious parent; while on the other hand, if but only one of the four has been neglected, it may have been the ruin of the child.

Remember, Christian parent, it is not enough to pray for, or even with your children, if you do not also instruct them; and it will be in vain to instruct them, if your own example contradicts your teaching; and in vain will be the prayer, the instruction, the example, if like Eli, when your children do wrong, you "restrain them not." But let all be found united; in all be found faithful to your duty; and you may trust in God that he will fulfil his promises, and that your children will grow up to serve Him, and to bless you for your fidelity to their highest interests.

THE METHODIST THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE at Concord, N. H., promises soon to become one of the largest, if not the largest school of the kind in the country. It contained, the last year, nearly ninety students, and the property of the institution amounts to $54,150 50.

Four of the members of the Missouri Legislature are "in a bad fix," being pledged to vote with the majority, and no party has a majority.

THE NEW BORN AND THE DEAD.

"Lavater, in his 'Phisiognemy,' makes the following curious remarks: "I have had occasion to observe some infants, immediately on their birth, and have found astonishing resemblance between their profile and that of their father. A few days after, this resemblance entirely disappeared; the influence of the air and food, and probably the change of posture, has altered the design of the face that you could have believed it a different individual. I have afterward seen two of these children die, the one at six weeks and the other at four years of age—and about twelve hours after their death, they completely recovered the profile which had struck me so much at their birth; only the profile of the dead child was, as might be expected, more strongly marked and more terse than that of the living. On the third day their resemblance began to disappear. I know a man of fifty years, and another of seventy, both of whom when alive, appeared to have an manner of resemblance to their children, and whose physiognomies belonged, if I may so express myself, to a class totally different. Two days after their death, the profile of one became perfectly conformed to that of his eldest son, and the image of the other father might be traced in the third of his sons. This likeness was quite so distinctly marked as that of the children, who, immediately after their death, brought to my recollection the physiognomy which they had at their birth."

EXTRAORDINARY SUPERSTITION IN DEVONSHIRE. An instance of the intense feelings of superstition which pervades the ignorant among our rural population in the West of England occurred at Northlew last week. Some gipsies having encamped in the neighborhood, one of the female members of the tribe ascertained from the wife of a farm-laborer that she had a daughter in the last stage of consumption. The gipsy represented that the child had been "bewitched," and that she could rule the spell, which would effect a cure, for two sovereigns. The mother of the child cheerfully paid the money, but next day the wild gipsy returned it, saying it was not sufficient, but £20 more in gold would do it. The cottager's wife, in her native simplicity, went and borrowed £10 from a neighbor, and with another ten sovereigns which she had in the house, saved from her husband's earnings, added the £20 to the £2 already in the gipsy's hands. Soon as the money was paid, the affrighted woman was bound over to secrecy by the gipsy, who mumbled over a few disjointed texts of Scripture, and left, with the promise that the child would be cured on the following Friday, when no angel would appear and return the money. Since that time, however, it is needless to add, neither gipsy nor money have turned up, although the impoverished husband and the police have been daily on the look out for the gipsy impostor. On Sunday last, another specimen of deep-rooted superstition was presented within the porch of the western door at Exeter Cathedral. As the congregation were leaving the church, a decrepid old woman took up a position within the porch, bawling a begging petition, setting forth that she had been attacked by a paralytic seizure, and had been recommended by "the wise woman" to get a penny each from forty single men, on leaving the church, and her infirmity would, by this charm, be banished for ever.

LIFE AFTER FREEZING.—It is said that the scientific men of France are at present speculating on a recent instance of a young man brought to life after being frozen eleven months on the Alps. The blood of a living man was infused into the veins of the frozen youth, and he moved and spoke. The experiment was afterwards tried on a hare, frozen for the purpose, with complete success.

It has been the practice at the hospice of St. Bernard for the monks to keep the frozen bodies of unknown travelers for months, that they might be recognized, and in Norway, according to the recent work on that country, published in England by Prof. James D Forbes, the people, in some of the valleys, during the long, weary winters, keep the bodies of deceased persons in a frozen state till spring, when they are borne to the church for the last time; but this is the first instance on record of resuscitation after death was for some time apparent.

In some parts of this country it is quite common to transfer fish from the waters of one locality to those of another, when they are frozen so hard that they may be broken like a stick by bending. In this State the Otsego bass has been packed in straw and conveyed to a considerable distance, and, after being placed in cold water, gradually thawed to life again. Nearly all the fresh fish brought to our markets, and forwarded hence into the interior, are packed in ice. In this manner the Eastern people ship fish, meats, fruit, etc., to the East and West Indies, in their ice cargoes.

Some years ago, an entire mammoth was found on the northern coast of Russia, in an excellent state of preservation, to the very hide and hair, and after its discovery and displacement animals partook heartily of its flesh. The tusks were brought to St. Petersburg, where they are still to be seen.

The Bay of Samana.

In the north-eastern corner of the Island of St Domingo lies a large and beautiful bay, known as Samana. It exceeds twenty miles in width in some places, and runs up into the country at least fifty miles, between pleasant and fertile coasts, abounding in all tropical productions. With the possible exception of Havana, there is no harbor in all the West Indies so large, so commodious, and so accessible; capable of affording ships so much safety from storms and so many facilities for repairing and obtaining supplies. It looks out closely into the Atlantic, and is centrally situated with regard to the Windward and Leeward Islands.

For a number of years past our Government has desired to obtain this bay from the Government of St Domingo for the purpose of creating a naval station there. Every country, of any maritime importance whatever, has better harbors in the Gulf than our own, although there is no country to whom they are so valuable. The Spaniards have Havana, the English Kingston, and the French, not only those of their own islands, but the privilege of using ports belonging to other powers. We are confined to a poor and insufficient harbor at Pensacola, incapable of containing a squadron or even a single ship-of-the-line. In point of fact, the nation whose commerce in the Gulf exceeds that of all other nations combined, and whose interests are most intimately connected with what occurs there, has the least accommodation for her squadrons and the poorest defence for her mercantile marine. The deficiency can not be remedied by the opening of any new ports along our Southern sea shore, and we are driven to the alternative of leaving things as they now are, or of obtaining what we want from another power.

The latter plan has been chosen by a number of Administrations, and the bay of Samana selected as the most desirable of any for the purpose mentioned. Negotiations have been at different times opened with the Government of St. Domingo on the subject, and specific overtures made. A Mr. Green was dispatched thither, as special envoy, some years since, with instructions to do all that he could towards the furtherance of so desirable a result. Mr. Green's mission failed, however, as signally as those that had preceded it, and the whole affair passed from the public mind. Within a few days the old interest in the matter has been renewed by the statement that the President of the Spanish Republic of Dominion has ceded or leased the exclusive occupancy and use, for the term of one hundred years, of the Bay of Samana and adjacent lands, to the United States Government; that the President, Santana, is favorable to the wishes and movements of our Government, as securing to himself and his petty State the moral and physical protection of a powerful country, against his superior neighbor, Soulouque; that the frigate Columbia, on her recent cruise to San Domingo, brought out Gen Caxneau as American Chargo d'Affaires, and that every thing is going on swimmingly for our Government.

This statement is not official, nor is it so fully authorised by other authority as to be entirely reliable. There is a strong probability, nevertheless, that something has been accomplished that will enure to our advantage. Even such a cession as has been made to us by Japan, and asked for by us at Spezzia, would be highly important and valuable. Our fleets would have a sufficient harbor south of Norfolk; one from which they might with like facility overlook the Leeward and Windward Isles, sail for the Gulf, stretch away along the Atlantic or Pacific coasts, or turn their prows seaward.

It can not but be acknowledged that we are in want of a naval station in the West Indies, and that the Bay of Samana meets with and supplies that want. If it has been already secured, an important point has been gained. If it has not been, we trust that it soon may be; and shall certainly feel no regrets if we end, by honorable means, secure a yet nearer and more desirable station for our Home Squadron.

GREAT BABY SHOW.—Cincinnati, Oct 5.—The National Baby Show took place at Springfield to-day, and one hundred and twenty entries of babies were made. The first premium for the finest baby of two years old or under, was a tea-set with a waiver, valued at $350. The second premium for the next best baby, was a tea-set, valued at $200. The third premium was $200 for the finest child under one year of age. The fourth premium was a Parian marble group. The first premium was awarded to Mrs. Rommer, of Vienna, Ohio; the second, to Mrs. McDowell, of Cincinnati; the third, to Mrs. Arthur, of Philadelphia; the fourth, to Mrs Henry Howe, of Cincinnati.

A letter was received from Fanny Fern and read, to the edification of all concerned.

Letters were also received from Mrs Swisshelm, Mrs. Crittenden, Mrs. Mott and Horace Greeley, Esq.

Mr. Greeley thought that much attention should be given to the development of the human constitution in a country where able bodied men sold for five hundred to fifteen hundred dollars a piece.

Mrs. Mott thought that black babies should have been admitted to this exhibition, and had an equal chance with the whites.

Among the exhibitors was an old woman who came with her seventeenth child. She claimed a premium on that ground.

A NEW PISTOL.—A new pistol, called the revolving hammer pistol, manufactured by the Robbins and Lawrence Company, of Windsor, Vermont, seems to be a very complete weapon. It has five barrels, which are loaded easily at the breech. A hammer revolves in the interior and strikes one of the caps at each pressure of the trigger. The barrels are stationary, which is an advantage over those that revolve. Another great advantage is that the works, being all in the interior of the weapon, offer no projections, and thus preclude all danger of accidental discharge. The powder and caps are so well protected that the pistol, it is said, might be discharged even when plunged in water. The barrels are grooved like those of the Sharps Rifle, and they carry a ball with extraordinary precision and force. The size of the weapon is such that it can conveniently be carried in the pocket.

Apple-Fritters—A Romance.

Soyer, the great cook, has written a novel in which the art of the kitchen is set forth in a rather novel manner. The two heroines go among the poor and impart the receipts of the chef.

Although this book ought to be in every gentleman's kitchen; still, we do not think that M Soyer has made the most of his subject. Could he not, in his second edition, give us a few scenes something like the following?

It was a lovely night. The warm breezes floated by, laden with the perfume of flowers; sweet incense, rising up from Nature's kitchen! The moon shone brightly as a bird's eye, covering the earth with its chaste rays, until the landscape seemed silvered and pure as a wedding-cake.

"Let us walk in the garden," said chere Hortense, clasping dear Eloise to her heaving bosom.

In a few seconds the two noble and enthusiastic girls were 'neath the orchard trees.

"Do you perceive those apples?" remarked Hortense, scarcely able to repress her emotion.

"Why this grief?" sighed the gentle Eloise. Then turning her large, pale, gray eyes in the direction of the fruit, she added, in a disappointed tone: "They are baking-apples, if I mistake not."

"They are! they are!" cried chere Hortense, bursting into an agony of tears.

Poor girl! they reminded her of home.

Some moments elapsed before chere Hortense could resume her wonted calmness. At length, with an effort, she said: "Forgive me, dear Eloise. I was silly, very silly! but whenever I see an apple, I always think of him."

"You must, indeed, have loved!" sighed Eloise.

"Loved! ay, child, madly!" continued Hortense. "The day we parted, I remember, we had apple-fritters for dinner. He himself prepared the dainty for me. As he peeled and sliced cross-ways, a quarter of an inch thick, the rosy fruit before him, he breathed in my ear the first avowal of the love he felt for me. He then placed in a basin about two ounces of flour, a little salt, two tea-spoons full of oil, and the yolk of an egg, moistened by degrees with water, and all the time he kept stirring up the compound with a spoon. I thought I should have fainted, for my heart was breaking."

"Dear Hortense!" exclaimed Eloise. "Ah! how you must have suffered!"

"It is past now," sighed the brave girl. Then, resuming her story, she said: "When the whole formed a smooth consistency to the thickness of cream, he beat up the white of an egg till firm, mixing it with the batter. I could endure my agony no longer. 'Alexis!' I cried, 'beware how you trifle with me!'"

"Proceed! you interest me greatly," remarked Eloise. "What was his answer?"

Hortense, with an effort, continued: "When the mixture was hot, he put the apples in, one at a time, turning them over with a slice as they were doing. Suddenly he turned toward me, his face glowing with passion—"

"Nay, say not so!" interrupted the kind Eloise; "perhaps the heat of fire, and not passion, had flamed his cheeks."

"Heaven grant your words prove true!" sobbed the loving girl; "I shall never forget the expression of his eyes. 'Hortense,' he whispered, 'the apple-fritters are now cooked. Let us, perhaps for the last time, eat together.'"

For a few seconds Hortense was speechless from grief. Rising from the mossy bank, she gasped out: "Eloise, as you love, let us hurry home! I shall die if we remain here."

"And the fritters?" inquired the gentle Eloise.

"They were excellent," continued Hortense, in a solemn tone. "That evening he presented me with the receipt for making them, together with a lock of his hair, which, however, formed no part of the receipt. Two hours afterward he was on his way to London and the Reform Club. But to this day even the sight of an apple makes me tremble! Alas! such is the love of poor, fond woman!"

That night Eloise slept but little. She was thinking over the story of the "Apple-Fritters." [London Elegance.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE DISMAL SWAMP. Mr. Geo. Elliott, the aeronaut, recently made an ascension near the Magnolia Springs, in the neighborhood of the Dismal Swamp. It was his one hundred and fourth successful trip to the skies, and he declared that no former one had given him greater satisfaction. The weather was delightful, calm and clear; not a cloud decked the horizon; a gentle breeze gradually took him, as he ascended, to the west. Amid the cheers of his spectators, the roar of cannon and the sounds of music, he ascended seventeen thousand feet, having a view of the entire Dismal Swamp, though at no time was he invisible. Mr. Elliott says the scenery was the most picturesque ever witnessed. Lake Drummond, situated in the centre of the great swamp, presented a sublime and pleasing sight. He represented the swamp as one vast plain, interspersed with innumerable pools or lakes, whose surface presented a golden hue.

On the last trip of the Atlantic, Capt. West completed his two hundred and thirty-fifth voyage across the Atlantic.

A BEAUTIFUL THOUGHT.—"As in the light of cultivated reason you look abroad, and see a wealth of beauty, a profusion of goodness in the work of Him who has strown flowers in the wilderness, and painted the bird, and enameled the insect, in the simplicity and universality of His laws, you can read this lesson. An uneducated man dreams not of the common sunlight, which now in its splendor floods the firmament and the landscape; he cannot comprehend how much of the loveliness of the world results from the composite character of light and from the reflecting propensities of most physical bodies. If, instead of red, yellow and blue, which the analysis of the prism and experiments of absorption have shown to be its constituents, it had been homogeneous, simple white, how changed would all have been! The growing corn, the ripe harvest, the blossom and the fruit, the fresh greenness of spring and autumn's robe of many colors, the hues of the violet, the lily, and the rose, the silvery foam of the rivulet, the emerald of the river, and the purple of the ocean, would have been alike unknown. The rainbow would have been but a pale streak in the sky, and dull vapors would have canopied the sun, instead of the glorious, which in the dyes of dawning brilliancy ushers his rising and going down. Nay, there would have been no distinction between the blood of the children, the flush of health, the paleness of decay, the hectic of disease, and the lividness of death. There would have been an unvaried, unmeaning shade over where we now see the changing and expressive countenances, the tinted earth and gorgeous firmament."

The Genoa correspondent of the Newark Advertiser, under date of the 6th of September, says: The United States frigate Saranac, Captain Long, having on board Commodore Stringham, has gone to Constantinople again. The American missionaries and their friends there appear to see some necessity for the presence of a man of war in that quarter. The flag ship Cumberland, Captain Lawton, is now probably at Barcelona with a view to show the Spaniards that our flag is afloat in the Mediterranean. Lieutenant Creighton, of the Cumberland, (a son of the late Com'r,) has a brief leave of absence, having recently been married at our naval station, in Georgia, to a daughter of Commodore Stringham. The happy pair are passing the honeymoon at Florence, the c...

NEW ORLEANS:
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21.

Health.—There is a hopeful feeling on this subject. Weather bracing. People returning. Business reviving. Notwithstanding, we noticed in one of the daily papers of Tuesday, the death of a man by yellow fever, who arrived five days before, direct from Liverpool. Such cases occur, while thousands of other strangers go exempt.

Thursday evening we visited the Charity Hospital. Number of patients, 694. Deaths by fever since our weekly summary, on another page, was made up as follows: Sunday 7, Monday 6, Tuesday 6, Wednesday 7, Thursday 9. Total number of deaths from all diseases, in that time, 44.

Dr. Choppin, the resident physician, informed us that on account of the late unfavorable weather—chilly nights and frequent north winds—the mortality had (slightly) increased beyond the proportion of admissions. The prevailing ailments of the sick now brought in are the autumnal ones—Intermittent fevers, dicentery, and catarrhs.

Bishop Early.—To reach the seat of Mississippi Conference in time and with certainty, Bishop Early left Louisville on the 5th instant, went to St. Louis via Chicago, and took boat for Grand Gulf, Miss., where he arrived 16th inst. His son, Dr. O. R. Early, resides at Rocky Springs, about 18 miles from Grand Gulf landing. The Bishop spent four days in St. Louis, in which we learn he discharged the various and good work that attaches to his office.

The fine boat, St. Nicholas, was necessarily a Sabbath on the river. Bishop E. preached in the morning, and Rev. Mr. Stratton, of Natchez, at night.

College Burned.—By telegraph we learn that the buildings of Howard College at Marion, Ala., were destroyed by fire on the night of the 15th inst. The building, which was a tasteful piece of architecture, and commodious, was erected but a few years ago, at a heavy expense, by subscription, mostly among the members of the Baptist Church, under whose patronage the College was founded and has reached its present flourishing condition. The dispatch adds, that a few of the students were personally injured. It was one of the best educational institutions in the South; and we hope to see it rise speedily from its ashes, and resume its career of usefulness and prosperity.

Revivals.—The greatest work that is going on in the world is that of the conversion of sinners and the edification of saints. Sometimes this work proceeds slowly and silently under the stated ministry of the Word; at other times it is accomplished in a more extraordinary way: vast numbers being brought suddenly under the power of divine truth, and exhibiting in a striking manner the effects of divine grace.

Our columns, and those of our cotemporaries, show that God has not forgotten to be gracious. Times of refreshing are come upon many of the Churches. This is the best news we can give. This is the part of religious papers the angels read.

To Texas.—Who is not going to Texas? Preachers, Physicians, Planters and Politicians. The Schoolmaster, too, is going. Our friend and Brother, J. H. Smith, who has been engaged successfully the last dozen years in this city, teaching, calls to bid us good-bye. We hope he may meet the best luck in Texas.

Such is Heaven.—Rev. Dr. Tyng assisted in the dedication of an Episcopal Church in Philadelphia, not long ago, with the usual ceremonies. The address fell to him, happily. "He showed," says a reporter, "that the only real temple worthy of the attention of a Christian, is a converted heart, which is the temple of the Holy Ghost. Outward temples were merely erected for the accommodation of those who desire to assemble together for the purpose of worshipping God. That in all denominations God has his people. That the zealous Methodist, the orthodox Presbyterian, the Baptist, and the Episcopalian, were all alike the recipients of Heaven's favors. He concluded by reciting an anecdote of George Whitefield, who, when preaching in your Quaker city, stopped short, and looking up toward Heaven, cried out—'Gabriel, whom have you in Heaven? Any Episcopalians? No. Any Presbyterians? No. Any Methodists? No. Any Baptists? No. Well, then, whom have you there? We know no such names here. All that are here are redeemed souls out of every kindred, and nation, and tongue, and people.' Such is Heaven!"

Rev. Dr. Achilli has lately been engaged in a new translation of the New Testament, a copy of which, as soon as finished, he sent to Archbishop Hughes, but that dignitary refused to receive it, as will be seen by the following letter from his secretary:

To G Achilli, Esq: Sir—The Archbishop of New York begs me to return you the accompanying copy of your translation of the New Testament, and your letter. He begs me to add that, in this, he does not mean any offence.

Yours, etc.
M. J. O'Donnell, Private Secretary.

The Rev. D. D. Love and family, late of the Methodist Mission to South America, arrived at New York from Buenos Ayres, on the 9th, in the bark Hugh Birkhead.

Expensive Funerals.

"The Roman Catholic Bishop of Buffalo has commanded that no more than five carriages shall accompany any corpse to the church or cemetry; and the Catholics have, with few exceptions, shown a disposition to obey the order cheerfully."

The extent to which this item has been copied and commented on by the press, indicates the need of reform. It would save a large amount of money, at a time, too, when money is worth most to those footing the bills. The rivalry of ostentation is carried so far that often half the carriages in train are empty. Some are filled by strangers, who take this opportunity for a ride. We have met them, on the Shell road, smoking cigars, and even uproarious in their mirth.

Tuesday week an undertaker was buried from Magazine street, and one of the daily papers estimated that a hundred carriages were in procession.

Last summer Dr. B. was called in to see an Irishman sick of yellow fever. He prescribed, and told the relative and friend of the patient to get the prescription filled by an apothecary. "Faith, and who is to pay for it?" The Doctor thinking his gratuitous services sufficiently drawn upon, told him to pay for it himself—it was only four bits. He refused. Next day Dr. B. passed, and a funeral train was wiading from the door, with a dozen or more cabs and carriages—the hire of any one of which was four times the cost of the prescription!

Time of Holding Louisiana Conference Changed.

This fact, and the satisfactory reasons for it, can not better be laid before those concerned, than by laying before them the letter of Bishop Andrew announcing it:

Newton Co., Geo, Oct. 10, 1854.

My dear Brother.—As I expect, if God permit, to leave New Orleans for California early in February, and as it will be necessary for me to return home after the Alabama Conference, in order to settle all my temporal matters and arrange for my children for next year, I find it necessary to change the time for holding the Louisiana Conference. You will, therefore, please announce in the Advocate that that Conference will meet one week later than the time originally announced. Give a notice of this change a prominent place in your paper for several weeks, so that there may be no mistake. I trust that this change will trouble nobody, while to me it will be a great accommodation.

I see by the papers that the fearful scourge, yallow fever, has visited you again. Surely, the people of your devoted city have had enough from the hand of God to humble them; and yet, though awfully smitten, I fear they are not humbled. I hope God will preserve you and your devoted associates in the great work of preaching Christ in the midst of pestilence and death. May God bless you abundantly in soul and body, in basket and in store, in your family and in your labors both with tongue and pen.

Yours, very affectionately,
James O. Andrew.

Revival Among the Tractarians.

A Presbyterian exchange gives the facts below, under the head of Tractarian Revival. We think ours the better heading. A story is told of a man who won an elephant at raffle. After the first flush of exultation at such fine luck, the hard question arose—What should he do with him? The Tractarians, with Rev. Mr. Aitkin on their hands, are in this man's fix:—

"A singular state of things has arisen among the English Tractarians. A Rev. Mr. Aitkin, formerly a Wesleyan preacher, entered the Established Church, and united his interests with those of the High-church party. It seems, however, that something of the warmth of the Methodist survived the singular change, and in his pulpit addresses he exhibits so much fervor as to have created a movement among the "very dry bones." The Evangelicals know not how to interpret his movements, and stand in doubt of the goodness of the fruit which is appearing, while the Tractarians are in a complete quandary. We extract a single notice illustrative of the effect of his preaching, which must be regarded as singular in its connections with Puseyism.

"Last week bills were posted in Wednesbury, announcing that the Rev. R. Aitkin, incumbent of Pendeen (Cornwall), would preach on the following Sunday in St. James's Church. Accordingly, on Sunday, the reverend gentleman preached two powerful sermons on the subject of conversion to large congregations. On Monday evening he preached again, taking for his subject the conversation of our Lord with the woman of Samaria. His sermon occupied one hour and twenty minutes, and the preacher exerted himself to bring conviction home to his hearers. The congregation, which was large and respectable, was remarkably affected by the eloquent discourse of the preacher, and several gave utterance to their feelings. A deep impression seemed to be made on the whole congregation; and after the service, at half past nine o'clock, a meeting was held at the Parsonage, when the house was crowded. A most exciting scene, we are informed, was witnessed on the occasion—some were weeping, some were praying, and some were singing. The preacher was occupied speaking to some personally and affording consolation, assisted by the Rev. R. Twigg, the Rev. R. Boot, and the Rev. J. Winter. The meeting continued till nearly eleven o'clock, and a great impression was made upon many. Mr. Aitkin is staying at the Parsonage, and was to preach three times during the week, and twice again on Sunday. He preaches in the surplice, and is said to hold High-church principles. He formerly belonged to the Wesleyan body, and preached in their chapels, but for some years he has conformed to the Church. Mr. Aitkin has lately been at Leeds, preaching in St. Saviour's Church, and a great revival is said to be taking place in that town."

The power, the divine power of the doctrine of "Justification by Faith," is at the bottom of this movement. With all of Luther's consubstantiational errors, it bore the Reformation triumphantly up and through. Amid the formalities of Puseyism, this doctrine, clearly announced, is working its wonders as of old. It outs its way through every thing. There is no doubt Mr. Aitkin has been befogged among the Tractarians. The English papers are trying to locate him and account for the revival. Mr. Aitkin even consented to be patronised by the Bishop of Exeter. But he holds on to "Justification by Faith"—a full, present salvation, and the assurance of it by the Spirit: a leaven can not be smothered. Hear how he speaks in a pamphlet addressed to the clergy on "Scriptural Vitality:"

"There are some who freely admit the necessity of conversion, but then they allege that gradual conversions are the rule, and sudden conversions the exceptions. Now if there were any ground for this allegation, I would most gladly admit it, for it is comparatively of little consequence how conversions take place, provided only they do take place at all; but so satisfied am I that this is just the system of gradual amendment through the use of means, under a different name, which has brought our Church into her present most sad and unspiritual condition, and which has destroyed millions of souls, and is destroying more that I dare not admit it. There neither is, nor can there be, literally speaking, any such thing as gradual conversion. Admission into the state of justification is on act of God's free grace, and growth or progress has nothing to do with any right conception about it. In the first place, as far as I know, the Holy Scriptures give us no authority whatever for the supposition. The conversions which are there recorded are in every instance of the class which are called instantaneous. The parables of the lost sheep, the lost piece of silver, and the prodigal son; the cases of the publican—Zaccheus—the woman of Samaria—Mary Magdalene—the dying thief—the three thousand on the day of Pentecost—the lame man at the gate of the temple which is called beautiful—the Ethiopian eunuch—the centuries—St. Paul—Lydia—the men that used curious arts, and the Philippian jailor, are God's recorded illustrations of conversion work, and suddenness is the prominent feature in every illustration. There was, doubtless, then, in all the cases, a preparation, as there is now; but that does not affect the act of conversion, which is ever of the most marked character."

Sermon on Baptism.

A pamphlet of 40 pages just from the printer. This is the substance of a Sermon of Rev. J. Lusk, P. Eldor of Covington District, Mississippi Conference. The preface informs us that the publication is principally to correct numerous misrepresentations, and is believed to contain "every rough or objectionable word, or phrase or sentiment" uttered in the preaching. Some pretty "rough" things and some "objectionable" on the score of taste, if not of charity. If precedents on the other side were a sufficient plea, we are sorry to say they are not wanting. Mr. Lusk's apology for a controversial sermon is this:—

"Our opponents act with injustice toward us. If we maintain our usual silence on this subject, it is attributed to the conscious weakness of our cause, and is wielded as an argument against us; and if we defend our position by Scripture and common sense (as we do,) we incur their hostility, and are accused of destroying the quiet and tranquility of societies and communities. It is a well-known fact, that the Baptist pulpit in many portions of our land ceaselessly resounds with language similar to the following: "You must follow your Saviour into Jordan; "go into the liquid grave;" "you must be immersed," etc., etc.

The argument is a very able one. All the main points are made with force, and the style is popular. A running fight is kept up. After exhausting a full quiver, rocks are used, chunks, light-wood knots, whatever comes to hand, not excepting an occasional fling of mud.

This publication will administer a quietus to the jangling that provoked it. Concluding paragraph on the mode of baptism:

"I do not vouch for the reality of the following dream, but judging from the present times, it may be true. A person dreamed he went to Heaven and there met some from all the orthodox denominations but the Baptist. It was asked, "are there no Baptists here?" The reply was, yes, many; and the conductor said, come with me; and he took the dreamer away to one corner and raised a trap-door, when instantly there arose an almost deafening cry, from a multitude of voices, crying, "baptism, baptism," as fast as they could utter it; the door dropped and all was silence again. It was asked why they were kept down there? The answer was: "There would be no peace in Heaven if they were out, in consequence of their interminable cry of baptism!"

"What good does it do? Men are not to judge of divine injunctions or institutions by their utility or inutility, and then discard or adopt according to the conclusion formed on this ground. Adam could have objected to the prohibition against eating of the 'tree' on the same ground. Abraham could have brought the same objection against circumcision, but his obedient spirit would not, and his tender conscience dare not 'bring a railing accusation' against the requirements of Jehovah. The caviler against infant baptism, on the ground of its inutility, has the same right to assail his Maker for instituting the circumcision of infants, the initiatory rite into the Church of God in a former age of its existence. What a time the Lord and Abraham would have had in establishing circumcision if there had been only a little Baptist wisdom there!!"

New Orleans Academy of Sciences.—We have received from some unknown source a copy of the Constitution and By-Laws of the New Orleans Academy of Sciences. Also the proceedings of the said body from May, 1853, to May, 1854. We shall take occasion to refer to the Society and its proceedings at greater length on some future occasion.

Preaching, in its Relations to the Inward Frame.

These remarks are evidently from a writer who is a thinker. The writer's name we do not know. His is not a machine model. That Spirit which bloweth as it listeth, demands a large liberty for those dependent on His influences. The distinction between prophesying and teaching appears to us more easily stated in theory, than maintained in practice:

"A discourse is so much the better, the more it resembles an act of contrition, of submission, of prayer, of martyrdom. The preacher should regard himself as 'a channel for what ought to be conveyed by him into the heart of his hearers.' 'The ministry of the Word,' says Fenelon, 'is wholly founded on faith.' We must pray, we must purify our heart, we must expect every thing from Heaven, we must arm ourselves with the sword of the word of God, and not count upon any thing in ourselves; this is the essential preparation. In a word, our lips are naturally defiled; they must be purged, and purged by fire. In short, preaching, which is a divine mystery, is also a human action, and the best part of this action is inward, spiritual, anterior even to the act of composing the discourse. The discourse finishes the work which prayer should begin.

"To this general direction we unite a more particular one, which is expressed by St. Paul in these words: "Let him who has received the gift of prophesying exercise it according to the proportion of faith which he has received." (Rom. xii. 6,) which further signifies, according to the proportion of life which he has in him. It is true that he is obliged to preach on a fixed and prescribed day. If he does not always find himself in a frame for prophesying (that is to say, for speaking with that fullness of heart, and that force which will carry the hearers along with him,) he must confine himself to teaching: that is to say, treating a subject regularly. 'Whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God; or whether we be sober, it is for your cause.'—2 Cor. v. 13.

"The evil consists not in being in one state rather than another, but in not exercising our gift according to the measure of faith and of life with which we ourselves are exercised at a given moment, to wish to force our state—to think that a blessing may be connected with a deception; for there is a deception when our thought is surpassed by our word. We would always be very eloquent; we must content ourselves sometimes with being sober, humble, and feeble. A discourse cold and feeble, but honest, will often be more blessed than an eloquent discourse which transcends the inward frame."

History of Jesuits.

"Take the Jesuit for what he ought or appears to be, and you commit the greatest of blunders. Draw the character of what the Jesuit seems to be in London, and you will not recognize your portrait in the Jesuit of Rome. The Jesuit is the man of circumstances. Despotic in Spain, constitutional in England, republican in Paraguay, bigot in Rome, Idolater in India, he shall assume and act out in his own person, with admirable flexibility, all those different features by which men are usually to be distinguished from each other. He will accompany the gay woman of the world to the theater, and will share in the excesses of the debauchee. With solemn countenance he will take his place by the side of the religious man at the church, and will revel in the tavern with the glutton or the sot. He dresses in all garbs, speaks all languages, knows all customs, is present every where, though no where recognized—and all this, it seems, (O, monstrous blasphemy!) for the greater glory of God—ad majorem Dei gloriam."

"Mexico, as you are aware, has taken another back step in the progress of civilization and free principles, by establishing the order of the Jesuits. But recently a most heinous outrage occurred in Mexico. The widow of Don Peres Galves, now living in Mexico, it is said, has an immense estate of from ten to twenty millions of dollars, and the Jesuits are determined to get hold of it. The Pope's Nuncio, chief of the Jesuits, is in daily communication with her. She is old and can not live long.

"In order to carry out their diabolical project, a short time ago they seized her administrator, Don Martin Ruil, and put him in the lunatic asylum, and kept him until they determined what to do with him. They finally determined to send him out of the country, to some secure retreat among the order, and placed him in the charge of three ruffians, (their tools,) and sent him to Vera Cruz, not allowing him to talk to any one. On arriving at Vera Cruz he was recognized by an old acquaintance, with whom he forced a conversation. His friend immediately went to the Governor, made known the whole affair, and thus he got out of their terrible grasp. He has since attempted a correspondence with his friends in Mexico, but all his letters, it is said, have been intercepted. So much for Jesuitism and poor benighted Mexico."

A missionary, J. R., writing from Panama, N. G., says:—

"A large part of the convents and nunneries of the country are forsaken and in ruins; in this city there were nearly a dozen of them once, and a large part of the city, some say one-half, thus belonged to the church; most magnificent ruins of the city show where they once wielded absolute power; but now there is neither convent nor monk in the city, and but one nunnery, in which are three nuns—two of them very old. A few convents yet exist in other parts of the republic, but they are rapidly passing away, and their property goes to augment the school fund. The Jesuits are abhorred and excluded from the country—or if any remain, it is in disguise; they dare not show themselves. And what is true of this fell superstition in New Grenada, can not fail to become true of it in every land of its quondam principle, when the word of God shall have free course, run and be glorified!"

Jesuits in Chili.—We gave, a fortnight ago, the favorable vote in the Chilian Senate, on the admission of this order into the Republic. We now have dates from Valparaise, S. A., to the 1st ult., with this latter news:—

"The political movements of interest during the past two weeks have been few. The matter of the Jesuits, after the excitement at one time caused by it, has fallen back again into its former silence. The rejection in the house of the measure to authorize their return to Chili, and to endow them again with property, has laid the whole affair at rest. Since that, politics have returned to their former level, and are flowing in their usual quiet channel."

Opening of Centenary College.

Mr. Editor: Please announce to the public that Centenary College has opened with a full corps of instructors in all the departments, and more than one hundred and forty students up to this date. I make this announcement to correct unfounded reports, which prevent many students from coming. We have no quarantine here to prevent persons from coming in, only to stop dry goods packed in infected districts. The health of the town is good—no death of a white adult, that I can learn, since early in July.

Those who wish accommodations in the College, should speak quick, as we are fast filling up. B. M. Drake.

Methodist Press.

The Texas Advocate republishes with approbation, as a good article and suggestive, that which appeared in our columns over the signature of A Cotton Planter. If the writer had revealed his name, additional strength and attention would have attached to his communication. His relations to the Church are close and kind, and his relations to society and the subject treated on, insure large and correct views. We invoke deliberate consideration for them.

Our excellent cotemporary dissents from our views as given on the reforms proposed to be adopted in the University of Alabama:—

"The advantages proposed in 'the open system' are, doubtless, much needed; at the same time many wise and experienced men are opposed to such changes in our Universities, on the ground that they are intended as the seats and the guardians of a high and thorough grade of education in our country; that the open system takes away the only guarantee of such a grade of education; that the partial courses desired can be very easily obtained elsewhere—in high schools, and in most of the colleges; and that Universities will no longer have that high and distinctive character and influence that they were designed to have, and ought to have, when the open system is adopted."

He inclines to the old plan as conservative, admitting that much can be said on both sides. The trustees (a quorum) held a meeting 25th ult., pursuant to adjournment, and adopted the open system for the University of Alabama.

"May we not have thought too much of the class-meeting system as an element and proof of piety. Of the principle involved—Christian conference one with another—too much cannot be thought. But of the mode of carrying it out, it is possible to give undue prominence. The principle is distinctly recognized in the Bible; of the mode of its performance we can find nothing. Has not our zeal for the mode been equal, or greater, we will not say for the principle, but than is justly due to its nature or its position? We have been very stringent in our rules and regulations for the meeting. It is true the object of the meeting—religious conference, has been at the bottom of this zeal, but we have not been very discriminating in our zeal. Now may not the present state of things be the result of a reaction in the Church consequent upon the belief that there is no scriptural warrant for the mode, and the conviction that it is not therefore essential to the maintenance of the Christian profession, or the growth and maturity of Christian character?"

The Editor of the Memphis Advocate (from whom just here we acknowledge an excellent sermon, lately published, on the "Old paths") takes up the issue and withstands Peter sharply:—

"But Dr. Lee distinguishes between 'the principle involved' in class-meeting and 'the mode of carrying it out.' The principle he admits to be in the Bible, but not the mode. Surely not. But what of this? Has not the Church full authority to prescribe the mode? If not, how shall we ever enforce the principle? The objector to class-meeting acknowledges the principle, but wishes to choose the mode; and until a mode is submitted to suit his fancy, he holds himself under no obligation to observe the principle. Now, as there may be a multitude of notions about the mode, if every one is permitted to neglect the principle until he is suited in the mode, the principle itself will be lost sight of, while we quarrel about the mode. This therefore, it is plain, must be left to the Church, in its proper legislative council to prescribe; and when determined, demands the acquiescence of all who have that Christian disposition which teaches us to submit meekly to those who have the rule over us. "If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing gain is godliness; from such withdraw thyself."

The Triad.—The S. C. Advocate editorializes capitally on the newspaper triad. "The three interested chiefly in the Newspaper are the Editor, the Subscriber, and the Contributor—these three ought always to be one in feeling and purpose."

May he bring this "ought to be" to be. Nothing in the biographical sketch of that patriarchal editor, Jeffries, so commended his transcendant ability in our eyes as this—that he kept his large corps of contributors in a good humor with themselves and a good understanding with each other. What is more, he did this while the Edinburg Review gained the highest reputation. Now that was greatness.

"As to the third, the subscriber, let him remember that he is but one of thousands—and if he is not satisfied, perhaps the thousands are. He is not selfish enough, we hope, to have them passed by for his sake. If this does not console him, let him reflect that if not edified this week he may next. * * * We will beg him to believe that the editor, who always pleases every body is a very insignificant fellow; that there is not enough of decided character in his paper to bring it up to the level of criticism."

But it is to the contributor he mainly keeps his face. The following glows with sympathetic truth. Among others, it settles this point—the absurdity of a writer's sending a cranky or a slashing article, and seeking to (slave) care not for it; but if thou mayest be free, choose it rather." "Care not for it!" Why? For what on earth should they care, in comparison with that which excluded them from the salvation offered in the Gospel? But this is not all. Slaves are not only denied by the Hosmerite theory all the blessings of "the life to come," but "of that which now is." Ministers have no right, we are told, to unite them in wedlock—"they might as well marry cattle." Thus is added to the other cruel conditions of slavery the necessity of living in perpetual concubinage. Verily, these "fits" are hopeless.

American Missionary Association.—The eighth annual meeting was held at Wesleyan Meriden, Conn., on the 27th and 28th of September, Hon. Wm. Jackson, President, in the chair. Prayer was offered by Rev. A. Underwood, of New Jersey.

The Treasurer presented his report for the year, showing the receipts of the Society to Oct. 11. from all sources nearly $48,000—an increase of more than 14 per cent. on the income of the previous year.

The secretary for the home department presented his report, showing that over $[illegible] 000 had been expended in aid of home missionaries. It has six foreign missionary stations and eighteen ordained missionaries in that field, of whom three are physicians. The mission among the Jamaica emancipated negroes seems to be its best, as these are connected with seven missionaries and eight churches.

The mission to the Copts in Egypt is about to sail. Mr. and Mrs. Martin, and Mr. Murad, a native Syrian, will leave New York for their mission early in October.

In the Home missionary work, nearly all the missionaries engaged are in the West and Northwest. The number of applications from that region is steadily increasing. There have been four missionaries laboring in the slave States, in connection with four churches that refuse admission to slaveholders. They also itinerate extensively in different parts of Kentucky and North Carolina.

In one of the Resolutions passed they "We rejoice and express our thanks to Almighty God, in view of the action of the Americna Board, recently taken in Hartford, in freely discussing the subject of slavery, adopting the anti-slavery sentiments of Treat's letter of 1848, and in resolving to regard the recent enactments of the Church Nation relating to the instruction of and their children."

Executive Committee: Arthur Tappan, S. Jocelyn, C. B. Ray, Anthony Lane, [illegible] Ritter, Samuel E. Cornish, William [illegible] ting, J. O. Beaucott, Henry Belden, J. A. [illegible] New York; Josiah Brewer, Conn.; J. R. [illegible] Mass.

General Board of Missions.—The [illegible] teenth Annual Meeting of the "Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America," met in Hartford, Conn., 3d inst. Bishops and members of the Board assembled in St. John's Church at 3 o'clock, P. M.

The Presiding Bishop, Brownell, took the Chair; the meeting was opened with appropriate prayers by the Rt. Rev. Bishop [illegible]. The other Bishops present were Whittingham, Eastburn, Williamson and [illegible] gate. The three Bishops elect, viz: Rev. Lee, of Iowa, Rev. Dr. T. M. Clark, of Rhode Island, and Rev. Dr. Potter, of New York, were also present. A goodly number of the clerical and lay members of the Board were in attendance.

Rev. Dr. Van Kleeck, Secretary and General Agent of the Domestic Committee, read the Report of the Domestic Committee. This Report stated the receipts of the year to have been $38,404 15, which, with the balance from last year, made the amount of available funds for the year $40,643 94. Number of contributing churches, 620.

The Rev. S. D. Denison, Secretary and General Agent of the Foreign Committee, read the report of the Foreign Committee. This report stated the receipts of the year ending the 15th of June last, to have been $60,881 08, and the receipts since that time to the present, $17,550 60.

The Board resolved to raise the salaries of the Missionaries in the Western [illegible]. Also that their annual meetings shall be more of a religious and devotional character.

We regret that while twelve Bishops of the Church made it convenient and thought necessary to be present, and assist in forming this Missionary Board, only one of the Bishops was at the meeting of our General Conference at Louisville, Ky., last month, where a much larger amount of money and work was to be laid off.

Choctawe Returned to Missionary.—The Jackson Mercury says that crowds of the Indians have been passing through that city for several days, returning from Arkansas. The Mercury surmises, that they will have to be removed again at Government expense.

Curing Fits.—Dr. Bond, of the Christian Advocate and Journal, is vainly trying to straighten out the ultra-Abolition editors of Zion's Herald and the Northern Christian Advocate, who are destroying the peace and endangering the unity of the Church. They exchange long editorials. Mr. Wise, of Zion's Herald, says Dr. Bond reminds him of a certain medical man who was famous for curing fits. Called to a patient one day, he was asked, after due examination had been made, if he thought he could help the sick man. "Well," said he, "I hardly know what ails him, but I can throw him into a fit, and then I can cure him, I know, for I'm death on fits." "Now," continues Mr. Wise, "since our brother of the Advocate is "death on radicals," he loves to throw all his opponents into their ranks."

"Really, we wish the application of his wit was better deserved; but alas for us! we are neither death on "radicalism" nor "fits." On the former we tried all our skill in the cadenvor to cure Mr. Wise and his friends, the radico-abolitionists of the Seattle school, some years ago, but found many of the cases utterly incurable. We had, indeed, hopes of Mr. Wise. There were for a considerable time signs of convalescence; but there has been an awful relapse, and we abandon all hopes of him. For the cure of "fits" we never pretended any special skill; and if we had any, the late fits into which Mr. Hosmer and Wise have fallen, are so anomalous in their nature as to set all pathology and all experience at defiance. We knew of "no sweet oblivious antidote," no "remedy for minds diseased," which would avail any thing for the cure of the hallucinations which these "fits" produce. Among other vagaries, the patient thinks he has made extraordinary discoveries in theology. Not only are all slaveholders excluded from the benefits of the Gospel, "whatever be their character or circumstances," but all slaves too; and Paul, notwithstanding his having received the doctrines of the Gospel from our Lord himself, did not understand it, or he never could have exhorted the slaves of his day, "If thou art called, being a servant, (slave) care not for it; but if thou mayest be free, choose it rather." "Care not for it!" Why? For what on earth should they care, in comparison with that which excluded them from the salvation offered in the Gospel? But this is not all. Slaves are not only denied by the Hosmerite theory all the blessings of "the life to come," but "of that which now is." Ministers have no right, we are told, to unite them in wedlock—"they might as well marry cattle." Thus is added to the other cruel conditions of slavery the necessity of living in perpetual concubinage. Verily, these "fits" are hopeless.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.—Rev. O. R. BLUE writes, October 11th: "We have just closed very interesting meeting; 92 accessions to Church, besides a number added to other churches. The appearances were flattering a continued and powerful week, when the low fever panic brought the meeting to a close.

TUSCALOOSA, ALA.—Rev. C. D. OLIVER writes, Oct. 5th: "We had a good meeting here, which lasted over two weeks. About twenty professed religion. Brother WELLS, of the Port Circuit, aided me. We are both very much exhausted from labors on this side of the river, where some 50 or 60 have joined the Saviour."

WARREN CT., MISS. * * * * I have nothing of special interest to communicate. My Circuit, however, is in good condition; moving steadily, though slowly, improving. There have been some accessions and conversions during the year; and at one place, there appears to be a general feeling on the subject of a deeper work of grace. May the good Lord hear prayer, and sanctify his people throughout soul, spirit and body.

Oct. 9, 1854. B. B. WHITTINGTON.

MACON CT., ALA. CON.—The Lord is still carrying his work on this Circuit. We have just closed our camp-meeting for the Circuit. Seventy-seven conversions and twenty-three added to the Church. The Church was abundantly blessed, and many labored earnestly for the conversion of sinners. We are grateful to visiting ministerial brethren for their untiring zeal. The next camp-meeting for that place will commence on Friday before the first Sunday in October, 1855.

Oct. 11. WM. VAUGHAN.

UNIONTOWN CT., ALA.—In answer to prayer, the Lord has graciously visited us at Hatchwoods, Uniontown Circuit, Ala. About thirty found Christ precious to their souls, among whom are several heads of families. Twenty-one joined the Church. We are much indebted to Brother J. E. NEWMAN, for his efficient services rendered during the meeting, and to Brother ISAAC TAYLOR. The children and sisters aided much by their prayers and singing, in which they did not grow weary, while the meeting lasted. This revival has helped the Church very much; many vows were made to hold family prayer, and live more devoted lives. May the Lord bless his people to keep their solemn pledges.

Oct. 6. D. M. HUDSON.

LAFOURCHE, LA.—We had four or five conversions at Tigerville; seven accessions to the Church, and the Church built up. Closed the meeting last night to reach my appointment at Donaldsonville next Sunday; the mourners at the altar much engaged. I pray God may speedily convert them. We had some interesting onses and clear conversions.

Oct. 13. L. A. REED.

NEW LEXINGTON CT., ALA.—Our fourth Quarterly Meeting passed off last Sabbath. Rev. T. G. KEOGEH, P. E., labored with us three days, with much success, and Brother WELLS, of Northport. God owned and much blessed the meeting. There were thirty accessions to the Church, and thirty-six professions. The meeting lasted five days. We had another at Pleasant Hill Church, and there forty-one accessions to the Church, and about thirty-six professed religion. There are some holy men and women on this Circuit, and some good local preachers of the pure grit. They work like men of God. To the name of the Lord be all the Glory.

WASHINGTON AND OPELOUSAS, LA.

INTERESTING MEETINGS IN BOTH—YELLOW FEVER—NO LICENSE—TRUE CATHOLICITY IN OPELOUSAS—ONLY ONE PROTESTANT CHURCH—ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

MR. EDITOR: Press of business has prevented my giving to your readers soonor some interesting news of the moral and religious prosperity of this part of the country.

Several weeks ago, assisted by Dr. J. M. LANEY, I held a meeting at Washington, which lasted eight days, and resulted in eight accessions to the Church and about as many conversions. This, though not a large result, was wonderful for this place. Such a scene was never witnessed here before. The congregations were large and very attentive, which gave promise that other good results would follow.

Very soon after the close of this meeting it was rumored that the Yellow Fever had made its appearance in the town. This created quite a panic, and the unacclimated portion of the citizens made haste to betake themselves to some safe retreat. After a short absence, however, the alarm ceased, and the people generally returned, entertaining the hope that their town, so fearfully scourged last year, would this year escape the dreadful infection. But how vain are the hopes of earth! The pestilence is here, raging with almost the violence of last year, and would, doubtless, prove as destructive with the same material to prey upon. But, fortunately, almost all unacclimated persons have left the town; the stores are all closed; business of every kind has ceased, and those who remain are engaged in taking care of the sick. For the reason just mentioned, the result will be nothing like to distressing as last year. Eight or ten days have elapsed since it was fully ascertained that Yellow Fever was here. In that time about eight persons have died. There are now twelve or fourteen cases, most of which are hopeful, and very few left in the village liable to the disease; so we hope soon to see a return of the health and prosperity for which this town has been noted; for I must say, before quitting this subject, that until the scourge of last year, this was regarded as one of the most healthy towns in the State. I am glad to be able to state further, that it is generally believed the introduction of the fever this year can be traced to some peddlers from Galveston, who brought the infection, doubtless, in their goods. I mention this as an assurance that the yellow fever did not originate here. But enough of this; I have some better news.

Last Monday the demon, Alcohol, was dethroned; and our good citizens said he should have "no license" to sit in judgment on the interests and happiness of this community. He has proved a traitor to the happiness of all who have committed themselves to his judgment; as well as many who have been his unwilling victims: and for one year, at least, his decree of infamy to the drinker, and want and sorrow to wives and children, shall not be heard among us. This is a glorious triumph, which should call the blush of shame to the cheeks of many of the moral and order loving of neighboring towns and villages who have thought Washington morally and religiously irredeemable. She has led off in this instance, bearing in triumph the banner of moral reform, bidding her neighbors follow the noble example.

I must now leave Washington, for the purpose of communicating to your readers some still more interesting news of Opelousas. We closed a meeting at this place last Sunday night which had lasted about ten days, and resulted in thirty-one accessions to the Church, and about twenty-five conversions. The meeting was an exceedingly interesting one, and gained for Protestant Christianity in this part of the State a position which will enable it more successfully to battle with sin and error in all its various forms. Several persons of influence and commanding character, who had long been members of other branches of the Church, joined with us—gave their names and influence to the common cause so dear to every lover of virtue and religion. Denominational prejudices and predilections were sacrificed to the interests of Christianity. The Presbyterian Church has struggled for an existence here, while a few zealous Episcopalians have tried, with commendable perseverance, to sustain a Minister of their order. But in both instances the effort has proved unsuccessful; and the Methodist Church is now the only Protestant Church in Opelousas. Possessed of the true Christian spirit, these few Presbyterians and Episcopalians nobly showed their devotion to God and His Church by joining the Methodist Communion.

Protestantism now presents a solid front in Opelousas; and, with the new recruits and the enlivened zeal of the former membership, I trust the influence of the Church will be great and good.

There was much seriousness manifested in the large and attentive congregations in constant attendance; and I am persuaded that strong religious impressions were made upon many who now stand as props in the ranks of irreligion—many they soon give way to the power of truth, and throw the influence which God has given them in trust on the side of religion.

I can not close this notice without acknowledging our indebtedness to Rev. N. A. CRAVENS, of Franklin, for the zealous manner in which, for one week, he labored for the salvation of this people. His strong arguments and appeals were like nails driven in a sure place by the Master of assemblies, and will, I trust, result in the eternal salvation of many who had the pleasure of hearing him.

Yours truly, A. E. GOODWYN.

In the U. S. Court two Utah Indians were tried for murder, committed in Utah county on the 8th day of August, 1851, on the bodies of two Mormon lads were found guilty, and sentenced to be hung on the 13th ult.

Affairs in Utah are prosperous. Mr Magraw heard that gold had been discovered on Sweet Water, and that quite a number of persons were prospecting on that river and its tributaries. Reports represented that success was good and prospects flattering.

There are few on the way across the plains about forty Mormon missionaries, under charge of Elder Taylor, destined for all quarters of the world. They travel in companies of about an equal number of returning Californians; and together with about twenty traders and explorers they make a party of about a hundred, probably the last considerable party that will come eastward this season.

The trading house on Deer Creek, about eighty miles west of Laramie, when passed, was almost entirely consumed, and the coral and other outbuildings were in flames, and every thing indicated that it was the work of hostile Indians. The inmates were understood to have left in consequence of the previous difficulties at Laramie.

Seventy-five miles west of Salt Creek, passed a party of fourteen Pawnees, supposed to be the same which attacked a party of Californians, wounding nine, a few nights previous, on that stream. From signs of blood on the ground of the attack, the supposition was that at least one Indian had been killed, and the party worted in the fight.

The company has been lifted to abandon its station, built at considerable expense, at Ash Hollow, on the North Platte, in consequence of a notification from the head chief of the Sioux nation, that if not abandoned, he would cut the throats of all found there after a given day. The employees of the company chose the alternative of going to Scott's Bluffs, 40 by miles further west.

Two days before arriving at Kearney, Indians supposed to be Sioux, stampeded twenty-two head of Government horses and mules, about an hour by one in the morning, and within half a mile of the fort. They were pursued by the soldiers, but with what success is not known.

The great Brigham Young came near losing his valuable life on the 21st ult. He had descended into his well for a bucket of water, when the curbing above gave way and he was buried under several feet of loose earth. The Saints collected in goodly numbers, and the resurrection of the unlucky prophet soon followed. He was more scared than hurt, to speak irreverently.

THE LOSS OF THE ARCTIC.

MR. BURNS'S STATEMENT—LIST OF THE RESCUED.

At a late hour last evening we received the heart-rending intelligence of the loss of the Collins steamer Arctic. Leaving more extended remarks upon the awful catastrophe for a future occasion, we hasten to introduce the account furnished us by Mr. George H. Burns, the express messenger of Adams & Co., who was on board, and fortunately escaped the terrible perils of the disaster.

STATEMENT OF MR. BURNS,

The steamship Arctic, with 226 passengers, exclusive of children, 150 employees, a valuable cargo, and heavy mail is lost. The details of the horrible disaster are as follows:

On Wednesday, Sept. 27, precisely at 12 o'clock M., in a dense fog, we came in contact with a bark-rigged iron propeller, with black hull, salmon colored bottom, lead colored pumps and boats, and black pipe. She was bound eastward and had all sail set, with a strong, fair wind. The speed of the Arctic at the time was about thirteen knots an hour. The shock to us appeared slight, but the damage to the other vessel was frightful. Capt. Luce instantly ordered the quarter-boats cleared away, and the chief mate, boatswain and three sailors went to her rail; before the other boats left the order was countermanded. The Arctic then described a circle twice round the wreck, during which I caught a glimpse of more than two hundred people clustered on her hurricane deck.

At this juncture it was ascertained that we had sustained injury, and the water was pouring in at our bows. When the first officer came alongside to report, the captain was unable to take him up, but headed N. N. W. in the hope of making land. Our position on the previous day, at 12 o'clock, was lat. 48 39, lon. 45 27. We had run about three hundred and ten miles from the place of observation until the moment of collision, and were supposed to be forty miles from Cape Race. The pumps were vigorously worked, and an anchor cloth thrown overboard; but, in spite of all exertion, the engines stopped, and the water extinguished the fires. Four of the five other life-boats, believed to have been well provisioned, containing the engineers, sailors, a few passengers, and all the officers except the captain and third mate, left the ship in an orderly manner. The majority of the passengers were working at the pumps—some tiring the signal guns, and others manning spars, under the direction of Capt. Luce and Mr. Dorian, the third mate, to form a raft.

In order to facilitate this latter work, the sixth and last boat was lowered. Dorian, one or two firemen, three of the other passengers saved and myself were busily engaged lashing water casks and settees to the main yard, two topgallant yards and several smaller spars—the captain, with a number of gentlemen, protecting the work by keeping back the crowd—when a panic seized all on board a rush was made, passengers and firemen precipitating themselves headlong over the bulwarks on to the raft, and in a moment our little boat was full and in imminent danger of being sunk. In this emergency, Dorian ordered the rope which held us to the steamer to be cut, and with our hands and axes we paddled from the ill-fated ship. The mate, who throughout preserved great presence of mind and labored with herculean energy, cried out—"For God's sake, captain, clear the raft, so that we can work. I won't desert the ship, while there's a timber above water."

But there was now a rush with the dead lights. In less than three minutes from the time he spoke the stern sunk; the bows went hurling over the tumbling heap of human beings; many were dashed forward against the pipe. I heard one wild yell (still ringing in my ears) and saw the Arctic and the struggling mass rapidly overwhelmed. Numbers yet clung to the rigging, and we instructed half; but, alas, we could render them no aid. Our own situation was no less precarious, and cruel as it seemed we were forced to abandon them to fate. Heaven forbid that I should ever witness such another scene. We, however, picked up two more men—and then with an overloaded boat, without oars, thole pins, food or drink, wanting with difficulty the fragments of the wreck and passing many dead females, prepared for a night upon the ocean. We secured a floating pumpkin and cabbage to guard against immediate starvation—but a spar to the bow of our boat to keep her head to the wind and sea, and thus drifted until day light; the night was cold and foggy, with a heavy swell, and in a stunned, drenched and half naked condition, we suffered terribly.

Without dwelling upon our miseries, alleviated much by the consciousness that we had endeavored to do our duty to our fellow-men, suffice it to say that at 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the 28th we espied a sail, and raised a handkerchief to attract attention. We were successful in making the rude sub-stitute for oars which we had constructed during the day by lashing planks to captain bars, with a view of attempting to gain land when the sea subsided, we pulled towards the ship. On our way we passed the remnant of the raft, with one man on it apparently alive.

The bark proved to be the Huron, of St Andrews, N. B., Capt A Wall, bound for Quebec. Our men safe on board, the noble-hearted Dorian, with some of the crew, returned to the raft and rescued the poor fellow who for twenty-six hours had clung to the spars. He state that after the steamer sunk he counted seventy-two men and four women on the raft, but at half-past 8 o'clock he was the only one alive. In the morning two bodies were beside him, much eaten by fishes, and at the time he saw one boat he was on the point of voluntarily dropping into the sea to end his agony. Coming from the raft Dorian encountered and examined the lifeless of the Arctic. It contained a bottle of water, some cheese and a lady's garment.

By the humane captain of the Huron, and Mr. Wellington Cameron, a son of the owner, we were received with great kindness, our wounds dressed, fire kindled, and food and clothing furnished in abundance. During the night of the 28th Capt. Wall hung out extra lights, fired rockets and kept a horn blowing, in hopes of calling in with the remainder of the boats. But his endeavors were fruitless. On the evening of the 29th, he spoke the ship Ionon, Capt. Story, bound for New York, by whom eighteen of our number were taken off, kindly welcomed and well treated. We have this moment reached New York by pilot-boat Christian Berg, No 16, to which we were transferred from the Lebanon, and to the crew of which we were under great obligations.

The fate of the propeller and our five boats is unknown. The fact that a boat left her which was capsized by our paddles augurs ill for her buoyant condition, though Capt. Wall, of the Huron, saw a singular-looking craft lie to the leeward, but was unable to tell whether she was a steamer or sailing vessel. He says she had a nondescript appearance, and may have been the wreck of the propeller. The following is a list of those saved in the sixth boat:

Names of persons known to be in the ship's boats—The five boats which may have reached land or been picked up are known to have contained Mr Gurley, first officer; Mr Moore, New York; T White boatswain; Mr Balam, second officer; Mr Graham, fourth officer; Mr Moore, New York, passenger; Mr Rogers, chief engineer; Mr Brown, first assistant; Mr Walker, second assistant; Mr White, third assistant; H Connelly, S Moran, J Flanagan, P McCauley, firemen; Mr Dignard, Mr Kelly, Mr Thompson, engineers; and a young man named Robinson, under instructions in the engineer's department, besides sailors and quarter masters.

Among those whom I last saw on the quarter-deck, while fastening life preservers on the females, and who must have sunk with the ship or perished on the raft, was Captain Luce and son, Mrs E K Collins, Mr Brown and family, (connection of the firm of Brown, Shipley & Co., Liverpool.) Mr. Thomas, importer of hosiery, New York; Mr. Adams, Brooklyn; Mr. Bowen, Cincinnati; Mr. Charles Springer, Cincinnati; James Muirhead, Jr., Petersburgh, Va; Mr. Hewett, Mrs Hewett and daughter, Petersburgh, Va; Mr Wood, New York; Mr Yaakl, Mr. Schmidt, Miss Murton, Falmouth, England; a nephew of Mr. Bloodgood, Hotel keeper, Philadelphia, residing in Albany; the Duke de Grammont, of the French Embassy; Second Steward, wife and child; Anate, a colored girl, and May, stewardess; Miss Jones, Mr. Peirie and lady, Stewart Hollin, Washington, D. C.; S. Cook, Opelousas, La; with many more whose names I do not know, but whose features are indelibly imprinted upon my memory.

A Mr. Comstock brother to the commander of the Baltic, was drowned by the capsizing of a boat while leaving inboard.

Government dispatches from France and England, entrusted to my care by Mr. Buchanan, I could not save.

The boat in which we escaped was one of Francis's patent metallic. No 727, from which her capacity can be ascertained and compared with the number rescued.

Respectfully, GEO. H. BURNS,
Adams & Co's Express, Philadelphia.

New York, October 10, 1854.

The New York papers received yesterday are filled with the particulars of this awful calamity. It was not certainly known what vessel had shared in the disaster, but we find in the Richmond Whig, of the 14th, the following dispatch:

BALTIMORE October 12—The French steamer Vesta has arrived at St. John's, N. B. Her bows are in a shattered condition. The effect of collision with the steamer Arctic. She picked up thirty-one persons, survivors of the wrecked Arctic.

It is reported that another boat load of forty persons, who were on board the Arctic at the time of the collision, have arrived at Warren, R. I.

NEW YORK, October 12—Mr Collins has made a careful investigation of all the details that have come to hand relative to the loss of the steamer Arctic, and he believes that Capt Luce, with Mrs Collins and other lady passengers, left the Arctic in a boat before the vessel sunk. The third mate denies the statement that Mrs Collins fell into the sea. It is not known, as yet, whether those saved by the French steamer Vesta, lately arrived at St. John, are passengers or crew. C. F. Mitchell, of Charleston, S. C., is among those saved.

STATEMENT OF MR. FRANCIS DORIAN.

The first I heard was the cry, "Hard-a-starboard." I then understood that there was something wrong. I went on deck and found the vessels about seven yards apart. I stood watching the Arctic in the full expectation that she should yield to, her helm. The other vessel struck her abreast the cat-heads. Capt Luce gave orders to clear away the boats. Mr Chantle cleared away his boats and lowered them down before I thought there was any thing wrong with the ship. By the time we had all the boats ready, Capt. Luce gave orders to hoist them and allow no one to enter them. During this time the captain, carpenter and several of the passengers were outside, trying to stanch the leak inside and out. At the same time water casks were being filled, and every exertion was used to cause the vessel to raise forward; paid the starboard chain overboard to lighten her.

The Second Officer came on deck; I asked if he was making any exertion to stop those leaks; he replied, yes. I asked him what was the prospect. All the answer I got from him was to hurry up those pumps, that is the main pumps and those at the saloon gangway; I went along the deck and found two of the quartermasters standing by the port afterard quarter boats; I ordered them, by command of Capt. L., to take some provisions and the load it. While I stood all I saw the passengers and crew filling the port forward boat; I came along for the purpose of putting a stop to it, and found Capt. Luce in the boat passing ladies and children into the boat. Several gentlemen were also passed in. I think about 22 were in it. He gave the orders to lower away; I turned around and saw the after boat perfectly crowded. By the time I got off they were in the boat and had the bow fall partly down, and from the decks, and held on by the after-fall when she dipped astern and capsized—all out with the exception of three. With the assistance of Captain Luce, Captain Brans, one of the firemen and myself we got the quarter-master to go down and pass the painter up, and by hauling on it as the ship lurched, we succeeded in saving the boat, and hauled her up to the afterguards, the engine turning ahead slowly at the time. I took a turn of the painter round the after guard with the intention of keeping the boat there as a last resource.

Some passengers, part of the crew and firemen, precipitated themselves right into the boat—at least twenty. They cut the boat adrift and went away, that was the last of that boat I saw. There was one quarter-master in her. I walked all the guards on the upper deck, and the passengers proposed to me to form a raft of such materials as I could find on board, and wished me to take charge of the ship. I answered that Capt. Luce was on board such was his place as long as the ship was above water the was quite cool, but had lost a good of his command of speech. At the same time I found, with the exception of him, that I was the only officer on board. When I reported to Capt Luce that all connected with the sailing department had left, he gave a sort of despairing exclamation, and then, with his assistant, the passengers and myself proceeded to get our spars overboard to form a raft—main-yard, main-top-gallant yard, main-top-sail-yard and several smaller spars. While this was being done, the remaining engineers took the other boat, as I understood to endeavor to stop the leaks. I saw them in the distance when the ship went down. With the consent of Captain Luce we launched our remaining boat to form a raft. For the boat's protection we took the oars out, as that those aboard would not rush into and swamp her. Mr Burns, of Adams & Co's Express, Mr. Thompson, of New Orleans (Capt Brans, of New York city, Mr Jenkins of California, —— and one or two firemen, among whom was Thos Brannon, of the island of Scilly and myself labored diligently, till we got all secured, which at the time was floating within our reach. I urged on the boat to be taken along outside the raft, so as to secure every thing that was on the surface, such as water-casks sofa—etc.

By the time I had got the boat on the outside of the raft, a perfect mania seemed to seize all on board and a universal rush was made for the boat, so that no possible control or threat could stop it. The boat was perfectly crowded, and in order to save it from being swamped, I ordered the painter to be cut and shoved clear of the raft. When I went about half a boats length from the raft they were selling every thing afloat to endeavor to reach the boat. I ordered the people in the boat to make every effort to keep her from drifting off, at the same time I hailed Captain Luce, "for God sake" to take people from the raft, in order that I might go to work on it and fix every thing that was buoyant to it. To the best of my knowledge almost three minutes afterward the the Arctic sunked to rise down, stern foremost. The last I saw of Captain Luce, he was standing at the after part of the starboard gangway, back to the boat there were several persons jumping, some screaming, there is the Captain, but to the best of my knowledge he was nowhere to be seen when the ship went down.

According to the description I got of Mrs Collins and family, (as I did not know them personally,) I believe she was not in the boat that was fitted over. I made the remark to Mr. Burns that perhaps Mrs. C. had gone in some of the boats that had left the ship. He replied, the last thing he did on board was to fasten a life-preserver around Mrs. C.

I remained with Dorian till our arrival in the city. I entirely endorse the statement given by Mr. Burns in yesterday's Times.

The propeller was above water when last I saw her, with about two hundred persons crowded on the poop. The boat in which were the chief engineer and his assistants, was the only boat that knew the fate of the Arctic.

New York, Oct 11, 1854. FRANCIS DORIAN.

Mr. Dorian was on board the Lanark, of Liverpool, nine years and seven days ago, when he was picked up one hundred and fifty miles east of where he was picked up on the 27th ult.

We had a long interview yesterday, at the Seamen's Retreat, on Staten Island, with the young man, Peter McCabe, who is the sole survivor out of seventy-six persons, who took refuge upon the raft which was carried from the spars of the Arctic. The case of this man is mentioned in the statement of George H. Burns, which we published in an extra edition of the Daily Times yesterday morning. McCabe clung to the raft for a period of twenty-six hours before he was relieved; and when finally discovered was so nearly exhausted that he was on the point of dropping into the sea to put an end to his sufferings. He was engaged on board the Arctic as waiter in the second cabin, and gives a very clear statement of the terrible events of the day.

McCabe is suffering from a severe wound in the left leg. His foot was caught by a cask while upon the raft, and so badly crushed that surgical aid became necessary. Upon his arrival at Quarantine on Tuesday night, he was duly cared for, and at an early hour yesterday morning was removed to the hospital wards in the Seamen's Retreat, near Vanderbilt Landing, where he now lies under medical care.

We give his statement in full, and nearly in his own words:

STATEMENT OF PETER M'CABE.

I was engaged on board the Arctic as a waiter in the second cabin. I am a native of Dublin; twenty-four years of age; have lived in Liverpool for the last seven or eight years, and shipped on board the Arctic on her last trip out from Liverpool. It was my first voyage across the Atlantic.

At the time of the collision, on the 27th of September, I was coming up out of the second cabin, bringing glasses for the table. We usually set the first table at 12 o'clock, and dinner was served in the second cabin from 12 to 1 o'clock. I had been engaged in laying the table. The collision occurred as I was ascending the stairs, and I think it was exactly at noon. The shock was very slight on board the Arctic when the vessels met; but it was sufficient to indicate that a serious accident had taken place. I immediately went upon deck, and the first thing I saw was a propeller heading along on the starboard side of the Arctic. After a few minutes had passed, the propeller again came round on the same side. I saw her twice, and at both times she passed on the starboard side of our ship. The second time she passed, I pulled in a man who was swimming in the wake of the propeller, and presently saw four more severed from the propeller under the paddle-wheels of the Arctic. They could not be rescued, and were never heard of afterwards. During all this time the fog was so thick that we could not see half the vessel's length from the bows of the Arctic.

As the propeller came in sight the second time, I saw that her decks were crowded with passengers. I did not observe any sailors among them, and the time was so short that it would have been impossible to distinguish any person through the fog. The first time the propeller appeared in sight, there was no sound of voices on board; but when she came into view again several persons were heard upon her decks shouting loudly. Several large holes were made by the propeller in the starboard bow of the Arctic, and the side of the ship was ripped open, so that the water came in freely. I observed the bed-plates of the engines. They began to come in the instant after the collision took place. In about an hour the water reached the boilers and extinguished the fires.

As nearly as I could ascertain, the Arctic cut the propeller down from the cut-water on the starboard side. I do not think, however, that the propeller sunk, for those craft are usually made with water-tight bulkheads so that they would float. At the time of the collision, I should think the Arctic was running at the rate of twelve or thirteen knots an hour, and the propeller was also going very rapidly. If the Arctic was running at thirteen knots, the other vessel must have been making fifteen knots, for the wind was in her favor, and all her sails were set, while we were running against a head wind.

When it was found that the Arctic was fast sinking, all hands went to work to cut the boats and construct a raft. Our passengers remained perfectly calm during the whole of the scene. Many of them had gone upon deck, while we were laying the tables in the cabins, but some remained below; all preserved excellent order, and assisted in the preparations for security. Both crew and passengers immediately manned the pumps, and continued to ply them vigorously until the water reached the second cabin, when further labor at the pumps became useless, and all hands desisted.

We then got axes, and went to work to cut down the two fore-yard-arms of the ship. One yard was launched at a time, and the two were fastened together in the water, for the purpose of forming a raft. After this was done, the firemen broke three or four water casks together, and it was hoped that when this work was completed, the casks could be floated off the deck, but unfortunately they capsized. The water was now on the main deck, and several persons were floating about on doors and beds. Two men were overturned under the water casks, but they afterwards got up, and I ran with them to the saloon deck. We had just reached there when the water came up to that deck also, and I was immediately covered by it. I seized hold of a door which had been taken down to save passengers, and went into the sea, where I left the door and got upon the raft, which had been partially constructed from the spars we took from the vessel.

A great many persons were trying to get on the raft. Some were clinging to it with one hand, and, although it was already crowded, others were striving to get a foothold. Among the number who were upon it, I saw four ladies. Their names I did not know. Altogether, there were seventy-six persons on the raft. It was hard work to secure ourselves to the raft, for it shifted rapidly and turned completely around for three or four times. All those who took refuge upon it were washed off or died by 8½ o'clock that evening, and I was left alone. At a few minutes before the last man went, I asked him the time. He told me, and died in five minutes afterwards.

All that night (Wednesday, 27th) I hung to the raft, and all the next day till 6 o'clock in the evening. Just at dusk on Thursday, 28th, I espied a sail in the offing, and commenced shouting as loudly as I could to secure attention. Happily, they saw me, and immediately bore down to my rescue. Had relief been delayed for a few minutes longer, I should not have been here to tell the tale. I was completely exhausted by 26 hours of exposure and hardship, and had lost all hope, so that I was on the point of relinquishing my grasp, and dropping into the sea. I had got my foot jammed between two casks, and was compelled to remain on my hands and knees. Mr Dorian, the third officer of the Arctic, was the one who came to my assistance, with a boat manned by the crew of the Huron, the vessel that I saw. On our way to the Huron, we passed the life-car of the Arctic, but I did not notice it particularly. On board the Huron I found 23 persons from the Arctic, who had been rescued, but it afterwards appeared, from the mail boat that was launched. I knew nothing of these people till I saw them on board the Huron.

All our treatment on board the Huron I desire to speak in the warmest terms. The sufferers were all received with the utmost kindness; dry clothes were furnished us, and every attention was paid to our comfort. The Huron was bound to Quebec. We remained on board of her a day and a night, and on Saturday were spoken by the bark Lebanon, bound to New York. It was deemed best that a portion of the Arctic's people should be transferred to this vessel, and eighteen of us were accordingly transferred. The remainder of the company went on to Quebec in the Huron. The reception we met on the Lebanon was as cordial as on the other vessel. We remained on board until Monday last, when we spoke the pilot-boat Christian Berg, one hundred and seventy miles from New York, and were all transferred to her. We reached Quarantine at 10 o'clock on Tuesday night.

Signed, PETER MCCABE.

THE DEAD.

The following is a list of persons whom the men with whom we have conversed know to have been drowned:

The following named persons also appear by Mr. Burns's statement to have been drowned:

Capt Luce and son; Mrs E K Collins, son and daughter, W H Brown, a son of Jas Brown, of Brown Brothers, with his wife, child and nurse; G F Allen, son-in-law of James Brown, with Miss Maria Brown; H A Brady, connecticut-law, of New York; Wm Adams, of Brooklyn, New York, brother-in-law to Mr Brady; Edw Sandford, connecticut-law, of New York, late Clerk of the Assistant Aldermen; C O Springer, —— Brown, Cincinnati; J Muirhead, Petersburg, Va; Mr Hewitt and daughter, Fredericksburg, Va; Mr Thomas importer of hosiery, New York; H C Wood, N. York, Mr Yaakl, Mr Schmidt, Miss Morton, of Falmouth England; ——, Albany, nephew of Mr Bloodgood, Bloodgood's Hotel, Walnut street, Philadelphia; J Cook, Opelousas, La; Mr Duc de Gammont and servant, Mr Comstock, Miss Jones, Mr Peirie and lady.

It is, perhaps, barely possible that one or two mentioned in the preceding imperfect list of the dead may have been saved, but there is little hope. Stewart Holland, or Hollins, the assistant engineer, lost, was from Washington, D C. We are told that he stuck to his duty to the last, and made no effort to save himself. Two minutes before the ship sunk, he was seen to fire the starboard gun aft.

The colored stewardess, who was lost, behaved gallantly. She worked at the pumps in the passage aft to the last moments. The white stewardess sat in the cabin almost paralyzed with fear, and there awaited death, saying that "she might as well die there as any where else."

Messrs Brady and Adams, brothers in-law, had engaged passage by the Baltic, to leave Liverpool on the 4th of October, but unfortunately they changed their minds, took passage on the Arctic, and were lost.

Three of the rescued men brought to this port by the Lebanon, viz: John Connolly, engineers' steward; Thomas Stanton, officers' steward, and P McCabe, waiter, have been taken to the New York Hospital. Connolly is sick, and the two other men are both sick and wounded by being knocked against the raft.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP CHAS. MORGAN

The U. S. mail steamship Charles Morgan arrived at this port yesterday morning from Indianola via Galveston, bringing dates from the latter place to the 15th. The list of her passengers and consignees will be found in the ship news column. We have received most of our Texas exchanges, but they contain nothing of great importance or interest.

The hope expressed in our last, that we would soon be able to announce the disappearance of the yellow fever, has not yet been realized. On Saturday last a number of new cases were reported, chiefly among the crews of vessels lately arrived. We understand that there are about twenty yellow fever patients in the Hospital and some other boats have occurred, but these are very few cases in private practice.

We learn from Capt. Nichols, who came up on Sunday by the Louisiana, that in the late storm a Mr. Andrew's Point and Sabaria, the wind violent wind blew from N. W. This was on Monday night the 19th. The wind forced the water out of the bay in such an tremendous body that there was not room for it in the channel, and it flew from this cause that the water cut away Decrow's Point to such an extent. But what appears somewhat singular is, that at the very same time (Monday night) the wind at Sabaria, and 5 miles was blowing a gale from N. W., it was blowing a perfect hurricane at Matagorda from the N.E. At the same time the wind in this city was blowing from nearly west. Capt. Nichols confirms our previous accounts of the disasters at Matagorda. He learned that the planters residing there immediately went to their plantations for their negroes and commenced repairing and rebuilding, and were, no doubt, speedily able to provide themselves comfortable shelter from the worst of the buildings that had been totally or partially destroyed. The total number of deaths in the bay we do not yet learn certainly whether there were five or six persons killed in Matagorda. The county of Matagorda county are said to be nearly a total loss.

Capt. Haviland, of the steamer J. H. Bell just arrived at Galveston from Indianola, informs the News that he came out of Matagorda Bay by the pass channel, cut by the late storm. Where he found eleven feet water at high tide, the old channel having twelve feet at the same time. The cane on the Brazos, he says, there are better than was anticipated. Those planters who have commenced grinding say the yield will be fully as great as last year, though the quality is inferior. The cotton crop of Brazoria county proves to be pretty much the same, as we have previously been informed.

The News has also the following item: We have just received information of one of the most distressing calamities attending the late storm. Col. Thorpe, a planter in Matagorda, who was spending the summer on the Peninsula, in the neighborhood of Col. Ira R. Lewis, Capt. Hagely and others, was inundated by the water and compelled to leave his house with his family, consisting of his wife and two small children, together with a servant woman and her three children. In the attempt to escape Mrs. Thorpe lost her infant child that was taken from her arms by the violence of the wind. Her other child about eighteen months old was also lost, together with the three children of the servant woman. We have received none of the particulars of this distressing calamity.

The Times thus describes the recent weather in Galveston: Since our last issue, we have had almost incessant rain; and from present indications we can form no idea when we shall have clear, dry weather. It is, however, approaching the time of the year when the Northers may be reasonably expected; and, as they usually followed by frost, when they visit us so late in the season as this, we may look for a regular "nipper" with the reappearance of dry, settled weather.

The Civilian has a letter dated October 2, from a planter on Oyster Creek, confirming the accounts of the damages from the storm and subsequent rains in that vicinity. It says that the storm lasted three days, and the rain continued up to the 24, and literally destroyed the crops. It did not extend over fifty miles up the Brazos, but the crops on the Lower Brazos, Oyster Creek Bernard and Caney are almost entirely ruined. The overflow did not reach in this region, over one-tenth of a crop of either cotton or sugar will be secured. Great quantities of timber have also been destroyed; and scarcely an oak is left standing. The roads are impassable for wagons, and it is difficult to travel on horseback.

The Times learns by a letter that a son of Mr. Dike, of Cherokee county, aged about eight years, accidentally shot his brother through the head while playing with a pistol.

The Houston Telegraph of the 7th inst. informs us that the telegraph line is again in operation between that city and Shreveport. Difficulties on the Red River and New Orleans line—over which the Galveston and Red River Company have no control—only prevent the transmission of dispatches through to New Orleans.

For the seven days previous to October 11, there were ten deaths in Houston from yellow fever. On the week previous there were twenty-three deaths from the same disease. So says the Houston Star.

The Telegraph says that Mr Charles Merlin, formerly keeper of the Alabama House, was found dead in his bed on the morning of the 6th inst. He had been on a spree several days before, and had a vial of black drops, from which he had taken a few drops to quiet his nerves on Thursday night. It was found in the morning that he had taken during the night the entire contents, which caused his death.

The destruction of the cotton crop in Fort Bend county has been distressingly great, as we learn from a communication addressed to the Houston Star. The writer says: "In a few days past I have seen nearly all the crops about here. I can assure you that one-third of an average yield is all that most expect, and many are convinced that they will not even make that. Judge H. (Buckley, we presume,) from 300 acres, will get 100 bales; Mr. Peabody, from 150, about 30; P. G. Secrist, from 5 to 6 bales. In truth, such destruction from storm and rain was never known about here."

The weather in San Antonio has been delightful, and the health good with the exception of considerable sickness among the Mexican portion of the population. The Western Texan states that a military court-martial will probably be held in San Antonio on the 20th, but does not say for what purpose.

We learn from the Ledger that a musician, belonging to Reynolds & Co.'s Circus, was attacked and roughly handled a few nights before by a party of men in a German lush-room, which, wishing to make good his retreat, he fell down a dentrify, broke a leg, and received many other bruises from the effects of which he died the following Tuesday.

The Austin Times mentions the occurrence of a duel(?) in Milam county, between Mr John Kaykendall and Mr. David Donnell, in which the former was fatally wounded by a shot from a gun in the hands of the latter. Also the death of a negroe after punishment by his owner, on the plantation of Mr. A. M. Davidson of that county; the affair, says the Times, "has created considerable excitement, and steps are being taken to ascertain the sanction of the law to the fullest extent."

STARR COUNTY.—We are sorry to learn of an encounter near Carrizo between the United States troops and Indians, in which, entirely owing to the inadequate force of the former, one corporal was so severely wounded that he died; two privates and four horses were also wounded. One Indian was killed, and three wounded. Capt. Hunter headed the command, finally dispersed the Indians, but it was a hard struggle. At last advices Capt. Hunter, and a few troops, were on the trail of the Indians. [State Gazette.

INDIANS NEAR FREDERICKSBURG.—A gentlemen brings intelligence that a party of three men had their horses stolen by Indians in the early part of last week, when encamped within thirty miles of Fredrickesburg, on the Austin road. He saw the Indian trail and came. It would be well for settlers to be on the look-out! There is nothing to prevent the Indians from making a foray upon the Colorado settlements. [Austin Times.

INDIANS AT FORT CHADBOURNE.—Capt. P. Calhoun, in command at Fort Chadbourne, has written a letter to Major Neighbors, from which the State Gazette makes the following extract: "We may now consider ourselves at war with the Indians. Last night one of the men of my command was wounded while bathing between 12 and 1 o'clock in the creek, a few hundred yards from the fort. He received eleven arrow wounds, one of the arrows remaining in him. Although so severely wounded he escaped, and was brought in by one of the married men living on the outskirts of the garrison, who heard the report. He still lives, but will probably die to-night. This is the second outrage committed within the last few days, and many of these not worth much, so that my hands are tied except so far as the post is concerned. Had I one hundred men more, I would carry the war into Africa." Major Neighbors suggests the propriety of sending one of the rangling companies to the aid of Capt. C. The Commanche. It is said there bring several thousand warriors in the field.

The recent victory of the Lipan Indians over the Comanches is said by the Austin Gazette to have led to numerous subsequent skirmishes; and that on one or two occasions as many as fifteen or twenty warriors were killed on both sides.

A U. S. soldier was killed at Belton, in Bell county, recently, with a rock thrown by a powerful man. The perpetrator of the outrage was arrested, but his escaped and is at large. The name of neither party was given in the Gazette, from which we condense the above statement.

The Texas Ranger, published at Washington, announces the presence of General Houston in that place. He was to address the people in several places upon the political topics of the day.

A man of the name of William Covin is advertised as a refugee from justice, in Harrison county. He is charged with the cold-blooded and cowardly murder of Richard Star. A man crippled and blind, and over seventy years of age. Covin is described as being about 22 years old, 5 feet 10 or 12 inches high, dark hair and black piercing eyes.

O'Day, a deserted soldier, who was confined in the jail of Bexar county upon the charge of horse-stealing in Tarrant county, has made his escape. The Herald says: "A vial of aquafortis was conveyed to him in the pipe with which he freed himself of a heavy chain by which he was confined to the floor, and over the jailer opened the door in the morning to hand in his breakfast, he rushed in him, and made his escape. Pursuit was made, but no trace had as yet been found of him."

Three men were shot in Camargo on the morning of the 4th ult.; one for desertion, one for the murder of his mother, and the other for various murders. So says a correspondent of the Rincon Valley

The Texas contains the following account of an outrage perpetrated upon an American citizen by the authorities of Mexico: Dr. J. D. Smith, a citizen of the United States, was purchased in Mexico, at great expense, 500 Mexican cranes, 150 mules, 27 jacks and 47 fine Mexican horses; the animals were procured a short distance beyond Saltillo. At Paris he obtained a pass, and under its direction he traveled to San Fernando, and there paid dearly on his drove of horses, mules, etc., amounting to $2000—and took a pass for Presidio. On the 15th of September he arrived at Presidio, and after he had traveled almost three leagues on the American side, he was overtaken by a company of Mexicans soldiers from Presidio, under orders of the Political chiefs of that place; his animals were all taken from him by force and driven back into Mexico, and the last he heard of them they were being sold by public authority. Dr. Smith immediately communicated to the proper Texas station, and presented his soldiers; but when they arrived at the Rio Grande the persons were in Mexico. He laid a full statement of the facts before our Government officer at El Paso, and they have been forwarded to the Secretary of War.

FROM EL PASO.—The mail from Santa Fe, on the 1st of September, arrived at San Antonio on the 29th. The Indians with the exception of the Muscaleros occupy a warlike attitude. On the 21st ult., after leaving El Paso, and before reaching Howard's Springs, about fifty Indians came upon the mail party and fired several shots, killing one of their mules, but doing no other damage. Only two shots were returned. The party proceeded without any further interruption. El Paso is said to be improving, and business pretty good. The news from Santa Fe is no later than we have received here by way of Independence.

A SACRILEGIOUS SCAMP.—A gentlemanly looking individual obtained admission a few days ago to the Convent of the Sacred Heart in St. Louis, and in passing through the chapel appeared to be overcome with feelings of devotion, and knelt before the altar as if in prayer. The Sister who attended him, not wishing to disturb his devotions, left him for a short time. On her return she found the scamp had gone, taking with him a quantity of jewelry from about the image of the Virgin over the altar. On the same day he stole a valuable gold watch from a priest in St. Patrick's Church.

FROM BUENOS AYRES.—The bark Hugh Birkhead, arrived at New York on the 9th with dates from Buenos Ayres to the 20th of August. The National Government has resorted to extreme measures to enforce the circulation of the new paper money, the tendency of which was to paralyse all commercial transactions. Exchange on the United States was now at 2½ per cent discount. Urquiza was so sick at the latest dates that he had sent for a confessor to receive the last rites of the church.

A PROPER CONVICTION AND A PROPER PUNISHMENT.—At the term of the Criminal Court for the county of Lenawee, State of Michigan, which closed on the 30th ult., Angustus Mc Donald was tried, convicted and sentenced for life, for placing obstructions on the line of the United States mail road, for the purpose, as was clearly shewn and admitted by him, of robbing the mails. This mail road, we suppose, was a railroad; if so, the punishment is a just and proper one, and we are pleased to see Courts recognizing the enormity of the offense, and treating it with the same severity they would visit upon a murder.

A CONGRESS OF AMERICAN DIPLOMATS.—According to Mr. Gallardet, the correspondent of the Courrier des Etats Unis, a meeting is soon to take place either in France or at Baden Spa, between Messrs. Soulé, Buchanan and Mason, to confer upon the policy which the United States ought to pursue toward the European powers. Mr. Soulé was daily expected to arrive in Paris. Mr. Gallardet's information may be received with considerable doubt.

THE VERDICT IN THE GRAHAM CASE.—We have already published the fact that a verdict of manslaughter, in the second degree, was rendered in the case of Dr. Graham. We find the following statement in the New York Herald:

We understand that the Jurors at first stood three—five for a verdict of murder, four for manslaughter in the second degree, and two for manslaughter in the third degree; which resulted, as has been shown, in those for the former and latter penalties compelling to a verdict for the more mitigated crime—manslaughter in the second degree.

We understand from another source that the Jurors on first going out stood ten for conviction of murder, and one for manslaughter in the third degree, and for a long time they could arrive at no other result, when a compromise was proposed to give in a verdict of manslaughter in the first degree; but that was objected to on the ground that the Judge in his charge told them he would not notice that degree of crime, intimating that the present offence did not come within its bearings, and the single Juror showed a determination not to be moved from his position But he finally gave in a little, and the present verdict was made up and rendered.

Covington, Ky., opposite Cincinnati, was the scene of an intense excitement on the 7th inst., among the Americans and Germans, growing out of the brutal murder of a small child by a German, whose name we have not learned. The little boy, as we learn, called the German an "old Dutchman," whereupon the latter attacked the boy and killed him in the street. The murderer was promptly arrested, and threats had been made that the jail would be attacked that night by a mob, with the view of executing summary vengeance. The officers took measures to preserve the public peace.

On the day of the recent election in Cincinnati the Mayor issued a formal request to the keepers of bar-rooms to sell no liquer until the polls closed.

The Harrisburg (Pa.) papers contain applications to be made to the next Legislature of that State for thirty-three new banks, covering a capital of nearly fifteen million dollars.

It is computed that there will be twenty-one thousand miles of railroad in the United States on the first day of January next. The longest railroad upon the surface of the globe is the Illinois Central, which is 781 miles in length, and is rapidly approaching completion.

ANOTHER CHURCH BLOWN DOWN.—Churches seem to have suffered in an extraordinary degree in the late high winds. We have already chronicled the destruction of several, and the Cedar Rapides (Iowa) Valley Times reports another. In the number dated Oct 5 it says: "A tremendous wind-storm visited our place, and among other depredations has blown down the Methodist Episcopal Church, a large and handsome new building just finished to the square and ready for the roofing."

ANOTHER CHARGE OF BEING CONCERNED IN THE SLAVE TRADE.—Bartholomew Blanc, a merchant, was arrested in New York on the 10th inst., on a charge of having fitted out the American bark Williamson for the slave trade. The Herald says: The bark sailed from this port in December, 1853, ostensibly for a market on the African coast and was sold at Cabinda on the west coast of Africa, on the 1st of May, 1854, by H. S. Maraliese Leopard as she was preparing to take on board a cargo of negroes for Cuba. The Merchants District Attorney, Mr. Joachimsen, required the accused to give bail in the sum of $20,000, which had not been given when the Commissioner left for the day.

The first Evangelical Church of the Upper Peninsular of Michigan was dedicated on the 17th ult. The new edifice was one of more than ordinary interest. The edifice was a Presbyterian one, and it is located at Sault St. Marie.

We regret to be under the necessity of stating that the sickness on the Coast, in this Parish, which has heretofore been confined almost entirely to the colored population, has made its appearance in several of the white families. It bears a very close similarity to the epidemic which prevailed last fall. In the town of Natchitoches we are still blessed with general good health. In fact, we believe that it is decidedly the healthiest portion of the Parish. [Natchitoches Chronicle, 7th inst.

A private letter from Russia describes General Gortschakoff as a highly educated man, well read in the literature of all countries, but at the same time an almost superannuated man, with not a spark of military fire, a general fit only for parade. Taskiewitch, it speaks of irreverently, as "an antiquated souvenir." After lamentuling the lack of able generals in the Russian army, the writer states that the best general the Russians have is Nicholas himself, and the second-best his son Constantine.

NEW MAIL CARRIER.—The Grenada (Miss.) Republican of the 7th inst thus accounts for the delay that occurs in the mail carrying up that way:

"An alligator measuring over ten feet in length was killed in the middle of the highway on Sunday morning last, near Mr Nason's. This gentleman was found nearly eight miles from the river in a high upland country. What his occupation was that took him to the piney woods it is hard to say, unless he was employed by Granny Campbell to carry the mail from Tuscahoma to Carrollton."

Louisiana Items.

We learn from the Thibodaux Minerva that on Tuesday the 10th inst. Mr. E Leonval, of that town, committed suicide by taking strychnine. Letters were found upon his person addressed to his mother and wife, accounting for the deed by stating that he had lost a sum of money at cards.

The editor of the Minerva says that many of the sugar-planters in that quarter have commenced rolling, but that he is unable to learn either the ylsid of the cane or the quality of the sugar.

The Concordia Intelligencer of the 18th has the following:

We regret to learn that Mr. B. F. Glasscock, residing on Black River, in this parish, had both his hands caught in the machinery of his cotton gin, on Tuesday evening last, and one of them (his right hand) literally crushed to pieces. It is feered by his friends that amputation must be resorted to. The other hand is badly injured, but hopes are entertained that he will not lose the use of it.

All our exchanges both in Louisiana and Mississippi complain of great injury done to the cotton crop from the late heavy rains and winds. The cotton in this immediate neighborhood has also suffered to a considerable extent, by the rains and the dry rot.

The Alexandria Democrat of the 11th announces that there is no improvement in the health of that town. Up to that date about a hundred persons had been under treatment for a fever resembling yellow fever, though none had died. On the previous day a mone was reported to have the black vomit.

FROM FORT SMITH.—The Fort Smith (Ark.) Herald of the 7th inst. has the following items:

Last week the prospect for a rise in the river was favorable, but a sudden change in the weather took place on Tuesday last, which gave the morninge the feeling of frost, or something very near it, without bringing rain or a rise in the river.

We are pleased to learn that a number of the intelligent Choctaws are in favor of accepting a territorial Government as proposed in Mr. Johnson's bill. The Choctaws will, in our opinion, be the first nation to accept of the liberal provisions of this bill, and become a part of the United States.

Emigrants appear to be traveling north and and south this year. We see emigrant wagons, loaded with women and children, going from the south to Kansas and Nebraska, and from the north to Texas. The larger portion, however, appear to be going north.

Several large droves of horses and mules from Missouri crossed the river this week going to Louisiana and Texas. The river can be forded at this place.

A Choctaw, by the name of Taylor, was murdered near the Sulphur Spring, about one mile from this place, on the night of the 28th of September. He was found on the morning of the 29th, near the road, with a large nut in the breast and one in the abdomen, besides several bruises about the head. The murderers are supposed to be two Choctaws.

LOSS OF THE E. K. COLLINS.—We have already published a paragraph announcing the loss of this steamboat with a great number of lives on Lake Michigen. We have obtained the following further particulars:

The E. K Collins left Detroit on the night of the 8th inst., with a large number of passengers from the Sault for Cleveland, and about midnight, when she was near Weiden, she took fire, and was soon completely in flames. The fire broke out on her lower deck, and such of her passengers and crew as escaped were unable to save any thing except the clothes they had on. Nearly all of them were compelled to jump overboard to escape the fire. But few would have been saved but for the fortunate arrival of the propeller Fintrey, Capt. Langley. All his boats were manned, and nearly every soul saved was through his exertions and instrumentality. Most of the passengers were asleep when the fire broke out, and of course there was great consternation on board when they became aware of the danger. Many plunged into the water.

A MYSTERY.—The Buffalo Democrat says that on the morning of the 25th inst., there was taken from the cistern trap in that city, a human hand out from the arm at the wrist. The hand wee small and delicate, evidently that of a women, and appeared to have been in the water for some time, as the flesh was much decomposed. The story of this hand to whom it ones belonged is of course a mystery, not to be cleared up, perhaps, till the day when all things shall be made plain.

A DEEP SPRING.—On Lake Prairie, Iowa, there is a spring, the bottom of which no plummet has ever yet sounded. It has a false bottom about three feet from the surface, through which, if a twenty foot pole be thrust, it will sink under the sand composing the crust-like layer, and in a moment after its disappearance, will bound up again on the surface. An Indian legend has it that on a quiet full-moon night, the Great Spirit led the wicked ones of a certain tribe thither, and when they saw the glorious beauty of the crystal water, they thought to bathe themselves in the moon-kissed fountain; and therefore plunged into the spring, but sunk to rise no more. Ever afterwards, runs the etory, the manes of these evil unfortunates have troubled the bottomless water, and to this day they agitate the deceptive bosom of the beautiful, though dangerous, spring.

The New York correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, writing under date of the 9th, says:

There are at present in port thirty-eight steamships, one hundred and sixty-eight ships, one hundred and eighteen barks, one hundred brigs, three hundred and eighty-three schooners, besides small craft engaged in various kinds of traffic probably number three hundred, the whole forming a fleet of upwards of eleven hundred vessels.

During the past two or three months an unusually large number of foreigners have returned to their homes in the old World. The number who have left this port for Germany, England and other parts of Europe, since the first of August, is estimated at six thousand, or between ten and fifteen per cent of the total amount of immigration during the same time.

RESURRECTION OF DISEASES.—On digging recently at a particular locality in London, for the purpose of making sewers, the same pit was disturbed which had been the place of interment from sufferers by the plague two hundred years ago. The mortality from cholera has been great in this particular locality. Such analogous cases are said to be on medical record; among others, one in which the small pox was communicated from opening the grave of a person who had died of it ten years previously.

Sir Bayle Roche was the droll of the Irish House of Commons—the Siththorp, but more amusing than his English counterpart. Indignant at receiving small bottles from his wine merchant, he took occasion to suggest to Parliament that, by law, "every quart bottle should hold a quart."

One of his invitations to an Irish nobleman was emusingly equivocal: "I hope, my lord, if ever you come within a mile of my house, you'll stay there all night."

"Does the razor go easy?" asked a barber of a victim who was writhing under a clumsy lustrument, whose oblef demenatretion "was a strong handle."

"Well," replied the poor fellow, "that depends upon what you call the operation. If you are skinning me it goes tolerably easy; but if you're shaving, it goes rather hard."

A very simple method of destroying ants is to put some sugar on a particular part of the floor, and then sprinkle some spirits of camphor upon the ants when they congregate, as they soon will, upon the sugar to enjoy a sweet repast. Camphor appears to be fatal to ants. [Scientific American.

BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast grial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a remedy has at length been found, which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are to full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements

Office of Transportation, Laurens R. R.,
August 4, 1853

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your CHERRY PECTORAL in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

It was in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would soon have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect.

DR J C. AYER: Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefit it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours, with respect. JOHN C WHITLOCK.

THE REV. P. J. EUCLES having resigned the Presidency of SHARON FEMALE COLLEGE, for the purpose of settling the estate of his father, recently deceased, the Board of Trustees wish to procure the services of some gentleman suitably qualified to take charge of said Institution.

The qualifications necessary are—ripe scholarship, unimpeachable character for morals and piety, and membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. A married gentleman, whose lady could take charge as teacher and governess, would be preferred. The President, by the rules of the Institution, is authorized to employ his Assistants (subject to the approval of the Trustees). His family will have the privilege of residing in the College buildings; and he teachers receive the entire tuition fees of the Institution—numbering from sixty to eighty—with a fair prospect, at present, of one hundred students. Additional buildings are now upon the eve of erection for the accommodation of the teachers and students.

Letters addressed to Rev. P. J. EUCLES, Sharon, Madison county, Miss., will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

N. B The public are hereby assured that the exercises of the Institution will be opened as usual, on the First Monday in October next, by competent persons temporarily employed until a regular engagement can be made.

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Br Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Bunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained to prepare to enter the higher departments of the Institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the Institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

Marion Female Seminary,

MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALA.

THE EXERCISES of this institution will be resumed on Monday, the 2d day of October, under the charge of the Rev. Jas. K. Armstrong as Principal, assisted by nine Professors, Teachers and Officers.

It has just closed its present session with one hundred and thirty-three students, seventy-seven of which number were boarders. There is but one session of nine and a half months.

Pupils can enter at any time during the session, charges date from the beginning of the month in which they commence, to the close of the session. No deduction will be made but at the discretion of the Principal.

The Principal, with his family, resides in the building. The female teachers also reside in the Seminary. Boarders in the institution are under the control of the Principal at all times. A Matron who constantly and kindly ministers to the private wants of young ladies, and especially in sickness, a Governess who directs them in their exercises and amusements, superintends the order of their private apartments, instructs them in certain domestic duties, and guards their private, personal habits, manners and morals, always aided by the presence and active co-operation of the female teachers. The Principal and his lady secure to those committed to their charge every necessary and proper comfort and kindness. Here they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations respecting neatness, order, punctuality and economy. They have regular hours for study and recreation, for rising and retiring, for eating, domestic duties, and social enjoyment among themselves.

The institution is furnished with a new and superior apparatus to the departments of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. There is also a large collection of Maps, Charts, Plates, Diagrams, Globes, etc., for simplifying the principles of Geography, Physiology and Astronomy.

In the department of Drawing, Painting and Embroidery there is a fine collection of Drawing Cards, Engravings, Pictures, Paintings, Patterns, and every other convenience important in

OBSERVATIONS

Upon "Pamphlets for the People, by a Presbyter of Mississippi," addressed to the Rev. J. H. INGRAM, of Mobile.

DEAR SIR: The meeting of the Presbyters of the Diocese of Mississippi, which was understood to have convened at Jackson, to determine upon the course to be adopted in relation to the Rev. R. ABBY's little book, acted wisely in selecting one of the youngest (by ordination) of their number to attempt a reply;—for the experienced among them know very well that any reply, to be even plausible, must be composed largely of utterly indefensible statements and reasonings, and if these should be attacked and exposed, the author and his friends could plead his juvenility. Bishop GREEN was far from being caught in that defile. And you, too, sir, acted wisely when you announced your ministerial minority. Still I can not see that this should entirely protect you; as I do not understand that the authority of that meeting was absolute, you might have declined the honor. And the judgment of the world will be, I think, that you were bound to wait until you had reached the age of ecclesiastical puberty before you gratified your desire for offspring, and subjected your brain to the bitterness of parturient pangs; for it often costs more to protect and sustain offspring, than to bring them into being. Whether, therefore, the meeting aforesaid fixed on the one deemed its ablest champion, or on the one they thought they could best afford to sacrifice, the result places you equally in the hands of a reviewer.

You set out by informing us in your preface, that "the high pretensions of the Methodists are not a little remarkable." But you entirely forgot to tell the world what these "pretensions" are that strike you as so remarkable. I know of none which ought to effect you thus, and yet I have known the Methodists and Methodism as long and as intimately as yourself, I presume. I half mistrust that you dare not state what you call "pretensions," and I will, therefore, do it for you. Methodism claims simply to be a Church of Christ—to be acting under a Divine commission—to be acting upon Divine principles—to have with it a Divine spirit—and to show Divine results. She is not of the number who "boast in another man's line of things made ready to her hands." And do any of these claims shock or surprise you? It may be a great piece of presumption in the eyes of Churchmen, for Methodists, or any other Church, to claim to belong to the household of faith; but if so, I see no way but that they must continue to suffer, for I think the cause of Christ and truth is onward.

A simple statement of these claims and their treatment by yourself and your brethren, will show how much justice there is in the deprecatory plea which you set up—that you act on the defensive! After your Bishop and his echoes have perambulated the State, giving out that yours was the only Church in it, trying to invade other folds and lead off proselytes, and unsettle the faith and minds of the pious, until your course has called forth an exposure of your claims, you cry out that you act on the defensive—you are the injured party! This is too late; the public understand you and your course too well to be misled by this.

You say further in your preface, that "the good it (Methodism) seems to do must stand on trial better." Ah, sir, I regret as much as you can, that many who "did run well" have been "hindered," (often by proselyters.) But you must know as well as I, that all Churches, whether large or small, are liable to have their Onderdenks, and Doanes, and Sawyers, etc., in them. It is a sad thing, but so it is. But allow me to suggest that your views in the case may have been formed from association with the most unstable and least pious portion of the children of Methodism—those who have allowed themselves to be flattered and coaxed away from the Church of their nativity, not content with a simple Gospel regime, have substituted for it a more showy but less nutritious diet.

In entering upon the matter of your letters I must, in the outset, correct a very great mistake into which you have fallen when you charge Mr. Abby with having "taken up the Roman spear and pierced his (Christ's) side." Amazing error! So far from this, he took the blade of truth and lanced an unsightly ulcer (succession) which has been produced upon the "body of Christ" by the bad usage of professed friends, and which was fast retarding its usefulness and sapping its constitution. With a good Gospel scion infixed vicious humors may be drawn off, and the health of the Church restored.

You dwell with much emphasis upon the (so styled) heavy charge which Mr. A. has brought against your Church, which, if sustained, would you say, rob that Church of its character and all claim to respect. If you identify the Church with these claims and pretensions at which Mr. A. levels his shaft, it will be very hard for you to prove that it is not a "practical falsehood." Mark these claims—the only Church of Christ in this country—(it was against that pretension that Mr. A.'s strictures are aimed, and if they do not involve you, why reply to them? They do involve Bishop Green)—alone authorized to preach God's word and administer the sacraments, etc. Now if these pretensions compared with results and characteristics do not exhibit that "practical,"—just state one. Yet we do not consign the authors to the greatest punishment God has in reserve for sinners, for we place much of this imposture to the score of paucity of information; and the moment they begin to write upon the points in dispute, they shew it. Mr. A. has not written to "destroy" a Church, but to rebuke imbecile ecclesiastical pretension, and he by no means admits that the Episcopal Church and Christ are so identified that to rebuke the one is to crucify the other. This is a specimen of that arrogant assumption which makes your Church so legitimate a mark for reprehension; and that he has done God's service in this rebuke, is believed by nineteen-twentieths of the praying men in Mississippi. To your prayer on page 9, that God would forgive what he has done (amiss,) I add my amen, and only wish you had included in the petition another—that God would give him grace or wisdom to strike another blow at arrogance, qually effective.

I regret, sir, that you are no better able to discriminate, or so blinded by Church attachment as to characterise Mr. A.'s book as marked by "bitterness and hostility." A simple statement of facts is "bitterness"—drawing the inevitable conclusion from those facts is "hostility!" What, then, is misstatement and distortion of facts? This, I fear, will be proved to have been done in your "pamphlet."

Your first attempt of any thing like argument, is found on page 11, where you endeavor to set forth the results that must ensue upon the success of Mr. A.'s arguments, viz: that neither the Methodists nor any other Church now in existence has any "valid ministry." In amplifying and applying this point, you introduce the case of the Campbellites, affirming that the Methodist Church rejects them "because they have no hereditary or transmitted ministry," and thus attempt to turn the argument upon Mr. A. Now I am sorry to have to step you unceremoniously, but I must do so by telling you that we repudiate that sect on no such ground. If you thus fail on simple questions of contemporary facts, what have we to anticipate when you attempt higher matters? We ignore this modern system because it has not the succession of apostolic faith, which, according to Ireius, Tertullian, Cyprien, Gregory Nazienzen and St. Ambrose (and you know, my dear sir, that we must stand by the Fathers,) and Bishops Lavington, Jewell, White of Ely, and Hall, and Stillingfleet, and a host of others (and, sir, we must not forsake the Bishops,) is the only true succession. Bishop Lavington said, in 1750, that the personal "succession" man had "dextrously preached the people (of England) into downright infidelity." I don't know what he thought about the "gates of Hell" when he said that, or how bedared thus take the "Roman spear" to the "body of Christ!" And good old Tertullian was very loose in his way of speaking on the personal succession, for he says, "to this form of trial (the test of sound doctrine) will appeal be made by those Churches henceforward daily established, which, though they have neither any of the Apostles or apostolical men for their founders, are, from this consanguinity of doctrine, to be esteemed not less apostolical than the former." A thousand pities, my dear sir, that Bishop Green or yourself had not been present to have reminded the good "Father" of the great truth—shown by the fact that "all the Eastern Churches have Bishops"—that there could be no Church without apostolical men for its ecclesiastical progenitors; or that his manuscripts had not come into your hands before they come to the public, for then you could have done with them as Churchmen did with the Ignatian Epistles, Hooker's "Polity," etc. You reason again, "if the bishop's consecrations are doubtful, and not to be proved legal and strictly canonical, those of the ministry whom they always ordained, are equally so. Therefore, if the Episcopacy has not transmitted unbroken the succession, the ministry receiving its orders from this doubtful source, could not communicate to our day the factual inheritance of valid orders." Now, in all this, and much more like it, upon the conclusiveness of which you evidently rely with the utmost confidence, you forget the fact that you reason from the prelatical standpoint and upon assumed Puseyite data. It requires a very bold, or a very ignorant man to affirm as you do, that bishops "always" ordained the ministry—meaning by that, as I suppose you must, that they alone had authority to do this. You must have calculated very largely upon the ignorance or lenity of your readers, for you make such a statement in the face of the whole current of past history. For the "Fathers" of the first five centuries—Catholic writers of nearly every century from the fifth to the fifteenth—the great reformers of the continent, and the fathers and founders of the English Church, all affirm that Presbyters have the power of ordination; and many of them affirm that they exercised it; and the English Church incorporated the provision for them to do so into her "Book of Orders." Hence ministerial orders of the present day do not depend upon the continuity of Episcopal consecrations. This is simply a Church fiction. Churchianity lives by them. Nor is this all; you must be aware that when and where Episcopal consecrations obtained, it did so by sufferance of the Presbytery, as a human arrangement: the proof on this point is overwhelming. The canons of the Church required that a man should first be ordained Deacon, and then Presbyter, before he could be set apart to the Episcopate; and a man of as abiding a faith as you have, in the canonical regularity of the early Church, will hardly doubt that in each case of Episcopal consecration, there had been the previous ordination to the order of the Presbytery. In this great probability we agree. Now, then, as we locate the source of ministerial authority, as it respects the jure divino, and, so far as conferring orders is concerned, in the order of Presbyters, our assurance that we have received valid orders by "factual" transmission, is as much greater than yours can be, as the probability that those filling the Episcopal office had been duly ordained Presbyters, is greater than the probability that they had all been duly ordained Bishops. And any thinking man acquainted with the history of the Church, must see that that difference is vast; for the mere office of the Presbyter has never been the object of such ambitious struggles, intrigues, and corruptions as has the office of Bishop, and so its transmissions has not been attended with such irregularity. A defective ordination to the Episcopate could by no means effect a previous ordination to the office of Presbyter; but by the canons of the Church (and we must stand by them,) a defective ordination to the order of the Eldership would vitiate both that and the subsequent consecration to the Episcopacy. Thus the transmitted validity of our orders is assailed only by the irregularities attendant upon a single consecration—that to the Eldership;—whereas yours is beset by those attendant upon two consecrations, and one, the object of simoniacal bargains, violence, intrigues, and every form of corrupt struggle! A radical defect in the second consecration ruins your hopes; but does not affect ours. It is on this claim alone that we assail it, and yet you exclaim, that if we succeed we shall ruin ourselves! This, I suppose, we are to understand as a specimen of Church logic. You must try again, my Brother. Until you reason better, we shall hardly consent to award to you the honors of a prophet, and therefore all your predictions as to the consequences of Mr. A.'s book, pass with us for nothing. Rome made the same outcry when the Reformers assailed her.

But a truce to reasoning or reliance upon such bases as these in support of ministerial prerogatives and authority. The minister, the Church, which can lay claims to no other or higher source of authority than that which must come from Rome, to no other qualifying unction than that which drips down through the meeses of simony, infidelity, blasphemy, licentiousness and festering corruption which marked the series of wretches who for ages claimed to dispense the mercies of Heaven in the office of Bishops, had better hasten to take out new parchments before called to his account. It is one of Rome's most audacious assumptions, that there must be no ministers of Christ but what she! or her offspring, sends forth! We claim for the Son of God—the Head of the Church—that He has neither surrendered nor waived his right to call forth into his vineyard whom He may be pleased to call, independent of all the Churches, and put upon such a higher honor than may be enjoyed by any others in the vineyard. He has done this again and again, and thereby put a rebuke upon prelatical arrogance that ought to have humbled it forever. For while they have been putting forth to the world the lie that there could be no authority or Divine sanction but through them, God has passed by the whole class, treating them with a most significant and awful silence, and poured his Spirit upon a Luther, a Calvin, a Knox, a Wesley, or a Bunyan, and ebook the moral world through them.

That feature in your pleadings which, by implication, denies Him this right and prerogative, is to me shocking for its impious tendency. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The uninstructed disciples acted upon your principle when they forbid the man to cast out Devils because he would not follow them! What a struggle is there among Churchmen to gather in the spurious fruit of these unauthorized labors!

"THE JUDSON FEMALE INSTITUTE, AGAIN."

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of the 7th inst., OBSERVER renews his attack on the JUDSON, but utterly fails to support his allegations by proof.

Your readers will remember that he charged me with having broken my "promise," to have my pupils attend Church as directed by their parents or guardians. He does not adduce a shadow of proof to sustain the charge. The "prevalent opinion" among the Methodists of Marion; the "recollections" of his letter-writer, or of other persons; the remarks of the two young ladies to the Methodist pastor—each and all have no bearing on the question of my fidelity to my engagements. This is the point under debate, and I hold Observer to it.

Observer wants to know what instructions parents and guardians have given me. Let him ask the parents and guardians themselves; I presume they will not hesitate to tell him—to mind his own business.

As to the "items" respecting "sectarianism," sectarian views are repudiated in all the teachings of the Judson, in whatever books found; they are never even mentioned, as all my Pedo-baptist Teachers will testify. The large number of Methodist and Presbyterian pupils I have always had; the number at this moment in the Judson—larger than ever before—is a sufficient reply to the charge of sectarianism.

In regard to "Jewett on Baptism," all copies of it, in the Judson, have always been kept under lock and key in the private Library of the Principal, "out of the sight or the reach of the pupils." No copies have been given or sold to any pupil, except to the graduates, on the eve of their leaving the Institute. To them it has been presented as a memento of affection; and had the Principal written any other book instead of this—a Dictionary or an Almanac, for example—his vanity would have prompted the same compliment at the final parting of teacher and pupil.

So far as I am concerned, this discussion stops here. With one hundred and ninety young ladies under my care, I have no time to waste in useless controversy. What course Observer may take, will appear in the sequel. He has charged me with abusing the confidence reposed in me by my patrons; with betraying a sacred trust, committed to my hands; with practicing intentional deception on the public; and, I submit to every candid reader, he has failed to prove these charges. Whether he will have the manliness, the honesty, to withdraw his false accusations; whether he will admit that he was mistaken, was misinformed, and will say he regrets uttering these slanderous aspersions, remains to be seen. M. P. JEWETT.

CHOCTAW SCHOOLS.

HARTFORD, Sept. 15—"The Board of Missions.—After an excited debate, they adopted resolutions refusing to continue the connections with the Choctaw Schools under the present law forbidding instruction to slaves and excluding abolitionists."

Good-bye, then; we don't want any missionary who has such a contracted missionary spirit as to be unwilling to teach and preach to thousands of non-slaveholding Indians, constituting the Choctaw Nation, just because there are slaves in the Nation owned by descendants of white men. Let them go; I am not sorry that they are going to leave us, for if the Board has any care for our souls, they would not abandon us because of the slaves owned by our half-breed friends and worthy fellow citizens. I need not make any comment on the law referred to in their resolutions: it is enough that they show that they do not care so much for the Indians as they do for the slaves. Choctaw masters are well alive to the importance and necessity of their slaves being taught in things pertaining to their salvation, and freely allow them to enjoy such privileges. And certainly there are many noble young men and young women who have the enlarged and sanctified Christian spirit of St. Paul, as to be willing and ready to go and teach and preach to the Onesimuses, the slaves, and Philemons, the masters, in the Choctaw Nation. The Choctaw is the largest permanently settled and agricultural tribe of all Indians in the West. Their influence is strong over the neighboring tribes, and with them all on most friendly terms. And I believe sustaining Religion, education and good government among the Choctaws, will be the saver of life and salvation to our neighboring tribes; whose souls are as valuable as the Africans, and more noble in their traits of character—stronger natural minds, and capable of brilliancy under culture of Religion and Education. The Choctaw is the undoubted friend of the United States. His friendship for its citizens is made sacred to him by the blood of his fathers on every battle field since the day of the Revolution to the present, to say nothing of the richer blood which unites the Christian Choctawe to them. He readily adopts the Constitution, the laws, the customs, the manners, the language, the principles, and the Religion of the United States. He is not exceeded in his loyalty to the Government.

The Board of Missions of the New School Presbyterian Church; and it has a large number of devotedly pious and intelligent membership in the Nation. Will they be left without shepherds? What say the Southern Presbyterians? Brother Methodist, Sister Methodist, come, and come to live and die in the work of Choctaw christianization and civilization. We claim your efforts, your services, your means, your men, your women in our behalf. Pay "that thou owest:" whoever comes, let him and let her come to work for the salvation of both matters and slaves. I reckon Christ died for both of them. Who, like St. Paul, will write to the Choctaws—"prepare me also a lodging; for I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you: So mote it be." D. W. LEWIS.

The Freewill Baptists have two out stations in India; all of which are in a hopeful condition. The receipts of their Society for Foreign Missionary purposes last year, amounted to $6 245 93, and their expenditures to only $4,630 23.

A FAIR HIT.—We copy the following from the Commonwealth: "An exchange paper publishes a story in which it is stated that a man who came very near drowning, had a wonderful recollection of every event which had occurred in his life. There are a few of our subscribers whom we would recommend to practice bathing in deep water."

REV. FRANCIS BAKER, formerly assistant clergyman in St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, and subsequently converted to Catholicism, has become insane, and is now an inmate of the Lunatic Asylum.

REV. T. P. HUNT.—We have heard many good things that have emanated from the keen wit of this Reverend Gentleman, but the last one threw us down entirely. A man recently passing Mr. Hunt, was accompanied by a small dog, and the little scoundrel took a sudden fancy to stick his teeth in the old gentleman's legs. This physical manifestation not proving satisfactory to the clerical victim, he determined to victimize the dog in turn, and drawing the big end of his cane, soon added another subject to the dog tombs. This began the dramatic tragic comedy:

Stranger: "Why did you kill my dog?"

Hunt: "Because he was going to bite me?"

Stranger: "Why didn't you use the small end of your stick? you could have frightened him and not killed him!"

Hunt (excited) "Why didn't your dog come at me tail first, then?"

THE FABIAN POLICY OF WAR.—It is said that the constitution of the only military company ever attempted to be organized in Nantucket began with the following article: "Article 1. In case of war this company shall immediately disband."

Sermons upon the subject of the loss of the steamer Arctic have been preached in many churches of the Northern cities.

The Vehmic Tribunals.

Although most minute researches have been made at different times respecting the terrible Vehmic or secret tribunals, which flourished in Germany in the middle ages, no records of their proceedings, nor any of the instruments which they employed in putting to death the victims whom they condemned, have yet been discovered. This has been ascribed to the fact that they were accustomed to hold their sittings in caves and in the midst of forests, or mountains, and they did not deem it prudent to have recourse to writing. The remains of one of these strange tribunals have at length, however, been discovered. M. de Meyenfisch, marshal of the court of Prince Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, fancied that he perceived in the wall of one of the galleries of a museum of rare and curious arms, the trace of a secret door covered with plaster. He caused the plaster, which was very thick, to be removed, and discovered a wooden door. The door was removed, and behind it was found one in iron, fastened with four enormous locks. With great difficulty the locks were opened, and a subterranean passage of a rapid descent, was seen. M. de Meyenfisch, accompanied by the employees of the museum, entered with torches, and after walking upwards of three hundred yards, found that the passage was entirely blocked up with rubbish. The rubbish was removed—there were not fewer than sixty-eight cart loads of it.

Then a vast saloon was open. On the walls at certain distances were wooden figures, clumsily executed, of the Holy Virgin and St. John the Baptist, together with a number of crucifixes. Between these objects were instruments of torture, such as heavy chains, pincers, iron rings, poignards, and a sort of cap in iron with sharp points, destined apparently to be put on the head. In the middle of the place was a large stone slab or table, and around it were ten stone seats. On the table was a hammer, five bolts in black wood, and a copper plate, at the bottom of which were in bas relief a crucifix, the Holy Virgin and St. John the Baptist. On the table also was the iron seat of the Saint Vehme. This seat it was which more than any thing else proved the purpose for which the cavern had been employed. The hammer was probably that with which the initiated were accustomed to strike three times on the doors of the persons whom they were charged to summon before the secret tribunal; the plate and the bolts were probably employed in voting—four votes being sufficient to cause a condemnation to death—the only punishment Saint Vehme was accustomed to inflict. It is on record that in the principality of Sigmaringen, the last Vehmic Court was held in 1417, under the presidency of Duke Ulric of Wurtemburg. Some time after, when the two Counts of Zollern, who had been cited before a secret tribunal, possessed themselves of the country, they abolished the secret jurisdiction, and caused the place in which it had been accustomed to hold its sittings to be fastened up. It is very likely that this place is that which has just been discovered. [Galignani's Messenger.

In front of a fine dwelling in Marlboro', Mass., there are six majestic elms, which the owner keeps insured against injury from lightning or fire, in the sum of five hundred dollars.

The Avaricious Merchant.

There was once a merchant named Filargiro, one of the most avaricious characters in the world—for, though he had realized a handsome property, all his thoughts were bent upon amassing more and more, his avarice still increasing with his increase of wealth. It happened that on returning one day from a sale of some of his goods, with a purse of four hundred gold crowns, while engaged in transacting other business, he was unlucky enough to lose the whole sum; nor was he aware of his loss until he reached home. Arriving there, he opened an immense chest, containing many thousand crowns, and on preparing to add the four hundred to the number, he was struck dumb with astonishment to find that they were gone. He uttered an exclamation of horror every time he put his hands into his pockets, till convinced at last that his loss was but too true, he ran off in great consternation along the path he had come, inquiring of the very dogs he met on his way, whether they had seen or seized upon his treasure. He was quite confounded when he reached the place where he had first received the money without obtaining the least tidings of it.

Almost overwhelmed with despair, he suddenly bethought him, as a last resource, to apply to the magistrate, entreating that a public crier might be instantly sent forth, and offering the sum of forty crowns for the recovery of his treasure. With great courtesy he acceded to the request, expressing himself at the same time concerned to witness the excessive affliction under which the unfortunate Filargiro seemed to labor. The reward was accordingly proclaimed, and the gold soon afterwards made its appearance in the hands of an old lady, who found it on her way home from church. Fearful lest her conscience should be loaded with such a weight of gold, though extremely poor, she would have been very greatly perplexed how to act, had she not luckily heard the crier announcing the reward of forty crowns, which she hoped she might receive with a safe conscience.

Observing her destitute appearance, the Judge very humanely inquired whether she had any means of procuring her subsistence, and whether she had no one to assist her. "I have nothing," she replied, "but what I gain by the work of my hands and the help of one daughter; we weave and spin, Signor, to earn as much as we want, living in the fear of the Lord the best way we are able. My daughter, to be sure, I should wish to see married before I die; but I have nothing to give her for her portion." The Judge, on hearing the poor woman's account of herself, highly praised her integrity, in thus restoring what she might so easily have reserved for herself, and for a marriage portion for her daughter; observing that it was an action of which he feared that few others, under the same temptation, would have been capable. He then summoned the merchant, informing him that his lost treasure was found, and requesting him at the same time to put into the woman's hands the stated reward.

The raptures of the miser were truly amusing when he beheld and seized upon the gold; but on hearing the demand for the stipulated sum, his countenance again fell, and he began to think how he could possibly withhold the promised reward. Having numbered the pieces once or twice exactly over, though he found them perfectly correct, he turned towards the old woman, saying: "There are four and thirty ducats short of the sum which I put into this bag." The old lady appeared extremely confused at this accusation, and exclaimed in a distressed tone to the magistrate, "Oh, sir, can that be possible? is it likely I should have stolen thirty-four ducats, when I had it in my power to possess myself of the whole? No, believe me: I swear, as I value my hope of heaven, that I have restored the exact sum which I found on my return from church; not a single farthing have I taken out."

But the miserly old wretch, continuing to affirm most solemnly that the ducats were in the same bag with the crowns, and that she must consider them as sufficient remuneration, the affair seemed to perplex the worthy judge not a little. Yet when he reflected that the old miser had only mentioned the four hundred crowns in the first instance, he began to suspect his design of imposing upon the poor woman, in order to save the paltry sum offered as a reward. He felt the utmost indignation at the discovery of this deceit, believing no punishment to be too severe for this despicable branch of faith. But checking his rising passion for a moment, he reflected that the most effectual punishment he could bestow upon the miser's attempt to impose upon the magistracy would be to make him fall into the very snare he had laid for another. With this view he addressed the merchant:

"And why did you not mention the full amount of your loss before proclaiming the reward?"

"I overlooked it; I quite forgot it," was the reply.

"But it seems somewhat strange that you, who appear so particular about trifles, should not have recollected the circumstance of the ducats. And as far as I can understand, you wish to recover what is not your own. I mean to say that this bag of gold never could have belonged to you at all, since the sum you first mentioned is not to be found in it." The Judge then turned towards the old woman, observing, "Since it is plain that the money is none of his, and you have had the good luck to find it, pray keep it; the whole is your own, should no owner appear who can prove his right to the property; therefore, give it as a wedding gift to your daughter. If it should happen that you meet another purse, containing the ducats as well as the crowns, belonging to the gentleman, I beg you will return it to him without demanding any reward."

The wretched merchant, finding that the Judge had truly penetrated his motives, and that there was not a chance of succeeding in his nefarious design, declared that he was quite willing to pay the reward he had promised, if she restored the remaining money, which was indisputably his own. But it was now too late; the Judge, turning towards him with an angry air, threatened to punish him for such a disgraceful attempt to defraud another of so large a sum, since from his own account it could not possibly be his:

"Get out of my presence, and beware how you exasperate me further! If this good woman should be fortunate enough to meet with the purse, with the exact amount you mention, she has promised to restore it to you untouched. This I think is enough."

Without venturing to answer a single word, the unhappy Filargiro was compelled to leave the place, unaccompanied by his new-recovered treasure, and filled with vexation at having refused to fulfil the conditions he had made. The poor old woman, on the other hand, went away overjoyed at her unexpected good fortune; and it need hardly be said that no claimant for the lost property ever appeared. Her daughter, after having long indulged in a vain attachment, had at length the pleasure of being united to the object of her choice, at the expense of the avaricious old merchant.

A lawyer at Poughkeepsie was applied to during his lifetime by an indigent neighbor for his opinion on a question of law in which the interests of the latter were materially involved. The lawyer gave his advice and charged the poor fellow three dollars for it.

"There is the money," said his client; "it is all I have in the world, and my family has been a long time without pork."

"Thank God!" replied the lawyer, "my wife never knew the want of pork since we were married."

"Nor never will," the countryman rejoined, "so long as she has such a great hog as you."

The lawyer was so well pleased with the smartness of his repartee that he forgave the poor fellow and returned him his money.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Members will take notice that it meets at Franklin, La., January 17th; Bishop ANDREW having changed it from the 10th. At the last (4th) Quarterly Conference, if not before, the lay members will be appointed for the Conference Committees. Every circuit and station should have its best man there. The financial and educational business will require large and liberal minds, devising liberal things. The missionary funds, the widows and orphans' collections, and others, we hope, will show a full figure.

PREACHERS AND CONFERENCES.—Providence permitting, the Editor will attend the Conferences patronising the paper, at their approaching sessions. He hopes to be made glad in a double way: meeting with brethren beloved, and meeting all the cash collected, clear and clean, from accounts sent out, with the addition of at least a thousand new subscribers.

DEDICATION.—The Selma (Ala.) Reporter, 17th inst., says: Last Sabbath the new Methodist Episcopal Church in Selma—a neat and elegant structure—was dedicated. The Rev. P. P. NEELY preached the Dedicatory Sermon.

HIGH CHURCHISM has broken out in a new quarter, if the following be true. We should hope, for the sake of the Baptists especially, that such a piece of folly has been falsely attributed to them.

"The Salina Baptist Association, (Mass.,) at its late meeting, with one or two dissenting voices,

"Resolved, That it is inconsistent for Baptists to recognize Pedo-baptist preachers as Gospel ministers (denying as we do the legality of their official acts,) by inviting them to occupy our pulpits, or preaching with them."

THE REFORMER.—This neat and readable exchange is published at Handsboro, Miss.; Edited by Rev. H. T. LEWIS, and devoted to morals, news, and temperance. It is a luxury to hear our friend Lewis fire off the big gun—bang—bang she goes—as one parish and county after another fully into the No-License ranks.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.—It seems that all of the Theological Seminaries in connection with the Presbyterian Church, so far as heard from, have opened with an increased number of students over those present at the corresponding period last year. The Danville Seminary, Kentucky, has now thirty-five. Princeton, the second week, had one hundred and eight or ten. The Western Seminary at Allegheny City, Pa., opened prosperously—there were thirty present the first week. New Albany, Indiana, has a class of sixteen in attendance. The Union Seminary of Prince Edward, Va., opened with a class of twenty-six, and expects others, which is a larger number than it has had for several years. The Seminary at Columbia, S. C., commenced its session Monday week, but we have not heard the number in attendance. The Southern Presbyterian speaks encouragingly of its prospects. There will, probably, be at least three hundred students in attendance on all these Seminaries this winter.

INFLUENCE OF THE BIBLE ON SECTARIANISM.

An intelligent Christian, and an old man, remarked to us lately on the effect, as seen in his lifetime, of Bible Societies, and Bible distribution, and Bible reading. Sectarian feelings have been mollified, sensibly. Religious disputes are not marked, as a general thing, with the old acrimony. Christians disagree less and more kindly.

All this comes of a better understanding of the record itself—the Divine original. How often disputes arise and wax warm and end, with the discovery that both parties were wrong. Divisions of the same army have met in fogs or night, and mistaking each other's character, gone to fighting. Misconceptions are fruitful of broils. Ignorance, like a mischief-making whisperer, separateth chief friends.

Knowledge promotes tolerance in feeling and sobriety in judgment. A criminal Judge once said to us,—bantering him on his professional acquaintance with the worst side of humanity—"I find out that the worst of men are not so bad, and the best not so good, as they are taken to be."

Christians, well read in the Bible, and not taking its teachings at second hand, find others holding with themselves the great truths and differing on minor matters; and that there is something to be said on both sides. They become charitable without latitudinarianism.

Bishop BURNET said, touching preparation for the Ministry—"One capital error in men's preparing themselves for the sacred function, is, that they read divinity more in other books than in the Scriptures."

The opinion that access to the Bible, and every one studying the Bible for himself, leads to dissent and multiplying sects, is not sound in theory or true in fact. There were more sects before the Reformation than at any time since.

"THE ARTIC LOSS."

Such is the heading of the leading article in most of our exchanges of last week. The pulpits of the Sabbath before echoed the solemn warning—"In the midst of life we are in death." A gentleman occupying the office next door to ours, and whom we have often looked in upon, was among the lost—W. Perkins, Esq., brother of Judge Perkins, M. C.

"The full report of losses of vessels connected with American trade, embracing inland trade, exceeds 4000 in the last twelve months. The whole reported from every part of the world is over 10,000.

"Up to 1850 the average losses reported from every section reach 3000. The losses of the last twelve months exceed those of any three previous years.

"Over fifty vessels in that time have not been heard from.

"The losses paid by Marine Insurance Companies for the last year, in New York alone, exceed $12,000,000.

"The losses on land, by fire and storms, for the last twelve months are not less than $18,000,000—making not less, in all, than $30,000,000."

Captain LUCE, though not wanting in self-sacrifice and sympathy, it seems to us, was strangely deficient in the promptness and fertility of resource and power of command required by his position. We are, therefore, at a loss to understand the honors paid him. This affair is a disgrace to the American marine. It is enough to make us all ashamed of humanity. Not one woman saved! Not one child!

On Thursday, we had an interview, in our office, with one of the survivors, Mr. T——. He escaped, with the last, on Dorian's boat; was twenty-five hours exposed, but suffered not the want of food or drink, only cold. The suction caused by the sinking ship was not so great as is imagined. The time from collision to sinking was four hours; it seemed to him about half an hour! Knowing that he had been assailed by a thousand inquiries, our own were very few. But he made us feel his spirit. The impression of the hair-breadth escape and awful catastrophe seemed to rest on him still. In the remarks of the eloquent CHAPIN, we find the best expression: "The most expressive sign of a great sorrow is a deep silence. For the calamity that really smites upon the individual or the public heart, strikes below the surface of emotion, and smothers words. Hence the anxiety with which we look upon speechless affliction, and the welcome we give to tears. And hence, too, the reluctance with which we attempt to speak in the presence of a mighty woe. All language is inadequate, and seems garrulous; and, moreover, something within bids us be still, and wait till the darkest of the shadow passes over."

LAKE PROVIDENCE, LA.—Rev. R. J. HARP writes, 20th inst.: "Most of the yellow fever patients are convalescing. We have had about a dozen cases in town, and about the same number in the country. Only two cases in the town proved fatal, and five of those in the country. Dr. Davis died yesterday, and there will probably be another death to-day. There have been but one or two new cases for eight or ten days. I hope we may have no more.

"I was attacked on the 2d inst., and am just able to creep about. My friends once thought my case almost hopeless, but through a kind Providence and kind nursing I am now on my feet."

"A CONCEPTION OF HIS HEARERS."

A correspondent of the Charleston Standard writes of Dr. BAKER, an eminent preacher of the Presbyterian Church. Dr. B. is a revivalist, a Caughey among his brethren. He is holding protracted meetings in the upper Carolinian Districts.

We extract the following, principally for the sake of one suggestive sentence. It goes far to account, under God, for his success in saving souls:—

"I have heard more finished orators—men whom it was more pleasant to hear; but I have seldom heard an orator who made his hearers understand him better, or who gave them less room, or less occasion, in fact, to dodge the conclusions to which he came. He is composed, and thoroughly in earnest. He seems himself to follow the track along which he leads you, to be practising his own precepts, and few are inclined to oppose a rebellious spirit to his teachings.

"It is the distinctive feature of his preaching, that he speaks not to a conception of his hearers, but to his hearers. Men have no time or opportunity to hand his admonitions over to their neighbors. Each is made to feel that he is himself the object, and that then and there in view of the hopes of Heaven and the powers of hell, alone, and upon his own responsibility, he must accept them or reject them.

"This remarkable divine is still hale and hearty: he seems to have had a fine constitution and to have preserved it well; and though more than sixty years of age, for the last month, with but three exceptions, while traveling, he has preached three and four sermons a day, and each of them at least one hour long."

This advice has been given to young preachers, to overcome bashfulness before a congregation—"Conceive of your hearers as a bed of cabbage heads, and thus address them." Or this: "Elevate yourself in your imagination for the time being, far above the intelligence of any of your congregation." Or this: "Pick out the most ignorant looking, and address all as on that level."

Miserable nostrums, all. The first would be more likely to secure cabbage-headed sermons than conversions: the second promote self-conceit and disgust; and the third ignores the judicious bounty of the house-holder, bringing out things, new and old, from his treasure; or the various skill of the master workman, who rightly divides the Word of Truth.

No conception of the preacher's hearers can rise above the fact, in appealing to his sympathies and arousing and sustaining his utmost efforts. They are dying creatures, yet immortal: not at peace with God; plunged of sin; the Gospel the only remedy; God in Christ reconciling the world; salvation present; the mercy offered great and free, and the offer closing; after death the judgment! Such conception lodged in the head and heart of the most timid, to whom a dispensation of this Gospel had been committed, would cast out the fear of men's faces and exalt above the dread of their criticism. "The love of Christ constraineth us." "Knowing the terror of the Lord, we persuade men." These overwhelm all other conceptions, and overshadow all meaner fears.

Book Notices.

The following Books are laid on our table by the polite Publishers, through J. C. MORGAN, Bookseller and Stationer, adjoining the Post-office, where they are kept on sale. Morgan keeps a large assortment of the freshest publications of the day, and may be relied on for the ready obtaining or transmission of books, periodicals and papers:—

LIFE OF CHRYSOSTOM, BASED ON THE INVESTIGATIONS OF NEANDER, BÖHRINGER, AND OTHERS: By PEATHES. Translated from the German by A. HOVEY and D. B. FORD. Boston: J. P. Jewet & Co., 1854: 12mo., pp. 239.

JOHN was born in Antioch, A. D. 347. Grateful Christians called him Chrysostom, because of his golden words. He is represented in person as small, slender, and bald-headed. Though his homilies and speeches have passed through translators, the style retains, to a singular degree, its individuality and the words their gold. A few years before his birth, the Church had received "the fatal gift of Constantine." Christianity became popular. The corruption which hitherto had warred from without now became an organized power within it. Another complication of difficulties, new and perilous, was added to those moral and social ones already existing; and to meet which, men for the times were wanted and sent. In his "Hypatia, or new foes with old face," Kingsley has spoken of them to our mind: "The general intermixture of ideas, creeds and races, even the mere physical facilities for intercourse between the different parts of the Empire, helped to give the great Christian fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries a breadth of observation, a depth of thought, a large-hearted and large-minded patience and tolerance, such as we may boldly say the Church has ever since beheld but rarely, and the world never; at least, if we are to judge those great men by what they had, and not by what they had not, and to believe, as we are bound, that had they lived now and not then, they would have towered as far above the heads of this generation as they did above the heads of their own."

After twelve years of presbytership in his native city—where the disciples were first called Christians—his eloquence, and piety, and usefulness growing with equal pace, Chrysostom was translated to the second greatest city in the Roman Empire, then the capital, Constantinople, and ordained bishop, A. D. 398. Corruption was rolling in like a flood. His eloquence was faithfully used in lifting up a standard against it. He baptised the children of the Empress Eudoxia, and for rebuking her sins, he was, like another John, exiled, A. D. 404, and soon died of exposure and cruelties. On hearing the sentence: "Let the billows rise; the ship that carries Jesus does not sink. What need I fear? Is it death? Christ is my life. Is it banishment? The earth is the Lord's."

He is the author of that beautiful liturgical prayer, worth more than tomes of speculative theology:

"ALMIGHTY GOD, who dost promise that when two or three are gathered in Thy name, thou wilt grant their request. Fulfill now, O Lord, the desires and petitions of thy servants, as may be most expedient for them; granting us in this world knowledge of thy truth, and in the world to come life everlasting. AMEN."

In communing with this "father," if you call him so, one feels that he could hardly have lived so long ago. He is the liveliest link of all between the past and present, by spirit and themes, and thought and acts, identifying the Church of Christ. What practicalness in his wisdom! in his denunciations of contemporary iniquities—theator-going, horse-racing, gaming, extravagant dressing, circuses, and the various tricks of trade and shapes of crime, and all worldliness in the Church, one almost imagines he is hearing a modern "evangelical." So like itself is sin; so uniform is the position and voice of Christianity toward it.

Let us connect with this lively link the fourth and the nineteenth centuries. In another column read the call upon Christian masters to build plantation churches for their servants. They can do it, they ought to do it; the needs of their dependents call for it; consistency calls for it, and to their own Master they will be held to account. Imagine Chrysostom in his pulpit, A. D. 399, in Constantinople, near where the dome of St Sophia rises. Wealthy masters and landlords enjoy the luxury of a city residence, or have ridden to town to hear the gold-mouth preacher. There they sit, enjoying Gospel privileges; but those who till their lands—where are they? Hear Chrysostom (p. 94):

"Many of you own estates in the country, and do not trouble yourselves how Christianity is treated upon them. You are solicitous for the building of baths and barns, and for the increase of rents, but not for the souls of your dependents. If you find thorns and weeds in your field, you burn or root them up, in order to improve the land; but weeds in the heart or life of men, you suffer to grow undisturbed! Do you not fear the householder to whom you must render account? Ought not every landlord (planter) to build a church, install a teacher and cooperate with him? How can the peasant be expected to become a Christian, if he sees you, his Christian lord, so little anxious for the salvation of his soul? I entreat you, I admonish you, nay I prescribe it as a law, that no landlord be without a church. Tell me not, there is a church in the neighborhood, or it will cost too much, I have not sufficient property. Is the expense so great? * * * Look not at the fact of its bringing no gain to you; is it no gain to gather souls into the heavenly garner? Will you think only of the fruits and barns upon earth? Ah, such an one considers not how precious it is to win souls; but we know it. Let us begin this Spiritual work, but with earnestness and zeal, not as a subordinate matter."

He then describes the blessing which would accrue in manifold respects to the owners, beyond acquitting their consciences before God, from the Church and preacher. The laborers would become new men; "there would be fewer trespasses, affrays, thefts; and the poor, hitherto neglected people would enjoy Christian consolation in affliction, and be thankful for the treasure procured for them." Could a plea be framed, stronger and juster, for the Mississippi swamp?

It were needless to add a special commendation of this volume. Who studies Chrysostom's character and such of his writings and cotemporary history as completes the portrait, finds better things than the mere fossils of theology and emotions and frames of mind that he could wish to retain always.

SABBATH MORNING READINGS ON THE OLD TESTAMENT: By J. CUMMING. Boston: J. P. Jewett & Co., 1854: 12mo., pp. 371.

Dr. CUMMING wields the pen of a ready writer. Thicle a running and eloquent comment on EXODUS; and before the year is out, another is promised on LEVITICUS. One that draws upon the boundless subjective resources of the "Minister of the Scotch National Church, Covent Garden, London," might make a book every month; and it would be readable. Fertility would not be exhausted, but stimulated thereby. And there is a grateful savor of devotion about his monthly fruit. But the objective reasonings and statements must be lacking in accuracy and breadth. The ground covered is consecrated by stupendous manifestations of Divine glory and thrilling adventure of the wanderers. He dips into slavery as it existed among the Jews, contrasted with the institution in the Southern States of America. The strong points are surrendered, without a summons, and a show of defense made behind secondary and tertiary ones. Enting this—a portion of the 21st chap.—the book is a delight; and we recommend it for any day in the week.

The author puts us in possession of his intention—"to furnish a text book for the study of Ecclesiology and Church polity in Theological Seminaries." He assumes most radically the universal priesthood of believers, and would set aside Papacy, every form of Episcopacy and ruling Elders, for Congregationalism. A good deal of Church history has been brought together on this point, and made convenient for reference; and for this we chiefly value the volume. The peremptory tone of the discussion rather surprises us, in one pleading for the largest liberty. It smacks of exclusiveness. "The most expedient and scriptural polity for the Church is not a matter of opinion only." From this text Congregationalism is urged as a certainty of Divine prescription. We regard Congregationalism as the result of the infection or pressure of ultra-democracy upon Church government. Its New England developments afford unfortunate illustrations of inability to preserve wholesome discipline or doctrine. Those who wish a statement of its history, defense and polity, will find it here, as set forth by a terse and clear writer, and one who writes as with authority.

The portrait of the authoress is good-looking enough. The papers speak of the present work as her chef d'œuvre. We read none of them. Opening the well-favored volume, we sampled at sight. Our eye fell on this refreshing sentence: "But Ellen withdrew her hand and covered up her face and wept. He waited patiently until she wiped her eyes and lifted up her face and replied:"

The same old vanity of vanities—all vanity. One begrudges this clear paper and type, when both are so scarce, to such waste.

Knowing the story of a man's life, be it ever so humble, increases our interest in him; especially if it be well told. So it is of a book, of any book, even of the Book. We have here an account of the Holy Bible while it was growing to the present full and perfect rule of faith and practice for mankind: Parchment and rolls, prophecies and Gospels and Epistles were added, increasing the wealth of the world by revelation in greater proportion than adding lands and continents by human discovery. The holy penmen heed their disasters. The Book grew. Toiling and accurate copyists pass before us; persecutions, hidings, burnings and sacrifice of THE BOOK. Printing is discovered. Translators work and revise. The Book is obtained. The frontispiece shows THE BOOK stationary in the crypt of old St. Paul, and one is reading aloud to promiscuous hearers. The British and Foreign Bible Society is formed in 1804; the American Bible Society in 1816. Now the Book runs and is glorified.

The Book and its story was meant for the young, but the old will read it, too. The translation of the Bible into various dialects and tongues, is so intimately related to the rise and progress of Missions, the world over, that we have incidentally much useful information of that sort. So, also, of the improvements and details of the printing art, and the progress of civilization. From officers of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and access to its archives, accurate and large statistics are furnished. The various and valuable contents are indexed. It is no disparagement to say that the story of THE BOOK enhances its interest. The dealings of Providence in its preservation and spread, put on it a value even beyond what is intrinsic. We heartily recommend this volume as a stimulant to the study of the Bible. The publishers have put forth a neat and substantial edition, first American from the eleventh London edition.

THE CHINESE REVOLUTION.

SUCCINCT ACCOUNT.

The Editor "of the Herald," of Louisville, Ky., has heard a lecture by Dr. C. A. TAYLOR, returned Missionary of the M. E. Church, South. The summary is interesting, and, in some respects, new:—

"The lecture was taken up in a narrative of the rise, progress and present aspect of the rebellion. His statements fully corroborated those of the missionaries of other denominations, which have been so extensively published in the religious newspapers of this country. The Dr. indulges the most cheering anticipations of the good results which are to grow out of the insurrection. He stated some incidents in the life of Tae-ping-wang, the leader of the insurgents, which we had not heard before, together with a great many others that were already familiar to the reading public. In the year 1836, Tae-ping-wang was a candidate for examination for literary honors, preparatory to receiving a recommendation to the Emperor for an appointment to civil office. A Chinese convert to Christianity, Leang Afa, was at one time distributing some tracts in the city of Canton, where the candidates were assembled, and among others, handed Tae-ping-wang one, entitled "Good Words exhorting the Age." He received it and read it with avidity. He soon afterward sought further instructions, and was directed to the Rev. Mr. Roberts, a Baptist missionary at Canton, who received him into his family, and instructed him for the space of two months. Mr. R. found him remarkably studious, and enthusiastic; he claimed to have visions of the Saviour, and applied for baptism. This Mr. R. declined administering, until he was more enlightened. He left his house and went to the southern part of the Empire, and Mr. R. heard no more of him, until, since the rebellion broke out, he discovered that his old pupil was at the head of it. He then learned that Tae-ping-wang, after leaving him, engaged in teaching school, and distributing books and tracts among the people, and collected them together and addressed them on the absurdity of their idolatry. He made so many converts, that the civil authorities forbade him to teach the people any more, threw him into prison, and put two men to death for embracing his doctrines. This inflamed the minds of the people against the government, and two large tribes in the South, which had never submitted to the Tartar Dynasty, made proposals to him that they would embrace his religious tenets on condition that he and his followers would join them in resisting the Imperial officers in executing the laws. The Triad Society, which was numerous also, proposed to unite with them. They gathered up a large force, and took up arms against the imperialists, intending at first merely to resist the execution of the royal edicts, but after achieving one or two victories, and becoming conscious of their strength, their leader professed to have a vision, in which he was appointed, by God, to the work of exterminating idolatry, and expelling the Tartar Dynasty from the Empire, which had ruled over it for near two hundred years. They, therefore, after several months determined to press on toward the Capital. The British Embassy, having received several of their proclamations to the people announcing their designs, and hearing various representations of their feelings toward foreigners, and all the foreign residents being in great doubt as to the nature of the rebellion, determined to send a steamer to Nankin to ascertain for themselves the true state of the case. The steamer was fired into, forty miles below the city, but the officers placing on it, in large characters in Chinese, "We come to communicate, not to fight," they ceased firing and came on board. The officers and crew discovered among them eleven different tracts, bearing the signature of the leader, who had by this time proclaimed himself Emperor. These tracts contained the first twenty-seven chapters of Genesis, various forms of prayer, hymns, and the Ten Commandments, with an addition to the seventh, forbidding the use of opium on the penalty of death. Their leader, it appeared, had other parts of the Old Testament, from the various quotations which he had made from it, but had not the New Testament. He had taken Joshua as his model, and claimed that he was commissioned to exterminate the Tartars, as Joshua did the Canaanites. It was said he had his harem, and thirty-six wives, and plead Old Testament precedent for it. He was kind and lenient toward all but Tartars, whom he seemed bent on exterminating, or banishing from the Empire."

INFLUENCE OF THE NEW GOSPEL.

If another Gospel, or a new one, has not been preached by certain pulpits of the land, it sounds like it. The case may be only that of those old tunes, familiar from childhood, known to the unskillful and blessed of all, undergoing such variations, as no longer to be recognized. Under the name of Gospel, socialism has been sung, talked and preached, abolitionism, fugitivism, compromisism, Nebraskaism, and other isms, until many are anxious to know how the plain Gospel sounds. The positive effects are disastrous. We copy from the New York Observer:—

"A writer in the Presbyterian Advocate of September 13th, gives a list of the most highly favored Presbyteries, to each of which is annexed the number of settled preachers, and the average of additions on examination for each pastor and stated supply. He then gives a list of pastoral charges, in which the largest additions on examination have occurred. From the facts and figures set down, the following are some of the inferences:—

'1. The Southern portion of our Church has been peculiarly favored with revivals during the past year.

'2. Those Presbyteries in the Northern States which have made the largest additions to the number of their communicants, with few if any exceptions, are those which have been most free from the distracting influences of abolitionism and other similar exciting topics.

'3. Generally speaking, those Presbyteries which are most strongly tinctured with ultra abolition sentiments, have been least favored with divine influences. The Presbytery of Chillicothe, for instance, with an effective force of fifteen stated preachers, received to communion only sixty-seven persons, being an average of only four and a half to each minister. Several other examples might be produced if necessary."

HOWARD COLLEGE.—From the Marion (Ala.) Commonwealth we learn the particulars of the calamity that befel this Institution on the 15th inst.:—

"The conflagration occurred about midnight. When the fire was first discovered by the students, the passages and stairways of the building were impassable on account of the flames and smoke, and they were driven to attempt an escape by leaping hurriedly from the windows. One life has been lost, that of the college servant, who died on the following day of injuries received from the fire during his efforts to awake the students to a knowledge of their peril.

"Six students received injuries from burns and by leaping from the windows of the building, which for a time rendered their cases precarious; but they are now believed to be out of danger.

"One Professor, the Tutor, and ten students received injuries from the same causes, which, though serious, are such that they will speedily recover.

"The remaining seven students in the building were all slightly hurt; but are now able to resume their duties."

The citizens of Marion, with commendable yet characteristic promptitude, appointed a committee and raised funds for relieving the injured. The Trustees held a meeting and resolved to rebuild the College at once. The buildings for the accommodation of the College are not to cost less than $20,000; a very large proportion of which sum has already been subscribed by the citizens of Marion and vicinity.

MAGAZINES.—Mackenzie, in the new edition of Noctes Ambrosiane, says that Blackwood's Magazine has never had a circulation of more than 10,000, which yielded £750 per month, out of which are deducted the expenses of authorship, composition, advertising and paper. The net profit is probably £3,500 per annum. "As a contrast, and to show how much the American magazine readers outnumber the same class in the old country, let me state some of the statistics of the most popular periodicals in the world, Harper's Magazine, four years established. One of its distinguishing features is the beauty of its illustrations. These together with the letter press, are electrotyped thus securing a fac simile of the whole, no matter how extensive the number printed. The annual circulation is 130,000 a month, of which, within a week after Magazine day, about 120,000 are cleared away for all parts of the world. The monthly expenditure to authors and artists is $2,500—a large amount, but three-fourths of its contents are original. Taking an average of eight readers to each number, it would appear that Harper's Magazine supplies literary instruction and entertainment for 1,040,000 readers."

BIBLE AGENCY IN ALABAMA.

MR. EDITOR: Please let me say through your paper to the friends of the Bible cause in Alabama, that owing to the affliction of my family, Rev. J. LYONS, Bible Agent for East Tennessee, and myself have changed fields during this Winter. I doubt not he will have the hearty cooperation of the members of the Alabama Conference. I know many of them personally, and have had the privilege of presenting the Bible cause in their Churches, and can say, a more noble class of brethren I have never known.

In consequence of the death of our beloved Pollock, a part of the State has not yet been visited, while a number of counties have been visited twice during the last two years, and several well supplied with the Word of God.

The American Bible Society looks to the salvation of the world by circulating the Holy Scriptures among all classes of society, and in all the languages of the earth.

Contributions made to this cause are certain to accomplish good; for the "Scriptures are able to make men wise unto salvation." God, in his merciful providence, has opened the way for the circulation of the Bible among the nations of the earth, and now the Church may do much toward the salvation of the world by giving the Bible to those who have it not. There is only about one Bible to every thirty inhabitants throughout the world. The prospect was never so good for the universal spread of the Gospel as now; and the Christian Church should say: "We are fully able to go up and possess the land."

Yours, J. ATKINS.

GREENVILLE MISSION—MISS. CONF.

To the Rev. H. N. McTYEIRE, Assistant Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

BRO. MCTYEIRE: To those interested, I say, that the Greenville Mission is grand on the increase in the good things of the Gospel of Christ. Though my health has been bad during the Summer, I often found my duty as well as I could; and I am thankful that the Spirit of the God of Missions has been with me in the preaching of the word. In our classes and prayer-meetings poor sinners, among the servants, have found peace and certain hope of immortality. In exhorting to the minister to hear them in a simple way, express gratitude to God for the forgiveness of sin, when they say: God has fogiven all my sins. I feel he is my saviour, and I will love him for it. I am to meet you in Heaven."

I am now closing my third year on this mission. Thank God, my labor has not been in vain. I have felt my heart interested in the salvation of the black people. I shall meet many of them in Heaven.

We have one very good Church, which will sent 200 white persons comfortably. The membership of whites, 15. The Christian friendship and hospitality of this people have enjoyed. I will long remember them with pleasure, with prayer to God for them that they may be saved.

I preach at seven plantations once in two weeks; but will leave a plain for a four weeks' circuit. There are: Of colored members, 270; children catechised, 200; added on probation, 110; expelled, 4; died, 6; children baptized, 50. I think I can say the work is in a good condition, progressing through God's grace. I sincerely pray that a man may be sent to them who will follow the work at heart.

My fourth Quarterly Meeting is just over. I could not attend on account of severe sickness. Our venerable P. E., Rev. JOHN WADSWORTH, who is abundant in labor for the Church of God, was also afflicted.

We are much indebted to our young brethren, Revs. Jones and Wadsworth, for their kind assistance.

I feel like saying more about Mississippi and their improvement in the Mississippi Conference, but must submit this duty to others more experienced in its operations. A suggestion may direct the mind of such persons to very important items.

It is a pity that our Mississippi Missions can not become as useful and interesting as those of the rice-fields in South Carolina and Georgia Conferences. We have large cotton planters here interested in missionary work. Many of them have well cultivated minds. Some are members of our Churches, while others are opposed to preaching to the colored people.

The Conference always sends young, experienced men to these missions. The missionary spirit is not spreading as it should. It does not take hold of the feelings of the people. Some do not care whether the missionary comes or not, and others wish he would stay away.

If more experienced men, say Elders, were sent to them, it would give character to the sessions; for our missions are not yet all right. The prejudice and indifference of the people must be removed.

Suppose the planters could be induced to build churches—comfortable churches between places, so that three or four might meet together. Could not all objection to this plan be removed? If adopted, would it not be better for master and family, overseer, servants, all meet and worship God together?

Then try sending two preachers to the small missions and enlarging upon the whole. It would be productive of more good and add to the general interest of the Church.

By a careful and close inquiry into these matters, can we not find out whether we can ever do done, or shall we remain as we are? Will "A Cotton Planter," or any other writer, withhold their pen or influence in the matter? Let the thing be fully set before the world.

Will the Methodists move themselves in this matter, and let us improve our Master for the cry comes up before us from thousands of colored people that never heard the glorious Gospel of Christ.

THE EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE, Bishop LY presiding, will be held at TYLER, [illegible]

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

LETTER FROM DR. WINANS.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent, BUNYAN, would write well had he as accurate knowledge of the facts he professes to record. But, alas! in this somewhat important particular he is most lamentably deficient. In his two articles, published in your paper under dates of Sept. 9 and Oct. [illegible], are more inaccuracies than I remember to have seen within the same limits. It is not he of much importance to correct these inaccuracies, yet every reader prefers to understand the true state of facts in any narrative which he considers worthy of his attention. Being well informed in regard to matters concerned in most of these statements, and being, it may be, the only living man who can correct them, on personal knowledge in regard to them, it may not be improper that I should do it.

John Bunyan is in error in charging TOBIAS GIBSON. He never settled in the neighborhood of Natchez, nor in Claiborne or Warren county. He was an itinerant methodist preacher; never married; and died to the last of life, without a home. His error arose from confounding TOBIAS with RANDAL GIBSON; the latter of whom was a local preacher, and lived first near Natchez, then in the upper part of Jefferson, near the line of Claiborne, and finally in Warren county, where he died in a ripe age. With regard to him, John Bunyan's error when he represents him as the "father of the pioneer preachers in Mississippi," he was not a preacher, nor even a professor of Religion, when Tobias Gibson came to Mississippi; but he was a member of the Methodist Society formed in Mississippi not long after his accession to the Church became a preacher, and continued a useful one to near the close of life, when the infirmities of age disqualified him for ministerial labors. He is none too highly eulogized by John Bunyan.

The next error of this writer which I shall correct, regards the camp-meeting in Foster's settlement. His memory is strangely at fault concerning this meeting, as neither Tobias Gibson, Milee Harper, nor Thomas Griffin were there; and as I was not very recently from Indiana—it having been nearly five years since I came to Mississippi, when I first attended a camp-meeting in this neighborhood. I do not depend upon my memory in regard to these matters, but upon memoranda put down at the time, about which I can be under no mistake. To the ludicrous description of my personal appearance and dress at that time, I am certainly not disposed to make any objection. So many have written of me in the same way, that the description must, I suppose, be considered accurate; though about the coarse boots I think there must be a mistake, as I believe that before that time I had discontinued the use of boots, whether coarse or fine, altogether;—but this is a matter of no consequence. The encomiums with which this ludicrous description is compensated, I find it rather more difficult to digest. But it is too much to expect poor humanity to repudiate even undeserved praise; so I shall no farther indulge in egotism, which I know is seldom tolerable.

At the time of this camp-meeting, HARPER and GRIFFIN were not brothers-in-law, though they became so several years afterward; nor until after the year 1818, were they at all in the habit of "hunting in couples:" they were very seldom together. John Banyan's description of these two Ministers of the Gospel, renders it evident that he had contemplated them attentively and with discrimination. He, however, does not, as I think, represent Harper correctly when he ascribes to him a severe aspect and frequent frowns. My recollection of him, on the contrary, is, that his aspect was kindly, and that a smile was much more frequent with him than a frown. I was surprised that this writer had not received information of the death of Griffin, which took place two or three years since.

The next error I shall notice into which John Bunyan has fallen, is in regard to this "first Conference that ever assembled in Mississippi." It was not held, as he affirms, "at Washington," nor was Bishop McKendree presiding Bishop. The first Conference that assembled in Mississippi was holden in the house of William Foster, on the Pine Ridge; and the Bishop who presided on the occasion was ROBERT R. ROBERTS. It was not only the first Mississippi Conference, but I believe it was the first Conference in which Bishop Roberts presided. The territory occupied by the Conference then assembled, extended from Fort St. Stephens, in Alabama, to Quelquechoes, in Louisiana, and from New Orleans to the line between Mississippi and the Chahta Indians. The number of members of which the Conference was composed was, I believe, EIGHT. The Bishop, these members and at least one who did not belong to the body, ate and slept in Mr. Foster's hospitable mansion; and the Conference held its sittings in an upper room of the same. The public services of the Conference were performed in the Presbyterian Church of the neighborhood, except that on the Sabbath the Bishop preached under some trees near the Church. He was one of the most interesting preachers it has been my privilege to hear. This Conference assembled in 1816: Bishop McKendree over, I think, presided in a Conference held at Washington. John Bunyan must have heard him elsewhere, or on some other than a Conference occasion, or he must have mistaken some other Bishop—Enoch George, perhaps, for Bishop McKendree. GEORGE presided in a Conference held in Washington in 1819, and was a good, a very good preacher, and quite as likely to have preached such a sermon as that described, as Bishop McKendree.*

John Bunyan characterizes Judge A. COVINGTON very correctly, but the account he has given of the "singular incident," which he mentions as having "happened to the Judge," is exceedingly defective, and in some points inaccurate. I know not how often I have heard the matter from the Judge; for this matter was intimately connected with, and strikingly illustrative of a favorite hypothesis embraced by the Judge. The incident, as I have heard him relate it, was substantially as follows:

On the night on which his brother, General Covington, died in Canada, from a wound received in battle, the Judge was, in vision, transported to the scene of that catastrophe. He saw his brother, not standing before him, as John Bunyan states, but lying upon his death-bed in a house, which was clearly exhibited before him. He saw the wound which was letting forth his brother's life, and the position of that wound on his person. In the morning he wrote a statement of his vision, took it to his friend, Dr. Rawlings, in Washington, and placed it in his hands with this request—"Keep this until we shall see what will come of it." Some six weeks after a letter came to the Judge giving him an account of his brother's death, corresponding in every particular mentioned in both documents, with the statement he had placed in the hands of Dr. Rawlings. The Judge's hypothesis mentioned above was, that man consists of three parts: a body, a soul or animal life, and a spirit—that the functions of life could go on in the absence of the last of these—that the spirit could leave the body and soul, and, with the speed of thought, could traverse a continent; and that it could take account of any matter which had drawn it forth with as much accuracy as if the whole man were present. Thus, he supposed that his spirit or mind, which was much occupied with concern for his brother, went to Canada, entered the house where his brother lay, and saw his wound and its fatal result.

I fear I have taxed your paper and the patience of your readers too far, and I shall, therefore, conclude at once.

Yours, truly, WILLIAM WINANS.

*The matter of Randal and Tobias Gibson was corrected by our interesting correspondent, JOHN BUNYAN, in a note dated October 10th, and published in the Advocate Oct. 14th. As to the Bishop, he was not so certain afterward, and in a private note to us referred to a possible correction. We are glad, as he will be, that one so well posted up as Dr. W. should do it. The truth of history is never unimportant. The following is the private note attached to the communication published on the 7th inst.: EN.]

My Dear Sir: Since writing the within, it has become a matter of doubt with me whether it was Bishop McKendree or Bishop Roberts that I first saw. I am certain it was the first Conference held in Washington;—it must have been somewhere between 1821 and 1828. I can not fix the time. Perhaps you have some data for determining. If Bishop McKendree ever was in Mississippi, it is he that I am describing. If he was not, it must be Bishop Roberts. He was a tall man, of dark or sallow complexion, and wore his hair long. I have a perfect recollection afterward of Bishops George and Soule, but can not determine whether the first was Bishop McKendree or Bishop Roberts. If you can not decide it, let it stand, and if wrong, some one else may correct me. J. B.

PLANTATION CHURCHES.

The plan proposed below, for improving the missions among the colored people, has coincidence and corroboration, in the communication under MISSIONARY REPORTS. They proceed from different sections—the writers are unacquainted with each other. But they are well acquainted with the subject in hand. Much has been accomplished in this field. After congratulating the patrons upon it, he proceeds to encouragement and suggestion:

To those friends and brethren who have become discouraged, suffer me to offer you some reasons why you should not abandon this enterprise. Look around, and see how many reasons you have to thank God that those who gave you the privileges of the gospel, for many years, did not abandon it as a hopeless case, but continued, with all your indifference and disregard, still to urge upon you its sacred benefits and blessings. And as the constant dropping of water will wear away the stone, so has the long continued preachings of the gospel worn away all your carelessness, and you are now the happy subject of the saving grace of God Almighty: Then let your colored people still have the offer of salvation. And remember they do not enjoy the many helps that you have: they have no Bible to read, no good books to assist them in rightly understanding the Bible; they are entirely dependent upon hearing and memory for all they learn. There are many serious difficulties to overcome, many obstacles to remove, before the gospel can have free course, run and be glorified among this people. Suffer me to call your attention to some of these hindering causes.

First, there is an almost impenetrable cloud of ignorance that envelopes the great mass of the people of color. To dispel this is not the work of a day. Another difficulty, in the way of success, is the long interval between the time of preaching at the appointments. For weeks is the time we are compelled to adopt, under the present system of missionary operations; a time too long to be very profitable, even among educated, intelligent people; but when brought to bear upon the unlettered masses, on the plantations, is a mighty barrier, for they, above all others, need to have line upon line, and precept upon precept.

Another serious difficulty, in the way of success, is found in the unsuitable hour, in which we must sometimes meet this people for preaching, which is not unfrequently as late as nine o'clock on a week night, when they are weary, and soon most of them are asleep.

One more obstacle we will notice, and we shall have done with this part of the subject; it is the want of suitable houses of worship. Comparatively few have provided suitable places; the congregations are crowded together in small houses, or in places entirely unprepared. Negroes have their notions and prejudices concerning these things, and I am often forced to this conclusion, that they lose much of the benefit flowing to them in the service, from a want of a suitable, solemn reverence on the occasion.

Brethren and friends, be not discouraged! all these difficulties may be overcome. And let us not be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. The time between appointments may be reduced; their attention and reverence may be secured, and then you shall reap a glorious harvest—your own conscious peace of mind, and the present happiness and eternal salvation of your people. May the God of Heaven give you all grace to continue faithfully to discharge this sacred duty, till all your fondest hopes be fully realized.

Brethren and friends, present patrons, patrons who have temporarily abandoned this enterprise, and all who wish to embark in it, I invite your calm, serious consideration of the following plan, which, if adopted generally, will meet the wants, desires, and expectations of the patrons, preachers, and people. Wherever it is practicable, let as many as four or more planters, in each neighborhood unite, select a central point, and construct a substantial house of worship, for the accommodation of all their people. Let them meet on Sabbath, for worship, in the day time, under the orderly police of one or more of the overseers in the employ of the associated planters. Let the children, large enough for catechumens, be brought to the Church an hour before the adults meet for worship, when they may be catechised. Let the hour of service be fixed at 11 o'clock, A. M., in one community, and at 3 o'clock, P. M., in another, on the same Sabbath, and at the close of each hour's service each and all the people go quietly to their respective homes.

I am persuaded, in my own mind, that if this plan was generally carried out, it would not only obviate serious difficulties, but would remove every hindering cause lying in the way of successful operations among the people of color. I entreat all who feel interested in this sacred enterprise to exert themselves, and also all their influence to organize the missions in the bounds of this Conference, upon the plan above submitted. Adopt it, and you at once secure what is necessary to the present well being and perpetuity of every separate mission—a concert of action in each community. In short, you will effect a community of interest, the want of which is so sensibly and keenly felt by every missionary under the present disconnected system; for now we have to treat with every patron as a separate and distinct member, having no care but his individual interest. Adopt it, and you may reduce the intervals from four weeks to two, and thereby keep fresh in the minds of the people the chain of instruction from time to time. Do this, and reformation and great improvement will almost inevitably follow. Build the houses of worship suggested, and another point of vast importance is secured, the respect, love, and reverence for the house of God and its sacred services.

Adopt this plan, and your people will all meet on the Sabbath, when their bodies will be refreshed by rest and sleep, their minds more clear and open to receive knowledge. They will have more time to reflect and meditate upon what they hear.

It will in all probability cost you a little more, but is not the adoption of that plan, which will secure this early improvement, and great moral reformation among your people, worth the cost of experiment? Surely it is. It will, it must succeed. May it be adopted, and succeed beyond even my most sanguine expectations, is the prayer of a

Ala. Conference. MISSIONARY.

On and after the 1st November next, the subscription price of the New Orleans Christian Advocate will be $2 per annum in advance; if payment be delayed six months, $2 50; at the end of the year, $3.

After a fair and full experiment of two years, it is ascertained that the paper can not be supported at $1 50 per annum. This will be to all our friends and patrons, and to every reasonable person, a sufficient cause for the change. In labor and material there has been a change to higher rates. The price of printing is now 25 per cent. higher in this city than it was a year ago.

This arrangement has the unanimous recommendation of the Publishing Committees. It puts the New Orleans Advocate at the same rates with the family of Advocates, and cheap still.

A REVOLT AT THE PENITENTIARY.—In the Baton Rouge Evening Advocate of Monday last we find the following account of a desperate attempt on the part of a number of the prisoners to escape from the Penitentiary:

"At 10½ o'clock this morning, about twenty-five convicts attempted to escape by the middle gate of the Penitentiary while the wood waggons were being driven into the yard. Seven of the number succeeded in getting out of the gate, two of whom were shot in the legs. The remainder of those who endeavored to rush out of the gate upon hearing the shots fired from the outside, returned back; and all those who succeeded in getting out were returned in less than ten minutes from the time of their escape from the gate. The gate at which the attack was made is the one through which all the material, lumber, cotton, etc., for the use of the prison, is carried. The convicts engaged in the revolt are represented as the most dangerous men now confined in the prison; and the two men now shot were desperate men. Their names are Charles Smith, a Spaniard, and Jas. F. Bowman, an American."

Mr. Parker, who lives on the Blue Ridge, south of Arnold's Valley, (Va) accidentally shot his brother a few days ago. Mr. P. was fixing his rifle, which went off accidentally; the ball struck a hard post, glanced at almost right angles, and inflicted a mortal wound on his brother. Both were young men.

Our National Defenses.

Notwithstanding the acknowledged wisdom of Washington's declaration that a nation ought to prepare for war in time of peace, and notwithstanding the frequency with which competent officers have declared that the state of our defences is wholly disproportioned to the wants of the country and the needs of war, nothing has been done to remedy the evil.

The defences of a country are threefold—its fortifications, its navy and its army. Perhaps a fourth might be added—its militia. As regards the first, there is no one at all acquainted with the subject who will for a moment contend that our fortifications are sufficient either in number or character for the defence of our cities and coast. Boston and New York harbors are probably the only ones that could stand a two days' siege. Baltimore, Philadelphia and Charleston are most inadequately defended. San Francisco has no protection. New Orleans could be burned by war steamers without difficulty and Mobile destroyed without danger to her assailants. If a war were to arise to-day between this country and either England or France, every one of our great cities, excepting those we first named, might be captured and destroyed—our whole coast ravaged, villages plundered and property ruthlessly wasted. With such an immense extent of seaboard as we possess on the Atlantic, the Pacific and the Gulf it is doubtless impossible to erect as complete and impregnable fortifications as England has, but we certainly ought to defend our best harbors and more important cities to the extent of our means.

Next in importance to fortifications, for the defense of a maritime country like our own are the "wooden walls" of its navy. Perhaps we should not err in placing them first; for so long as we rule the sea we are beyond the reach of foreign assault. The question arises how are we prepared for war in this respect? Our commerce is superior to that of any other country, our interest on the sea accordingly greater, and our naval pride not less than that of other lands. The comparison is mortifying in the extreme. England has an enumerated navy of six hundred vessels. France possesses between four and five hundred, while the United States cannot claim sixty! Probably a hundred might be detracted from the British fleet as worn out and worthless, fit only for receiving, hospital and prison ships. A proportionate number must be taken from ours for the same reasons. We are left, therefore, a fleet of fifty vessels to encounter five hundred in case of war with England alone, or nine hundred in case of war with England and France. In point of fact, however, we are not so strong as this statement would make us. Of the fifty that are allowed, some, like the Pennsylvania, are unfit to go to sea; some, like the New Orleans, were never built; some, like the Vermont, have been allowed to rot on the stocks, and others, like the San Jacinto, Princeton and Powhattan, can not be trusted on a voyage from Norfolk to New York. Of the few that remain, by far the greater part are sloops, corvettes and brigs—excellent in their way and their class, but not collectively equal to one ship of the class of the Duke of Wellington or St. Jean d'Acre. We have no navy; only the nucleus and possibility of one; and yet the annual addition is not equal to the annual diminution and no steps are taken for an increase.

So far as the army of this country is concerned, we have none, and no organization for the collection of one in time sufficient to withstand a strong attack. If New York were invested next week—if an army of sixty thousand men were landed on Long Island, what means have we for defence? New York city could probably turn out fifty thousand fighting men, and any number more could be collected from the adjacent county. But they are raw and untrained—undrilled and undisciplined. In time they would doubtless be formidable, but the time is the very thing they could not get.

Neither fortifications, navies or armies can be effective without the munitions of war—cannon, muskets, swords, powder and ball. In all these we are as deficient as in other things. Many of the guns already mounted at our forts are rusted and worthless. They are all too small in their calibre and range and unfit to be opposed to the heavy artillery of foreign fleets. In case of war these things might be provided, but time would be required just when it was most precious and important.

A summing up of the foregoing facts shows conclusively that we are unarmed and defenseless; exposed to the attacks of any powerful enemy without the means of immediate resistance. In the event of hostilities between the United States and Great Britain, it can not be doubted that our coasts would be ravaged, many cities burned, many defeats encountered, and great disgrace endured without cause. Our mercantile marine would be temporarily destroyed and commerce suspended. Ultimately, we should grow more formidable, and at the close of the war be our enemy's equal, for our dock-yards are crowded with the materials for ship building, and every necessary article is ready at hand in its rougher state. Two hundred vessels of the first class could be built, manned and sent to sea, properly equipped, in two years, but who would like to recount the losses, defeats and disgraces that had previously occurred? Who would like to write the history of that period?

The state of affairs which we so sincerely condemn is not owing to any national inability, but to a general apathy and unwarrantable self-confidence. Uncle Sam has a monetary scurvy. His pockets are overflowing with revenues that can not be spent. Would it not be well to expend this excess of cash in the building of vessels, the erection and completion of fortifications, the procurement of proper munitions of war, and a more practical and valuable organization of both the army and navy? When these things are accomplished, we shall feel a greater safety in case of war, and listen with more complacency to the boasting and bravadoes of our parade-day warriors.

Louisiana Items.

The physicians of Shreveport formally certified on the 10th inst. that there was but one case of yellow fever in the town.

The Attakapas (St. Martinsville) Gazette of the 21st, says:

"Mr. Nicholas Cormier, of our parish, has commenced grinding his crop of cane. We understand that the sugar is of a superior quality, and the yield is very good. The weather is cool and dry, and in a couple of weeks more all our sugar-mills will be in operation."

The Gazette has a letter from Franklin, parish of St. Mary, stating that the yellow fever prevails to a considerable extent in that town. We make the following extract:

"In all, there has been since the commencement, about 50 cases; 12 of whom have died up to the present time. This mortality is greater in proportion to the number attacked than is usual in New Orleans in private practice; but allowance must be made for the lack of experience on the part of those unacquainted with the proper mode of treating yellow fever."

QUARANTINE AT NATCHEZ.—The Natchez Courier of Tuesday last says: A few days and we presume our city authorities will abolish quarantine. As to the health of our city, there has not been a season in ten years with so little sickness of any description as the present. We do not know of any, and it is entirely too late to think of any fever. With the cool and bracing weather of October upon us, the quarantine can soon be dispensed with.

We publish below that portion of the Baltic's news which appears to be authentic, omitting the accounts of the fall of Sebastopol, which have since been contradicted by the Africa's advices. The dispatches below will give some idea of the manner in which this stupendous hoax originated. We give them as they appear in the English papers:

A dispatch from Omer Pasha to the Turkish Minister at Vienna is reported to state that Sebastopol is taken, with all its material and fleet. The garrison were offered free withdrawal, but preferred remaining prisoners of war. They surrendered on the 25th.

PARIS, October 3.—It is telegraphed from Bucharest, 29th inst. September, that a reinforced war was captured by the allied forces on the 25th. Details are wanting. The garrison surrendered as prisoners of war.

VIENNA, October 1.—The garrison of Sebastopol, to which a free retreat, after laying down their arms, was offered, preferred to remain as prisoners of war.

VIENNA, October 2.—The French Embassy and the Austrian government have received from Bucharest under date of 3 P. M., September 30, the following telegraphic dispatch:

Today, at noon, a Tartar arrived from Constantinople with dispatches from Omer Pacha; his Highness being at Silistria, the dispatches had to be forwarded to him at that place.

The Tartar announces the capture of Sebastopol—15,000 Russians were killed and wounded; 22,000 made prisoners; Fort Constantine was destroyed, and other forts, mounting 200 guns, taken.

Of the Russian fleet, (except of the line were sunk, and Prince Menschikoff had retired in the bottom of the bay with the remaining vessels, declaring that he would burn them if the attack continued.

The Allied Commanders had given him six hours to consider, inviting him at the same time to surrender for the sake of humanity.

A French General and three Russian Generals, all wounded, have arrived at Constantinople, which city was to be illuminated for ten days.

From the London Times of the 3d.

The Oesterreichische Correspondenz confirms the news already received with the sole difference that instead of 24,000 Russians being killed and wounded and 25,000 made prisoners, it says 18,000 Russians were killed and 22,000 made prisoners. Fort Constantine blew up, and other forts with 200 guns were taken.

The news is not astounding, that some slight doubt is still felt whether it can be true.

On the 19th hostilities recommenced between the Turks and Montenegrins. In this case the Turks were the assailants.

We have since received another dispatch from our correspondent at Vienna, who informs us that according to a Russian telegraphic message just received there, Sebastopol had fallen.

Private telegraphic dispatches received at Paris from Vienna confirm the intelligence of the capture of Sebastopol and of great exploits there.

Mention is made of 18,000 Russians killed and wounded, of 22,000 Russians made prisoners, and eight Russian vessels of war blown up.

Prince Menschikoff is said to have threatened to burn the whole town unless terms were granted to him.

The Moniteur has not as yet confirmed the truth of these dispatches. The Three per Cents closed to-day at 70f. 35c., and the Four-and-a-half per Cents at 99f. 25c.

When this false intelligence was received it created the greatest excitement in Constantinople. France and England, and hummanged the people into the most noisy demonstrations of joy. It was ordered that the city of Constantinople should be illuminated for ten successive days. Marseilles was illuminated when the news was brought to that port. On reaching Boulogne the dispatch was conveyed at once to the Emperor, who was engaged in reviewing the troops. He hastily perused the cipher, then turned to his Generals and said quietly: "Sebastopol est pris!" The announcement was greeted with cheers, and was duly communicated by the Emperor to the army. He said: "This news was probable. I have now the happiness to announce it to you myself, and at the moment I speak I have little doubt that the flags of the allied armies are floating on the walls of Sebastopol."

At Liverpool, Manchester and other cities, the news was welcomed by the ringing of the church bells, and by the display of flags. At London, the Lord Mayor and the civic authorities, shortly before 10 o'clock, on the evening of Saturday, September 30, proceeded to the Royal Exchange to proclaim the victory of Alma, and after, calling the people together by sound of trumpet, the Mayor delivered a flaming address upon the mighty achievements in the Crimea.

THE LANDING IN THE CRIMEA.

On September 13, the formidable squadron of the Allies came in sight of the spot selected for the landing of the main body of their army. All the ships were drawn up in line, and extended a point of three miles. Telescopes and telescopes were turned towards the beach, but not a hostile uniform was visible. The signal to commence the disembarkation was to be a gun from the Agamemnon, and every ship and boat's crew knew precisely the place they would have to occupy. No gun, however, was fired, but a brief conversation, by signal, took place between the admirals and generals, and towards 5 o'clock in the evening, boats put off from the Agamemnon to the steamers and transports, with the following order to the quartermaster-generals of the divisions:

ORDERS FOR SATURDAY.—Wednesday Night—The Light Division to be actually under way at 1 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The 4th Division to sail at 2 A. M.

The 3d Division and the 5th Division to sail at 4 A. M.

Steer S. S. E. for eight miles. Rendezvous to be 15 degrees. Do not go nearer to the shore than eight fathoms.

According to these orders the ships of the various divisions proceeded to the locality indicated. The place is described as a low strip of beach and shingle, cast up by the violence of the surf, and forming a sort of causeway between the sea and a stagnant salt water lake—one of those remarkable deposits of brackish water so frequent along the shore of the Crimea. The lake is about a mile and a half broad, and when the fleet arrived was covered with wild fowl.

From the ships the invaders could see homesteads and villages lying peacefully in the rays of the autumn sun, and the inhabitants quietly pursuing their ordinary occupations. Hundreds of cattle covered the fields, and the farm houses were surrounded by the evidences of an abundant harvest, in the shape of stacks of grain. The inhabitants, in dress and aspect, bore a resemblance to the better class of Italian farmers.

At 7 o'clock on the morning of the 14th, most of the fleet were in their assigned positions, and without any very great deviation from the prescribed order, the ships drew up in line parallel to the beach, and the French running close in shore below the cliffs of the plateau.

LANDING OF THE FRENCH.

A little after 7, a French boat containing fifteen or sixteen men pulled quietly to the beach, and landed her crew, who advanced a short distance and commenced digging a hole. Presently the anxious spectators from the ships saw a flag-staff raised, and the tri-color run up! Immediately the French Admiral fired a gun—boats dashed out from every one of the French ships, and in twenty-two minutes they had landed 6000 men. The French were thus the first to take possession of the Crimea. The instant the French had landed a regiment, a company was pushed on to reconnoitre, and skirmishers or pickets were sent on in front. As each regiment followed in column, its predecessor deployed, extended in front, and advanced in light marching order, on a wider spreading out like a fan over the plains. It was interesting to observe their progress, and to note the rapid manner in which they appropriated the soil. In one hour after the first detachment had landed, 9000 troops, of all arms, were on shore, and their advanced posts were faintly discernible between three and four miles from the beach. The French had in all 24,000.

LANDING OF THE BRITISH.

The British whose fate it seems to be to do every thing clumsily, although in the end effectually, proceeded much less skillfully in their debarkation, and nearly had General Sir George Brown captured before their eyes by a picket of Cossacks. The work of the day was under the immediate orders of Admiral Lyons, for Admiral Dundas, although present in his flagship took no part in the proceedings, it being probably considered by the Admiral in-Chief to attend to such small matters as landing cargo.

At 6 o'clock in the morning one black ball was run up to the mast-head of the Agamemnon, and a gun fired. This signal meant, "attend to the following order:" "Divisions of boats assemble round ships to disembark infantry and artillery." No enemy had hitherto appeared in sight, but now the figure of a mounted Russian officer, followed by a few thousands, was distinctly seen on the heights. The Russian was within eleven hundred yards, and through a glass his every motion could be watched. A letter says: "The Russian rode slowly along by the edge of the cliff, apparently using the number and disposition of the fleet, and taking notes with great calmness. In a memorandum book (in) wore a dark green frock coat, with a little silver lace, a cap of the same color, a sash round his waist, and long leather boots. His horse, a fine bay charger, was a strange contrast to the shaggy, rough little steeds of his followers."

The rest of the disembarkation was effected without any incident worthy of notice. Each officer carried in his haversack 4½ pounds of salt meat and 4½ pounds of biscuit as his ration for three days. Besides this he carried his great coat, strapped round his body; a wooden keg for water; a small ration of spirits; a change or two of linen; a tooth-brush; and in most instances a Colt's revolver. Each private man carried the same as the officers, and in addition a portion of the mess cooking apparatus, firelock and bayonet, cartouch box and fifty rounds of ball cartridge. Both officers and men were in capital spirits.

FAIRAY, September 15, 1854.

Few of us will ever forget last night. Seldom were 27,000 Englishmen more miserable. The beach was almost cleared. The troops had marched off to their several quarters, the Light Division about six miles in advance, the 1st Division two miles nearer the shore, the 2d Division on the cliffs and hills, and a part of the 3d Division on the slopes of the hill. No tents were seen on shore, partly because there had been no time to land them, partly because there was no certainty of our being able to find carriage for them. Toward night the sky looked very black and lowering; the wind rose and the rain fell. The showers increased in violence about midnight, and early in the morning the water fell in drenching sheets, which pierced through the blankets and greatcoats of the homeless and heedless soldiers. It was their first bivouac—a hard trial enough in all conscience, but worse than all their experiences of Bulgaria or Gallipoli, for there they had their tents and now they learned to value their canvas coverings at their true worth. Imagine all these old generals and young lords and noblemen exposed hour after hour to the violence of pitiless storms with no bed but the reeking puddle under the saturated blankets or bitumenous water-proof sheets, which could not get dry bits of ground, and had to sleep, or try to sleep, in lithographs and sailor-corners—no fire to cheer them, no hot grog, and no prospect of breakfast—imagine this and add to it that the nice "change of linen" had become a wet abomination, which weighed the poor man's limbs down, and you will admit that this "seasoning" was of rather a violent character—particularly as it came after all the miseries of a dry ship sickness. Sir George Brown slept under a cart tilted over. The Duke had drawn eight planks of a cart and made a kind of shelter. Some similar contrivance. Sir De L. Evans was the only General whose staff had been careful enough to provide him with a tent. In one respect the rain was of service; it gave them a temporary supply of water, but then it put a One on all the question, even if the men could have scraped up wood enough to make it; the country is however, quite destitute of timber.

THE BATTLE OF THE ALMA.

FORFAR, Monday, Sept. 25, 1854.—Sir: I am directed by the Secretary of State to transmit to you, for the information of the Duke of Newcastle, a copy of a telegraphic dispatch from Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, dated Constantinople, September 23, and forwarded by her Majesty's Consul General at Belgrade, under date September 25, at A. M., containing intelligence of the storming by the Allied forces of the entrenched camp of the Russian army on the heights of the Alma, on the afternoon of the 20th inst. I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

H. HAYWOOD.

Hd. Bloody, etc., etc., etc.

The entrenched camp of the Russians, containing 50,000 men, with a numerous artillery and cavalry, on the heights of the Alma, was attacked on the 20th inst., at 1 P. M., by the Allied troops, and carried by the bayonet at half-past 3, with a loss on our side of about 1500 killed and wounded, and an equal loss on the side of the French. The Russian army was forced to put itself in full retreat.

The Duke of Newcastle held his dinner, in publishing this telegraphic dispatch, to caution the public against expecting any details for several days. No items none can be received before the 5th of October.

Every thing which is received by the Government will be published immediately.

War Department, Sept. 30 1854.

Wm. Brownrigg, Oct. 1, 1854—The Duke of Newcastle has this day received a telegraphic dispatch from General Lord Raglan, of which the following is a translation:

Copy of a telegraphic dispatch from General Lord Raglan to the Duke of Newcastle, transmitted through Belgrade, not dated, but evidently from the 21st September:

The Allied armies yesterday attacked the position of the enemy on the heights above the Alma, and carried it after a desperate battle of one hour and a half before sunset. Nothing could surpass the bravery and excellent conduct of the troops. The position was very formidable, and defended by a numerous artillery of heavy calibre. Our loss, I regret to add, is very considerable, but no general officer has been wounded. The main body of the army of the enemy was estimated at from 45,000 to 50,000 infantry. A few prisoners, among whom are two general officers and two guns, have been taken by the English.

(Signed) RAGLAN.

DISPATCH TO THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

HEADQUARTERS, ALMA, Sept 20.—We encountered the enemy to-day on the Alma. The woody ravine through which the river runs, studded with houses, and having very steep slopes on the left bank, was occupied by the enemy in great force. These slopes were strongly entrenched and covered by a powerful artillery. The Allied armies attacked those difficult positions with unparalleled vigor. Our soldiers advanced to the assault with cries of Vive l'Empereur, and carried all before them! The battle lasted four hours, and our loss was 1400 killed and wounded. I am as yet ignorant of the loss sustained by the English army, which fought valiantly against an obstinate resistance. (Signed) ST. ARNAUD.

THE RUSSIAN ARTILLERY.

We learn that the Russian artillery was arranged in three batteries, and that the Russian force was quite 50,000 men, including a fair proportion of cavalry. The battle commenced at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, and at 3 o'clock the Russian position was carried by the bayonet. Marshal St. Arnaud and Lord Raglan commanded personally. Three English steamers protected the passage at the Alma, from the sea. Gen. Thomasson (French) was shot in the side (ten. supposed fatally; and Gen. Canrobert was wounded in the shoulder.

From the small number of guns or prisoners taken by the Allies at the Alma, on the 21st, we infer that their (the Allies') success amounted to no more than driving the Russians from their position on the heights. At all events, Prince Menschikoff had managed again to bring his forces into order, and on the 25th of September he gave battle to the advancing forces, on the plains of Kalantai, on the river Katcha. After a sanguinary engagement, which lasted some hours, the Russians were totally defeated, and pursued to their entrenchments before Sebastopol. Here they appear to have made a third stand, and to have again offered battle to the invaders.

The following is a letter from a gentleman on board one of the vessels of Com. Ringgold's exploring squadron, to his brother in New York, to whom we are indebted for a copy. It will be read with interest:

U. S. STEAMER JOHN HANCOCK,

My last was dated Hong-Kong when and where we were preparing for sea, and in fact had received orders to take in six month's provisions. But lo! the orders were countermanded, and in three hours we were on our way to Whampoa, which is about ninety miles up the river. We arrived there in ten hours. As the Vincennes drew too much water to go any further up the river, Com. Ringgold hoisted his broad pennant on the Hancock, and we started in hail an hour on the remaining fifteen miles to Canton, and moored head and stern in front of the European factories, astern of the U. S. steamer Queen, and H. B. M. sloop or corvette Comus, of twenty guns. The rebels, or as the Canton people call them, the Tief a mans, are surrounding the city, and we are here to prevent, in case they take the place, a mob taking advantage of the confusion to attack the factories. So in addition to our own crew, we have chartered two junks and moored them alongside with sixty seamen and nineteen marines from the Vincennes.

We have a light field-piece stationed in the factories and a guard of marines every night. In the day time it is constant drill, and at night we are prepared for the boatswain's call: "All hands to quarters."

The merchants have sent on board for safe keeping about a million and a half of Mexican dollars, and there is a good deal more coming to-night (always at night.)

The day before yesterday the captain and second lieutenant, with forty men, went fifteen miles up the river to the scene of action, where the rebels are encamped, for the purpose of seeing for himself whether they were really so near the city. They took the Consul with them and two interpreters. When the boats came to the spot there was the two armies within half a mile of each other, in full view of our party, and the river crowded with mandarin boats or war junks, every one pulling from city to a hundred oars, and mounting from ten to twenty guns.

The captain did not get a chance of speaking with the rebel chiefs, for three or four of their men, through ignorance, rushed down to the water's edge and first their matchlocks at the gig, wounding the Consul in the cheek. Our fellows on the instant returned the fire, and killed three of them. Our boats then went down alongside the Manderin's boats and had a talk with one of them, then turned tail and came away.

Capt. Davis of the Porpoise was sent home, and Rolando of the Vincennes put in his place, and she stays about Hong-Kong chasing pirates. She took two or three.

The John P Kennedy has been condemned for the dry-rot, and will be sold, and the Fenimore Cooper came up here the other day to join us. We will have to stay here till Com Perry comes, and as he has no vessel in his squadron light enough to relieve us, it is very probable we may remain here a long time, which is rather an unpleasant look-out, as our crew are getting very unhealthy.

HONORS TO CAPT. LUCE.—The New York Board of Councilmen have voted a public reception to Capt. Luce, of the Arctic, and appropriated $500 to carry out the design. The citizens of Yonkers, the place where Capt. L. resides, have held a public meeting and passed highly complimentary resolutions.

We learn, says the New York Times of Thursday, that on Tuesday afternoon last Capt. Luce went from Yonkers to New Rochelle, and there had an interview with Mr. Collins. Their meeting was one of peculiarly touching interest. As late as Monday night, Mr. Collins entertained hopes that a portion of his family at least might be saved; but the perusal of the accounts of Tuesday, containing Capt. Luce's statement of the position of his family when the Arctic sank, left him hardly any ground to rest a hope upon, and his interview with Capt. Luce on Tuesday only confirmed his worst fears. Since then, we understand, Mr. Collins has become comparatively resigned to his severe affliction.

Beneath the restless bright and keen,
And plunge it in the beating heart;
I wipe the tear from sorrow's eye,
And build the magic dome of art.
I weave the pall and dig the grave,
I give to merry music birth,
I scourge the poor, and through the pen
I speak to all the peopled earth.
I forge the fetter of the slave,
I bear the banner of the free,
I press the sacramental cup,
And rear the gloomy gallows tree.
I grasp the gold and starve the poor,
I build a church and pay for prayers;
'Twas I that crucified the Christ,
I slew the promised Man of cares,
I took the gold that Judas got,
And hung the traitor on a tree;
I find the cord about his neck,
And see his guilty spirit flee.
And in the senate-house of Rome,
'Twas I immortal Cæsar slew;
And thrice I bathed me in the gore
That Brutus' friendly dagger drew.
And many a pious saint since then
Fast to the burning stake I've tied;
And heaped the blazing fagots round,
And mocked them as in pain they've died.
But all the sinful deeds I've done,
Obedient to my master, Man,
I could not tell were I to sing
Until my judgment day began.

THE ARCTIC SEARCH.

VERY INTERESTING NEWS FROM DR. KANE'S EXPEDITION.

SECOND GRINNELL EXPEDITION.
BOAT ANCHORAGE, Baffin's Bay, July 14, 1853.

My Dear ——: It is with pleasure I comply with your request, made upon leaving New York. After a passage which only abounded with the usual incidents of ocean life, we arrived upon the coast of Greenland June 27. The passage was a somewhat protracted one, owing to the universal head winds and calms we encountered; but by the wise foresight of the planners of the expedition, we left New York with plenty of time on our hands to guard against every contingency of delays, and to make the best of whatever accidental circumstance might arise to favor an early and safe passage to the scene of our labors.

The barrenness of "Greenland's icy mountains" has long held a place in my imagination, but I was unprepared for the absolute desolation which greeted us. Peak after peak rose abruptly from the very water's edge, and the interior seemed to be one continued waste of snow-capped summits. Not a single foot of level land or soil was to be seen, and the rocks told a mournful tale of sterility. Although water poured plentifully from the hills, even the usual surface vegetation which follows our streams at home seemed entirely wanting. Why it should have received the name of Greenland is a puzzle to me.

Such as it is, however, with its vernal cognomen, it was doubtless discovered and occupied by the early Icelanders and Norwegians, and when the suspended intercourse with the Old World gave rise to the fable of a "lost Greenland," its discovery was due to Frobisher or Cabot, those indomitable Arctic pioneers. To the efforts of a single man, Hans Egede, "the Greenland Apostle," as he is termed by the Lutheran church, the Greenland of the present century owes whatever it possesses of civilization and Christianity.

We made the coast near Godshalar, the scene of his early labors, and I write from a point nearly opposite that neatest and most flourishing of its settlements, Egedisminde, "the Nunnery of Egedi."

On the 29th, being becalmed off Fiskernaes, we dispatched a boat up the Fiord, to look out for the town; returning soon, with a pilot boat and crew from the Governor, we stood in, and were in a short time in sight of the first Greenland town I had yet seen. It was in keeping with the scenery around. In the midst of Esquimaux huts rose the only mansion, the residence of the Governor, a most kind-hearted old gentleman, full of Scandinavian hospitality and fond of his wife, his children, and his pipe. The courtesies of his humble mansion were cordially extended to us, and after breaking bread with his Excellency, we felt quite as much at home as on board our little brig, from the cramped quarters of which we were by no means sorry to be, for a short time, relieved.

The official letters brought by our commander from the Court of Denmark were anticipated by the cordial kind feeling of the authorities. Every care was extended to the expedition, and we departed with a goodly supply of codfish and an Esquimaux hunter, whose ryack and lines are expected by Dr. Kane to keep his dogs in food.

Sukkertoppen was our next port, a quiet little glen, shut in by rocks and looking its barren solitude. Here in a single hour we laid in reindeer furs, dog's harness and moccasins, filled our water casks and stood out to sea.

At both these places, while my comrades were busily engaged in hasty preparation for departure from port, I made the best use of time my in collecting botanical specimens. With botany box and gun I made two sallies at Fiskernaes and one at Sukkertoppen, into the deep mountain gorges, where the water, caused by the sun's genial rays, had melted the snow that trickled down the mountain sides, and at last found a resting place, around which grew a highly interesting and quite luxuriant flora. Upon the southern slopes I found the willows, as if determined to force a living out of the world, clinging apparently to the solid rock, and though stunted in growth, looking no less fresh than members of the same family growing in our own rich soil. The cuttkins of these plants were found to be of very deficient development. The same was also observed of the Anaromida Tetrigona, one of the characteristic heaths of this region. These circumstances seem to our commander to indicate a backward summer, while the meteorological returns obtained at Fiskernaes and Sichtoufels, show a winter of unusual mildness. The bugs, too, are not numerous, and he seems to expect we will meet no ice less until we reach Melville Bay.

Disco we longed to visit—a longing which the sight of its high mountains only increased—but the breeze, I suppose, did not justify us in losing an inch of ground, for we stood on to the northward in expectation of reaching the middle ice. But one thing more remains—an increase of dogs—for deficiency of which we are humbly thankful, as but for that we would not see the settlement of Proven.

Proven is not unlike the settlements previously visited, except that, in being farther to the north, its inhabitants are proportionately more poor and wretched. It is, with one exception, the most northern of the Danish settlements on the threshold of the great barrier of Melville Bay. The scenery around presents the same barren picturesqueness characteristic of the Greenland coast. Here resides the royal inspector, a clever old Dane, possessing a small fortune, obtained through his office, an Esquimaux wife, and good beer. His one-story mansion, looking almost as old as the hills, presented a grand appearance beside the miserable huts of the natives. Built as they are of stones covered with sod or moss for winter, and seal skins for summer, they look more like the houses of burrowing animals than any thing human. Poor creatures! their only pasture-ground, the sea, affords them occasionally an inadequate supply of food, at which time their condition is truly deplorable.

It is the custom of the coast, brought from the fatherland, to set before the stranger the welcoming cup of coffee, after partaking which, like the salt of the Arabs, he may consider himself at home. This custom extends from the Governor's house to the native's hut; and good coffee do they make. At the inspector's, signal credit is due our good Esquimaux hostess for her skill in coffee making, and the natural ease with which she did the honors of the house.

We have here procured some fifteen or twenty Esquimaux dogs, but as the number is less than half a supply, we will be obliged to stop at Appemavik, twenty miles further to the northward. These dogs are a necessary part of an Esquimaux settlement, and seem to mingle with the natives in about equal numbers, and are on terms of the greatest familiarity, living, in many cases, in the same hut. One striking peculiarity I observed, was their huddling together, and, taking their pipes to the notes of a chosen leader, who occupies the center of the pack, the whole settlement, young and old, set up a chorus loud and shrill, that lasts about five minutes.

Leaving Proven and the civilized world at our backs, we will, in an hour, be pushing forward to the scene of our explorations. This is, as you are aware, Smith Sound. How far we will be able to penetrate with our vessel into this unknown region, will depend upon the point at which nature has thrown up her impenetrable ice barrier. Its waters have only yet been sighted by previous navigators of the region, and we have every reason to hope that we may be able to conduct our explorations into this unknown and mysterious quarter of our planet. Once arrived at the terminus of our voyage, winter quarters will be selected at a point protected to the northward and westward by some prominent headland, against the floating ice in the early spring. In this selection great experience and judgment are required, but in our commander's sagacity we have every confidence. Here we will be frozen in during the long nine winter months, during which period the search for Franklin will be made.

For this search the most active preparations are going on. Once at anchor, but few hours will expire before a boat and sleigh party will set out to continue that which could not be accomplished with the vessel. This party will consist of nine, all of which have, I believe, been selected, as all hands have volunteered; but the Doctor is not very communicative as to his intentions, and we are in ignorance as to who will be its fortunate members. They take with them one of the light India rubber boats constructed by Mr. Bennet, and dogs.

The great object of this expedition will be to pave the way for future operations in the spring. For this purpose they carry with them a stock of provisions, consisting of pemican, preserved meats, meat biscuit, &c., with a few luxuries, to be left at different points on the way. The boat, "The Forlorn Hope," for so she is called, is so constructed as to propel either on ice or water—on ice by eight men operating against wooden bars lashed athwart the boat, while the Doctor will lead off in advance to explore the track. The stern is covered with an India rubber cloth tent, to serve as a protection by night, and cooking apartment by day.

Having arrived at the termination of their journey, leaving the Forlorn Hope and provisions to the mercy of the wolverines and bears, they will return to the brig on foot, in the darkness of the polar night, guided by their compass and the stars.

This plan of operations, hitherto considered impracticable by the English, is entirely new, and originated with this expedition. By it there are many advantages gained. The men are more fresh and vigorous than in the spring, and the party that follows them at this time have not only the advantage of traveling over ground previously explored, but carry during their march but a comparatively small quantity of provisions; besides, there is a great saving of time. The boat is extremely light, compared with those used by Parry and others who have undertaken similar journeys. The most rigid economy with regard to space is preserved, and calculations are made with mathematical exactness as to the stowage of the different articles. Nothing will be taken that can possibly be dispensed with, and the cooking apparatus will be of the most simple kind. The whole is a modification of the North American Indian and Russian; while the complicated machinery for cooking with the little odds and ends used by the English is dispensed with, or greatly simplified. Quantity and not quality with regard to food, convenience and not comfort, with regard to space, are the points considered. Every two men carry a haversack between them, containing a simple change of clothing for each, to weigh not more than twenty pounds. Thus the Arctic traveler's wardrobe is ten pounds, including a pair of canvas boots, to be used in the homeward journey.

Pemican is almost the only food to be used, preserved meats and milks, etc., being looked upon simply as antiscorbutics and luxuries occasionally to be indulged in. Fats, such as may be procured from bears, birds, etc., together with a small quantity of lard taken with them, with a little spirits, to melt and light it, will serve as the only fuel both for heating and cooking purposes. The lamp used will be the simple copper dish, cork float and cotton wick of the Icelanders. A supply of teas and coffee, together with the different extracts prepared by Messrs. Alden & Borden, will be taken, as also a small quantity of the meat biscuit of Mr. Borden, and prepared milk of Mr. Ahbett. Our pemican is of very superior quality, having been made under the personal superintendence of Dr. Kane. In our sledge parties we will be served much like the boy whose variety consisted in, first, "mush and milk, thin milk and mush," pemican soup, fried pemican, pemican raw, and vice versa.

The one thing in these regions to be dreaded from such rigid adherence to animal diet, and that of one kind, is attacks of scurvy; but there is unquestionably more of it in many of our vessels than need be if proper hygeinic measures were taken. Thorough and regular ablutions, with moderate exercise, will no doubt do almost all that can be done to ward off its attacks; and when such a system has been made a regular branch of discipline, cases have been rare; at least such has been the experience of the recent exploring expeditions. In the sledge parties every man will be required to wash down with snow, and rub with a coarse towel, previous to turning into the snow hut for his nightly, or rather periodic, rest. "A cold comfort," truly; but experience has proven it to be a very necessary one.

Since leaving Fiskernaes, we have lived almost exclusively upon the products of the region, little animal food being used, but birds and fish. A species of codfish, which I believe to be the Gadus Moschus, is our almost constant food, and, although a most delicate morsel, it has so often shown itself on our table as to have become very unpopular. The eider, with several of the auk, one of the lorne, (uria bourichii,) the little auk, or "Greenland dove," (W. alle,) and the black guillemot, (W. gryllo,) and others, are becoming an every day dish, and are a most decided improvement over salt beef. Yesterday while on an excursion to a settlement twenty miles to the southward, for the purpose of procuring dogs, we stopped at a little island, and in a very few minutes procured several fine eiders and a large number of eggs. In a few hours we could have shot hundreds, if not thousands, and obtained as many eggs as would have laden our boat. A fire made upon the sand, from the fragments of a broken oar, soon roasted for us as rich a repast of ducks and eggs as ever mortal need wish. With snow water, and the other necessaries which our good steward had the precaution and kindness to put aboard our boat, we made toddy and tea, and enjoyed our feast, sincerely pitying you New Yorkers, who would envy us our ducks. In a short time, we will make it our business to lay in a large supply of the different birds that abound so plentifully, to serve as one of our principal articles of food and luxury during the winter. They will be shot and strung on strings, much after the manner of our good farmers in preparing apples, and dried. The bay abounds in gulls, and of these fine specimens have been shot. Our collection already numbers five species. The lestris or Arctic jagor, the skera of the Icelanders, is a beautiful bird. The stormy petrel followed us as high as latitude 67, and almost immediately afterwards the maulemoke of the whalers took its place. Our slow advance has enabled us to collect interesting facts as to the zones of the gulls and petrels.

At Breven we had the first opportunity of testing the beautiful daguerreotype apparatus sent out by Government. In the hands of our artist, Mr. Bousalt, a number of fine pictures have been taken, representing the geological and picturesque character of the country. The difficulties apprehended in the working of the chemicals have been happily, in a great measure, overcome, and Mr. B. confidently thinks he will be able to take pictures with a great degree of decency, even in the highest latitudes we may be able to reach. It promises fair to become a most valuable aid in enabling us to bring back such material as will make this little frequented portion of our globe more familiar to you. The glaciers will form an interesting series.

Thus far we get on happily and well—each one in every way seeming determined to do his best to further the one great object of the expedition, while every opportunity is embraced of making contributions to different departments of science. Our decks present quite an interesting and amusing appearance. One is busily engaged in sewing pemican bags, another ham sacks, another lining buffalo robes with India rubber cloth, to spread upon the ice and snow, etc., etc., while the carpenter is with great diligence at work on the "Forlorn Hope." Our net brings up many little curiosities out of the deep, while our guns now and then give us a bird for preparation.

All seem, as if by one accord, to recognize the necessity of harmony, and a good degree of the same spirit of hope and expectation that inspires our commander he has not failed to instill into those around him. The regulations of the ship enforce a rigid system of domestic discipline. Our only quarrelsome companions are our dogs, who keep up a continual snarling and snapping, and scarce a day passes that does not bear witness to the Doctor's heavy Arctic boots flying in the air, preceded by some unlucky puppy who may have been so unfortunate as to be too little disposed to show fair play. The Doctor being remarkably fond of their dogships, it is astonishing to see the gratitude and affection they hold for him; and he is almost always sure to excite their jealousies and raise a fight when he shows any favors.

The officers and men of our little party fare alike, and the products of our guns are shared equally. We look anxiously for the events in store for us; and if the restoration to a sympathizing world and devoted family of the man who, braving perils for the world's good in obedience to his country's commands, may be involved in obscurity, we hope, at least, with God's blessing, to bring back something which may set the world at rest with regard to his fate. Yours, very truly,

I. I. HAYES, M. D., of Chester county, Pa.,
Surgeon to the Expedition.

Mrs. Belcher on the Know-Nothings.

From certain indications, Mrs. Belcher is led to suspect that her liege lord has become a Know-Nothing. Having the characteristic infirmity of her sex, she assails him with a view of ascertaining what it's all about.

"So you thought you'd keep it from me, did you, Belcher? Just as if you could! Of course I haven't noticed any thing out of the way in your conduct lately."

"What do you mean?"

"O, it's all very well to ask what I mean? Didn't it ever strike you that it was for me to ask what you mean by your mysterious conduct?"

"I'm as much in the dark as ever."

"Of course you are. I supposed you would be. I hadn't the remotest idea you would pretend to be any thing else. But to proceed. You needn't think I haven't noticed your mysterious conversations with Squire Orray and Deacon Taft, and others—and how only the Monday afterwards, the Squire was elected representative by a large majority by the Know-Nothings. Of course you ain't a Know-Nothing yourself, Mr. Belcher? I don't like these underhand proceedings, for my part. If you want to do anything, why don't you do it openly? Now, Belcher, I want to know what it's all about. What are these Know-Nothings, and what are their principles, and what are they trying to do, and how many of them, and—"

"I know nothing about it."

"Know nothing! O yes, I supposed you'd say that. That's your motto. But you know you ain't in earnest now. Come tell me all about it."

"How can I, when I am just as ignorant as you are?"

"Mr. Belcher, this is a paltry evasion, and nobody knows it better than yourself. The simple fact is that you are not willing to tell what you know. It's as bad as a lie. But, perhaps, Belcher, you are afraid I will reveal the secret. You may rest quite easy on that point. People say that a woman can't keep a secret, but it's a great mistake, as you will find out, if you will only try me, Belcher. Mind I don't say any thing against the Know-Nothings. I have no doubt they are a very respectable party, and acting very properly end all that, but then I don't know. In fact, I've taken rather a liking to it, and I presume I should like their principles very much. So just let me know what they are, Belcher, that's a darling."

"I tell you again, that I don't know any thing about it, and I hope it will satisfy you."

"It doesn't satisfy me at all, Mr. Belcher, I see you distrust me. Pretty conduct in a husband to keep a secret from the wife of his bosom. But it's exactly like you, Belcher, and I needn't be surprised at it, not in the least. And as for these Know-Nothings, I'm very confident they're a miserable band of scapegraces, every one of them. A pretty set of principles they must have, when they're not fit for a wife to know."

"You were praising them just now, calling them respectable, and all that."

"You are a provoking man to pervert my language in that way. I didn't say they were. I only said they might be. But I'm very sure they're not now."

After a momentary pause, Mrs. Belcher resumed in a more conciliating tone: "I don't know but I've been too hard upon you, Belcher. Perhaps you've taken an oath not to reveal their secrets. But then, you know the Bible says a man and wife are one; so, of course, it wouldn't be telling to tell me. If you can't tell the whole, tell me a part, at any rate. Do they really put the right thumb to the end of the nose when they meet, as I read in the paper of the other day? Tell me, and I won't think so herd of you, Belcher. Laughing! You're a restless wretch, Belcher, to laugh at your poor wife, who never did a worse day's work than when she promised to become so."

Mrs. Belcher plunged into the depths of distress, from which her husband could only extricate her by some marvelous fictions respecting the Know-Nothings, which were manufactured to order. Mrs. Belcher dried up her tears, and listened with avidity. Henceforth, she invariably assumed an air of mysterious knowledge whenever the subject of Know-Nothings was broached. But, between you and me, friendly reader, she knows nothing about them to this day.

ART INTELLIGENCE.—At the late Mechanics' Fair in Portland, Maine, much attention was drawn to the works of a young painter named Tilton, who is now at Rome, perfecting himself in his adopted calling. A few years since young Tilton, as we learn from the State of Maine, came to Portland a mere boy, and engaged himself as a car painter in a manufactory, where his sketches, emblazoned on the panels, were pronounced remarkable for "force of expression and warmth of coloring." John Neal, the eccentric writer, and several other gentlemen, became interested in him, and by their persuasions he began his studies as an artist in a studio provided by Mr. Neal.

Tilton subsequently visited Italy, with funds obtained from the sale of his works, where he bids fair to attain celebrity. Competent judges abroad it is said, have been so impressed with his mastery of coloring, and in the blending of light and shade, as to compare his recent paintings with those of Claude Lorraine.

Crawford, the American sculptor, is busied in executing the order of Congress for a monument to be placed at the eastern extremity of the Capitol extension. The material is statuary marble. The design is announced as follows:

The central figure of the pediment represents America standing on a rock, against which the waves of the ocean are beating. She is attended by the eagle of the country; while the sun, rising at her feet, indicates the light which accompanies the march of liberty. In one hand she holds the rewards of civil and military merit—laurel and oak wreaths—her left hand is extended toward the pioneer, for whom she asks the protection of the Almighty. The pioneer is the athletic figure of a backwoodsman clearing the forest. The Indian race and its extinction is explained by the adjoining group of the Indian chief and family. The son of the chief is returning from the chase, with a collection of game slung on a spear over his shoulder. In the statue of the Indian chief, Mr. Crawford has endeavored to describe the despair and profound grief resulting from the conviction of the white men's triumph. The wife and infant of the chief complete this group of figures, while the grave, being emblematic of the extinction of the Indian race, fills up this portion.

The opposite half of the pediment is devoted to the effects of liberty and civilization. The first figure on the right of America represents its soldier. He is clothed in the ops tume of the Revolution, as being suggestive of the country's struggle for independence; his hand upon his sword indicates the readiness of the army to protect America from insult. By the soldier is placed a merchant, sitting on the emblems of trade; his right hand rests upon the globe, by which the extent of American commerce is symbolized. The anchor at his feet connects this figure with those of two boys advancing to devote themselves to the service of their country. The anchor is easily understood to be the emblem of hope; behind them sits the teacher instructing a youth. The mechanic completes the group. He rests upon the cog-wheel, without which machinery is useless. In his hands are the emblems of trade; and at his feet are sheaves of corn, expressive of fertility, activity and abundance, in contra distinction to the grave at the corresponding corner.

The New York Journal of Commerce calls the attention of the public to a counterfeit quarter of a dollar, which is the closest imitation in appearance of the genuine coin which ever fell under notice. It was taken at the Post-office, and paid into the Sub-Treasury, where it was detected by Mr. Edward H. Birdsall, the weigher and tester of coin. This counterfeit appears to be made of zinc, or other bright metal, is cast to resemble exactly the genuine coin, and is afterwards galvanized with pure silver. It is dated 1853, is about ten grains lighter than the genuine, and is very brittle. By the latter characteristic it may easily be detected, as it will readily break by a blow from the hammer. The specimen referred to was broken by Mr. Birdsall between his thumb and fingers. There are probably but few now in circulation, and receivers of money will do well to be on their guard against them.

AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a Remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

August 4, 1853.

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your CHERRY PECTORAL in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect,
J. D. POWELL, Supt. Trans. L. R. R.

Dr J. C. AYER: Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in selling the best of it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours with respect,
JOHN C WHITLOCK

P. S. Almost any number of certificates can be sent you, if you wish it.

The proprietor is determined this shall continue one of the best and cheapest Female Schools in the country. Situated where provisions are cheap and abundant; his buildings large and commodious; no rent to pay; he is prepared to accommodate a large number of boarders at $4 50 per week. JOHN T. DUNKLIN, A. M., Associate.
PREPARATORY SCHOOL.
THOS. C. BRAGG, A. M., Principal.
Assistant.
This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—a healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. To one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.
Her-tofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.
One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.
The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.
The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.
The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the Institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.
The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.
B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.
N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.
The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug6—6m26

Marion Female Seminary,
MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALA.
THE EXERCISES of this institution will be resumed on Monday, the 2d day of October, under the charge of the Rev. Jas. K. Armstrong as Principal, assisted by nine Professors, Teachers and Officers.
It has just closed its present session with one hundred and thirty-three students, seventy-seven of which number were boarders. There is but one session of nine and a half months.
Pupils can enter at any time during the session, chargeable from the beginning of the month in which they commence, to the close of the session. No deduction will be made but at the discretion of the Principal.
The Principal, with his family, resides in the building. The female teachers also reside in the Seminary. Boarders in the institution are under the control of the Principal at all times. A Steward, in the employment of the Principal, of experience, urbanity of manners, and faithfulness to his duties, a Matron who constantly and kindly ministers to the private wants of young ladies, and especially in sickness, a Governess who directs them in their exercises and amusements, superintends the order of their private apartments, instructs them in certain domestic duties, and guards their private, personal habits, manners and morals, always aided by the presence and active cooperation of the female teachers. The Principal and his lady secure to those committed to their charge every necessary and proper comfort and kindness. Here they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations respecting neatness, order, punctuality and economy. They have regular hours for study and recreation, for rising and retiring, for eating, domestic duties, and social enjoyment among themselves.
The institution is furnished with a new and superior apparatus in the departments of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. There is also a large collection of Maps, Charts, Plates, Diagrams, Globes, etc., for simplifying the principles of Geography, Physiology and Astronomy.
In the department of Drawing, Painting and Embroidery there is a fine collection of Drawing Cards, Engravings, Pictures, Paintings, Patterns, and every other convenience important in the prosecution of these departments.
There is in connection with the institution a Library of more than one thousand volumes, and a Cabinet of several hundred specimens.
The institution is furnished with six Pianos, five Guitars, and one Harp.
MUSIC.—The Professor at the head of this department is equal to any in the country. He is a superior vocalist, a fine performer on the Piano, Harp, Guitar, Violin, Violoncello, etc. He has enjoyed ten years experience as a teacher of music in the best institutions in the Union, is profoundly versed in the principia of harmony, and is a real amateur of the sublime science to which he has devoted himself.
LOCATION.—Its salubrity, intelligence, morality and public spirit are unsurpassed.
PERMANENCY.—Parents may send their daughters here with confidence in their completing their education under the same course of instruction and system of discipline. Every thing conspires to make the permanency of the Principal a matter of duty, pleasure and interest.
TEACHERS.—The Principal, himself a native of Alabama, surrounds himself with a corps of teachers of known efficiency and tried success, nearly all of whom have been reared in the South, thus ensuring a better acquaintance with Southern peculiarities and sympathy with Southern views and interests. Thoroughness is our motto in teaching. We ascribe the true importance to the harmonious development of the physical, intellectual and moral nature.
Reports are sent to patrons once every two months, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and conduct of the pupil. In our system of merits and demerits scholarship and conduct are connected.
The Principal regards it as his most important duty to attend to the moral habits of his pupils and to imbuing their minds with proper religious principles.
The facilities for acquiring the French and other modern languages are superior.
There are daily exercises in Orthography, Reading and Writing. Great attention is bestowed on letter-writing and composition.
Lectures are delivered weekly to the junior and senior classes on various subjects of Science and Literature, on which they take notes and are subsequently examined.
The Principal will be assisted in the Collegiate department, the ensuing session, by a gentleman, a Professor of long experience, of the ripest scholarship, and the most superior qualifications as a teacher. He will take charge of the department of Mathematics and some of the higher English branches and the control of the main study hall.
Visitors are not received by boarders except with suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.
No accounts will be opened in Marion. Money must be deposited or forwarded for all necessary and proper purposes. Let pupils be supplied from home as far as is practicable.
All sums of money for the use of pupils must be deposited with the Principal.
One hundred and forty-five dollars will pay the board and tuition of a young lady for the entire session in the collegiate course. $175 will embrace the languages. $235 will embrace board, tuition in the collegiate department, on the Piano, and in the languages.

EARLY MISSISSIPPI METHODISTS."

JOHN LANE--MR. PARKER--DR. MOORE A MODEL TEACHER--SCHOOL-BOY RECOLLECTIONS -- STEPHEN STRONG -- JAMES R. MARSH -- ISAAC CALDWELL -- MISSISSIPPI PREACHING--INTEMPERANCE.

The first Conference at Washington brought many young ministers, who subsequently became eminent. Among them I recollect Winans, Harper, Griffin, Lane, Parker, Moore, Menifee, Drake, Burruss, McMahon, Kesaca, Hearn, Talley, Minter, Owen.

My recollections of William Winans will be given hereafter, in a separate sketch. Of William Harper and Thomas Griffin were referred to in my first number. John Lane was then a young man, of noble form, of serene and dignified manners, with a physiognomy beaming with light and benevolence. He had, eminently, the gift of pleasing. His appearance in the pulpit, his modest, yet dignified aspect, the placid and benign expression of his countenance, even before he uttered a word, disposed every body to listen kindly and anxiously. Boy as I then was, he never knew that I did not whisper to myself, "there's a good man; he will never deceive me." Such was the first impression made by John Lane, in the old Meeting House, in Washington, many many years ago, so long I can not fix the date; but the memory is indelible. His subsequent career has been a mission of usefulness; full of good works before the world, and a multitude of kindnesses, to the poor and the sorrow-stricken, "not seen of men." Having married into the wealthy and distinguished family of the Vick's, he became, many years ago, one of the proprietors of Vicksburg, and has filled various important and trusts, ably and faithfully. As Judge Vick he is almost as well known, as in his ministerial relations. He resides in Vicksburg, (I believe,) honored and beloved by thousands who have grown from youth to manhood under his ministry; by hundreds whom he has united in matrimony; and by more than the writer, who will never forget his early counsels, and unbroken friendship, steadfast through after periods of trial and vicissitude.

Mr. Parker, as well as I can remember, was then the stationed preachor in Washington. He was in the decline of life, not so much from years, as from a constitution early wrecked in the service of his Master. I think he was a Virginian, but came to Mississippi from Ohio. He was very much loved. Physically and intellectually, he resembled Bishop McKendree. The old citizens of Washington (if any of those days he yet living--will remember that he occupied a small cottage on the hill, afterwards known as Mrs. New-'s, and where that pious lady, in a delirium, produced by illness, terminated her own life. Mr. Parker died there. His widow, who was a sanctified Christian, returned to Cincinnati, where she had connections, and was living comfortably, a few years since.

Few preachers, of that Conference, made more lasting impression than the Rev. Dr. Moore. He was a native of either Georgia or Virginia, but came from Alabama to Liberty, Amite county, where he established an Academy, on an extensive scale, assisted by Stephen Strong and James R. Marsh. I was one of his pupils, and lived in his family. He was an excellent scholar, and, what is still better, a man of strong, practical common sense; not pedantic; not superficial; not visionary; but thorough, solid, simple, unaffected, substantial. He had the faculty of making every body understand him, and of ruling absolutely, without appearing to do so. You obeyed his will implicitly, and yet felt all the while that you were only consulting your own volition. This very rare faculty, of commanding others, without seeming to be despotic, Napoleon classed as the highest of all talents. Dr. Moore was fully endowed with it. Our greatest ambition was to please him. He was in ill health; his wife and family -and a blessed family it was--were sickly and consumptive; he was very poor; he had sixty scholars, of different habits and dispositions, to control, yet he was never peevish or austere; his reproof came as from a parent, and encouraged, not mortified; he was the companion of our sports; amused us with his anecdotes; reclaimed us by his mildness; soothed us with his prayers. As a preacher he was forcible, solemn and full of feeling. He died many years ago, literally worn out by exposure, in early life, on the Circuit. His first assistant, Mr. Strong, was nephew of Caleb Strong, a well-known Governor of Massachusetts. He was a first-rate mathematician, and afterwards went to the bar, and enjoyed a lucrative practice. He died in Liberty, a number of years ago, and of his large class, consisting of the Stewarts, Bowmans, and Jelks, of Wilkinson, the McKnights, McKays, Ratcliffs, Haynes, Davis, Cains, Robinsons and others of Amite, the Perters, of Franklin, the Claibornes and Bryans, of Adams, the Dunns, of East Feliciana, and others, more than two-thirds are now in the grave! The few that survive—rari nantes in gurgite vasto—a shattered band, tried by various fortunes, struck by many a tempest; should they see these sketches, will saddeu over the reminiscences of early years, without recognizing the hand that recalls them; so darkly does the mist of time loom up between us! When I last stood, a wayfarer, on the threshhold of that old schoolhouse, "I was a stranger, and felt that strange eyes were upon me;" but, at every step, some well-remembered object would arise and whisper, with silent eloquence, of the holy memories of the past. It is at such times that men may weep. To stand amid the scenes of early joys; to gaze upon the foot-worn path, and the remembered tree; to see the forms of the distant, the estranged, and the dead, trooping in melancholy procession across the glass of memory; to note how flower after flower has fallen from the tree of life, till nothing is left but the bare trunk, that scarce the thunderbolt can harm; and then, to look forward on the coming years, and view their dark and sullen tide, rolling heavily in, over the distant sands. Oh, there is something in this that touches the heart, and teaches the chastened spirit to kneel, weepingly down, at the shrine of memory, and of God.

The second assistant at this Seminary was James R. Marsh, professor of languages, who had recently graduated at the University of South Carolina. He was a young man of uncommon talents. He afterwards went to the bar, in Madison county, and became a leading member of the Legislature. I shall never forget a ludicrous incident, in which he was a party, and as it is a burlesque on dueling, and points out the dangers of intemperance, I will here relate it.

At the session of 1829-'30, Marsh and Isaac Caldwell, of Hinds county, were two of the most prominent members. They were hostile, personally, and belonged to adverse factions. One night, at a late hour, there was a furious knocking at my door. On opening it, Judge Caldwell came in, very much excited, and intoxicated.

"Why, Judge," said I, "what is the matter?"

"Get up," said he, "get up! don't ask questions! There's no time to be lost! Get up, and write my will!"

"Write your will! You must be crazy! Are you sick? Are you about to die?"

"I am," said he, with a groan; "get up, and write my will."

Startled by the solemnity and earnestness of his manner, I wrapped myself in a cloak, and proceeded to write down, in due form, what he dictated. He signed the instrument, and then proceeded to say: "My friend, get that witnessed, immediately. I have not twelve hours to live. This evening I was invited by Pink. Smith* to a social party in his room; that scoundrel, Jim. Marsh, obtruded himself, became insolent, I kicked him out of doors, and he will challenge me in the morning. I know nothing of pistols; he is a dead shot; a regular fire-eater. I'm a gone case: get that will witnessed!"

Leaving my room, on the pretext of procuring witnesses, I strolled towards Pearl River, for it was then just day-light, and I felt feverish and disturbed. To my surprise I saw Mr. Marsh there, pacing slowly backwards and forwards, with his head down, and arms folded, evidently in deep thought.

"Why, hello, Marsh," said I, "what are you doing here this time of day? Why so serious?"

"My friend," he gravely replied, "I have enough to make me serious. I shall be in my grave before night!"

"Come, come, old fellow," said I, "you are hypo'd! You were never in better health."

"It is not that," he said; "it is not that. Last evening, after a Champegne supper, with Brandon and Scott, I called at Smith's room. There I found that rascal Caldwell. He was smirking and impertinent, as usual, and I kicked him into the street. He will challenge me to-day. The villain is a Kentuckian. His rifle is good for a hundred yards. I shall certainly be killed!"

This was the last of the affair. Each of these gentlemen, when duly sober, had a dim recollection of kicking the other, and each was satisfied with his own prowess! It is sad to remember that both of them, brave and brilliant men, some years afterwards died violent deaths. Caldwell was shot in a rencounter in Clinton, and Marsh was dismembowled by a blow from a bowie-knife, in Carroll county. Ah! what evils Intemperance has inflicted in Mississippi! What families have been ruined! What homes made desolate! What grave yards filled! What a fearful schedule, should I write down my recollection of the lawyers, the physicians, the rising statesmen, the opulent planters, and even ministers, that have been victims to the fatal cup! Honor and gratitude for those who are stripping away the vine-leaves, and exposing the skeleton and the serpent that lurk beneath.

A SHARP REBUKE.

The London Times gives the Pope's recently issued "Encyclical Letter" a terrible overhauling. His Holiness, in that singular document, intimated or seemed to intimate that the "wars," "pestilences" and "famines" with which the world is just now afflicted, were so many manifestations of Divine displeasure, because the world was departing from the Catholic faith.

The Times, with bitter irony, observes:

We are of opinion, before the Pope made up his mind to empty this peifful of clops upon all who disbelieve in his mission and set his authority at defiance, he might have been at the pains of taking an inventory of his own possessions and examining into their condition. According to our notion, the question of Rome or Canterbury had little enough to do with the quarrel between the Russians and the Turks—that is, between a Greek and a Mahomedan.

The earth, no doubt, is afflicted in consequence of this dispute, but most assuredly, if vengeance from above has been provoked by Propagandism against the Roman See, it is a most roundabout manner of punishing the transgression to slay some 100,000 Russian soldiers, who believe Papist and Protestant to be equally in error. This is the doctrine of vicarious chastisement with a witness. The Czar of all the Russians certainly cares as much for the Pope's authority—just as much—as the Sultan Abdul Mejid—that is to say not in the slightest degree. Again, with regard to the cholera, surely if the Divine wrath has been kindled at the falling off of belief in the Roman See, it does seem a little hard that the devout Lazzaroni, and the pious King Bomba should be so severely afflicted, while the Protestant countries of Europe have not suffered from the pestilence in an equal degree.

We content ourselves in thanking the Author of all Mercy that we have been so graciously dealt with; we do not, therefore, begin howling in triumph over the Pope and his followers, as though they were detected pick-pockets. If half a dozen Cardinals were to die of cholera, would that be a proof that the wrath of Heaven lay heavy upon mankind for not holding fast to the Roman See? With regard to the cholera, as in other matters, we must, with all humility, assert our own belief that certain general laws have been laid down for the government of the world, which are not lightly abandoned. Sin brings misery, it is true; but an Encyclical letter from Rome with more ample references to the benefits to be derived from ventillation, yellow soap and wholesome food, than to the remedial influences arising from meditation upon the Immaculate Conception, or frequent perusals of that very telling letter launched by St. John Chrysostom against the Anomaei, would be far better calculated to do good.

THE DOUAY BIBLE.

To the Editor,—

SIR: I have thought that an extract from a periodical, called the "Catholic Layman," which is conducted with much ability and in an admirable spirit, ought not to be uninteresting to your readers. To no man is the language of our Lord more applicable than to the thorough-going Papist, who consents to be judged by the Douay Testament—"out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant."

S.

THE INDEX EXPURGATORIUS AND THE DOUAY BIBLE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Layman,—

"SIR.: As your correspondents appear to take an interest in the subject of the Index Expurgatorious, I think it right to give you an account of a pamphlet I met with some time ago, in which it was recommended to the Roman Catholic authorities to expurgate the Douay Testament. The author of the pamphlet (whom I believe to have been a Protestant) maintains that there is sufficient precedent for such a proceeding. See, for example, the expurgation of the Scripture references in Stephen's Bible (Index Exp. Vat. p. 41.) And as there are many passages in the Douay Testament which appear at first sight at variance with Roman Catholic teaching, he proposes that they should be altered or expunged. I forward some specimens of the proposed alterations, which appear conceived in the spirit of the good friar who said, that if he had been by St. Paul when he was writing, he would have recommended him to leave out some ugly sentences which smelt of the faggot.

"I am, sir, etc.,

"IV. Jas. v. 16.—'Confess your sins one to another.' Dele 'one,' and read 'to another;' otherwise the text might be used to prove that priests should confess to the laity as well as the laity to the priests.

"V. Jas. v. 15.—Dele 'And the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him up.' For extreme unction, which is here meant, is never given but when it is hopeless that the sick man shall be raised up.

"VII. Heb. ix. 26, 27, 28.—Dele 'once;' for it is certain, from the decree of the Council of Trent (Sess. xxii. De Sac. Misc. Can. i. iii.,) that Christ is offered many times every day.

JUSTIFICATION AND SANCTIFICATION.

According to information occasionally received, it seems to be at least proper to furnish our private members with passages from our standard authors in regard to the distinction between justification and the state of entire sanctification. All of them may not have books at hand to decide their orthodoxy on this important subject.

Speaking of the errors of his early ministry, Mr. Wesley says: "During all that time I was utterly ignorant of the nature and condition of justification. Sometimes I confounded it with sanctification, (particularly when I was in Georgia.") Please notice that this "confounding" the two states of grace he ranks among the errors which he afterward saw and abandoned. Hear him describe the experience of one whom he knew: "From the very time of her justification, she saw the necessity of being wholly sanctified, and felt an unspeakable hunger and thirst after the full image of God; and in the year 1772 God answered her desire. The second change was wrought in as strong and distinct a manner as the first had been."

Speaking of another he says: "She had been clearly justified long before; but said the change she now experienced was extremely different from what she experienced then; as different as the noon-day light from that of day-break; that she now felt her soul all love and quite overwhelmed in God." "Another says she has enjoyed the love of God nine years, but felt as great a difference between that state and the state that she is now in, as if her soul was taken into heaven."

Referring to the anti-evangelical clergy of his day, he says: They speak of justification either as the same thing with sanctification, or as something consequent upon it. I believe justification to be wholly distinct from sanctification, and necessarily antecedent to it." This language cannot be misunderstood. Upon such points of vital interest, Wesley selected his terms with care. And we earnestly hope that those who claim to be teachers among us, will keep the distinction between the two states of grace as clear as he did, and attach the same importance to that distinction. Fletcher, Benson, Clarke, Watson and Hare, are equally careful to express that distinction, and to make it plain by arguments from Scripture. Cudworth, even, was tolerably clear upon this subject. But when the two states are confounded, sanctification, as a state, is virtually denied, and all concern for its progress in the Church must be thrown off in proportion to the influence of such a sentiment. Justification removes the guilt of sin—sanctification its pollution and stains. Justification (in its evangelical sense) destroys the power and control of sin; entire sanctification destroys the inbeing of sin, and sweeps from the heart those remains of unhallowed nature, of which the justified believer complains. How sad that the importance of such a work should be depreciated by even a solitary individual in the Christian Church!

One of the ministers in the Wesleyan connexion in Canada denied the distinction stated above, and for so doing was called to account before the last session of their conference. Upon acknowledging that he was partially convinced of error, and that he would not disturb the Church with it, he was placed upon trial for one year, and allowed to preach under a judicious superintendent. He was evidently an amiable man, and did not intend to do harm, constantly affirming that his sentiment, if erroneous, was an unimportant one. But the conference thought differently, as did also the membership on his circuit, who, I am happy to say, defended the truth; and the work of holiness continued to prosper among them.

SAINT PAUL AND THE GREEK POETS.

When certain philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoicks, encountered Saint Paul preaching the Christian religion at Athens, in the year of Christ, 53, some said, "What will this babbler say?" Others said, "He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods," and they brought him to Areopegus to talk with him on these matters. And then, standing on Mars Hill, it was that the eloquent "apostle of the Gentiles" delivered that remarkable discourse, the text of which was the inscription on one of the altars he saw in Athens. "To the unknown God." In the course thereof, he used these memorable words: "For in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, for we are also his offspring."

Paul was thoroughly versed in all the literature of his time, and could reason and argue, and speak with authority, in the presence of the wisest and most learned. The words here quoted by him, as having been uttered by certain Greek poets, are to be found in the works of two of them. First, in those of the poet Aratus, who was born in Cicilia, and wrote some 270 years before the birth of Christ. The passage from which the Christian apostle quoted, has been Englished thus:

From Jove begin we. Who can touch the string,
And not harp praise to heaven's eternal king!
He animates the mart and crowded way,
The restless ocean and the sheltered bay.
Doth care perplex? Is lowering danger nigh!
We are his offspring, and to Jove we fly.

Another Greek poet, Cleanthes, who was a Stoic philosopher, and a disciple of Zeno—and who died some 240 years before Christ—wrote, among other things, a most beautiful hymn to Jupiter, six lines of which have been thus rendered into English:

Worshipped by many names; alone in might!
Author of all! Who's word is nature's law!
Hail! unto thee may mortals lift their voice,
For we thine offspring are. All things that creep

EXPEDITION FOR THE EXTERMINATION OF HOSTILE INDIAN TRIBES.—The American public is yet unaware of the fact that an expedition is to be organized during the ensuing winter, the object of which is to wage a war of extermination against the Sioux Indians, and other hostile tribes who have been engaged in the late outrages on the plains. This force is to be concentrated upon Jefferson barracks early in the spring, so that active operations may commence without delay, as soon as the weather will permit. The force will consist of the Second regiment of infantry, three companies of the Second dragoons, and one section of the light battery, now stationed at Baton Rouge—the whole under command of Col. Sumner. This force will also be joined by all the men who can be spared from the garrisons of the forts which are scattered through that region, and there is a probability that at least two companies of mounted volunteers, composed of frontier men, will be added to the command. After they have accomplished their duties in that region, they will turn their attention to the Comanches, and will act in cooperation with the forces now stationed upon the frontiers of Texas. The object of this movement is not merely for the purpose of reducing the Indians to an observance of the stipulations of former treaties, but to exterminate all the warriors of tribes who have hitherto annoyed the emigrants, and to reduce the residue to complete obedience to the laws of the United States.

The late massacre near Fort Laramie has been the cause of such a vigorous movement upon the part of the authorities, and it is in consequence of this projected expedition that no step has yet been taken to punish the offenders. It is in this manner alone that the Government need ever expect to be rid of the trouble and expense of endeavoring to keep these barbarians in any thing approaching subjection; we say endeavoring, because the thing itself has never yet been done. It would be wise to increase the mounted volunteer force to seven or eight hundred men, organized in separate detachments of one hundred and fifty each, so disposed that the Indians might be attacked simultaneously at all points and hemmed in at once. The regular force now stationed at different points on the head waters of Nueces, and on the Rio Grande above El Paso, is thought sufficient to intercept the Camanches should they endeavor to escape into the northern territories of Mexico. The measures become more evidently necessary when we consider that the Pacific Railroad is to be built through the Camanche region, to do which, under existing circumstances, will be totally impossible. Secretary of the Baron Steuben.

THE TROUBLES OF A HOST.

In the year 1794 there was much excitement among the settlers of Onondaga county, on account of a threatened invasion from the Western Indians. The alarm was so great, and the immediate danger so apparent, that many prudent persons buried their most valuable effects. To such a height were the fears of the people excited, that it was confidently believed the settlements in the vicinity of Onondaga would be broken up. During this state of affairs, Gov. Clinton, about the middle of May, dispatched Gen. William North, Gen Stephen Van Rensselaer, Gen. David Van Horne and Baron Steuben, who had been recently appointed special commissioners by the Legislature of New York, to provide for the defense of the Western frontier, and to erect such fortifications as they should deem necessary for the public safety. Twelve thousand pounds had been appropriated by the Legislature to defray any expenses thus made. The commissioners repaired to "Salt Point," and with the advice of a "Committee of Safety," consisting of Messrs. De Witt, Van Vleck, Orman, Phares and Danforth, advised the erection of a block-house at that place. The militia of the county were called out, and reviewed by the commissioners, and active measures taken for the protection of the frontier.

On their return, the commissioners spent the night at the house of Mr. John A. Shaeffer, innkeeper in Manlius village. The guests were considerably fatigued with their journey, and the labors of their important trust, and retired early to rest. During the night there seemed to be an unusual stir about the house. As the hour of midnight approached it still increased, and before morning transpired one of those unpostponeable events incident to all societies, and increasing families. The Baron was greatly annoyed during the night, so that he scarcely slept a wink. The frequent shutting of doors, continued trampling of busy feet, and hushed sounds of female voices, which were greatly magnified by the Baron's nervousness and the importance of progressing events, kept his mind in a continual tumult.

The house was built of logs, only one story high, with two rooms below; the chamber being the whole size of the house, with only loose boards for a floor. This chamber was occupied by the distinguished guests of Mr. Shaeffer. The companions of the hero of this tale slept soundly, and were not at all disturbed by their dreams. It was not so with the Baron. He threw himself upon his bed of straw, seeking rest, yet finding none, continually wondering what on earth could excite such wonderful commotion below. He tossed about in nervous wakefulness, and finally worked himself into an almost uncontrolable passion, which could scarcely be restrained till morning. On the earliest approach of light the Baron rose, still in his rage, vowing vengeance on all below. He approached the redoubtable landlord in not the most agreeable humor, saying: "Your house is full of gossips and goblins, sir; I haven't slept a wink all the blessed night. You have a pack of dogs about you, noisy enough to deafen one. Sir, I repeat, your house is full of gossips and goblins. Sir, your house isn't fit to stable swine. Give us breakfast; let us be off as soon as possible, and we'll not soon trouble you again."

The Baron's rage was at its height. Mine host was perfectly dumfounded before his enraged and angry guest, and dared not so much as to lift his head, or even to hint at the cause of the disturbance during the night. The more considerate companions of the Baron heartily sympathized with him in his troubles, and were ready to excuse their host, but it only had the effect to add fuel to the flame, and increase his rage.

In the height of the storm which had already spent much of its fury, as if to afford relief and calm the rending elements, a woman cautiously and timorously approached the angry Baron, who was still breathing forth threatenings, bearing in her arms a little infant wrapped in swaddling-clothes, which had not yet witnessed the setting of a single sun, saying: "Here, Sir Baron, is the cause of all the trouble and noise last night." The gallant soldier instantly felt the impropriety of his conduct; his habitual good humor was instantly restored, and his accustomed gallantry prompted him at once handsomely to apologize, at the same time begging ten thousand pardons of those around him. He tendered his most hearty congratulations to Mr. and Mrs Shaeffer, and offered, as an atonement for the wrong he had done, to bestow his own name upon the new visitant, which offer was joyfully accepted, and forthwith the Baron drew a deed of gift for two hundred and fifty acres of land, from his domain in Oneida county, and after breakfasting with his friends, went on his way rejoicing.

There is often a singularity in the closing scenes of the lives of distinguished men. It may not be unworthy of remark here, that Frederick William Augustus, Baron de Steuben, once an aid-de-camp to Frederick the Great, King of Prussia; Quartermaster-General; Chevalier of the Order of Merit; Grand Marshal of the Court of Hohenzollen; Colonel in the Circle of Swabia; Knight of the Order of Fidelity; Commander-in-chief of the armies of the Prince of Baden; Major-General in the armies of the United States, and Inspector-General of the same—the fortunate soldier of fifty battles, an admirer of Freedom, the friend of Washington, the man of virtue, fidelity and honor—performed his last military service in reviewing a few score of unarmed, half-clad militia, and in selecting a site for a block-house, for the defense of the frontier of New York, in the county of Onondaga, at Salt Point, in 1794. The Baron died at his residence in Steuben, Oneida county, November, 1795. [Clark's Lights and Lines in Indian and Frontier Life

"Six or seven weeks ago I had a valuable cart mare bitten by a strange dog. My man was in the chaff-house, and he was aroused by a sudden rearing, plunging and unusual noise; he immediately entered the stable, and thought he saw a small dog jump out of the manger and leave the stable; he thought this must have frightened the animal, as it was dark. I told him to bring it out to the light, when we observed three or four long scratches or incisions just deep enough to draw blood; an uneasy thought crossed my mind at the moment but it was soon forgotten, and it was only last week that I was pleasing myself that the mare was improving in condition. On Monday last she appeared to have a sore throat. I sent for the farrier, who administered some remedy, and ordered fomentation, which was very frequently applied. She appeared something better on Tuesday morning, but towards evening became worse, and eventually quite rabid—starting and shivering at the sound of water, and snapping at every thing within reach; and at last we found it necessary to kill her."

BREAD AND BUTTER.—We laughed some at hearing the following story from the lips of a friend a few days since—a friend, by the way, who always has a good story to tell.

Mr. Jordan was a bachelor, on the shady side of forty, and consequently was subject to the tender mercies of the boarding-house keepers. Circumstances—and circumstances have an old bachelor at their back generally, for he has no dignity to stoop his ends—had kept Mr. Jordan an inmate of Mrs. Wiggins' boarding-house for a long time, and Mrs. Wiggins was a lady of one idea, namely, economy. Her experiments in economical philosophy, and philosophical economy were, for the most part, brought to bear upon the stomachs of her boarders, as "victuals," is the principal item of expense in mediocre boarding-houses. Mr. Jordan had been startled by some of the aforesaid experiments, but he had borne with patience the present and certain evil "rather than fly to others that he knew not of," until one day, when butter was scarce and high, Mrs. Wiggles hit upon the economical plan of spreading with her own economical hands the butter upon the allowance of bread she doled out to her boarders—excusing herself for this interference in their affairs by stating in the blandest manner, that she assumed that task cheerfully, to save them trouble!

Mr Jordan came home to tea rather late on the first evening of this new dodge, sat down in presence of all the other boarders, and received a slice from Mrs Wiggins, who had gone through the ceremony of buttering it before his eyes. Mr. Jordan eyed the bread inquisitively, and began to turn it from side to side, and scrutinize it closely through his spectacles.

"What is the matter with your bread and butter?" demanded Mrs Wiggins.

"Nothing—nothing—nothing," replied Mr. Jordan, still turning the piece over, and persisting in his scrutiny.

"I'm positive, Mr. Jordan, that you do see something. Now I went," said Mrs Wiggins, her face becoming flushed with excitement, "I want my boarders to tell me right out when their victles doesn't suit! Now, Mr. Jordan, what is it?"

Mr. Jordan laid down the slice upon his plate, raised his spectacles to his forehead, and replied, with great deliberation:

"Mrs. Wiggins, there's nothing the matter with the bread, I assure you; but, Mrs. Wiggins," and here Mr. Jordan glanced mischievously down the vista of attentive faces, "I have lived in this world sight and forty years, and I find myself this evening such a simpleton that I can't tell for my life which side of my bread is buttered!" MAKING FACES AT A WITNESS.—One of the smartest lawyers in one of the New England States has an unfortunate infirmity of the muscles of his countenance, and the convulsive movements or twitches of his ponderous eyebrows, nose, and the parts adjacent thereto, are almost frightful to persons unacquainted with the gentlemen, and with this peculiarity of his physiognomy, it happened on one occasion during a trial in which Squire H. was engaged, that a buxom matron was placed on the witness stand. The good lady was one of the class who are not afraid to look about them, and withal, understand the use of their tongues. Squire H. was observing her attentively while the junior counsel continued the examination. The lady proceeded, with great volubility, in her narration of what occurred in the house, in reference to something in dispute between the parties litigant.

At length she caught the eye of Squire H., and, reddening with anger, she stopped, but at the suggestion of the examining attorney proceeded. But she soon observed the legal gentleman's visage turned towards her again, and the eternal grimace of the unconscious lawyer upset her temper.

She stopped, looked furious at Squire H., gave her head a toss, fanned herself violently a minute and then proceeded with her testimony.

Again, on looking around at Squire H., she caught him at it, and her anger rose almost to the boiling point. She shook her fan at him, and looked as if "she would eat him up." His honor the judge at length requested her to go on with her narrative. The indignant witness drew herself up as stiff as a whalebone, and snapped out:

"Please your honor, I can't as long as that ugly man sits there a-making faces at me."

The gravity of the bench, bar, jury-box, and spectators' gallery, was all upset in a promiscuous heap, and every body but Squire H. thought it a capital joke—on the face of it.

ON ONE CONDITION.—Some years ago, when the Legislature of one of the Middle States were framing a constitution, the discussion of its various provisions was warm and obstinate. Many days had been spent in fiery debate, and the vote was at length about to be taken. Just at this moment a country member, who had been absent for some days previously, entered and took his seat. Another member, who was in favor of the amended constitution, went to him and endeavored to make a convert of him.

"You must vote for the constitution, by all means," said he.

"I'll think of it," said the country member.

"But you must make up your mind at once, man; for the vote is about to be taken."

The country member scratched his head and seemed puzzled:

"Come, why do you hesitate? Will you promise me to vote for the constitution? I am sure it will give general satisfaction."

"I'll vote for it on one condition," said the country member.

"What is that?"

"And on no other, by gracious!"

"But what condition is it?"

"Why, that they let it run by my farm."

TO PRESERVE A BOUQUET.—A florist, of many years experience, gives the following recipe for preserving bouquets for an unusual period, which may be useful to our lady readers: First, get the bouquet, which is not very easy to do just now, but when you get it, sprinkle it lightly with fresh water. Then put it into a vessel containing soap-suds, which will nutrify the roots, and keep the flowers as bright as new. Take the bouquet out of the suds every morning and lay it sideways, the stalks entering first, in water. Keep it there a minute or two, then take it out, and sprinkle the flowers lightly by the hand with water. Replace it in the soap-suds and it will bloom as fresh as when first gathered. The soap-suds need changing every three or four days. By observing these rules a bouquet can be kept bright and beautiful for at least a month, and will last longer in a very passable appearance; but the attention to the fair, but frail creatures, as directed above, must be strictly observed, or the last rose of summer will not be left faded alone, for all will perish.

SCOTT'S SENSIBILITY.—Sir Walter Scott could never eat the flesh of any creature he had known while it was alive. "I had once," said he, "a noble yoke of oxen, which, with the usual agricultural gratitude, we killed for the table; they sold it was the finest beef in the four counties; but I never could taste Cog and Rogey, whom I used to admire in the plow. Moreover, when I was an officer in the yeomanry, and used to dress my own charger, I formed an acquaintance with a flock of white turkeys, by feeding them a handful of oats now and then, when I came from the stable. I saw their numbers diminish with real pain, and never attempted to eat any of them without being sick; and yet I have as much of the rugged and tough about me as is necessary to carry me through all sorts of duty without much sentimental compunction."

A convict named Hamilton made his escape from the jail of Marion District, S. C., last week, and killed Mr. Gibson, the jailor, who attempted to arrest him.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4.

APOLOGY.—The Advocate was delayed two days, in going to press, on account of the removal of the Printing Office. For the miserable quality of paper used this and two weeks back, we can say, it was the best to be had in the market. When the BOOK AGENTS get in stock, then we shall keep on hand a supply of good quality—thus avoiding these privations of the paper market.

NO LICENSE.

On the 7th inst. the vote will be taken, throughout the city, "License or No License." Shall groggeries and coffee houses, and cabarets and bar-rooms be closed or continued? We verily hope the city vote will abate these nuisances. It will not do to lose it once, but friends of temperance, order, health, and low taxes must try, try again. Let no citizen lose his vote. If you have not done, take time to exercise your discretion on this question. We suggest not how any shall vote. Go to the polls, look at the subject in the light of patriotism, of philanthropy, in the solemn light of eternity. Then vote.

SABBATH SCHOOL.

We are requested to say that a Sabbath School will be organized to-morrow, Nov. 5, in the "Union Ball Room," on Jackson street, between Jersey and Chippewa, Fourth District, at nine o'clock, A. M., and that the School will continue to meet regularly every Sabbath morning at the same place and hour.

The School is organized by order, and under the supervision of the New Orleans District Sabbath School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

FELICITY STREET CHURCH.—This Church, Rev. L. Parker, pastor, has been the scene of protracted and interesting meetings for two weeks, the presiding Elder, Dr. Keener, and Rev. J. B. Walker assisting. The congregations are very large and serious: the word in the demonstration of the Spirit. It has been delivered with point and pungency to the consciences. Regardless of the fastidiousness and chronic complaints of city Churches and city folks, these brethren have gone to work on the principle that the forte and the duty of Methodism is to work out her own peculiarities. Some noise, therefore, and much power. We have heard that one or two nice people have been offended. (Acts 11, 12, 13.) We have also heard what is better, of about forty souls converted. The [illegible] have not got their consent, or the consent of their friends to mourn at the altar, are doubtless mourning in secret places. From night to night, a free gospel and present salvation continues to be offered there.

THE NEW BISHOPS.—The three new Bishops have passed their novitiates auspiciously. Of Bishop EARLY we have before given information. Bishop KAVANAUGH presided at the Missouri Conference. The St. Louis Advocate states that in this, his first Conference, he presided, and preached to the satisfaction of all.

The Holston Advocate says of Bishop PIERCE:—"We have never been better pleased with a presiding officer than we are with Bishop PIERCE. He gives universal satisfaction in the pulpit, in the chair, and in the social circle."

SOLOMON AND DR. ADAM CLARKE ON CALIFORNIA.—"As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place."—Prov. 27, 8.

"As a bird that wandereth from her nest, leaving her own brood, places of retreat, and feeding-ground behind, and going into strange countries, where she is exposed to every kind of danger; so is the man who leaves his family, connections and country, and goes into strange parts, to find employment, better his circumstances, make a fortune, etc. I have seen multitudes of such wanderers from their places come to great misery and wretchedness. God's general advice is, "Do good and dwell in the land; and verily thou shalt be fed."—Clark's Commentary, vol. 5, p. 778.

The Doctor talks as if he had lived in California for the last four years.

FORCE OF HABIT.—It is curious to observe how easily habits of thought constantly break out, and exhibit themselves in whatever he does or says. In one of our colleges it was customary for the professors to take turns in reading the chapel prayers. Once upon an occasion this duty fell upon the learned professor of chemistry, and the students were astonished to hear him introduce an illustration thus: "Then knowest, O Lord, that for obtaining lightning, silver is better than platinum, so in the mind, touched by Thy grace, oxide the most ready to receive the principles of oxidees!"

On another occasion the mathematical professor asked "Divine goodness to enable us to [illegible] its length, its breadth, its depth, and its [illegible] contents!"

METHODIST PRESS.

From the family of Advocates we blot out, after this week, the Holston. Our "great official," at Nashville, is a sort of Saturn, this being the second of the family it has devoured, and hard after another. The Editorial Correspondence, of this last number of the Holston, tells the story. Under date of October 14th, it is written:

"After prayer by brother Stringfield, on yesterday morning, Rev. J. B. McFerrin, D. D., Editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, was introduced to the Conference. Having obtained permission from the Chair, he addressed the conference at some length upon the Book Concern established at Nashville. Commodious and suitable buildings, he said, had been purchased on good terms, that Nashville had subscribed twenty-two thousand dollars towards the purchase of the property. He next presented a memorial from the Tennessee Conference to the Holston; in which the proposition was submitted to our consideration, to merge the three Methodist papers, published in Tennessee, to wit: the Holston, Nashville and Memphis Advocates, into one, that is, the Nashville Christian Advocate; with the understanding, that in the event of their union, the subscription price is henceforth to be $1 50 per Annum, invariably in advance."

The memorial was laid on the table, and made the subject of discussion for afternoon session:

"The afternoon session was opened with prayer by brother Gass, after which the memorial from the Tennessee Conference was called up. Brother McFerrin spoke at considerable length in favor of merging the Holston into the Nashville Advocate—demonstrated that by an act of the late General Conference, the resolution of the same body to loan the H. C. Advocate $5,000 was virtually annuled, and that these funds, in the usual order of things, could never be available. He dwelt upon the influence of the proposed reduction in the subscription price of their paper, would have in curtailing our subscription lists. He argued that other States had but one Methodist paper, and why should Tennessee have more—that the facilities for transporting the mails are so great that the Nashville Advocate can be within the bounds of our conference within a few hours after it is published; and that the good of all concerned, demanded that our whole energies should be concentrated on the one paper. Brethren of our Conference followed in short speeches. Pending the discussion, it was moved and carried to adjourn, to meet again at 7 o'clock, P. M. At the appointed hour, Conference came together, and after prayer, by brother Goodykoontz, the debate was resumed. At nine o'clock it was closed; the Conference, on a second ballot, voting almost unanimously, to transfer the Holston Christian Advocate, with its entire assets and liabilities, to the Nashville Advocate."

ADVOCATICIDE.—This item in the proceedings of the Tennessee Conference, occurred on the 5th inst:

"The regular committees being appointed, and communications on various subjects having been read, Dr. Green presented a resolution on the subject of discontinuing the Holston and Memphis Advocates, and transferring their subscription lists to the Nashville Christian Advocate. This resolution contemplates memorialising the conferences concerned in those papers, in order to secure their co-operation."

Knowing that Dr. G. was an old and standing member of the publishing Committee of the Nashville Advocate, and that he and Dr. McFerrin were members of the Book Committee; and having observed, at the General Conference, and since, the Federalist policy prevailing in certain quarters, we regarded that item as significant. It seemed like "official notice" to our excellent cotemporaries to pin back their ears, grease themselves, and prepare to be swallowed.

One has submitted. What else could it do? The resolution of the General Conference to loan it aid, was "virtually annuled." How or when, we are not informed, but it was "demonstrated" to them. Then "he dwelt upon the influence, the proposed reduction of the subscription price of their (Nashville) paper would have in curtailing our (Holston) subscription list." Such skillful handling of power and patronage, brought about an emergence, which made merging "a virtue of necessity." It was a very Christian way of saying, "stand and deliver." The "entire assets and liabilities," with subscription books, were handed over "almost unanimously." While the Editors of other Church papers are thrown for support upon their subscription list, the Editor of the Nashville Advocate, by some special provision obtained of the General Conference, goes upon the Book Concern for his support. He and his paper are backed by all its capital. It is a very safe thing therefore, with such advantages and securities to over ride others and clear the field of them. If $1,50 will not secure a monopoly, then come down to $1. Though this might be a losing business, it matters not, as the Book Concern foots the bills, and the Advocates' printers get their pay, and its Editor his salary, sure. A strange time this, to reduce subscription price, when both religious and secular papers are yielding, all over the land, to the necessity of higher ones. Why did not the Nashville Advocate try it before the strong box of Stevenson & Owen was put at its back, the key hanging up in the sanctum? This subject might be enlarged upon, but with these hints we drop it. Here is an extract from the Memphis Advocate' views:

"The whole aspect of this attempt, now made to cut off the heads of our local Advocates, is too patent, to escape animadversion. The question arises in every honest mind, why is the attempt made now to destroy our beloved Memphis and Arkansas Advocate? What reasons now exist, which did not exist at Columbus, in May last! As for the Holston Advocate, we are not authorized to speak. Whether she may have an understanding about this matter, with the Nashville Book Committee, we know not; we only know that the last number we have seen of this excellent sheet, speaks in high anticipation of a continued and more improved existence. But we do know, that we came, in good faith, from Columbus, to conduct this paper, as best we could, for the next four years. We have never made, never will be so recreant to the Church, nor this section of the country, as to make overtures of amalgamation with any Advocate, least of all that at Nashville. If we should ever get unable to stand alone—which our present prosperity does not indicate—we shall prefer to unite with that at New Orleans, which is more favorable to us as to location and accessibility, and is conducted with a propriety, force and skill, far more worthy of its objects. We ask, then, why now is this Advocaticide contemplated? We are in no need of the union asked for? Is the Nashville Advocate? And are we to be thus coolly decapitated for the benefit of Nashville? But if, for the benefit of the Nashville Advocate, this is to be done, why was it not proposed at Columbus? That would have been a fair and honest way, though, even then, it might have been selfish enough to sicken common Christianity."

* * * * * * *

"Cut off the Memphis Advocate, and what then? Why the precedent is set, and the grasping ambition of Nashville may swallow up other Advocates, with the same authority. Cut off the Advocates, and the sentinels being out of the way, the depositories may be defeated in pursuance of the same unrighteous policy, instituted in defiance of the Discipline. The "enlarged discretion" which the Book Committee claimed in its recent manifesto, published by us without remark, some time since, as we were waiting developements—this enlarged discretion will be exorcised with a vengeance, truly, and intrigue now will secure that central power at Nashville to crush the Church, which no one dared attempt openly at Columbus. Is not this, then, the first sheaf of the harvest? Is not this but the first step in a policy which seeks to overthrow the whole system of loans and donations to Western papers, with the Western Depositories? We put the question pointedly to the Nashville Book Committee, is it not your wish to overthrow the whole scheme of depositories at St. Louis, Memphis, New Orleans, and Galveston, as provided for in the eighth section?

"For the present, we have done. We have no idea that our Conference will do otherwise than spurn this resolution from their table, with disgust, should the Tennessee Conference be so lost to propriety as to pass it. They love this paper, and will sustain it."

MAILS.—The Richmond Advocate says our Advocate fails him lately and that it is "too great a favorite" in his office for that to be put up with. We bow—hat off. The Editor of the Charleston also misses the New Orleans semi-occasionally. If we should reply that the complaint is mutual—it would be truth. When we missed the Southern so long we began seriously to dread intelligence of the death, by yellow fever, of our good brother Myers. The last number, due several days since, is just to hand. Several numbers gone for good—or rather, they never came. This is a great depriviation to us. We never feel ready to make up "Methodist Press" unless the Richmond and Charleston are at hand. Let us petition the President.

[The following letter is from a lady of Mobile, Alabama, passing the fall and winter in the North under medical treatment. We must see, out of her southern eyes, to appreciate the delicate proprieties of a Woman's Rights Meeting. That the paper has not reached her, is owing to the same cause obtaining in many other cases—no notice of change was given.] ED.

LETTER FROM PHILADELPHIA.

MR. EDITOR: You can not imagine the pleasure the Advocate gave me. It is the first I have seen in four months. I was thinking how to get the subscription to you, as one dollar and fifty cents could not go in a letter and was always so awkward. To my comfort I see you have changed the price to the convenient sum of two dollars. The Advocate is worth much more than that to me, so I send two little gold dollars.

A little excitement prevails here in consequence of the WOMAN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION being held in the quiet city of Philadelphia. Would you believe it? curiosity led me to attend one of their evening meetings. The house was crowded, so much so as to be oppressive. Among them were a great many Quakers. Their sentiments were decidedly abolition. Miss Lucy Stone remarked it was a shame to Pennsylvania for not permitting colored men to vote, and a shame to Philadelphia for not allowing the colored population to ride in the omnibuses; that things would never be rightly adjusted until Mrs. Lucretia Mott went to Congress.

Mrs. Gage, of Missouri, spoke over an hour. Miss Lucy about the same length. A great many ladies and gentlemen stood up throughout the meeting. I send you extracts from the papers that you may read for yourself.

An invitation from the Female Medical College was read by Mrs. Cutler, asking the Convention to attend the lectures at the College:—

"Mrs. C. took occasion to remark and speak complimentary of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania as being the first city and State not only in the Union, but in the world, to establish such an institution. There were four Colleges in Ohio that admitted females as graduates, but the Philadelphia institution is the only one exclusively devoted to females.

Mrs. Ann Preston, a professor in the Female Medical College, spoke upon the expediency and necessity for the medical education of females, and the thriving prospects of the institution, and the growing desire among females to enter the medical profession.

Henry Grew said he was an advocate of rights of woman as far as was consistent with Divine Revelation. It does not pertain to either man or woman to define the sphere in which they should act, that belongs to the Infinite. He could not therefore accord with all that is claimed by the advocates of woman's rights of a perfect equality. He quoted from Genesis, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee," to show that by the revealed will of God perfect equality was not accorded to woman.

He also quoted other passages from the Testament to show that home was the proper sphere of woman, and that subjection to the husband was a pre-requisite. In objection to the right claimed of occupying chairs in College or the pulpit, he quoted—"Let your women keep silent in the churches, for they are not permitted to speak," to show that this claim was not consistent with the commands of Holy Writ. A number of similar quotations of the same tenor. Woman was told to go forth in the labors of the Gospel, and he bid her to continue in her labors, but not to soar too high, else she must not object to his clipping her wings, that she may come back to her proper position in accordance with the Divine will. He hoped he would not be misunderstood. He accorded with all the efforts for the amelioration of the wrongs of humanity, governed only by the revelations of Divine Providence. As for the propriety of women becoming legislators and rulers, he could not see how this would accord with Holy Writ, but he was open to conviction, and individually would as leave be governed by a woman as a man.

Mrs. Cutler responded in a most eloquent address, controverting the arguments of the reverend father in Israel, for whom she professed the utmost respect and esteem. She took the creation as recorded in Genesis, as the basis of her argument, contending that God never gave the sovereignty of the earth to man, until after Eve was created, and then it was given to both equally, and it was not until death had entered the world through their joint transgression that Eve was put under subjection to Adam. The consequence of that sin, that woman should bring forth children in sorrow, and man was condemned to labor all the days of his life for the sustenance of himself and progeny. The coming of Christ, she argued, restored all things to their original position, and the perfect equality between the sexes was restored.

Wm. Lloyd Garrison made a long speech in reply to Mr. Grew's argument upon the scriptural authority for the inequality of the sexes. He said, as regards the majority of the Convention it was a matter of but little importance to the quotations made, as they had gone over the ground and they placed their cause upon the decree of Nature. They had long known that man and woman are equal in sight of God, and that they were bound by the same tie of life, and have no taste for the discussion of the dry texts. But the mass of the people believe that the Bible comes from God, and that if the book decrees it, that settles the question, though they would be converts to Woman's Rights were it not for the Bible diffinelty. But why go to the Bible to settle the question, when we have by the Declaration of Independence ignored that book? That declaration of the equality and inalienability of the rights of man included the whole human race.

Miss Lucy Stone continued the debate upon the Scriptural quotations brought forward in the afternoon session of the Convention, by Henry Grew, as authority for woman being subject unto her husband. She discarded the idea of being governed by the precepts of St. Paul, which were only designed for local adaptation, and were totally unfit for this age of progress. Suppose, she said, our forefathers had been governed by the text, "Fear God, and honor the King," would not the Declaration of Independence have been left unwritten, and the present Republic now a Province of Great Britain. For her part she said, if every page of Holy Writ, from Genesis to Revelations, had written upon them "wives be subject to your husbands," she would discard them for the golden rule of Confucius, "do unto others as thou wouldst others should do unto thee." There were several expressions of disapprobation from the audience at this avowal, but her remarks were generally listened to with the utmost attention, and frequently elicited applause."

I retired while Mrs. (Presidentess) Rose was holding forth. Enough—of those brazen hearts as well as faces. I was pleased to see that they were hissed as well as applauded."

THE REVIVALIST CAST OUT.

The Mourners' Bench and Anxious Seat had but a short run among the English Tractarians. It was too good to last. "There was the promise of a fine work"—as a Methodist preacher (O. S.) would have said. These things show that Wesleyans acted right, and as they were bound to do, when a century ago they organized a separate Church from the establishment. No revival can be prosecuted within it. And if they do these things in the green tree, what were the scenes under the dry—the days of fox-hunting and card-playing and dram-drinking clergy? The London Record says:

"As we have anticipated in former articles, the High-church party, have cast out poor Mr. Aitken! The Vicar of Leeds, in a semi-episcopal letter addressed to a Church warden, ignores his whole proceedings, denies that any extensive or permanent effects have been produced by his preaching, and warns his youngor clergy from having any thing to do with this erratic and enthusiastic teacher! Mr. Knott, the Incumbent of St. Saviour's, Leeds, we are assured by the Vicar of Leeds, has for some time been persuaded of the 'unreality of the proceedings at the Church;' and in this state of mind he has been carried away by the more positive doctrines of Mr. Aitken; but the Vicar senior has hopes of the Vicar junior, 'as a man of education and piety,' and hints, 'he may soon regain his equilibrium.' All this denotes certain disturbance in the machinery in the out-and-out Tractarian Church of St. Saviour's, and discovers fear on the mind of the via-media Dr. Hook, that Mr. Aitken's preaching of justification by faith, conversion and assurance may further disturb the sound and sober Churchmen at Leeds. The doings of Mr. Aitken have actually become 'revolting' to the Vicar, who, if we mistake not, did himself most strongly recommend and vigorously press the services of this same Mr. Aitken upon a certain conference of gentlemen held not a hundred years ago in London!

"I need scarcely remark in addition," he says, "that meetings for extempore and declamatory prayer, designed to excite the passions of the hearers, rather than to seek humbly the grace of God, are very revolting to those who have been trained in the sober ways of the Church of England."

In a foot-note to his letter, Dr. Hook thus sums up the results of Mr. Aitken's labors in Leeds:

"P. S.—Out of more than fifty clergymen in Leeds, I only know of one who sympathizes with Mr. Aitken. Two or three of the younger clergy, anxious to make experiments for the improvement of their districts, were at first carried away by the impetuosity of his declamation; but they soon changed their opinion of his teaching, when they found that instead of converting the wicked to Christianity, the tendency was to pervert the pious to fanaticism. The clergy of St. Saviour's consist of Mr. Knott and one curate, and the curate is known to be opposed to Mr. Aitken. If other clergy have assisted there, they have intruded themselves, and have no license from the Bishop."

RESISTANCE TO TAXATION.—The corporation of Norfolk having passed an ordinance imposing a special tax upon each resident lawyer, physician, and dentist and an additional tax of one and a half per centum upon the income derived from the practice of their profession, they have held a meeting and resolved to resist its payment as unjust and unconstitutional. Counsel is to be employed to test its legality.

ASBURY CAMP-MEETING.

This meeting was held on the Mount Zion Circuit, Alabama Conference; it commenced on Friday night, October 13, and closed on Thursday morning the 19th. The site of the camp-ground is very singular and quite picturesque; it is situated in a valley surrounded on three sides by an almost perpendicular hill, which rises to near one hundred feet above the tents: there is another lofty hill in front of the other side, which gives it the appearance of being completely surrounded. The access to the camp-ground is on each side of that hill. The shelter, which is about sixty feet long, stands on a shelf of ground, considerably elevated above the tents, which seems to have been laid off by nature for the purpose, it being a gradual slope from the foot of the hill, causing the seats to rise gradually one above another from the stand to the uttermost seat. The stand for preaching was large enough to hold eight or ten persons.

There were but six board tents, which were placed with the end towards the shelter, with a narrow pass between; they were arranged at the lowest part of the valley, on the margin of a branch running from the spring, which was quite convenient; and elevated rather above the level of the tents. In addition to the board tents, there were some eight or ten families camped at their wagons, having tents of cloth, etc. The preachers' tent was a small house about fifteen feet square, made of pine logs split in two and covered with boards; we had two bedsteads, and the floor covered with straw furnished room for two beds more; there was no shutter to the door, but a quilt supplied the place. This was the first meeting ever held there, and the friends of the meeting had got it up with much toil and through many discouragements; but nothing could dampen their zeal, they were determined to have a camp-meeting.

The first service was held on Friday night, a sermon being preached by brother Grace, the preacher in charge of Pikeville Mission; we had a lively meeting among the professors of religion the first night; on Saturday, after the eleven o'clock sermon, two penitents came to the altar; at night we had a fine meeting, several mourners at the altar: on Sabbath there was a large congregation, after the sermon at eleven o'clock, the sacrament of the Lords' Supper was administered to a large number of communicants. In the afternoon, brother Bromley, a local preacher, delivered a missionary discourse, and the congregation raised upwards of fifty dollars for missions; Sunday night there were five conversions. The meeting was interesting on Monday; at the close of the day the praying people retired to the grove for prayer, and soon the woods were resounding with the praises of God; for about an hour they continued in the grove, and then came in procession to the stand, singing and rejoicing, the males from one side and the females from the other; when they met in the altar, there was a general burst of shouting and praising God, mingled with the songs of the assembly. It was soon manifest that it would be unadvisable to attempt to preach under the circumstances, we, therefore, called upon the mourners and they crowded the altar on both sides, and the work went on until a late hour; about seven were converted, and some professed perfect love.

The next evening the same thing took place, a powerful work breaking out in the prayer meetings in the woods, especially among the females; many of whom were so overpowered that they had to be assisted to the stand, when they met there the excitement was even more intense than the evening before, and we had no preaching but a continual shouting, exhorting and singing the praise of God.

On Wednesday the meeting was delightful, the preachers preached with power, and at the close of the day the congregation again retired to the woods for prayer, and God met them there. They came in, at the signal for preaching, shouting and rejoicing; it was again found impracticable to preach, and the mourners were called up, without preaching; we had a glorious work; about ten were converted last night, and the excitement continued till midnight.

On Thursday morning we met at the stand for the closing services at eight o'clock; I read a portion of scripture and we sung and prayed, after which I made some remarks and opened the door of the Church, one joined. I then proposed that all the converts of the meeting who felt like giving me a pledge to meet me in heaven should come forward and give me their hand; a large number of interesting young persons then came forward: this produced quite a sensation among the congregation, and many rejoiced. I then requested all who had professed to obtain perfect love at that meeting, and all that had even professed that blessing and felt the evidence that they now enjoyed it should come forward: quite a number came forward, about twenty-five or thirty I suppose. After which I proposed that all who felt like meeting me in heaven, should come forward and give me their hand: all the Christians then came forward, and truly we had a glorious time: it was a parting blessing indeed; I was completely surrounded with happy Christians, male and female, old and young, rejoicing in hope of eternal life. The results of the meeting were thirty-one conversions, thirty-one accessions, and ten professed to obtain the blessing of perfect love. Glory be to God for the results of the Asbury camp-meeting.

The Mount Zion Circuit is in charge of George W. Brown, who has labored successfully among his people—he has had about one hundred conversions, and has raised about eighty dollars for missions.

We have had many revivals on my district, and the missionary collections will be good.

GEORGE SHAEFFER.

ASHVILLE CT., ALABAMA CONFERENCE.—The Lord has been with us and we have had refreshing times. Our camp-meeting at Enon began on Friday the 7th, and closed on Thursday following. Religious exercises were protracted until Sunday night—the result was forty-eight accessions to the Church of God. May God continue to work until all shall be brought to acknowledge that "Christ is Lord to the Glory of God the Father."

Oct. 21, 1854. F. WALKER, P. C.

MACON, MISS.—Just closed the Noxubee camp-meeting. A most interesting and profitable occasion. About twenty-five conversions and as many accessions. Made a speech on Sabbath afternoon for the Advocate. Hope it was successful. Had your good friend bro. Connerly, of the Pickens Ct. with us—he who has obtained SIXTY-THREE subscribers for the New Orleans Advocate, during the present year!! All honor to him for his zeal and success! If all your agents would go and do likewise, what a noble New Orleans paper we could have. His example convicts me for doing no more than I have and incites me to new efforts.

Oct. 15, 1854. T. H. FOSTER.

P. S.—I reopen this to state that we have just closed a most interesting meeting in Macon. The Church was very much revived and refreshed. The work was confined chiefly to the most influential and substantial class of our citizens; men who will do the Church excellent service, in time to come. I have rarely attended a meeting whose results promise so much permanent and extensive benefit in the future. Within a few weeks past we have had about twenty accessions. Though the number seems small, yet in their character and influence the Church has received an accession of strength, such as is rarely found in the same number of new members. Surely God is with us and to him be all the glory.

T. H. F.

RED RIVER CT., LA.—We have had one of the most interesting camp-meetings in my circuit I ever attended. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather and cry of yellow fever, our meeting was well attended by ministers and people. The word was with power—a power that made sinners tremble—mourners found comfort and the Christians rejoiced and the Church built up. Forty-seven conversions with several accessions. To God be all the glory.

Book Notices.

The polite publishers have furnished our table with the following issues of their press, through H. D. MCGINNIS, 36 Camp street. Mr. MCGINNIS has them on sale, and is receiving weekly additions to his assortment For Theological and School Books, his establishment is equalled by none in the city. His store is immediately below the Advocate office.

Lamartine's theory of history seems to be that though a world-drama is being acted, the supe are many, the characters few. Seizing upon these few, and vividly portraying them wherever found, he gives the reader an exhibition of the human race in action, and fixes upon the mind the great events connecting themselves, by cause and effect, by historic association, with those characters. This is any thing but tedious to the reader, and impresses, by its abruptness. The style varies, and the scene is shifted from one quarter of the globe to another. Nelson precedes Heloise, and she Christopher Columbus. Cicero and Cromwell, Homer and Fenelon, pass before us, in lively portriature, by no alphabetical or chronological rule: but by this rule, that a small number of well-selected characters is sufficient to bring all known time in review. These volumne are relishable, and their philosophy more than plausible.

We suppose the salient feature is the Commercial. The answers, in each example, are arranged in tabular form at the end of the volume, which the teacher may seal up or cut out, as he pleases. This will meet the views of those who hate keys, and cyphering made easy.

THE EMIGRANTS; AN ALLEGORY: By Rev. W. COCHRAN, A. M., Auburn, N. Y.; 1854; 12mo, p. 191. W. J. Moses.

By mail the publisher furnishes me this. The leading idea is, that the influence exerted by emigrants, flocking to the American shores, over their countrymen and kindred behind, to induce them to follow, is like that of Christians to gain the wicked over to piety. The execution is sustained with some pleasing novelty, and a kind spirit, very kind—especially to the Methodists.

SOUTHERN METHODIST QUARTERLY.—This is the completing number of Volume VIII. Dr. DOCGETT, before his next four years' term expires, will, by the generous co-operation of the Book Agents, put it along side of the best, in all respects. Let the preachers also co-operate, as they ought, in getting it a circulation. Arrangements have been made not only for enriching its pages with the ablest contributors, but adorning its frontispiece with engravings of distinguished men.

The contents of the October number are marked with variety and ability. Dr. SIMMONS has a capital article on "Tom Paine's Theological Works," elicited by their recent re-publication: also JOSEPHUS, on "Judaism Unveiled." We widely differ from the judgment passed at No. 5 of the "Notices of Recent Publications."

NATIONAL MAGAZINE.—The Editorial sets forth the aspect of Infidelity prevailing in Christendom, the infidelity of the times, and the way to meet it. Its earliest aspect was that of skepticism, as seen in Spinoza and Lord Herbert: metaphysical doubt—good acuto, but respectful; above the level of the common mind, and little felt. Next, intellectual opposition, and contempt of the biblical claims of Christianity. Hobbes, Bolingbroke, Hume and Gibbon represent this period. Subsequently, another aspect is put on—practical and undisguised hostility: the other class of weapons used, satire, ridicule, blasphemy. Voltaire, Rousseau, Tom Paine are examples. In this country, Jefferson was under the influence of the French Encyclopedists; and Franklin even, was tainted. The fact that this form of infidelity had its exemplification in the French Revolution, with its defeat. The world revolted from it. Reaction took place, and infidelity changed its tactics. It is now another thing in appearance, but the same in its evil heart of unbelief. The difference is notable, and should be recognized. Our modern infidelity is full of sentimentalism. It sympathises with progress and freedom, and affects horror at the demorulizntione. It is highly esthetic. Its moral sentimentalism lies its main force. Tears it has, if pressed; and abundance of fine speech about love, and our Heavenly Parent, and Jesus; enough to deceive the "elect" themselves, if not wary. The spirit of the Gospel is eulogised; its dogma rejected. The morality of Christianity is spoken well of; its ecclesiasticism, without which it vanishes into thin air, is denounced. German rationalists and Westminster Reviewers abroad, Theodore Parker, et id omne genus in this country, are the types.

The defence called for, must be mainly moral. Plain and earnest preaching, pure and active lives, spirituality restored, and aggressive work, demonstratively; these are the weapons used against an Infidelity, which is more in the heart than head, more a sentiment than an opinion. Learning has something still to do for Christianity, in developing biblical criticism, and reconciling ethnological and geological science, and affording illustration and analogies in natural theology; but the agencies now in demand open a wider field for individual usefulness. The great standards on Christian evidences have been prepared. On that ground, the battle has been fought and won. The works of Butler, Paley, Fabor, McKnight, Lardner, Leland, Bishop Warburton, Chalmers, and others, can never be superseded, any more than they can be overthrown. Every one should have access to this armory when needful, but especially let him arm himself with the mind that was in Christ. The victory is certain, as its triumphs will be glorious.

PUTNAM, for November: No Engraving this number. MCGINNIS, 36 Camp street, who furnishes it to our table, says it does not sell, and the present supply is the last he shall order.

HARPER, for November—goes off like hot cakes. See Advertisement of Contents. We must be excused for quoting this one from the Editor' Drawer:—A clerical nut-cracker, indulging his penchant, to the oblivion of great, obvious and saving truths is an abomination, and ought to be made a bull:

There was once an itinerant preacher in "West Tennessee," who, possessing considerable natural eloquence, had gradually become possessed of the idea that he was also an extraordinary biblical scholar. Under this delusion, he would very frequently, at the close of his sermons, ask any member of his congregation who might have a "knotty text" to unravel, to announce it, and he would explain it at once, however much it might have troubled "learned and tinguished divines." On one occasion, in a large audience, he was particularly pressing for some one to propound a text, but no one presuming to do so, he was about to sit down without any opportunity of showing "his learning," when a chap "back by the door" announced that he had a Bible matter of great "concern," which he desired to be enlightened upon. The preacher, quite animatedly, professed his willingness and ability, and the congregation was in great excitement. "What I want to know," said the antagonist, "is, whether Job's turkey was a hen or a gobbler?" The "expounder" looked confused, and the congregation tittered, as the questioner capped the climax by exclaiming, in a loud voice, "I fotched him down on the first question!" From that time forward the practice of asking for "difficult passages" was abandoned.

Yes a tale! And our real life a tale that is told. This is told charmingly and with not a few excellent moral points. Dr. Olin once pshawed at the phrase religious novel—might as well, he said, talk of religious groggeries. The characters here are drawn with freshness. The writer, whose name is not given, has depth, strength and tenderness.

A pioneer preacher stands out distinctly, ministering his holy office under the trees shadowing a Western forte—among his bearers ere soldiers, Indians, forte attaches and the here and heroines of the tels. Every one who knew him will recognize MAFFIT as the leading figure in a protracted meeting described. We have not met a critique more just. The temptations of Washington City and the fall looks like "an o'r true tale." Hundreds have been its counterparts. There intemperance winds its folds about the noble hero and crushes him. The closing chapter introduces the reader, without a ticket, into a pretty good love feast; and there among the "experiences" we recognize in the chastened widow--our heroine--a first-rate Methodist!

HARPER'S GAZETTEER: Nos. 4, 5 and 6 are received, bringing it down to MAN. Ten completes it at fifty cents each. It must supersede all others, not only for its recency but for its fullness and accuracy.

HYMENEAL:

MARRIED--On Thursday, 19th of October, by Rev. E. Heern, Rev. WM. K. NORTON, of the Alabama Conference, and Miss MARTHA L. MASON, of Camden, Alabama.

OBITUARY:

DIED.--In Franklin, La., the 15th Oct., of yellow fever, Miss MARY COCKLE, in her 16th year.

God has removed one of the loveliest lambs of our fold to her bright home in Heaven.

Mary, daughter of Ellen C. Wheldee, was from early childhood piously inclined. She did not, however, unite with the Church until she was in her thirteenth year. She was in December two years before she was satisfied as to a change of heart. Last April, during the gracious revival season in Franklin, while at the altar of prayer, she received the blessing of pardon and the witness of her acceptance with God. She was a bright exemplification of Christian humility and filial love. She was highly gifted and cultivated for one of her tender years, and consequently found great employment and amusement with her books and flowers at home, (of which she was passionately fond,) which best suited her disposition. Evidences of her taste and industry remain, to remind those who knew her well, and especially her bereaved parents, that one of Earth's loveliest flowers has been taken away. She was an only child, and the stroke has fallen heavily upon the home circle. God grant that the parents may have grace to improve as well as to bear this sad affliction!

On Sunday morning, the 15th, she sent for the writer, to administer to her The Lord's Supper. We found her and her mother in a heavenly state of mind. In that solemn hour we broke the bread and gave the cup to the stricken mother and her dying child, in presence of her dear father, for the last time on earth. But oh! the triumph of her faith! With affectionately exhorted her father to unite with the Church, to serve God, and to meet her in Heaven, declaring that not a cloud or doubt obscured her sky! At midnight's solemn hour she closed her eyes on earth! aged fifteen years and six days.

"Ye stricken ones, forget your grief—
Your lovely child has God to Heaven,
Where parting words are heard no more,
And Love's bright link is never riven!

She is a flower in paradise—
A jewel on her Saviour's brow!
Your loss is her eternal gain:
Weep not—she is an angel now!"

HAN PARTEE.

DIED, of yellow fever, at the residence of her son, M. P. Blue, in Mongomery, Ala., on the 20th Oct., Mrs. ELIZA POWERS, consort of Neil Blue, in the 59th year of her age. She was a native of Robeson county, N. C., and removed, with her husband, to this city in 1819, where, with the exception of four years spent in Texas, she continued to reside till her death. A devoted husband, eight children, and numerous friends, are left to deplore her loss and imitate her Christian example. She died as she had lived for nearly thirty years, a firm, consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

DIED--In the 25th year of her age, of chronic diarrhœa, at Vicksburg, Miss., on the 19th of Oct., 1854, Mrs. LOUISA MARIA, wife of John W. CRARY. She joined the Church at fourteen. A few days before she left New Orleans, for her mother's residence in Jackson, Miss., (she died on the way,) The Lord's Supper was administered, at her special request. Only herself and the minister communing. In the onp and the bread Jesus manifested himself to her, in such a blessing as she had seldom or never experienced.

At the Fourth Quarterly Conference, for the Red River and Ouachita District, Louisiana Annual Conference, held at Springville Camp Ground, Sept. 23d, 1854, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, it hath pleased the Great Head of the Church, to remove from our midst our much esteemed brother, Rev. JAMES H. SHERMAN, who died on the 30th of August last, therefore be it resolved,

1st. That in his death this Conference has lost a valuable and useful member, and the Church a promising preacher.

2d. That while we lament his sudden, (and to human appearance,) untimely death, we rejoice in the happy assurance, that he has gone from the evils to come.

3d. That the members of this Conference tender their warmest sympathies to his bereaved family and friends.

4th. That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the widow of the deceased, and also to the N. O. Christian Advocate for publication.

DIED--On the 7th of September last, after a pilgrimage of nearly fifty-two years, JANE G. HOOE, wife of James Hood, Sr.

I became acquainted with this excellent woman in the beginning of the present year. She had long been in the communion of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. At my first appointment, in her neighborhood, she was admitted, by letter, a member of the M. E. Church, South.

In her life and conversation, Sister Hood illustrated, most impressively, the excellency of the Gospel. With her, Religion was a living, active principle, displaying its beautiful characteristics, as well at the hearth-stone as in the assemblies of the Saints, as clearly amid the duties of her household, as in the relaxations of social intercourse. Every where her light shone brightly. Every where she maintained the consistency of an humble and devoted disciple of her much loved Lord. She possessed a warm, but gentle spirit. Her soul seemed ever to be trusting and rejoicing in God, her Saviour. Thus she lived. Such a life, must needs secure a peaceful death. Just before her departure, she sung the first stanza of the beautiful hymn of Watt's

"When I can read my title clear,
To mansions in the skies,
I'll bid farewell to every fear,
And wipe my weeping eyes."

MISS ANN ELIZA THREDGILL was born 31st March, 1838, in N. Carolina, Anson county; joined the M. E. Church in 1847, and lived an humble, consistent Christian; and though called upon, in the morning of life, to pass through the Valley of the Shadow of Death, she feared no evil. She was sick but a short time. She left a bright evidence that she was going to rest. When her mother told her she could not give her up; "Why not, mother; you should be willing to let me go to Heaven." And then calling her little brothers, she told them to meet her in Heaven. She then begged her Uncle, who was her physician, to meet her in Heaven, and raising her arms caught him around the neck, and said, when I get to Heaven I shall see all my friends, and O! how happy I will be. And then turning to her father, said, you must meet me in Heaven. And the last words she said, were "Jesus, my all, to Heaven is gone." If I were to state all the words that fell from her lips, it would make the notice too long. This young and interesting lady died in midsummer, the time was not given, in Marengo county, Ala., at her father's residence, Samuel Threadgill.

[The S. C. Advocate will please copy.]

Departed this life, August 7th, 1854, at half-past eight o'clock, P. M., at her father's residence, in Carroll county, Miss., APPHIA ADELAIDE GEREN.

The deceased was born on the 25th of Sept., 1831, in the State of North Carolina, and removed with her parents to Mississippi in 1835; was converted and joined the Church in the fall of 1848, at a camp-meeting, at Bluff Spring, and has ever since lived a consistent Christian.

Her health had been delicate from a child, and in her last attack she was confined to her bed twenty long weeks, suffering the most excruciating pains, but there never was a murmur escaped her lips. Sometimes, after a paroxysm of extreme suffering, when she would be comparatively easy her friends would attempt to sympathize with her, but her answer invariably was, "It is all right or the Lord would not permit it."

She seemed to have a presentiment of her death even before her last sickness, and would speak of dying as though she knew how near she was to death, and from her first attack she expressed the belief that she would not recover. I visited her several times during her sickness, and always found her resigned to the will of God. She would rather depart and be with Christ, but willing to suffer all the will of the Lord.

She directed her friends how to dispose of all her things, and gave the most minute directions about her burial. She expressed a desire that I should preach her funeral sermon, selected the text (Rev. 7th chap. 14th verse) herself, exhorted her brothers and sisters to meet her in heaven, and begged her aged parents not to grieve for her: she was only going to glory before to await their arrival. Conscious that she had performed her last duty on earth, she had one request to make of her Heavenly Father, which was that she might die rational and easy, and she desired us to pray that it might be granted; the Lord in mercy granted her the desired blessing.

The morning she died her mind had been wandering, but as death approached her reason returned, and in a sweet but low tone of voice she said, Glory, Glory, Glory, and breathed her last without a departing struggle or groan.

Death seems to love a shining mark, nor did he miss his object in the now sainted ADELAIDE: raised in the lap of wealth and luxury, almost idolized by a large family, of whom she was the youngest, amiable, intelligent, accomplished and deeply pious, she was every thing devoted friends could wish; not an enemy in the world; known only to be loved. Nor should we repine. Too pure for earth she is transplanted to a more congenial clime to bloom in immortal youth.

Her funeral sermon was preached over her remains in her father's house to a large audience of sorrowing relatives and friends, who followed her to her last resting place, where Jesus

"Looks down and watches all her dust,
'Till he shall bid it rise."

JAMES WALTON.

JULIA A., daughter of John D. and Dorothy King, was born in Hinds county, Miss., 1833. About four years ago she was brought to repentance at Pearl River camp-ground. She testified to all her friends that God for Christ's sake had pardoned all her sins. In her example, she said to all, she had been with Jesus. Who that hath known her, but that loves her? How loved while living, how lamented now dead!

We copy a few lines which she wrote a few days before her illness: "For several days previous to the last five, I have felt a depression of spirits. Felt as though my faith was flagging--growing weak—but since I have been buoyed up by conversation and advice from kind friends. To-day I have felt happier than I have in a long time. I have been more cheerful, patient and forbearing. Oh that I had more faith—more religion, then I could withstand all temptations."

The week before taken sick she went with us to a protracted meeting. She was very happy. From her loved Sabbath School she went home sick. Ah me, how much she suffered! Kind friends did what they could to help and soothe. Midnight watchers sat around her bed of affliction until it became the bed of death!

She said, to her sister, "Angelite, prepare and meet me in heaven. Treat our aged parents well. I had anticipated some pleasure in this life; but if I die I shall go straight to heaven, and there are pleasures for evermore. Praise the Lord—praise the Lord, oh my soul."

As she lived a life of love, so she died a death of peace. At two hours past midnight, on the 25th of September, her pure spirit went from earth to the bosom of God in Heaven.

GEORGE W. STEWART.

DIED--Very suddenly in Linden, Alabama, on the 17th of October, WINFIELD SAVAGE, aged three years six month and fifteen days, the son of P. A. and Emily Savage. As we stood by the open grave of the lovely child, among the dead, we remembered that five others of the same family had already been buried, so that almost a family of children are in heaven. What thoughts mingle on an occasion like this! The sad home: the darkness of the grave: the undisturbed solemnity of the tomb: the disconsolate hearts of father and mother, and the tearful eye of children still surviving, throws over the occasion that which is sad. O how it broake the heart to see those roses droop and die that God has animated with intelligence as well as loveliness. Yet let us look at life and death in another light. After being separated for many long, long years—the embrace of parents and children—to die no more--all come up in the experience of the Christian, when he deposits in the cemetry the loved ones to sleep till resurrection morn.

The grave is a sad place, but how bright will be the resurrection! Let the parents enjoy the hope of the Christian while they live, that they may glory in Jesus and the resurrection when they die.

How sweet it is to think
That while we sojourn here,
In the embraces of our God
Our children are secure.

We learn from the Bayou Sarn Ledger of the 28th inst. an affray occurred a few days ago at Barker's Settlement, between Mr. Wm Ratliff and a Mr. Wilson, in which the latter was shot dead. The difficulty was in relation to a negro.

The Opelousas Courier of the 28th ult., states that an awful murder had been committed near Bayou Constableau, St. Landry Parish, on or about the 10th of October,

The body of a man unnamed Maxwell Zenoe, alias Max Laplante, was found floating in the Bayou with his throat cut, and an incised wound in the right breast. Suspicion had attached to a man named Joseph Escoubles, and one Mrs Antoine and her daughter Eleonore, and they had been arrested.

The following is extracted from a letter to the Courier, from a French correspondent, who went from the Parish of Lafayette:

Most all the planters in this parish are picking up their cotton; for never such fine weather has been seen for long; the cotton is of the finest quality; the cotton worms have been seen on several plantations.

I was positively informed the other day, that the contract for the construction of that part of the Opelousas Railroad lying between Washington and Brashwick's Bay, was taken by Mr. Bakers of St Mary and Mr. Cade of Lafayette. It appears that after several propositions from both sides, after conference, communications and deliberations, these gentlemen have taken the so desired contract. I am very glad for the country.

YELLOW FEVER IN FRANKLIN.—The Franklin Banner says that it is a difficult matter to arrive at any very satisfactory conclusion respecting the sickness with which Franklin has been visited for the last two three weeks. Nobody now doubts, says the same paper that the yellow fever is among us, for its symptoms are too apparent.

The Banner gives the following list of those who have died since the appearance of the fever in said town: Smith, son of Capt. Cheney Johnson; Ell, son of Solomon Levy; Harriet, daughter, of Solomon Levy; Peyton R. Pane, Mrs. Green, Miss Eliza Fraser, Miss Cockle, Edward J. Benson, Mrs. Castignle, Neville Castagnle, Donbelser; Porter, son of Dr Lyman; a German.

George S. Houghton, of East Baton Rouge, convicted of keeping a gaming house, was sentenced to pay a fine of $10 and costs, to suffer four months imprisonment at hard labor in the House of Correction, and to give sureties in $200 not to violate the statute of 1843, chapter 318, for three years to come.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S PARTY.—The following, from the Montreal Herald of the 21st, is all that was known in regard to the matter at that time in Montreal. It is but little more satisfactory than that we have already received by telegraph, but we publish it as a matter to which extraordinary interest attaches:

In our extra of yesterday evening, we informed the public that a rumor was current in town that the remains of Sir John Franklin and of his crew and their ship had been discovered.

We immediately dispatched a special messenger to the Hudson Bay Company's House at Lachine, and through the kindness of the Governor, Sir George Simpson, are enabled to lay before our readers the following outlines of a dispatch received by him yesterday from Dr. Rae.

Dr. Rae has been absent on the coast since the first of the month of June, 1853, and returned to York Factory on the 28th of August last, from whence he forwarded letters, by express, to Sir George Simpson, via the Red River settlement.

After his by noticing the result of his own expedition, and the difficulties with which they had to contend, he proceeds to state that from Esquimaux he had obtained certain information of the fate of Sir John Franklin's expedition, who had been starved to death, after the loss of their ships, which were crushed in the ice, and while making their way South to the Great Fish River of Back, near the outlet of which a party of whites died, leaving accounts of their sufferings in the mutilated corpses of some, which had evidently furnished food for their unfortunate companions.

The information, although not derived from the Esquimaux, who had communicated with the whites, and who found their remains, but from another band who obtained the details who were, may yet be relied on. No doubt is left of the truth of the report, as the natives had in possession articles of European manufacture, which had been in possession of the whites. Among these are seven silver spoons, forks, etc., on one of which is engraved sir John Franklin, K. C. B., while the others have crests and initials on them which identify the owners as having belonged to the ill-fated expedition. Drawings of some of these have been sent down.

This fearful tragedy must have occurred as long ago as the spring of 1850.

An abstract of the report of the English Emigration Commissioners shows that the average emigration from Great Britain for the last seven years has been 303,083 annually, or 2,121,231; while for the previous thirty-two years it amounted to only 1,072,224. There has been a decrease in emigration to this country during the past two years, but there has been an increase in that to the British North American provinces, owing, perhaps, to the fact that the price of passage to the latter is at all times somewhat less than to the former. The emigrants to the provinces usually at first make their way to the United States, especially those of the laboring class, which of course is by far the most numerous; but many of them retrace their steps and eventually become permanent settlers in Canada, the upper province generally having the preference over the lower on account of the large admixture of native Canadian French in the latter, and for other reasons of a more substantial nature. The report also gives the ascertained amount of money remitted from North America to Great Britain by emigrants. From 1848 to 1853 these remittances reached the enormous sum of £3,710,000, or nearly $20,000,000; and this is only the amount sent through the principal banking and mercantile houses, leaving entirely out of its account the equally enormous sum transmitted by private channels.

THE HONEST DESERTER.—Frederick of Prussia, visiting one night some outposts of his camp, saw a soldier passing the sentry. His Majesty stopped him, and asked him where he was going. "To be candid, sire," said the soldier, "your Majesty has been so unfortunate in your enterprises, that I have concluded to desert." "Indeed," said the King, "stay here eight days longer, and if in that time fortune does not smile upon us, I will desert with you."

New Orleans Mails.

The interests of a great city are many and complicated, acting and acted upon by a thousand remote causes, of which some may be anticipated and provided against, while others lie beyond all foresight. Of those common and regular matters which can be properly regulated by proper care and suitable arrangements, it is to be doubted whether any one is more beneficial, if duly attended to, or more universally annoying, when overlooked, than the mail service. In years past, when a city's trade was almost entirely confined within its own limits, and commerce had just begun to exist; when post-coaches were for railroads, and express riders, in the place of telegraph lines, regularity of communication was as little thought of as rapidity. But now, when trade has extended itself in every direction, and the business of one place is dependant upon that of a thousand others; when the timely news of a moment may ensure a fortune, and its deprivation lose one; when the ocean is ploughed by steamships, and distant places are joined to one another by railways, it is in every respect important that the communication should be open and regular.

It was for the furtherance of this very end, and not with a view to increased revenues, that Government originally took charge of Post-offices and post transportation. It entered into a tacit contract with the public to convey to and from different places, with regularity and dispatch, all specified mail matters upon the payment of specified prices. This contract has never yet been fully lived up to. There have been failures in every respect and under every Administration, to a greater or less degree. Under no Administration, however, have the affairs of the Post-office Department been so wretchedly mismanaged as under the present. There were always reasons and excuses for irregularity heretofore, on account of the length of the service and the impediments to be contended against. The length of the post routes has been increased, to be sure, under each succeeding Administration, but the facilities for transportation have increased in more than a commensurate ratio. Communication between New York and San Francisco is now easier than it was twenty years ago between New York and Cincinnati, and mails can go, to-day, carried between New York and New Orleans with the same regularity as between Boston and Baltimore. There is a continuous line of railroad from New York to Montgomery, and a regular steamboat line between Mobile and this city. Six days are amply sufficient for any number of mail bags to go through.

The peculiar necessity of a regular mail conveyance to this city need not be dwelt on at length. New Orleans is the largest exporting city on this continent. Its trade is peculiarly foreign and its interests are affected, one way or another, by every steamship arrival at New York. Our merchants are in constant correspondence with the merchants of Liverpool, Havre and New York. Their purchases and sales and shipments depend upon the advices they receive. In fact no city is more in need of regular and punctual mail carriage than our own. In the face of all this it has to be recorded that no city in the country is so little cared for by the Post-office Department and so badly served. For weeks at a time no mail arrives according to the schedule, and at periods there are three, four and six back mails due. The telegraph affords an uncertain and less reliable equivalent. Its advantages are more confined and less complete, and, very frequently, it is out of order.

The blame for such a state of things certainly lies somewhere, and one has traced to no other quarter than that of the Post-office Department. Occasional irregularities, arising from unforeseen and inevitable causes--the bursting of an engine, an avalanche or a freshet--though exceedingly annoying, are excusable. We can find no such mitigating circumstances in the present case. We have not had a New York mail as soon as due for the past ten days, and from the statement made by Mr. Caldwell, President of the South Carolina Railroad Company, do not see any reason to suppose we shall have one from beyond Charleston for the ensuing week.

It seems that in 1851 the Company contracted to carry the Great Northern and Southern Mail to and from Charleston and Augusta, their contract containing the following clause:

"It is hereby stipulated and agreed by the said contractors and their securities, that the Postmaster General may increase the service or change the schedule, by allowing a pro rata increase of compensation within the restriction imposed by law for the additional service required. But the contractors may, in case of increased service or change of schedule, relinquish the contract, on timely notice, if they prefer it to the change; also, the Postmaster General may discontinue or curtail the service, he allowing one month's extra pay for the amount dispensed with."

Under this contract the mail was transported until the early part of the present year, when the route of the mail was changed. A change of service thus became necessary on the route, and there was an agreement between the Company and an agent of the Post-office Department as to the compensation, which proved satisfactory.

In June last, difficulties began to grow up between the Company and the Department, from a demand of the Department that the road should change their day service into night service. This led to a conference between the President of the Railroad and the Post-master General, in which the latter was informed that the proposed change would entail on the Company an additional expenditure of $52,000 per annum; but that if they were paid $300 per mile, the "same rate paid to the companies between Washington and Wilmington," they would perform the proposed service. In this change of time the Company has steadily refused to acquiesce.

Unwilling on their part to comply with the demand for a change of schedule, without what they assert, to be a fair equivalent in the way of increased compensation; and unable to obtain this from the Department, the Company gave notice of their intention to discontinue the transportation of the mails under a clause to that effect in their original contract; and afterwards resolved upon the extreme measure of refusing themselves to carry the mail after the 1st inst., or of even permitting it to be carried on their cars after that date.

Thus it is that the interests of our city are subjected to the folly and ill-judged economy of an incompetent official. Can no remedy be found? [Crescent.

The Columbus (Miss.) Democrat of a late date states that the gin house belonging to Mrs. Swoop, of that place, was recently burnt, with twenty-five bales of cotton and seven negro fellows, and the eighth negro so badly burnt that he was not expected to live; caused by the dropping of the lantern in the lint room when packing cotton.

Very ingeniously contrived counterfeit quarter eagles are in circulation in New York. They are said to be made from a genuine New Orleans Mint die, stole some years since, and bear "O" under the talons of the eagle. John Terry, Assayer, at New York, has analyzed the coin, and finds that it is made of a casting of pure gold, filled with silver, and probably platina, to increase the weight. The weight is 66 5-10 grains, which is only four lights and the casting of gold weighs 30 1-10 grains. It is therefore worth $1 17 in gold, and 8 cents in silver, or 4 25-10 raw material, besides the labor of making. The maker and vendor could not, therefore, realize more than $1 each, which would seem too small a profit, except that the counterfeit is so well done that there is but little risk of detection.

The Montreal Herald of the 22d contains the following letter from Dr. Rae, which will be found extremely interesting, and confirms the full particulars of the information obtained by him in relation to the fate of Sir John Franklin's party. Dr. Rae has been engaged in expeditions of discovery in the Arctic regions since 1840, principally with a view of obtaining information upon this subject:

We are indebted to Sir George Simpson, Governor of the Hudson's Bay Territory, for the privilege of first publishing to the world the at length ascertained fate of the noble, but ill-starred Sir John Franklin and his gallant company. Alas! that that fate should have been so sad, and that the problem which has so long occupied the thoughts and engaged the energies of the great navigator's countless friends and admirers in Europe and America, should be solved by so painful, so distressing a narrative as is contained in the following letter, which was forwarded from York Factory, via Red River. Our own hopes of Sir John Franklin's restoration to the world had long ceased; but who could have been prepared for the fearful reality--a miserable and lingering death, from literal starvation--possibly, as Dr. Rae conjectures, worse than starvation--on the frozen and desolate shores of the Arctic Ocean. But we will not detain the reader by any reflections of ours, from the perusal of Dr. Rae's intensely interesting narrative. York Factory is situated at the mouth of Hayes River, in Hudson's Bay, in about 56 N. lat.

DR. RAE'S LETTER TO SIR GEORGE SIMPSON.

YORK FACTORY, August 4, 1854.

My Dear Sir George—Your several letters, public and private, of dates 16th June and 1st December, 1853, and 13th and 16th June, 1854, were handed me on the 28th ult., on my reaching Churchill, and I was rejoiced to learn that your health had benefited so much by your visit to the North.

Let me now allude to the expedition's affairs. I arrived here on the 31st ult., with my small party, in excellent health, but I am sorry to say without having effected our object. At the above time, information has been obtained and articles purchased from the natives which place the fate of a portion if not all, the then survivors of Sir John Franklin's miserable party beyond a doubt—a fate the most deplorable—death from starvation, after having had recourse to cannibalism as a means of prolonging life.

I reached my old quarters at Repulse Bay, on the 15th of August, and preparations were immediately commenced for wintering. On the 1st September I exchanged to the main pack ice, the stock of provisions we had on hand, (not more than three months' rations,) and the prospects we had of getting more, etc., etc., pointing out all the danger and difficulty of our position. All readily volunteered to remain, and our exertions to collect food and fuel went on with unabated energy. By the end of September, 109 deer, 1 musk ox, 52 brace of ptarmigan and 1 seal had been shot, and the nets produced 100 salmon.

Of the larger animals eleven outmigrated, 45 deer and the musk ox were shot by myself; 40 deer by Mistegun (the hunter); 44 by one of the men, 9 by Gullybunk, and 16 by the other four men. The migration of the deer terminated about the middle of October, and 25 more animals were added to the stock.

On the 25th of October, the snow being sufficiently hard to commence building, we were happy to exchange our cold tents for the more comfortable shelter of the snow-house. The winter was very severe, but the temperature is not considered much warmer now as in his winter quarters of 1846-47. Up to the 12th of January we had set nets under the ice in the lakes; the nets were taken up on that date, as they procured nothing.

On the 31st of March my spring journey commenced, but in consequence of gales of wind, deep and soft snow and foggy weather, we made but very little progress. We did not enter Felly Bay until the 17th. At this place we met with Esquimaux, one of whom, on being asked if he ever saw white people, replied in the negative, but said that a large party (at least forty persons) had perished for want of food about ten or twelve days' journey to the westward. The substance of the information obtained at various times and from various sources, was as follows:

In the spring four winters past (spring 1850,) a party of white men, amounting to about forty, were seen travelling southward over the ice, and dragging boats with them by Esquimaux who were killing seals on the north shore of King William's Land, which is a large island named Kelokt-ak by the Esquimaux. None of the party could speak the native tongue intelligibly, but by signs the natives were made to understand that their ships or ship had been crushed by ice, and that the "whites" were now going to where they expected to find deer to shoot. From the appearance of the men, all of whom, except one officer, (chief,) looked thin, they were then supposed to be getting short of provisions, and they purchased a small seal from the natives.

At a later date in the same season, but previous to the disruption of the ice, the bodies of about thirty white persons were discovered on the continent, and five on an island near it, about a long day's journey (say thirty-five to forty miles) to the north-west of a large stream, which can be no other than Back's Great Fish River, (named by the Esquimaux Out-koo-hi-ca-lik, as its description and that of the low shore in the neighborhood of Point Ogle and Montreal Island agree exactly with that of Sir Geo. Back.) Some of the bodies had been buried (probably those of the first victims of famine,) some were in a tent or tents, others under a boat had been turned over to form a shelter, and several lay scattered about in different directions. Of those found on the island, one was supposed to have been an officer, as he had a telescope strapped over his shoulder, and his double-barreled gun lay underneath him.

From the mutilated state of many of the corpses and the contents of the kettles, it is evident that our miserable countrymen had been driven to the last resource—cannibalism—as a means of prolonging life.

There appears to have been an abundant stock of ammunition, as the powder was emptied in a heap on the ground, by the natives, out of the kegs or cases containing it, and a quantity of ball and shot was found below high water mark, having been left on the ice close to the beach. There must have been a number of watches, telescopes, compasses, guns, (several double-barreled,) etc., all of which appear to have been broken up, as I saw pieces of three different articles with the Esquimaux, and, together with some silver spoons and forks, purchased as many as I could obtain. A list of the most important of these I enclose, with a rough pen-and-ink sketch of the crests and initials on the forks and spoons. The articles themselves shall be handed over to the Secretary of the Hon. H. B. & Co., on my arrival in London.

None of the Esquimaux with whom I conversed had seen the "whites," nor had they ever been at the place where the dead were found, but had their information from those who had been there, and those who had seen the party when alive.

From the head of Felly Bay—which is a bay, in spite of Sir H. Beaufort's opinion to the contrary—I crossed sixty miles of land in a westerly direction, traced the west shore from Castor and Pollux River to Cape Hart r of Sir. James Ross, and I could have got within thirty or forty miles of Bellot Strait, but I thought it useless proceeding further, as I could not complete the work.

Never in any former Arctic journeys had I met with such an accumulation of obstacles. Fogs, storms, rough ice and deep snow we had to fight against. On one occasion we were four and a half days unable to get a glimpse of the sun, or even to make out his position in the heavens. This, on a level coast, where the compass was of little or no use, was perplexing in the extreme.

The weather was much finer on our return journey than when outward bound, and our loads being lighter, our day's marches were nearly double the distance, and we arrived at Repulse Bay on the 26th of May, without accident, except in one instance, in which one of the party lost a toe from frost bite.

The commencement of spring was very fine, but June and July were colder. We were unable to get out of the bay until the 6th of August.

Our progress along the coast as far as Cape Fullerton was much impeded by ice; but on getting to the southward of the cape we had clear water, and saw no ice afterwards.

The conduct of the men, I am happy to say, was, generally speaking, good; and we had not a single case of sickness all the time of our absence.

Being anxious to send this to Red River by the first boats, I write in haste and, briefly, but shall have the pleasure of sending a more detailed account by some further opportunity.

With the utmost respect, I have the honor to be your very obedient servant,

JOHN RAE.

List enclosed in Dr. Rae's Letter:

How Russia First Got the Crimea.

Chamber's Repository contains an account which will be interesting at the present time, of the means by which Russia became possessed of the portion of territory which the English and French forces are now trying to wrest from her. It forms part of a biographical sketch of the famous

"——duyaroff or anglic, Suwarrow,
Who loved blood as an alderman loves marrow."

Catherine had huddled up a peace with the Sultan in 1774, partly on account of the Pugatchiev danger, and partly because of the insulting tone of the British Cabinet; but no sooner was England involved in a war with the United States of America, and France preparing to strike in with the revolted colonists than the Empress, true to the traditional policy of St Petersburg, forthwith commenced, while yet the ink was wet with which she had subscribed a covenant of "perpetual peace" with Turkey, active provocations for a renewal of the war by offensive demonstrations in the Crimea, on the Kuban northward of the Caucasian-Cordillera, and on the shores of the Black Sea. In 1776, Suwarrow, fully possessed of the designs of the Czarina, left St. Petersburgh for Cherson, the most southern point of the Russian frontier toward Turkey; and without even a decent pretence for hostilities, at once attacked Dulut Ghiray, Khan of the Crimea; drove him off to seek such redress as Constantinople might afford, and set Schaim Ghirny, a kinsman of the deposed Khan, and the supple tool of Russia, in his stead. Gen. Suwarrow next proceeded to erect forts on the Kuban, and provoke hostilities with the "banditti of Circassia," but with such ill fortune that he abandoned the task to Major-General Kayser, and busied himself with "the delicate mission," a much easier one at all events, than a guerilla warfare with the Tcherkessi, of removing some 20,000 Armenian families from the Crimea to the districts of Catherinerlof, in Russia, where they would be more manageable than in their own country. Nearly a third of these unfortunates perished by the way of fatigue and privation, and hundreds threw themselves, in despair, under the hoofs of the Cossacks's horses, as their elders, in obedience to Suwerrow's orders, pricked them on with their spears, as if goading cattle to market or to pasture.

The Sublime Porte loudly remonstrated against these proceedings of the Russian general, and even went so far as to parade a numerous fleet on the Black Sea, but the deplorable war with America and her European allies, precluding the minister of Lord North from affording the Sultan more than "moral" help, the Capudan Pacha returned with his fleet to Constantinople, after receiving a contemptuous note from Suwarrow, in reply to his demand for an "explanation" of the Russian doings in the Crimea and the appearance of "Russian corsairs" in the Black Sea, to the effect that the legitimate khan of the Tartars, Schaim Ghiray, had been pleased to call in the aid of his august ally, the Empress of all the Russias, which had enabled him to dispense with the assistance of the Sultan: and that with regard to the scandalous epithet of "corsairs" applied by Capudan Pacha to her Imperial Majesty's ships, that was a grave offence which must be answered for hereafter. The Sultan was at length induced to acknowledge Schaim Ghirey as the rightful khan; and that point gained, comparative tranquility prevailed till 1782, when the Tartar tragi-comic farce was played out. Large bodies of Russian troops having been quietly drawn together, and judiciously posted, the Prince Potemkin issued a proclamation setting forth that Schaim Ghiray had solemnly abdicated his khanship entirely of his own free will, in favor of the Empress of Russia, to whom therefore Nogay Tartars were bound, and required immediately to swear allegiance. To facilitate the due performance of this solemnity—at which Suwarrow and his soldiers were of course to assist—a grand feast was provided in the open air for the Nogey chiefs and their dependents; where, after they had devoured 100 oxen and 800 sheep, with 35,000 pints of sage-brandy, the oath was administered to them collectively; and Suwarrow immediately dispatched a special courier to inform Prince Potemkin of the completion of that "act of faith and homage," by the misdoubted Tartars.

Doubts, however, were not long in suggesting themselves to the mind of Gen Suwarrow as to the degree of binding force which an oath, however solemn in itself, or impressively administered, could be expected to have upon the consciences of men who, when grieved in discover, were entirely destitute of religious reverence;" the result of which was an understanding between him and the Prince Potemkin, that all the tribes of Nogay Tartars should be gradually removed to the wilds of Ural, and that in the meanwhile there should be as opportunity offered, as quietly as possible, and under plausible pretexts, disarmed. This scheme went on prosperously for some time: but at last a large body of Nogays, on their way to the Ural steppes, suddenly refused to remove farther in that direction, overpowered and broke away from the escort, and fled for shelter to the southwest bank of the Kuban, in the plains of Caucasia. Suwarrow pursued them thither, with the determination of taking signal vengeance upon the "oath-breaking infidels"—a promise which he thoroughly redeemed. By daybreak on the morning of September 11, 1783, a large encampment of Nogays was discovered—whether the precise delinquents he was in quest of, the general did not stop to inquire—and presently the Russian squadrons burst upon the surprised and defenceless tribe, and "the massacre," we read, "continued till noon," till, in fact, there were none left to slay, all, men, women and children, having been destroyed by Suwarrow's express orders, "they being Godless heathens, who did not respect their oaths!" This terrible example, if we may believe the Russian historians, produced the desired effect; and the enforced migration of the Nogays encountered no further opposition. Catherine soon afterward sent the successful General the Grand Cross of the Equestrian Order of St. Wolodimir, "as a public testimony of our approbation of the zeal and activity you have displayed in our service, and particularly in the commission you have borne under the direction of our General, Prince Potemkin, for the re-union of the various nations of the Russian Empire." Suwarrow returned to St. Petersburg in 1785, having thoroughly "pacified" the Nogay Tartars, one of whose chiefs, Mursa Bey—a great eater, who drank pure sage brandy with his meals, and was always carried by his servants to bed—the Russian General regarded with great attachment and esteem, and took leave of with many expressions of affectionate regret.

A FRESH WATER SEA SERPENT.—In the Dunkirk Journal we find the following account of a monster recently seen in the waters of Lake Erie: A movement in the waters of our bay one day last week created quite an excitement for the time being among those who witnessed it. We are told by an eye-witness that a monster of serpentine form, from thirty to forty feet in length was distinctly seen to move about in the water with an agility equal to that of the most expert of the finny tribe. We are also told that several of our fishermen have long been impressed with the idea, from actual observation of the existence of some imaginary monster in the waters of the lake. On one occasion, at a distance of only about ten rods, his snakeship was seen exhibiting a length of over fifty feet, and a body of more than a foot through. They represent the unknown as capable of great rapidity of movement under water, having on more than one occasion suddenly disappeared, and in almost incredibly short time risen to the surface of the water from a quarter to half a mile distant. We understand Barnum, has been consulted, and offers a reward of ten dollars a foot in length over ten feet for its capture, dead or alive.

PRICES ADVANCED.—The proprietors of the Chicago newspapers held a meeting last week, and advanced their advertising rates twenty per cent. Their rates are now ten dollar per square for the first insertion

The printers in Mobile have raised the price of composition from forty to forty-five cents per thousand

REVIEW OF THE MARKETS

Saturday Morning, November 4, 1854.

We have yet but little animation in our general market to report, the supplies of Western Produce during the past week being still very limited, owing to the continued low stage of the upper rivers. The demand for Cotton falls considerably short of the receipts, and the stock of that staple is accumulating, notwithstanding the recent decline in freights. Prices too have slightly fallen off although the last accounts from Europe were more favorable. Sugar has been in pretty good demand, at steady prices. In Molasses, a larger business has been done, but at still lower rates. Flour has improved, and Corn, of which the receipts have been trifling, has largely advanced. Provisions have generally been dull. The Pacific's accounts, embracing dates from Liverpool to the 18th of October, were received at noon on Monday. They reported that the demand for Cotton had been good since the departure of the Niagara, and the sales of the three days embraced 32,000 bales. The market had been firm, and in some of the transactions a slight advance in prices had been realized. The market for Breadstuffs had been excited, and, most descriptions higher. Flour had advanced 3c per bbl, and Wheat 6@9d ₩ 70 ℔ since the preceding Friday. Provisions were unchanged in prices. The weather had been bleak and unfavorable.

The Money market at London had been stringent, and Consols had declined 94¼@94. Trade in the manufacturing districts had slightly improved.

The Pacific brought advices of the failure of Messrs. Perris & Wright, and five other houses in Dublin. It was believed, however, that these suspensions would be temporary in most of the cases.

The accounts by the Arabia, which are three days later than those by the Pacific, will be found in our telegraphic columns.

COTTON—The Cotton market opened on Saturday last with a rather quiet appearance, and the transactions of the day were limited to about 2500 bales. On Monday, however, with some concessions on the part of factors, and with the Pacific's advices in the evening papers buyers came forward pretty freely and took 6500 bales, prices for the lower and middling qualities being easier. The demand was fair on Tuesday, and on that day and the following together about 7000 bales were sold without any further change of moment in the rates. Thursday's sales embraced some 3000 bales, at irregular prices, but yesterday the demand was unusually active, and about 10,000 bales were taken, making an aggregate for the entire week of 29,000 bales, the market closing at the range of our quotations as follow:

Foreign News by the Washington.

The principal feature of the Washington's news, as also of the later accounts by the Niagara and Pacific, have been already received here by telegraph. We publish the full particulars of the battle of the Alma, as given by correspondents of the London Times. The accounts will be found highly interesting:

BATTLE OF THE ALMA, Sept. 20.

Last night orders were given by Lord Raglan that the provisions and extra boats at Old Fort, now that all were aboard or must be sent on board the ships of the fleet. Our advance had been determined upon, and it was understood that the Russian light cavalry had been sweeping the country of all cattle up to a short distance of our lines and carrying them off to the north. Accordingly, at 5 o'clock, the morning dawn the signal was given by the rocket, and all the 30,000 sleeping on the late active day. The boats from the ships lying the south to receive the water. The commissariat officers struggled in vain with the very deficient means at their disposal to meet the enormous requirements of an army of 30,000 men for the transport of baggage, ammunition and food, and I notice which to an unpractised eye would seem one of utter confusion, began and continued for several hours to proceed only by the readiness and order of the regiments as they paraded previous to marching.

The French in advance on our right, were up bellimet, and the whole force of the allied armies, extending for miles along the heights and ravines with the lights of the ships, was anticipated the coming fight. Marshal St. Arnaud, the commander-in-chief, Prince Napoleon, commanding the first division, Canrobert, Forey, and Prince Napoleon. Our order of march was about four miles to the right of their left wing, and as many behind them. The right of the allied forces was covered by the fleet, which notwithstanding were the shoals and reefs, darkening the shallow waters with the columns of smoke ready to shell the enemy should they threaten to attack our right, and commanding the land for nearly, two miles from the shore.

It was 6 o'clock in the morning ere the whole of our army was prepared for marching. The day was warm, and the movement was delayed by the wretched transport system for the baggage—an evil which will, I fear, be severely felt in every protracted operation. Every thing and absolutely indispensable was sent on board ship. The naval officers and the sailors worked indefatigably, and cleared the beach as fast as the men deposited the baggage and tents there. At last the men fell in, and the march of the campaign began. The country between the position we occupied and the sea was undulating, partly destitute of tree or shrub, and consisted of wide plains, marked at intervals of two or three miles with hollows, and long irregular ridges of hills running down towards the sea at right angles to the beach. It is but little cultivated, except in the patches of land around the scattered villages built in the higher recesses of the valleys. Hares were started in abundance, and afforded great sport to the men. Grander they bolted, and several were thereby knocked over by the shot of the fleet. All cattle and sheep, of course, had been driven off by the Cossacks. The soil is hard and elastic, and was in excellent order for artillery.

Before we had an hour's fair start three or four miles, during which Lord Raglan, accompanied by a very large staff, headed by Marshal St. Arnaud, Generals Bosquet, Forey, and a number of French officers, rode along the front of the columns, which, as they passed, took up from the ground, rushed forward, and column after column rent the air with those thundering English cheers. It was a good omen. As the Marshal passed the 55th regiment, he exclaimed "English, I hope you will fight well to-day!"

"Oui!" returned a voice from the ranks; "sare you know we will."

The troops presented a splendid appearance. The effect of these grand masses of soldiery descending the hills, rank after rank, with the sun flashing over forests of glittering steel, can never be forgotten by those who witnessed it. Onward the torrent of warriors, wave after wave, huge stately billows of armed men, while the rumble of the artillery and tramp of the cavalry accompanied their progress. At last, the smoke of the burning villages and farm houses announced that the enemy were in sight, and shortly after the glitter of the bayonets and helmets of the dense masses of infantry could be seen right and left of the white walls of the houses blackened with smoke, the flames ascending through the roofs of deserted habitations, and the ruined outlines of deserted homes. Many such were fell out and were carried to the rear. It was a painful sight—a sad contrast to the magnificent appearance of the army in front, to behold litter after litter conveying to the rear the poor sufferers who had dropped from thirst and fatigue.

Presently, from the top of a hill, a wide plain was visible, beyond which rose ridge darkened here and there by clumps which the practiced eye recognized as cavalry. It was our first view of the enemy. On the left of the plain, up in a flame kindled by the lurid sweep of two ridges, lay a large village in flames; right before us was a road with Turkish cavalry, mounted Cossacks, Russian Pachs, moved slowly by the road-side; and in front came the division of the French Imperial Guard.

was, in its inception and design a benevolent institution—and it has justly denominated, "a noble charity." nerated Francis Asbury, who well ed the character of "a benefactor of od," was, no doubt, the father of pro- of this institution—by his efficient and ng agency—the co-operation of his and excellent conductor John Dick- and the contributions of the traveling ers, "the printing and book business" to be in successful operation as early year 1790. I believe, that the first e of bound Ministers is the only re- history of these events.

e we learn, that John Dickens was ted "book steward in Philadelphia in in 1790 "superintendent of the print- and book business"—and this appoint- was made by Mr. Asbury, and repeated year to year, until the death of Mr. ns in the year 1798. "He superinten- he book business of the Methodist So- sending out many thousand volumes, every State in the Union, on experi- al and practical religion." To facili- this benevolent enterprise, and to relieve pressing wants of men who were no lon- ble to render effective service—Mr. ry appointed sundry supernannuated bers, as "traveling book stewards," the great mission of itinerant Metho- —that spreading Scripture holiness, was d by the circulation of religious books, profits arising from which, affording some f to the instrument employed, or worn- n this work.

far from the book concern being "the ture of the general Conference"—it is en of, in the memoir of John Dickens, es book business of the Methodist Socie- —and it may more properly be said to e creature of Francis Asbury and John ens—seeder their economical superintee- e, it soon became, not only a self-sus- ing institution, but yielded nett profits— ch "the traveling preachers, in general ference assembled," in the year 1796, ired that "the profits arising from the e of books, should thereafter be devoted to relief of distressed traveling, supernum- y and wornout preachers, their wives, ows and orphans." This is the first ac- nt we have of a General Conference ing the direction of the book concern— having settled by law the purposes to ch the produce of the concern should be propriated, they, by resolutions, committed management of its affairs to the Philadel- n Conference. That Conference, which but once in the year, appointed a com- ee, or board of directors, consisting of t traveling Ministers, of which Ezikiel per was chairman, who were "to meet a quarter, or oftener if necessary." , and not the general Conference, was n l "board of directors"—and in this way "the printing and book business" con- ted. Its purposes were twofold, viz: the read of religious knowledge, or Scripture ness, and "the relief of distressed trave- and wornout preachers, &c." who were bored instruments employed in great work; therefore "a noble charity." And ther the produce or nett profits was much little, the principle was the same. And e fundamental law prescribed by the dors," and uniformity in usage, has been the e for well nigh sixty years.

multaneously with the "book fund," re existed a "fund for superannuated chers, widows and orphans of pren- rs." These funds were created and re- nished by "contributions"—the latter be- e absorbed in the former, being kindred itutions. It was then felt, that "a sacred gation rested upon the Church," to pro- e means to relieve or alleviate the suffer- of wornout preachers, widows and hans.

The same spirit of christian philanthropy, h the untiring efforts of the benevolent ary, created about the same time, "the ctered fund," the produce of which, was redly dedicated to the same benevolent d charitable purposes.

WHO CAN STAND BEFORE ENVY.

BY W. S. PLUMER, D. D.

"What makes the man of envy what he is
Is worth in others—vileness in himself;
A lust of praise with undeserving deeds,
And conscious poverty of soul."

One of the most obvious remarks respecting envy is its universality. The Scripture saith not in vain that the spirit which is in us lusteth to envy. All nations afford very striking examples. In families how hard it is to repress the risings of this wicked spirit. An infant is born. It necessarily, to some extent, takes the place, and engrosses the attentions, which formerly belonged to another, next older. How much care and address are necessary to prevent the little one from becoming the object of envy to the very one that ought to rejoice in its birth and being. Among adults this sin has fearful sway. It is a master passion.

Nor does it ever tire. Lord Bacon well says it has no holidays. It is like the malice of fallen angels. It always rages. From the day that Cain found his brother's works accepted and his own rejected, his heart was malignantly set against him. At times it is hypocritical, and pretends friendship. But in this there is oftentimes deeper malice, and always more meanness, than in undisguised hatred.

It is very violent. It is the rottenness of the bones. "Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who shall stand before envy?" It hath a most vehement flame. It disregards ties of blood, as in Cain towards Abel; and public usefulness, unparalleled meekness, and heavenly wisdom, as in the Jews towards Christ. Its breath is always murderous. It tends directly, constantly, vehemently, towards bloodshedding and all maledictions. It has no pity, no relentings. To it all restraints are irksome. It is full of deadly venom.

Yet it sometimes pretends to do good things. It sometimes gives alms. It has even preached the gospel. Phil. i: 15. It does not like to be outdone. It is as self-righteous and boastful as it is malicious. It readily adopts forms and pompous vanities in religion. It abounds in will-worship, as did Cain. He spent as much time and property in worshipping God as did Abel. But it was all in a way of his own invention. He brought the fruits of the earth and offered them to God. This Adam might have done in innocency. But Cain rejected the only religion which befitted him—the religion of a sinner. He refused bloody sacrifices and penitential confessions. If God would accept those offering he might have them. But no sin offerings would Cain present. He was too proud for that.

There is no way of effectually curing this evil principle of our nature but by the abounding grace of God. Love, begotten in the soul by the Holy Ghost, casteth out this unclean spirit. "Charity envieth not."

What a mercy it is that God controls the strong passions of men. When he takes off his hand, and lets loose their powerful violence, earth soon becomes like the bottomless pit. It is always so in a long seige, in a wasting famine, in the prevalence of dreadful maladies. It is often so in neighbourhoods which become excited, man against man, and family against family. Wickedness rages till wrath and malice want a name. But in mercy God commonly controls men's hearts. He restrains them. He holds them like chained lions. Blessed be his holy name. We cannot be too thankful if allowed to live quiet and peaceable lives. Peace is God's blessing. To dwell safely in the midst of the envious is a rich inheritance.

We cannot be too free from vain-glory, from pride, from all boasting. With the lowly is wisdom. Our humility must be genuine; then our behavior will be modest and kind, and if men rage against us they will the sooner appear to be in the wrong. An acute servant in an old university, said he always knew which disputant was worsted by his loss of temper, although he was ignorant of the Latin in which they held their discussions. It has long been noticed that he who does a wrong is much harder to be reconciled than he who suffers wrong.

But envy and all malice greatly torment those in whom they reign. Lord Clarendon says: "If envy, like anger, did not burn itself in its own fire, and consume and destroy those persons it possesses, before it can destroy those it wishes worst to, it would set the whole world on fire, and leave the most excellent persons the most miserable." What a mercy that in all cases wickedness is followed by misery.

Let good men be jealous of their own hearts. It is generally admitted that drunkards, liars and unchaste persons will come short of heaven. The envious are in no less peril of perdition. Gal. v: 21.

NEWSPAPER SUSPENSION.—The Daily Evening Register, of Philadelphia, suspended publication yesterday. Cause, the ruinously high price of paper. We are much mistaken in our conjectures if more don't follow suit shortly.—Exchange.

The cost of newspaper publishing has increased full twenty-five per cent. in less than two years. And unless by some method white paper is reduced in price, and that, too, soon, many of the journals now published must go down. It has long been true that newspaper publishing was among the least remunerative of occupations; and the truth has of late obtained a startling significance. We must have a cheap article of white paper, or newspapers will be reduced in number full one-half. N. Y. Baptist Register.

God loves you too well to give you unnecessary pain; not a pain can he dispense with, if God is faithful to his character and word.

THOUGHTS ON A RAINY DAY.

MR. EDITOR:—Yesterday was a rainy Sunday here, which gave all who desired it the privilege of staying at home, without having their ears tingled with the clangum of bells; for it really rained so hard that no bells were rung. I confess this was not disagreeable to myself, as I had a bad cold, was about out of sermons, and had a sick wife, who could not have gone with me to the House of Prayer. On the whole, it was a day of comfort and profit to my soul; as 'tis said,

"The clouds we so much dread,
Are big with mercy, and will break
In blessings o'er our head."

1. It gave me some sympathy with those who are generally termed "dry weather Christians." Not having tried it before for many months, I was really not aware how much a person may enjoy home on Sunday. Nevertheless the enjoyment of such persons must be greatly marred when the "morning cloud passeth away," and they are left high and dry at home, while the current of Church-going people has swept by them, and left them "alone in their glory." Then the hearty greeting of the Pastor. "A fine day" is but poorly returned with the restricted reply, "Yes, after so dark a morning."

2. This gave an opportunity of conversing with two of my local brethren, who are thinking of placing themselves in the ranks of the itinerancy, at the opening of the next campaign. Falling in with these brethren at the hour for Church, we withdrew to "an upper room," and there communed together of the things of God. One of these has his mind fully made up, and has obtained his certificate. Although a little turned of forty, he seems to feel as if he were just entering life, and goes forth with ardor and alacrity. He is settling his business, getting his outfit, and "forsaking what he hath" of this world, to follow the Lord. And even now by anticipation, he enjoys these rich feasts of love and joy, which belong chiefly to those who bear the vessels of the Lord. Long he thought the influence of example, in his own community would be as effectual as the direct preaching of the word to the world at large; but although highly respected here for his piety, he finds at last, that a prophet is not honored in his own country; and in as much as his owe people, can not themselves, unworthy of eternal life, he is going to the Gentiles. That he will be eminently useful, in his new way of life, there is no doubt with any who know him.

As the other has not yet fully made up his mind, I shall not say more of him at present, than that we would be proud to have him in our connection, if circumstances will allow him to fulfill his desires.

3. As the year is drawing to a close, I had, on yesterday, a good opportunity to reflect upon the history of the past 12 months, and thus to treasure up the wisdom of experience. One can not thus review the past, without feeling, for the whole, much for which to be humble. Ah! with what high hopes the itinerant received his appointment last Conference, and left for his new field! Eye report confirmed him in the opinion that a great and effectual door would be opened for him, and that many would hear him as an angel from Heaven.

Arriving, he finds, perhaps, all that had been told him true, but that he had greatly exaggerated it by his own fancy. Here were difficulties, too, he had not dreamed of. A few drizzly days, and dribbling sermons, damped the curiosity of his people, and reduced his exalted notions of himself and them, to a mere matter of fact Methodist preacher, and common, indifferent congregation. Then came the tug of war. And after hard fighting, he finally got his men into ranks, and with the sound of a trumpet, and the shoutings of the Captains, finally succeeded in making a charge upon the enemy, and after a partial success, it was concluded that the campaign for this year was ended, and that the weary hosts had now best be led back to their accustomed winter-quarters.

But the pious heart will also find, at the end of the year, much for which to be grateful. Through what untold snares and dangers has his soul been led, what amazing grace has been required to enable him to discharge all his duties, how often have his feeble efforts to do good succeeded far better than he expected or desired; how many kindnesses has he received from the people; how many immediate blessings from God. "Child of Heaven canst thou rejoice?" The writer can humbly say of himself, this year, as Bishop Hedding said upon his death-bed, "the goodness of God to me, has been incomprehensible. Amidst many and deep afflictions, it has pleased Him to give a deeper experience of his love, and to make me raise here some feeble memorial to commemorate his grace."

As the time for Conference draws nigh, the Preacher will probably feel, in some respects, serving for his change, and in others, glad of it, but as a general thing, the latter will predominate. In the first place, he is sorry to leave so many who have, by their kindness and love, made a place in his heart, and sorry, too, that he has no more time to finish his work. But on the other hand, he feels as if most that he can do for this people is done; or at least his successor will probably be more useful than he would be; that himself, shall again be thrown into a new field, with a larger stock of experience, more grace and better hopes; and that God who has sent him forth weeping and bearing precious seed, will finally bring him home rejoicing, and bringing his sheaves with him. TIMOTHY.

Alulouf, Oct. 20, 1854.

Controversies upon doctrinal points generally disturb the mind, weaken faith, waste, love, and puff up, or depress the spirits: be sure you are called to it, before you engage in it.

A FEW OF THE BEAUTIES OF ROMANISM.

The religious and humanity of Romanism are marvellous. Some of its beauties, as set forth by its own organs, will be found below. Read and see how you like them:—

For our own part, we take this opportunity of explaining our hearty delight at the suppression of the Protestant chapel in Rome. This may be thought intolerant, but when, we ask, did we ever profess to be tolerant of Protestantism, or to favor the doctrine that Protestantism ought to be tolerated? On the contrary, we hate Protestantism—we detest it with our whole heart and soul, and we pray our aversion to it may never decrease. We hold it meet that in the Eternal City no worship repugnant to God should be tolerated, and we are sincerely glad the enemies of the truth are no longer allowed to meet together in the capital of the Christian world. Pittsburg Catholic Visitor, 1848.

No good government can exist without religion; and there can be no religion without an Inquisition, which is wisely designed for the promotion and protection of the true faith.—Boston Pilot.

You ask if he (the Pope) were lord in the land and you were in a minority, if not in numbers, yet in power, what would we do to you? That, we say, would entirely depend upon circumstances. If it would benefit the cause of Catholicism, he would tolerate you, if expedient, he would imprison you, banish you, fine you, possibly he might even hang you—but, be assured of one thing; he would never tolerate you for the sake of the "glorious principles" of civil and religious liberty.—Rambler.

Protestantism of every form has not, and never can have any rights, where Catholicity is triumphant.—Brownson's Quarterly Review.

Let us dare to assert the truth in the face of the lying world, and instead of pleading for our Church at the bar of the State, summon the State itself to plead at the bar of the Church, its divinely constituted judge.—Ibid.

I never think of publishing anything in regard to the Church, without submitting my articles to the Bishop for inspection, approval, and endorsement.—Ibid.

I declare my most unequivocal submission to the Head of the Church, and to the hierarchy in its different orders. If the bishops make a declaration on this bill, I never would be heard speaking against it, but would submit at once, unequivocally, to that decision. They have only to decide, and they also close my mouth; they have only to determine and I obey. I wish it to be understood that such is the duty of the Catholics.—Daniel O'Connell, 1843.

Heresy and unbelief are crimes; and in Christian countries, as in Italy and Spain, for instance, where all the people are Catholics, and where the Catholic religion is an essential part of the law of the land, they are punished as other crimes.—R. C. Archbishop of St. Louis.

A heretic, examined and convicted by the Church, used to be delivered over to the secular power and punished with death. Nothing has ever appeared to us more necessary. More than 100,000 persons perished in consequence of the heresy of Wickliffe; a still greater number for that of John Huss; and it would not be possible to calculate the bloodshed caused by Luther; and it is not yet over.—Paris Univers.

As for myself, what I regret, I frankly own, is, that they did not burn John Huss sooner, and that they did likewise burn Luther; this happened because there was not found some prince sufficiently politic to stir up a crusade against the Protestants.—Paris Univers.

The absurd and erroneous doctrines or ravings in defence of liberty of conscience, is a most pestilential error—a pest, of all others, most to be dreaded in a State.—Encyclical Letter of Pope Pius IX., Aug. 15, 1852.

Protestantism of every kind, Catholicity inserts in her catalogue of moral sins; she endures it when and where she must; but she hates it, and directs all her energies to effect its destruction.—St. Louis Shepherd of the Valley.

You should do all in your power to carry out the intentions of His Holiness the Pope. Where you have the electoral franchise, give your votes to none but those who will assist you in so holy a struggle.—Daniel O'Connell, 1843.

CHURCH DIFFICULTIES.

Spending a night in a certain neighborhood of A——, we inquired of our host, a fair Christian man, how the Church got on, for we had passed a neglected frame Chapel at the cross roads.

"Oh, poorly," said he, "poorly enough."

"Why, what's to pay? You are in a thick settlement, intelligent people; able to keep up congregation and support the Gospel."

"Just so," sighed he, "but one troublesome man has broken up the Society, and keeps it broke up. It was an unlucky day for the Church when he moved here: there has been no peace since. Yet he is a person of good parts, too, and has an interesting family. Before he came here he had troubles in the same way."

We suggested that perhaps the troublesome man's peculiarities were not consulted; indulge him a little. May be he wants to lead.

"Oh, as to that, we've tried him in the lead, and every way. He is not satisfied with leading, but turns round and butts the wheel horses."

We gave it up. Our host was a farmer, and the illustration cut like an argument. David had a few of this sort in his mind when he wrote the 120th Psalm.

"Some persons," says an exchange, "seem to act upon the principle that the Church is to be militant, in a different sense from that of waging a warfare against the enemies of Christ and of the souls of men. They would make individual bodies of professing Christians so many warriors, engaged in strife, not with a common foe, but with each other. In the language of the apostle, they "bite and devour one another." Some, unhappily, have a peculiar aptness for engendering strife. Let them be surrounded with ever so peaceful a brotherhood, they can some how or other bring out a bone of contention; let them remove their membership into over so many congregations, their trail may be traced by the noise and dust of war."

REVOLUTIONARY SERMON.

"They that take the sword shall perish by the sword."

The following interesting document was recently found among the papers of Major John Shoolmyer, a deceased parishioner of the Revolution. It is a discourse delivered on the eve of the battle of Brandywine, by Rev. Jacob Trouté, to a large portion of the American soldiers, in presence of Gen. Washington, Gen. Wayne, and other officers of the army.

Soldiers and Countrymen!—We have met this evening perhaps for the last time. We have shared the toil of the march, peril of the fight, and the dismay of the retreat, alike; we have endured the cold and hunger, the contumely of the eternal foe, and contempt of the foreign oppressor. We have sat night after night by the camp-fire, we have together heard the roll of the reveille which called us to duty, or the beat of the tattoo which gave the signal for the hardy sleep of the soldier, with the earth for his bed and the knapsack for his pillow.

And now, soldiers and brethren, we have met in this peaceful valley on the eve of battle, in the sunlight that to-morrow morn will glimmer on scenes of blood. We have met amid the whitening tents of our encampment; in the time of terror and gloom have gathered together, God grant that it may not be for the last time! It is a solemn moment. Brethren, does not the solemn voice of nature seem to echo the sympathies of the hour? The flag of our country droops heavily from yonder staff; the breeze has died away along the green plain of Chadd's Ford; the plain that spreads before us glitters in the sunlight; the heights of Brandywine arise, gloomy and grand, beyond the waters of yonder stream; all nature holds a pause of solemn silence on the eve of the uproar and bloodshed strife of to-morrow.

"They that take the sword shall perish by the sword"

And have they not taken the sword?

Let the desolate plain, the blood-sodden valley, the burned farm-houses, blackening in the sun, the sacked village and the ravaged town, answer; let the whitened bones of the butchered farmer, strewn along the fields of his homestead, answer; let the starving mother, with the babe clinging to the withered breast that can afford no sustenance, let her answer—with the death-rattle mingling with the murmuring tones that marked the last struggle of her life; let the mother and the babe answer.

It was but a day past, and our land slept in the quiet of peace. War was not here. Fraud and woe and want dwelt not among us. From the eternal solitude of the green woods arose the blue smoke of the settler's cabin, and golden fields of corn looked from amid the waste of the wilderness, and the glad music of human voices awoke the silence of the forest.

Now, God of mercy, behold the change! Under the shadow of a pretext, under the sanctity of the name of God, invoking the Redeemer to their aid, do these foreign hirelings slay our people. They throng our towns; they darken our plains, and now they encompass our ports on the lonely plain of Chadd's Ford.

"They that take the sword shall perish by the sword"

Brethren, think me not unworthy of belief when I tell you that the doom of the British is sealed. Think me not vain when I tell you that, beyond the cloud that now encloses us I see, gathering thick and fast, the darker cloud and thicker storm of Divine retribution!

They may conquer us to-morrow. Might and wrong may prevail, and we may be driven from the field, but the hour of God's own vengeance will come!

Ay, if in the vast solitudes of eternal space there throbs the holeg of an awful God, quick to avenge and sure to punish guilt, thee the man George Brunswick, called king, will feel in his brain and heart the vengeance of the eternal Jehovah! A blight will light upon his life—a withered brain and an accursed intellect; a blight will be upon his children, and on his people. Great God, how dread the punishment! A crowded populace, peopling the dense towns where the man of money thrives, while the laborer starves; want striding among the people in all forms of terror; an ignorant and God-defying priesthood chuckling over the miseries of millions; a proud and merciless nobility adding wrong to wrong, and heaping insult upon robbery and fraud; royalty corrupt to the very heart, and aristocracy rotten to the core; crime and want linked hand in hand, and tempting man to deeds of woe and death; these are a part of the doom and retributive that shall come upon the English throne and the English people.

Soldiers, I look around upon your familiar faces with a stronge interest! To-morrow morning we go forth to the battle—for need I tell you that your unworthy minister will march with you invoking God's aid in the fight?—we will march forth to battle! Need I exhort you to fight the good fight—to fight for your homesteads, for your wives and children?

My friends, I might urge you to fight by the galling memories of British wrong. Wait! I might tell you of your father, butchered in the sileace of the night, on the plains of Trenton; I might picture his gray hairs dabbled in blood. I might ring his death shriek in your ears; Shelmire, I might tell you of a butchered mother and sister outraged, the lonely farm-house, the night assault, the roof in flames, the shouts of the troops as they dispatched their victims, the cries for mercy, and pleadings of innocence for pity. I might paint this all again in the vivid colors of the terrible reality, if I thought courage needed such wild excitement.

But I know you are strong in the might of the Lord. You will march forth to battle on the morrow with light hearts and determined spirit, though the solemn duty—the duty of avenging the dead—may rest heavy on your souls.

And in the hour of battle, when all around is darkness, lit by the lurid cannon glare and the piercing musket flash, when the wounded strew the ground, and the dead litter your path, then remember, soldiers, that God is with you. The eternal God fights for you; he rides on the battle cloud; he sweeps onward with the march of the hurricane charge.

God, the awful and infinite, fights for you, and you will triumph.

"They that take the sword shall perish by the sword"

You have taken the sword, but not in the spirit of wrong or ravage. You have taken the sword for your homes, for your wives, for your little ones. You have taken the sword for truth, justice, and right, and to you the promise is, be of good cheer, for your foes have taken the sword in defiance of all that men hold dear, in blasphemy of God—they shall perish by the sword.

And now, brethren and soldiers, I bid you all farewell. Many of us will fall in the battle of to-morrow, God rest the souls of the fallen! Many of us may live to tell the story of the light to-morrow, and in the memory of all will ever rest and linger the quiet scene of this autumnal eve.

Solemn twilight advances over the valley the woods on the opposite heights fling their long shadows over the green of the meadow! around us are the tents of the continental host, the suppressed bustle of camp, the hurried tramp of the sublisters, and far among the tents, the stillness and awe that mark the eve of battle.

Wait! we meet again, may the shadows of twilight be thus over the peaceful land! God in Heaven grant it! Let us pray.

Interesting Letter from Lieut. Maury.

My Dear Son—Former letters have kept you posted up as to the movements of the family since the regular summer breaking up at the Observatory. Though we abandoned that stately place the first day of August, we were doomed to discover that it was not soon enough, for I have had to weather out two spells of sickness, and all the children except the boy, have been down with ague and fever—or other disease, the seeds of which grew in the Observatory dwelling, and were soon in our systems before we abandoned the place for the summer. Those marshes are a great drawback. They prevent us from doing as much as in a healthy place, we would, and they people the Observatory until either for a residence or for study it is a place not to be envied. It is a pity that we could not build an institution as this has grown to be should be suffered to remain in such an unhealthy situation.

It is too soon for the family to return there at present, and while we are hearing up here, waiting for "Jack Frost" to come and drive away the pestilence for me I have determined to write to you a series of letters touching affairs of the Old Dominion. It is your native State and the place where your father and your father's father were born, and the green hearth the ashes of my grandfather and of his father lie buried. You are therefore, my children Virginians; and having a few days of leisure, I shall devote portions of each to conversing with you (fatherly and) as to the future. I hope by these letters to excite in your young minds even a stronger interest than that which I know you already feel for the dear old State.

So before we proceed further together, you must get the map and follow me in all I say concerning geographical positions. If you have one, you will find it a great help in reading me, for in tracing out my routes, ask Mr Hasbrouck—whose hospitalities are unbounded, and elegant hospitalities I wish I could enjoy with you to help you out. I went to school to him, you know, in Tennessee, and therefore know how excellent he is at explanation. He is one of one best geographical experts I ever knew.

First, then, let us take a map of the United States—a globe will be better—without any internal improvements? any turnpikes, canals or railroads, winter, marked on upon it. For I want to show you what nature has done for Virginia, then we will take another map, with all the railways and canals upon it, to see what man has done.

With this, and such other information as I shall give you from authentic sources, we shall be able to understand the true situation and present condition of the Old Dominion. We shall see how far she has been eclipsed in the commercial race; how far she has been left behind by sister States in the development of resources; and then we shall be able, understandingly, to discuss the great question which is now engaging the attention of her sons, viz: the true policy of the State with regard to her internal improvements. Perhaps we shall be able to satisfactorily conceive how, if you and I were the people and State of Virginia) we could recover for her at least a portion of her lost commercial advantages.

With a common terrestial globe before you, elevate the North pole, bring Vera Cruz under the brazen meridian and put your finger on Norfolk,—you now have a clear view of its geographical relations seaward. As to the natural advantages of position, depth of water, and accessibility of land and sea, Norfolk has no competitor among the seaport towns of the Atlantic.

Midway the Atlantic coast line of the United States Norfolk is the most convenient (because the most central) point where the produce of the interior may be collected, and whence it may be distributed North and South, right and left, among the markets of the seaboard.

It situate is delightful. It is exactly of that happy mid-is temperate where the frosts of the North bite not, and where the pestilence of the South wakes not. Its harbor is commodious, and as safe as safe can be. It is never blocked up with ice, and as to the egress and ingress between it and the sea, it possesses all the facilities that the mariner himself could desire. It has the double advantage of an out-ward and inner harbor. The inner harbor is as smooth as any mill pond, in it vessels lie with the most perfect security, where every natural facility imaginable is afforded for lading and unlading. Being ready for sea, the outward bound trader dropping down from this sunny anchoring and approaching the sea, finds a storm raging from outside. The outer harbor then affords shelter until the fury of the gale be spent, when the white winged messenger trips her anchor, trims to the breeze, and goes forth rejoicing on her way to the haven where she would be.

Moreover, the prevailing winds in the parallel of Norfolk are westerly winds, which are fair for coasting, and for going seaward in any direction. A little to the South of that parallel you find the North East trader which are fair winds for the inward bound Norfolk vessel.

Then there is the Gulf stream; that mighty river in the ocean, upon the verge of which Norfolk stands. It flows by with a current, which, without the help of sweeps, sails or steam, will carry the European bound vessel out of Norfolk at the rate of nearly one hundred miles a day, directly on her course.

Then at the side of this, and consider to it, are eddies which favor the same vessel on her return to Norfolk. These favor her along, and shorten her voyage by many a long mile.

Next to complete the survey seaward, cast your eye down to the great Amazonian water-sheet of South America. That river drains a district of country twice as large as the whole Mississippi valley. The volume of water discharged by the Amazon into the sea exceeds, by six fold, that which the Mississippi empties into the Gulf; and it opens a highway for commerce and navigation from the sea to the foot of it's snow-capped mountains that rise up on the chain of the Andes, and touch the clouds under the Equator. This country is to be the emporium of the world. It's climate is that of an eternal Spring. Its soil is the most prolific on the face of the earth, and its minerals the richest and the rarest, and the most abundant that ever adorned the person, or administered to the convenience of man.

But you have read your uncle Lewis Herndon's Exploration of the Amazon—you have studied with me the physical geography of the country drained by it, and you understand how. And why the winds are constant and fair both ways for vessels trading between that river and Norfolk.

Now, take a string, and with your finger hold of one end of it in the mouth of the Amazon, then, with the distance thence to Norfolk as a radius sweep on the globe an arc of a circle from Florida to Newfoundland, and you will be surprised to find that the Atlantic coast is very nearly a perfect arc of a circle, of which the mouth of the Amazon is the centre, and Norfolk the middle.

Such are the natural advantages of Norfolk seaward. Let us look ashore and consider them landward. You will better appreciate these by studying them in contrast. Therefore, we will compare them with the natural inland advantages of New York.

A bay or harbor which is conveniently accessible to the sea, is surpassed in other natural advantages for a commercial city, in proportion to the fertility and extent of the back country that is tributary to it. Thus we say that when the Valley of the Amazon is fully peopled up, the largest city the world ever saw will be at its mouth. Social affairs, political relations or the requirements of trade, may modify this calculation, and place the commercial emporium of Amazonia at some other point, but not that indicated by nature. But you will recollect we are considering at present only the natural advantages of New York and Norfolk; their artificial advantages we will consider at another time.

The back country that is naturally tributary to the city of New York, is confined to the counties that are drained by the Hudson or washed by the waters of the Sound. And if there were no such things as internal improvements, no way in the interior by which produce and merchandize could be transported from one water shed to another, the people for whom New York would export and import would be those who live in the valley of the Hudson, or who inhabit the shores of Long Island Sound. These would be all.

Now contrast the fertility and extent of this country with the back country that is tributary to Norfolk. Both shores of the Chesapeake Bay are tributary to it; and this magnificent sheet of water is the natural receptacle, about the drainage and surplus produce of the valley of the James River, the York, the Rappahannock, the Potomac and the Susquehanna, and, with a perfect net work of creeks and rivers that indent their shores. The back country therefore, which, without portage, is naturally tributary to Norfolk, not only surpasses that which is tributary to New York, in mildness of climate, in fertility of soil and variety of production, but also in geographical extent, by many square leagues; the proportion being as three to one in favor of the Virginia port.

But there are such things as natural portages, by which commerce, even in a rude state, may pass from one river valley to another on its way to the sea. Now let us see what portions of country are as near to New York what to Norfolk, assuming that if these natural portages be equally improved, all that country which they will bring nearer to Norfolk will be tributary to Norfolk, and all that they may bring nearer to New York, will, to like manner, be tributary to New York.

Then let us divide and lay off this back country, turn to the globe once more; stretch a string upon it from Norfolk to New York and make a dot half way between them. Now seek a point on the South shore of Lake Erie, that is equi-distant from New York and Norfolk; draw a line from the dot to this point, and there you will have a dividing line of distances between the two places, every point along which will be just as far from the one places as the other. Transfer this line to the map—to which you will be presently referred—and you will find that it runs through Delaware and cuts Lake Erie near Cleveland, Ohio.

Now, as you are on the banks of the Hudson, all the country that is on your side of this line is nearer to New York, and all on my side of it is nearer to Norfolk. Thus you will perceive that Chicago, Ill. and St. Louis, Mo., are actually nearer to Norfolk than they are to New York, even by an air line.

I come now to prove that as between New York and Norfolk the natural advantages here are greatly in favor of the latter. The most direct way to the sea through either of [illegible] from most of the lake country, and from [illegible] valley, is through Virginia. The natural advantages there in relation to the sea or to the back country are superior beyond comparison to those of New York.

I have here before me a letter written by your great-grandfather from his parsonage under the Blue Ridge of Virginia, to a friend in England, in 1756.

France and England were then at war about their North American possessions, and the old gentleman reasoned the prediction, and offered proof amounting to more than probability" that he of the two contending monarchs who at the end of the dispute should remain master of the Ohio and the Lakes, would become lord of North America. The acquisition of this territory would also, he added, be his (own private opinion, make either Hudson's river a New York or Potomac in Virginia, the grand emporium of this country and of Europe.

At that time the Missouri river was a myth. Cox, who had ascended the Mississippi to the Falls of St. Anthony had reported in his Cordera the existence of such a river. This Cox had been the proprietor of a charter granted by Charles I to Sir Robert Heath constituting him lord proprietor of all the lands and waters of the Mississippi. A party was organized in Virginia to explore the Missouri and a friend and neighbor of our ancestor was appointed to conduct it.

The day seeing old gentleman then goes on in this remarkable letter to advocate the advantages of a thoroughfare across this continent in the "south seas," as the Pacific Ocean was then called. He points out two routes, one from the waters of the Chesapeake to those of the Ohio, the other from the Hudson to the Lakes, thence to the Ohio, and so down into the Mississippi and the Missouri. And then by a process of reasoning that is perfectly philosophical and most logical, he points out theoretically the existence of the Columbia river, as clearly as Le Verrier did that of the planet Neptune before the telescope discovered it. In this reasoning, it was held that the tributaries of the Mississippi on the right bank approached probably as far to the West as those on this side do the East—that the head waters of the Missouri were probably separated from the Pacific by a chain of mountains, answering to that which separates the waters of the Atlantic;—that to the West of this theoretical chain of mountains—now known as the Rocky Mountains—another river would be found taking its rise and pouring its waters into that "boundless sea," as he styled the Pacific ocean—as our rivers Allegheny rivers do into the Atlantic—that the head streams of this river—now known as the Columbia—would be found to insinuate with those of the Missouri as to leave but a short portage between them, and thus a great thoroughfare to the Indies and across this continent might be established.

The old philosopher then goes into a most glowing description of the beauties of this country, he shows her future to be the most dazzling, but stops with the picture to discuss the annual flood rolling and bright enough for the Buddhist Heaven. Whether Norfolk or New York should bear off the palm, and become the great commercial emporium of the country was to depend upon which of the two should be the first to establish a commercial thoroughfare with the Mississippi valley.

I advise you to read this letter. It is very interesting. It is from the pen of James Maury to a friend in England, and you will find it at page 286, of the little work called "Memoirs of a Huguenot Family, written by our cousin Ann Maury Hasbrouck has it in his library. Mr Jefferson went to school to him, and I believe Mr Madison also; though of this I am not sure. It may be that we have here discovered the fountain where young Jefferson first imbibed the ideas which finally expanded into the expedition of Lewis & Clarke.

The prediction of our far seeing ancestor, is now in the east of the day "in Red feet." New York opened the Erie Canal; she was the first to establish a commercial highway to the lake country. This induced other States to put in other thoroughfares between the Mississippi Valley and the Lakes; and thus New York got hold of the commercial sceptre.

Your affectionate father,

THE WORLD TO COME.—The following were the meditations of the celebrated John Foster on the death of his wife. They will seem to many as a transcript of their own thoughts under similar bereavements:

Can it be—how is it—what is it—that we are now not inhabitants of the same world—that each has to think of the other as in a perfectly different economy of existence? Whither is she gone—in what manner does she consciously realize to herself the astonishing change—how does she look at herself as no longer inhabiting a mortal tabernacle—in what manner does she recollect her state as only a few weeks since—in what manner does she think, and feel, and act, and communicate with other spiritual beings—what manner of vision has she of God and the Saviour of the world—how does she review and estimate the course of discipline through which she had been prepared for the happy state where she finds herself—in what manner does she look back on death, which she has so recently passed through—and does she plainly understand the nature of a phenomenon so awfully mysterious to the view of mortals? How does she remember and feel respecting us, respecting me? Is she associated with the spirits of her departed son and our two children who died in infancy? Does she indulge with delight a confident anticipation that we shall, after a while, be added to her society? If she should think of it us (with respect to some of us) many years, possibly before such an event, does that appear a long time in prospect, or has she begun to account of duration according to the great laws of eternity? Earnest imaginings and questionings like these arise without end; and still, still, there is no answer, no revelation. The mind comes again and again up close to the thick black veil; but there is no perforation, no glimpse. She that loved me, and I trust loves me still, will not, can not, must not answer me. I can only imagine her to say, "Come and see; serve our God so that you shall come and share, at no distant time."

STEWART HOLLAND, THE HERO OF THE ARCTIC.—Mr. Dorlen, the third officer of the steamship Arctic, has written a letter to Mr. Isaac Holland, of Washington, in relation to his son, Stewart Holland, who so heroically met death on that ill-fated steamer. After describing the scene of confusion and terror among the passengers, Mr. Dorlen says:

In the midst of this scene, Stewart came running up to me; his words were: "Dorlan, my powder is out; I want more; give me the key." "Never mind the key," I replied, "take an axe and break open the door." He snatched one close beside me, and down into the ship's hold he dived, and I went over the ship's side to my raft. Half an hour later, when busy at the raft, a voice hailed me, and, on looking up, I again saw Stewart, when he hurriedly asked: "Dorlan, have you a compass in your boat?" "No," I replied; and off he went. He knew that any chance I had would be shared with him; and I have often thought how strange it is that that young man should, for a moment, quit his gun to inquire after my safety, and never for a moment think of his own. But such was Stewart Holland. I recollect distinctly his appearance as he hailed me from the deck. The right side of his face was black with powder, and two large spots on the left side. When he spoke his countenance seemed to me to be lighted up with something like a quiet smile.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11.

DOCTORS DISAGREEING.

QUININE IN YELLOW FEVER.

The New Orleans Medical News and Hospital Gazette, for November, is upon our table. Dr Cropper, Surgeon of the Hospital, is the principal Editor, and his good taste and professional learning, appear to fine advantage in its pages. The subject treated, and the experiments reported, are eminently local, and, as such, useful in guiding Southern practice.

A report is submitted, of the Physico-Medical Society, of this city, in session September 30. We have never been so disheartened, as in reading it, at the guess work of Doctors. If they do not quit, reporting these discussions of the Physico-Medical Society of the allopathics, the homeopathics will condemn them out of their own mouths, and the confidence of all patients be destroyed. We suggest, for the credit of the profession, that the meetings be continued, but the publications discontinued.

"Previous to 1839, the usual practice of physicians was to give quinine during the periods of remission, as they were considered in yellow fever; and by some practitioners this medicine was continued until quininism, or intoxication by quinine, was produced. But, sir, in 1839, as appears in Harrison's essay on yellow fever, I proved by experiments —yes, Mr. President, in more than sixty cases of convalescence in the Charity Hospital, that quinine in large doses, from twenty to sixty grains, produces for a short time a slight stimulating effect, and a few hours after, a sedative impression that endures.

"Such, sir, was the manner in which I tested the physiological action of quinine. Having tested and established the sedative effects of quinine in large doses in health, I then administered the remedy in yellow fever, in disease."

* * * * * * *

"It is a source of gratification to me, Mr. President, to state, that during the present epidemic, the practice I have indicated has been pursued in the Charity Hospital, in the Touro Infirmary, and by a very large majority of the members of this society, and with the most extraordinary success. In the Charity Hospital, I shall be prepared to show, hereafter, that there has not been a loss of one in fifteen of the persons admitted six hours after their attack."

Dr. Hunt states that in the Touro Infirmary, the loss has not been one in twenty, and quinine gets the credit.

Satisfactory, so far; but Dr. Moss, whom we set down as equally good authority, on the other side, addresses the President:

"Dr. Moss said he was opposed to the views expressed by Dr. Hunt, in relation to the administration of sulph. quinine in yellow fever; that he thought quinine exercised no curative influence whatever over yellow fever; that when administered in small quantity it might do no harm, but certainly did no good, and when given in large doses, with the view of arresting the disease, (the so called abortive treatment,) he had found it to fail; that it complicated the case, and was very often absolutely pernicious; that all the good effects, said by its advocates to follow the use of quinine, would as certainly ensue if the quinine had not been administered, provided the same care had been observed in the administration of the remedies, such as laxatives, diaphoretics, antacids, local blood-letting, pediluvia, etc., and the general management, such as careful watching and good nursing.

"That quinine had been a prominent remedy before the medical community of New-Orleans for fifteen years, a sufficiently long period, if the remedy really possessed any decidedly curative influence over the disease, to have established its merits and superiority over all other modes of treatment, beyond question. There are many physicians in the city of NewOrleans quite as scientific, skillful and capable of administering any remedy as correctly and judiciously as the advocates of sulph. quinine, who have tried it fairly, and failed to find the good results following its use, which have been claimed for it by those who make it the strong feature of their treatment of yellow fever."

Dr. Moss went farther, and claimed as many cures for the anti-quinines as the others.

"Dr. Bein also said, that he had used the sulphate of quinine largely, both in private and hospital practice, and the good results invariably obtained from its administration early in the disease, had led him to depend upon that therapeutic agent as the sheet anchor in the treatment of yellow fever."

Dr. Meux stated to the society, that in his practice this summer he had treated, successfully, thirty cases of yellow fever, and that in no case did he use a single grain of quinine.

Dr. Hart confounded the confusion by his contribution to medical science:

Let me add my experience. Every individual here must know what success a thousand methods introduced and carried out in the Charity Hospital have acquired during the time. Persons, non-professional, were invited to test their methods, and must I declare it? they proved equally as successful as the regular practitioner. Again, gentlemen, we are told the condition of a yellow fever subject after the administration of quinine is so much changed for the better, that every one's experience could be a guarantee for its administration. Who among you, gentlemen, could have failed to observe, as one of the sequences of yellow fever invasion, and that a lapse of twelve or fifteen hours determines the very same phenomena—a soft skin with gentle diaphoresis, a round and full pulse, the patient cheerful, and declaring his entire exemption from all pain? Are we, with this fact, to declare it the effect of quinine? No, gentlemen, last year's experience among one hundred and sixty cases, where not a grain of quinine was administered, but twenty-three certificates of death were written. In this year's epidemic, so far, sixteen cases were treated by me, but one certificate was required, and not one grain of quinine used.

Dr. Copes comes up to the confession—"We had as well confess:"

"As the essential pathology of yellow fever remains after all our investigations so exceedingly obscure as to afford as no reliable lights to guide our treatment, it is the more important that the observations and experiences of practitioners should be fully given and compared. Possibly, by this means, by continuing to narrate, to record, classify and analyze the facts in relation to this terrible disease, which instead of declining, appears to be increasing in the power requisite to extend its malignant conquests over regions hitherto exempted from its dominion, we may arrive at a better understanding of its laws, and thus form some sound conclusions regarding its remedies. We had as well confess, that now, as well as in all past time, it is one of those diseases in which we can demonstrate neither its cause, pathology, nor mode of propagation."

For our part, we believe that in yellow fever a good nurse is half the battle; the other half is between a good doctor and a good conscience. A good nurse: one of the Creoles, with handanna handkerchief jauntily wound about her head, yellow as the ailment and native, with it.

As for faith in Doctors, we still keep it, and when sick, either from habit or conviction, must have one. But these discussions remind one of the "confessions of an infidel," and stuck hard at faith.

Gil Blas, of Santillane, could learn our Doctors a lesson. Old Sangardo is a pattern. He looked wise, but kept his own counsel; let the blood of patients copiously, but never "let on."

The New Orleans Medical Journal, for November, ably edited by Dr. Dowler, puts the yellow fever theories to the route. Dr. Dowler says:—"The comparative frequency of recovery after black vomit, in the late epidemics of 1853-'4, is the most salient point of symptomotology in which they differ from those of former years. It is remarkable that black vomit is not only becoming less fatal in, but less characteristic of yellow fever, owing to its late extension to some other maladies."

Dr. M. M. Dowler insists that yellow fever is no more catching than freckles. He annihilates the theories about the geological formation of the swamps, in which NewOrleans is situated, also the filth doctrine, and concludes with the following strikingly just observation:

"The writers cautiously make out these by giving a little 'meteorology,' a little 'medical typography,' a little 'geology,' a little 'putrefaction and exhalation,' together with a very circumspect reference to the organic, microzoic, cryptogamic, electric, calorific, gaseous, and filth theories, and so forth. A very specious appearance of real knowledge is thereby kept up, and an undoubted display of impartiality. All that the medical reader can make out is, that nothing can be known; and all the non-professional one can discover is, that he cannot understand the scientific method of finding out how it happens that nothing is known. It does not comport with the dignity of authorship or professorship to say, 'I don't know.' It must be said gradually, and with the appearance of knowing everything. Speaking for myself, I may say that I have been a student and practitioner for twenty years; have read and reflected much on this subject, and I have never yet obtained any explanation of the causes of either one or other of these diseases, to which the least importance should be attached—any theory worthy of belief or of legislative attention."

The Medical Faculty of NewOrleans, not inferior to any in the land for ability: they certainly deserve to stand high for frankness. The fact is the Know Nothings are on the increase,

JUBILEE FOR THE "FAITHFUL."

The Southern says Archbishop Blanc left the city, 25th ult., for Rome, whither he has been called by the Pope, to assist at the proposed Council. From the same source we have authority, (Archbishop Blanc's,) pastoral letter, in relation to the Jubilee. The Journal translates it, saying—"While on the subject, we beg leave to suggest the propriety of having important documents, such as Archiepiscopal letters, published in the English as well as the French language."

This singular document begins:

You are, doubtless, already aware, dearly beloved brethren, that the Sovereign Pontiff, penetrated with sorrow at the sight of calamities of every description which hang over nations, and the yet more disquieting evils which afflict or menace the Church, has addressed an Encyclical to all the Bishops of the Catholic world, in order to obtain their prayers and those of all the faithful, to the end that it may please God to let the mildness of his mercy, succeed the strokes of his justice. And that our prayers may be more fervent and efficacious, the Holy Father, opening the heavenly treasures, whose dispensation has been entrusted to him by Our Saviour Jesus Christ, himself, grants a plenary indulgence in the form of a jubilee, to all those who, praying with the prescribed intentions, which we shall announce below, and sanctifying their prayers by fasting and alms, shall worthily approach the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist, during a space of time, not to exceed three months, and which must be determined by each Bishop for his own diocese.

If the "Holy Father" has the opening of the heavenly treasures, why don't he open them? Prayer ought to be directed to him, instead of our Saviour. Perhaps it means that while the higher and spiritual gifts are in the Pope's keeping, the Lord has retained the dispensation of smaller matters, such as, the cessation of wars and epidemics, lending rain, preventing fires, and ship wrecks, and riots, etc., for to these the prayers of the faithful are directed.

The fact is, the Pope has been borrowing money lately. He is threatened with bankruptcy. This dispensation, this Jubilee, these indulgences are his old resorts for making a raise. The money part of the Pastoral letter was an ill-disguised prominence.

"And that our prayers may be heard, let us accompany them with that repentance which manifests itself by acts of expiation, among which fasting and alms-giving hold so important a place."

The immaculate question has long divided the Roman Church. The Dominicians and others insisting that not only the Son of Mary but Mary herself was of immaculate conception. To us it appears that a Council of any Sect could as soon fix a new star in the firmament as a new truth in Christianity. The Pastoral letter, after fixing the temporals, encourages the faithful with the prospect of having a new article added to their creed:

There is, finally, another special object for which the Sovereign Pontiff requires the prayers of the Catholic world during this Jubilee, and we know in advance, how pleasing to your piety will be this prayer. Since a long time, already many among you have prayed, God to hasten the happy moment when the belief in the Immaculate Conception of the Holy Virgin, shall be infallibly confirmed by the authority of a dogmatical decision, which shall make that belief a doctrine of faith. But the nearer this time approaches, with the more earnestness does the Sovereign Pontiff ask the prayers of all the Church, in order that God may suggest to him on this occasion, what will be most apt to procure the glory of our Lord, and His holy Mother. You will, then, redouble your fervor and assiduity in prayer, dearly beloved brethren, in order that we may soon be permitted to see the auspicious day when the infallible voice of the Vicar of Jesus Christ, shall proclaim this dogmatical decision of the Immaculate Conception, a decision so impatiently awaited, and which, at the same time that it will be for Mary a new source of glory in the Church, will also be for the Church, a fruitful source of new graces and ineffable mercies.

The Jubilee opens in our parts on Wednesday, the 1st of November next, and terminates the 1st of February, in the ensuing year.

We subjoin for the faithful the following very minute directions:

"The Faithful may gain the indulgence of the Jubilee, on any day during the course of these three months, by fulfilling the conditions prescribed in the Encyclical of the Sovereign Pontiff.

The conditions for gaining the Jubilee are, 1st, to fast one day; 2d, to give alms, each one in proportion to his means; 3d, to visit three designated Churches, or the same Church three times, and there pray according to the intentions of the Sovereign Pontiff, which we have made known; 4th, to receive with piety the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist."

When shall the end of these follies be? This religion of upholstry and forms, superseded by one of spirit and truth! The Lord hasten it in his time.

METHODIST MISSIONS.

From the most authentic statistics, dating about two years back, we learn that the total strength of the evangelical missionary enterprises, throughout the world, in foreign lands, compriso 2,945 missionaries; 11,807 assistants; 333,604 Church members; 31 native institutions; and 40 printing establishments. The expenses of all these amount to $3,202,419.

The various departments of Methodism support 900 ordained ministers in the foreign field. These are assisted by 8,226 local preachers, catechists, interpreters, school teachers, etc. Under the pastoral care of the Methodist Churches are 165,972 Church members, and 101,742 scholars in schools. On these foreign fields are seven institutions for training a native ministry, and eleven printing establishments. The amount necessary to support these agencies last year was $684,453.

About one-third of all the missionaries of evangelical Christendom belong to the various Methodist Churches. They have about one-half of the Church members and scholars, and one-fourth of the printing establishments and native institutions. Yet this one-third of all the missionaries has been sustained on about one-fifth of the whole income. Thus the money contributed by our people accomplishes more in evangelizing the world than the same amount contributed by most others.

Yet the missionary character of Methodism in the United States can scarcely be inferior to that in heathen countries. A few poor men, on the smallest pittance of support, have planted in the new settlements the religion of Christ; and in the older portions of the country, the other Churches have been greatly stirred up to greater labors, and have imbibed more of the evangelical spirit. The work in the South, and in the West Indies among the slaves, perhaps, is the crowning work of the whole; and our brethren of the Methodist Episcopal Church South are nobly and faithfully carrying on this work.

Baccalaureate.—An address delivered to the graduating class of Centenary College, of Louisiana, on the day of the annual commencement at Jackson, La., July 25th, 1854, by Rev. John C. Miller, M. A. We were amongst those who heard this address at the time of its delivery; and are glad that it now appears in pamphlet form. The Class could not better show their appreciation of its merits, than by presenting it to the public in its present neat style, for general circulation.

The following resolutions were passed at the fourth Quarterly Conference of the Yazoo Circuit, Sept. 2nd 1854.

Whereas, it is the sentence of this Conference that attendance upon Theaters, Balls, Shows and Circuses is of a demoralizing tendency and should be discountenanced by the people of God. It is therefore resolved, that hereafter if any of the members of this Quarterly Conference attend such places, they shall be censured by the Body.

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Local Preachers, Exhorters, Stewards and Leaders connected with the circuit, to aid the Pastor by every prudent means in suppressing attendance upon such places, by the members of our Church.

Resolved, That the New Orleans Christian Advocate be requested to publish the foregoing resolutions.

By order of the Conference.

Revival Intelligence.

Lafayette, Ala.—The Chambers (Ala.) Tribune, of November 4th, says: The revival at the M. E. Church, in this place, still continues with increased interest. A large number are seeking—and manifest their desire to have the prayers of the Church, by crowding to the altar. Several have connected themselves with the Church; and, from present indications, (notwithstanding, it is currently reported abroad, that we have a "hard set" among us,) there is encouragement to hope that the people are becoming awake to their souls' best interests. There is deep feeling in this community, on the subject of Religion; which, we hope, will terminate in the conversion of all who are without the pale of the Church.

It is proper, to state here, that the Ministers, (especially Rev. Mr. Ellis,) who has been conducting the meeting, deserve, and to them we take the liberty of returning the thanks of this community, for their earnest efforts in trying to advance the cause of morality, in our midst.

Amite, N. Miss.—"Revival intelligence, (as you aptly remark,) is that the Angels read," and although we can but claim to be of humbler birth, yet, I do assure you it rejoices my heart to read and hear of Zion's borders being enlarged. I contribute my mite to the general fund. Our meeting began Saturday, the 21st; continued until today, the 31st.

The power of the Holy One has been in our midst, in converting and sanctifying grace. Seventy-two whites added, and thirty-six blacks; making an aggregate of one hundred and eight. Now Conversions generally estimated at over one hundred. We were much indebted to the indefatigable labors of Professors Youngblood, Wheat and others.

Brethren, one and all, your reward is in Heaven. The ladies, but few in number, gave $20 Crif money; six young ladies gave $35 worth of jewelry to the Missionary cause. God give us modest Methodism, "beauty unadorned, is most adored." This closes our labors on Amite Circuit.

Geo. J. Mortimer.

Allen Castle, Oct. 30.

Green Ct., Alabama Conference.—We have had some good meetings lately. At Trinity, seven conversions, and six accessions to the Church. At Pleasant Grove, seventeen conversions, and nine accessions. At Holly Springs, twenty conversions, and twenty five accessions.

CALIFORNIA MATTERS.

W. S. Mount Esq., writes that he has concluded to drive down his stakes in California. We wish for him all manner of blessings in his new home. The Pacific country needs such men and though we reluctantly yield them, we are persuaded a good usury will come of the investment to the Church and every good cause. His leaving NewOrleans now, takes away another very useful member of the Methodist Church and she has lost not a few, by death and removal, the year past. It also vacates a place in the Board of Managers of the South-Western Bible Society, the Public School Board and the Board of Trustees of the Church.

He writes us that W. R. Goodall has been elected to the California Legislature—rather a different representation from that he was sent out for.

The Sectarian Schools which were established by Roman Catholic priests in San Francisco, and have drawn $17,000 from the pockets of the people, have proved abortions, and are complained of by the Grand Jury as nuisances.

We copy from the San Francisco Christian Advocate an interesting letter, from a Missionary of the M. E. Church, South:

Messrs. Editors: Allow me to inform the readers of the Advocate that we have recently witnessed gracious refreshings from the presence of the Lord. At a camp meeting held in Pajaro Valley, two weeks since, several persons professed the blessing of sanctification, upwards of twenty were converted, and thirty-seven added to Church.

Our camp meeting for this (Santa Clara) Circuit, has just closed. Thirteen persons joined the Church, and six or eight professed religion. We have seldom attended a better, anywhere. I am in receipt of information from different parts of the State, and from all I can learn, our prospects for doing good have never been so flattering, at any former period, in this country, as at present. You may not see the necessity of two organizations of the Methodist Church in California, but there are thousands who can not fellowship your views on the subject of politics and slavery, as expressed in the Advocate; and the better way for all concerned, is for us to be separate and distinct in our movements, while we apply ourselves to the great work of "spreading scriptural holiness over these lands." I would say to those eight brethren, who prefer a Southern preacher, and to all whom it may concern, that the Methodist Episcopal Church South is permanently established on the shores of the Pacific, and vigorous efforts will be used to supply our people with the ministers of their choice. I read your paper with deep interest, and do heartily rejoice at the bold stand you take against the prevalent vices of this country. I say Amen to all you write, and to all that is written in your paper against drunkenness, swearing, Sabbath-breaking, and the sins that disgrace our land; but I must say, if you continue your present course towards the people of the South, if you do not drive a large majority of them from under your power and influence, I am greatly mistaken.

Your brother in Christ,

A. M. Bailey.

Santa Clara, Sept. 16th, 1854.

SIX OUT OF THIRTEEN.

We copy from the Church Herald a portion of Bishop Hopkin's Convocation Address. He is congratulating his Church on what she is and what she has done:

"For if we look to our advance in the United States, under the weighty disadvantages of the Revolutionary war, which placed us, for many years, under a cloud of political odium, we find that we have grown, from a very humble beginning, up to 35 acting Bishops, and 1650 clergymen: while every State and Territory is partially supplied, and we have extended our work to Africa and China. Our numbers, indeed, are still far below those of several christian sects, but our ratio of increase has gone greatly beyond them. The character of our people stands in the highest rank for position and intelligence. Witness the fact that out of thirteen Presidents of the United States, Washington, Monroe, Madison, Harrison, Tyler and Taylor, were Episcopalians. Witness the fact that Calhoun, Clay and Webster, were the same, to say nothing of the numerous living lights of the nation. It is also certain that our services are the most acceptable, because they are the best adapted to the army and the navy. And the movements of our church are regarded with much more general interest throughout the land, than those of any other."

The Liturgy is used in the Queen's Chapel: the robes and Prayer Book also. English nobles and statesmen patronize the Episcopal Church. It is part of their aristocratic system. As in other things, the Court sets the fashion. This prestige is felt in the United States; and, as far as religion is a fashion, makes the Episcopal Church fashionable here. As far as religion is a fashion, we say: for it cannot be disguised that there are many people who chose their pastor as they do their tailor or milliner. They would not be caught doing any unfashionable thing. Their Church is selected not in view of the fellowship of saints. They have no notions of doctrine. The question is not—"Where will my spirituality be promoted,—where do I hear the preaching and witness the usages most accordant with true religion." Not at all. But rather!—"Is this the place where the upper ten do congregate—Is it here we meet our best society?—Here let me dwell." High or low Church may be preached there, or no Church at all: Calvinism or Arminianism—it is all the same to them. "Ours is the fashionable Church" is an argument that can be appreciated by those insensible to any other; and, it has been found hard to resist by even a higher order of Church goers. Flunkyism is one of the isms.

There may be something taking even to our statesmen (for they are but men and have their weak places) in doing the same way that Lord such-a-one is doing on the other side of the water. Even on their knees, the diplomatic level is maintained. The nearest approach to a royal road to Heaven is that wherein royality travels.

Passing beyond these reflections, it does seem strange that a Bishop, in Convocation, should boast after this line of things. St. Paul held a different language—"For ye see your calling brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called." John the Baptist received as an identification of Jesus and His ministry—"The poor have the Gospel preached to them." Bishop Hopkins boasts that "the Church of our people stands in the highest rank for——position and intelligence." He calls to witness the fact that out of thirteen Presidents six were Episcopalians!! Then there is the noble trio—Calhoun, Clay and Webster, to glory in. If this does not prove the Episcopal Church the true Church what will? "Our services" are the most acceptable to those very holy and spiritually-minded people of the army and navy!! Another proof of an Apostolical Church.

The rich are not to be despised. The Gospel belongs to them as well as the poor. Influence and position are not to be despised by the Church, but sanctified. However the rich and the noble are few, the poor many. Where the gospel is offered like Christ and his Apostles offered it, the noble and rich form a very small proportion of its converts; not only because of numerical but moral reasons. Wealth and position present peculiar hindrances and snares to the soul. It is therefore a very suspicious circumstance if "the common people" do not make up the large majority of any Christian Church.

The Church that boasts of an undue proportion of rich and noble is liable to the suspicion of not having worked faithfully under the world charter, the every-creature-commission of her Head, but of having yielded to the temptation of pandering and flattering those who can afford religious luxuries.

The Episcopal Church boasts of six out of thirteen Presidents in the United States: Nearly one half of the Presidents. Has she one half of the citizens—one half of the slaves? No: not one in hundreds. But she takes care of the Presidents souls!

Has the Episcopal Church one half of the Christian membership in the United States? No! she is among the smallest in her membership. This looks like picking and culling for the souls, of the high ranks; cultivating the first families.

We have heard it said of an excellent Bishop of the P. E. Church, in small favor, however, with its Puseyite wing, that before his Convention he exclaimed with emphasis—"Brethren, I am alarmed that there are so few poor in our Church."

Of a certain Church in C—— it has been boastingly proclaimed.—"There was not a communicant in it with less than $30,000." What an Apostolic boast!!

We thank God for Methodism that while the rich, and the noble, and wise, and mighty are represented in her membership, they are not found there in suspicious disproportion. The world is taken as it comes. Take any section of population—analyse it. Take any section of Methodism—analyse it. The relative members of rich and poor, high and low, wise and ignorant, will be found much the same in her membership as it actually exists in the world. She is debtor to all, without any class of preferred creditors. She goes to all. God has given her of all. These, we take it, are the most healthful indications to be drawn from a Church census. So far as any Church or ministry is confined to a class, their claims to apostolical character are invalidated. God's Church is intended for saving God's world.

The License Question.—On Thursday the 9th inst., this was decided for another twelve months. The vote in favor of License was largely in the majority. Total for License 7595; Total against 2404: majority for License 5181. It exceeds the majority of '52 by over a thousand votes. This looks like moral regression. The influence of 2800 drinking houses, backed by the city press for the most part, has contributed to the lamentable result.

Rev. Dr. Deems.—A telegraphic dispatch informs us that this gentleman finally declines the Presidency of Centenary College. The board is at this time in session and will make other arrangements, probably.

New Lexington Ct., Alabama Conference, Nov. 2nd 1854.—Dear Editor: We have had a glorious time this year on this circuit. We have received up to November 1st two hundred and twenty into the Church. Expelled one, dropped three, withdrawn two, and the circuit much revived.

Julius N. Glover.

Felicity Street Church.—The Protracted Meeting at this Church is still in successful progress. Fifty conversions, and between thirty and forty accessions thus far. The week deepens in interest, mourners still throng the altar, and the congregations are large and serious.

The Solar System.—A better idea of the relative distances and magnitude of the bodies in the solar system than can be obtained from orreries or planispheres, is presented by an astronomical writer, in somewhat like the following manner: In the center of a large level plain three miles in diameter, place a globe two feet in diameter, to represent the Sun. At this distance of eighty-two feet from the globe put a grain of mustard seed, to represent Mercury, the planet nearest the Sun, which gives it an orbit four hundred and ninety-two feet in circumference. For Venus, take a pea, and place it one hundred and forty-two feet distant from the globe, which will give her orbit eight hundred and forty-two feet. For the Earth, take also a pea, and place it two hundred and fifteen feet distant, which will make her orbit one thousand two hundred and ninety feet. For Mars, take a grain of pearl barley, place it three hundred and twenty-seven feet distant, and its orbit will be one thousand nine hundred and sixty-two feet. For the inferior planets, Juno, Ceres, Vesta and Pallas, take grains of sand, and allow them orbits varying from one thousand to one thousand and two hundred feet. For Jupiter, take a middle sized orange, and place it about a quarter of a mile distant, which will make its orbit a mile and a half. For Saturn, take a small orange, place it nearly half a mile distant, so that its orbit may be nearly three miles. Then for the planet Herschell take a full sized cherry or boy's marble, and carry it nearly a mile distant, so that its orbit may be nearly six miles; and having got these relative magnitudes and distances and pretty well fixed in the mind, allow a million of miles in space for every foot of these distances in the field, and you may form some faint conception of this one of the innumerable solar systems with which the Creator has adorned the the immensity of the Universe.

The Chief Engineer of Sebastopol.—Every one (says an English paper,) has heard of Sebastopol, but every one has not heard of Col. Upton, for many years the chief engineer of that redoubtable fortification. Mr. Upton was the surveyor of the Dunchurch and Stratford road, and resided at Daventry many years. His name frequently appears in the parliamentary reports of the Commissioners of the Holyhead road, between the years 1818 and 1826. All the great improvements on the above line were made under his superintendence; and Mr. Telford, who was the engineer of the Holyhead road, had the highest opinion of his acquirements, and took every opportunity of stating his opinion of him to the commissioners. Mr. Upton got into a course of expensive living unwarranted by his means, and was induced to commit many gross frauds on the trustees of the road. These frauds were discovered in the month of April, 1826, and on inquiry by a competent person employed, it was discovered that he had trespassed on the funds of the trustees to an amount exceeding £2000. Evidence was taken at the time, of the facts, and he was held to bail to appear at the July Assizes following, to answer to the charge.

He appeared at the assizes, and answered when called upon to plead. The trial did not come on the first day of the assize. He had been given to understand by his solicitor that he would be merely indicted for a fraud, but he obtained information he could not doubt that he would be indicted for forgery, and, if found guilty, would probably be hanged. He slept at Northampton, got up about 7 o'clock, said he was going to take a walk and should return to breakfast. He did not, however, appear again, and, as it seemed, went that morning to London. By some means he got a recommendation to the Russian authorities in London, received the appointment of engineer, and was in a few days on his way to the Crimea. We have not heard by what means he obtained his recommendation, but if we were to publish them they would implicate parties whose characters were unimpeached. As talents are much more highly prized in Russia than honesty, it is possible that his real character might have been given. Talents are the first thing required in that country, and the surest guarantee for honesty is the certainty of being hanged if you are detected in being otherwise.

When Mr. Upton went to Sebastopol the harbor was in a very inefficient state, and in vain had several engineers endeavored to improve it. There was great difficulty in getting the water into it soon to admit large ships. He procured immense iron works at Birmingham, and by dint of science, labor and expense, he made it what it is. The whole time of his residence in the Crimea, he has been engaged in the fortifications in the Black Sea, and has been for some years the chief engineer at Sebastopol. The Emperor was so pleased with him that he gave him the rank of lieutenant colonel in the army, and he was received at the palace in St. Petersburg. In addition to his numerous forgeries and frauds he got upwards of three thousand pounds of the money of his wife's relations, not one farthing of which did he repay. He held the Post-office at Daventry for a year, and at the end of it was a defaulter of nearly three hundred pounds, which one of his sureties was obliged to pay. He died about a year ago, and has left a name (infamous though it be) more durable than the brass artillery he planted at Sebastopol.

African Traveler.—News of Dr. Barth, from Timbuctoo, has recently reached his father at Hamburg. Dr. Barth's letters, dated in December last, were transmitted across the desert in caravans to the Mediterranean shore of Africa. One of them commences thus:

"I am still kept here in this city with its mixed and varied population and its numerous masters, each of whom strives to assume as much authority as possible. Like a helpless vessel drifting on the ocean, am I thrown about in a sea of uncertainty, between the power and passion of contending parties, without possessing a moment's rest or quietness. Every day brings with it something new, now of a satisfactory character, then again the reverse. Death, captivity, safe return home, are my visions by turns, and it is yet impossible to say which of the three will be my fate."

Dr. Barth was in good health and spirits, and hoping shortly to start, under the efficient escort of one hundred Tuarick horsemen, backward down the Kowara. The Tuaricks are disposed to trade with England, and would protect any English vessel going up the Kowara.

LECTURES.

The Northern mind seems once more to have been thoroughly awakened upon the subject of lectures and lecturers. New associations are announced, and the names of new speakers heralded. It would take a large portion of our space merely to mention the different individuals who now hold themselves in readiness for lecturing engagements, hopeful either of profit or glory.

The mania for public lectures has not, as yet, extended into the South. But few lyceums or literary societies have been formed here for the purpose of engaging a series of orators during a stated period of time, and popularizing knowledge by the brilliant metaphors and antitheses they might dispense. Something of pleasure and something of profit is, undoubtedly, lost by this disregard of a most useful and interesting means of intelligence and enlightenment. Much information that might be usefully dispensed remains locked up, much ability that might be displayed is disregarded, and much literary gratification overlooked.

There are, undoubtedly, some very serious objections to be urged against the existing system of public lectures. Men of small ability are frequently chosen to teach the public, and their addresses have a wrong rather than a right direction. Even in those instances where able and educated men are induced to speak on literary subjects or subjects of general and immediate interest, some personal crotchet is likely to protrude and mar the whole. Charles Sumner can not make an address without alluding to war, nor Henry Beecher without referring to slavery, or Horace Greeley without making mention of temperance. In the long list of public lectures announced by Northern papers, we have not met any name that has not been committed to the advocacy or defense of some ism which; to say the least, were better fitted for special occasions of debate than for general meetings. It must be apparent, too, that no subject can be fully and thoroughly treated in the short space of time allowed for a public address. Only the head and outlines can be alluded to—the body and substance must be left for further research.

There are also some strong reasons in favor of public lectures. They are calculated to attract many who would not otherwise seek for any means of information, and to diffuse knowledge that might remain locked up. They condense into a few sentences what, elsewhere, is diffused through much space. They make learning agreeable, and tend to make it popular. They awaken an interest that can only be allayed by reading, and thus contribute something to the spread of general information. They profitably occupy time that might be foolishly frittered away. They generally treat of matters of general interest, and give an epitome of what is most valuable concerning them.

There are, then, arguments for and against public lectures. Those in their favor seem to us stronger than those in opposition, and induce the hope that we may have them as frequent in New Orleans as they are in New York or Boston. Some able men will be engaged, upon important subjects discussed, some useful information conveyed and some interest awakened in the diffusion of knowledge. Let us have lectures.

Viviparous Fish.—A correspondent, writing to the Delta, on the subject of viviparous fish, one of which was recently discovered here, very clearly shows that the discovery is not new or singular, but that the fact that certain kinds of fish were vivaparous was known long ago.

The statement which he makes reminds us of a fact that had wholly escaped our memory when we noticed the discovery alluded to. About two years ago we caught a dog fish, of the Hole-in-the-Wall, that contained seven young, all perfectly formed and nearly two inches long. The fact that this class of fish are viviparous was remarked some years since by Hugh Miller, and has been elsewhere recorded. There are several other classes distinguished in the same way. Our new discovery, therefore, is only the discovery of an old fact, well known to all fishermen.

Immoral Works.—A Philadelphia cotemporary, in calling the attention of the authorities to the fact that works of the most indecent character are hawked about the streets and in the public hotels by peddlers, young and old, asserts that Cincinnati and New Orleans are two of the principal sources from which these streams of filth and corruption emanate. "We have every reason to believe," it is added, "that many of them are even published here, and we know from personal knowledge that the plates are prepared in New Orleans, where an artist employing upwards of forty hands is kept constantly engaged in putting up his infamous productions of art for the northern market.

We are not aware how great the "personal knowledge of a Philadelphia cotemporary" may be with the style of literature and art to which he alludes, nor how large a patronage the immoral citizens of that place may extend to immoral pictures and publications. It is a branch of literature to which we have never paid attention, and which has never been obtruded upon our notice here. As to the fact of forty artists being employed in this city constantly in preparing obscene plates, it may or may not be true, although it seems exceedingly doubtful. If true, it is at least true that their productions are not for home use, where there is no demand, but for exportation to the christians of Philadelphia and other Northern cities. Cannot those newspapers who are so fond of abusing and vilifying the South, and particularly New Orleans, attach this fact to the foregoing statement, and infer them travel together?

The telegraph informs us that the difficulties between the Post-master General and the South Carolina Railroad have been adjusted, and that the mails will continue to be carried over the road.

Munificent Legacy.—The executors of the late Hon. Samuel Appleton have transferred stocks to the par value of $25,000 to the Boston Athenæum, from the fund of $200,000, bequeathed by the deceased to distribute at their discretion for "scientific" purposes. At the time an effort was made last year to place the Athenæum on a firm basis, the president of the corporation announced a donation of $25,000 from a source which he was not at liberty to name. It now appears that the above arrangement was then agreed upon.

Emigration to Arkansas and Texas.—The Memphis Whig says:

There is a heavy tide of emigration passing through this city daily, destined to add to the rapidly increasing population of Arkansas and Texas, mostly the former State. The two steam ferry boats passing between this and the Arkansas shore are doing an immense business in carrying movers across the river, taking full loads hourly during the day, and "the cry is still they come." A large addition will be made to the population of Arkansas the present fall and winter, all of a good class of citizens, who are well provided and stocked.

Transportation of Officers' Families.—In recently deciding on a claim in the Treasury Department, it was decided that the laws and regulations of the army authorizing pay for transportation to officers traveling on duty, do not include their families; and no payments on their account for travel or passage money can be legally allowed.

The Great Fire in Cleveland.—From the Cleveland papers we learn that the great fire which occurred in the morning of the 24th, entailed a loss of more than one million dollars. It originated in the stables attached to the New England Hotel, destroying the house and the entire square upon the hill where it stood. The loss was principally in store and dwelling houses, and the amount of insurance, although heavy, was not known

OBITUARY:

Died, of consumption, in Pickens county, Miss., on the 12th of September, 1854, EMILY ANN, daughter of Julius N. and Mahala Hart.

She was born, August 24th, 1834, in Lauderdale District, S. C. Joined the M. E. Church about 9 years of age; professed religion early. She was an example of piety; noted for her Godly walk and conversation; devoted to the Bible and Sabbath School, and committed much of the Scriptures to memory. She was confined long, but not a murmur was heard from her lips, but bore her affliction with Christian patience and resignation. When her physician, (Dr. F. S. Hill,) announced the solemn truth to her, that she must soon die, she received the information joyfully and submisively. Her death was one of the most triumphant in modern days. When she felt that the cold dew of death was gathering upon her brow, she called her beloved father, affectionate mother, and loving brother and sisters, and neighbors to her bedside, and gave them her last charge, "to meet her in Heaven" then taking the parting hand of each, fell asleep in Jesus.

"Thou art gone to the grave, but we will not deplore thee":
Though sorrows and darkness encompass the tomb.
The Saviour has passed through its portals before thee,
And the lamp of His love is thy guide through its gloom."

The total number of deaths, the previous week, was 243, of yellow fever 107—showing a great decrease in favor of last week. Of the yellow fever cases, thirty-four died at the Charity Hospital, leaving only eight for the city proper.

The Secretary of War recently paid a visit to West Point Academy, to inspect the practical merits of a system of field tactics, just arranged by a Board of Experienced Officers of the Army. The system, if approved by the War Department, will be approved by the President, and become the uniform system for the fight ing of the army and militia of the country. It has in view for its object a greater celerity of movements, and to enable such troops rapidly to concentrate to resist the enemy, to pursue them, to move with them, and to keep all day on forced marches, of the accelerated gait of "trot" and slow gallop.

Hon. George M. Dallas is out in a letter, (again his adhesion to a movement in Pennsylvania, centering in Philadelphia,) to form a "constitutional party"—that is to say, a party pledged to maintain the General Constitution, as paramount to all other laws, of local or national character. The new party professes to have in its embrace Whigs as well as Democrats. Thus A. J. Dallas bids them God speed, and tells them they have organized a moment too soon, seeing the powerful elements of sectionalism and disunion that are now at work.

A convention of the survivors of the war of 1812 is to be held in Washington, on the 8th of January next, to adopt such measures as will induce Congress not only to do justice to them, but also to the widows of those who have gone to their last account.

Of one hundred and three persons committed to the Jersey City Prison, last month, but five were natives of the United States; of England and Germany, each, there were seven natives, of Scotland 2, and of Canada 1. The remaining seventy-nine were all natives of Ireland.

The New York papers state that about one hundred hogs died on the Erie Railroad train, from suffocation, a few days ago, and that they were purchased by a dealer near Newburg at a dollar a head, and dressed for the New York market.

Joseph Nicholas, a son of Col. Nicholas, of Isabelle, Ind., aged 17 years, was instantly killed on Tuesday week, by falling from the top of a hickory tree to the ground, a distance of sixty feet.

The body of an infant was found in the water at Jones's Falls in Baltimore, on the morning of the 1st inst. A cord was drawn tightly around its neck, indicating that it had been strangled to death.

FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE.—During a part of last week, the District Court in Ohio was engaged in trying a case against R. R. Sloan, an attorney at Sandusky, charged with aiding in the escape of four fugitive slaves. The action was brought under under the fugitive slave law of 1850, for the penalty, which is $1000 for each slave. Two suits had been commenced, by different owners, but all the circumstances against the defendant were the same, it was agreed that both the cases should be passed upon at once.

The verdict was, not guilty in one case, and guilty in the other. The verdict of not guilty was found under the instructions of the Court, the power of attorney under which the arrest was made being null and void.

In the case of Weymer vs. Sloan, where the verdict was guilty there were three slaves involved, and the penalty by the law is $3000, which will be the amount of judgment with costs. So far as we have heard an expression of opinion it is of surprise at the verdict in this last case.—N. Y. Sun.

LOCKPORT, Nov. 2, 9:30 P. M.—A dreadful fire is now raging in Lockport, and the greater portion of the north part of the town is in ruins. At the present time it is impossible to state the extent of the damage, as there is no knowing where the destruction of property will cease. The Tremont house, the Congregational church, and the entire block of buildings between them are entirely destroyed.

Six bridges are in flames, and the entire north part of the town is threatened with destruction.

The Buffalo Fire Department has been telegraphed for, and will proceed immediately to the scene of destruction.

MR. SWISSHELM ON HYDROPATHY. (The celebrated editress of the Pittsburgh Family Visiter.)

In 1776, a patriotic fever broke out in this country which became epidemic. Our father-in-law, then a youth, had a prolonged and severe attack of the disease; and when he was, with a large number of the afflicted, on the banks of the Delaware, under the charge of Doctor Hodge Washington. One night he knew by the symptoms that all his patients would have a gunpowder system in the morning, unless some measures were taken to prevent it; and he ordered them all to plunge in the Delaware, a rigorous rubbing with ice cakes, to swim to the other shore, and then haul them "packed away" in wet blankets until the next morning. Some died from the effects of the treatment, but to the patient to whom we were most particularly interested it resulted in a confirmed asthma, which descended to his children. So our finger half gets up a coughing and wheezing spell almost every evening, until lately, when it begins to take a few drops of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which gives him immediate relief. Thus we have a present experience in our family, which says, that although water is all the medicine we require, other people may need something else.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

NEW YORK, Nov. 9.—The Cunard steamer America has arrived at Halifax, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 28th of October, one week later than the accounts brought by the Arabia. The following is a summary of her news:

Liverpool Markets.

LIVERPOOL, Oct. 28.—There has been a fair demand for Cotton in this market since the departure of the Arabia, and the sales of the week embrace 40,000 bales, of which 3000 bales have been taken for speculation, and 4000 for export. Sellers have generally realized very full prices, but the market closed without any quotable advance. The quotations remain as follows: Fair Orleans, 6¼d; Middling Orleans, 5¾d; Fair Uplands, 6d, and Middling Uplands, 5¼d per lb. Breadstuffs have continued active, and most descriptions have further improved. Flour has advanced 2s, and closes at 42s for Western Canal, and 44s per barrel for Ohio brands. White Wheat is quoted at 12s to 12s 6d per 70 lbs. Indian Corn is 1s higher, and closes at 43s per quarter for White and Yellow alike. Lard has been dull, and the rates are easier. Pork and Beef are without any material change. Bacon, however, has advanced one shilling per cwt. Freights have been firm at previous quotations.

Money and Trade.

The money market at London has been rather easy, but Console are quoted at 94⅛. But little has been doing in United States securities, which are unchanged in rates. The hullion in the Bank of England has increased 500,000 pounds sterling during the week. Trade in the manufacturing districts has been dull, and prices have slightly fallen off.

General News.

The latest accounts from the Crimea report that the bombardment of Sebastopol continued, but the place had not yet fallen.

AUSTRIA AND PRUSSIA.—There is a great quarrel between Austria and Prussia, and there is danger of immediate war between these two States.

FRANCE AND MR. SOULE.—Mr. Soule, who was about to return to his post in Madrid, applied to the French authorities for permission to pass through France on his way. The Government, however, refused to grant him permission to do so.

Steamer Yankee Blade Lost.

NEW YORK, Nov. 9.—The steamer North Star, with later news from California, has just passed Sandy Hook. She reports by telegraph that the steamer Yankee Blade has been lost. No particulars yet received.

NEW YORK, November 9.—The steamer Brother Jonathan has arrived from San Juan, bringing the passengers of the steamer Yankee Blade, recently wrecked on the Pacific coast. The Yankee Blade went ashore in a heavy fog, when one day out from San Francisco. Nearly all the passengers, numbering about 800, were saved by the steamer Goliad, but fifteen lives were lost. A terrible scene of pillage followed the wrecking of the steamer. All the specie on board, amounting to about $153,000, was lost. The steamer was a total wreck.

Black Warrior.

NEW YORK, Nov. 9.—The steamer Black Warrior sailed to-day for New Orleans, via Havana, with one hundred and twenty-five passengers.

A Duel.

COLUMBIA, (S. C.) Nov. 9.—A duel took place to-day about fourteen miles from this place, between Mr. Peter Gaffney and Dr. Rae. Mr. Gaffney was killed at the second fire.

Death of Mrs. Hamilton.

NEW YORK, Nov. 8.—The widow of Alexander Hamilton died last night at her residence near this city.

New York Markets.

NEW YORK, Nov. 8.—The Cotton market here is yet dull and prices are easier, though without any quotable change. The Flour market continues depressed, and prices are 12½c. lower. Sales of good Ohio brands at $8 56¼ to $8 87½. per bbl.

THE GREAT RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

Details of the recent dreadful collision on the Western Railroad.—Statement of T. F. Meagher, Esq. The Detroit Tribune gives the following additional particulars of the accident on the Great Western Railroad, caused by a passenger train coming in collision with a gravel hurthen train in a fog—the account comes from Mr. T. F. Magher.

The train left Chatham at 4½ A. M., and reached the fatal spot at 5:10 A. M. Mr. Meagher had been asleep about twenty minutes when he was startled by a deep, rumbling noise, like the sound of a heavy spout wave as it subsides. On coming to a clearer consciousness, he distinctly heard the crashing and ripping of timbers all around him, mingled with the most fearful shrieks and groans, and the noise of escaping steam. The floor under him was vibrating while he was crushed in the seat, the roof falling down immediately before him, striking him in the face with a large torn fragment. He made an instant effort to get clear from the ruins, but found his right foot caught beneath the seat and the broken floor. Upon making a second trial he succeeded in drawing out his leg, leaving the boot in the ruins as if in a bootjack. He succeeded in reaching the door, where he stumbled over the body of John Martin, the breakman, at that end of the car. He had been evidently at the brake at the moment of the collision, and was flung back into the doorway of the car. On procuring a lamp, a little after, he found that Martin had both thighs and both arms broken—the latter above the elbows. His head, too, appeared to have been dreadfully bruised, though no wound could be perceived. This noble fellow deserves especial mention. Upon going to him when the morning broke and offering to remove him to a comfortable situation, he answered, "Never mind me—help those who are living, for I am done for." Somewhat later, upon bringing him a drink of water, he asked Meagher to turn him on his side a little more, so that he might die quietly.

Fires were immediately kindled by the passengers, which afforded light by which at a glance the awful wreck and havoc which had been made could be seen.

The passenger engine and tender were lying at the foot of the embankment—some twenty feet high—bottom side upwards, smashed into fragments, with the smoke stack and iron portions embedded in the marsh, which at this point, (Baptist Creek) stretched away on both sides of the road. The fire had been completely thrown out, and the hot cinders were smoking in the wet grass. The first baggage car was perfectly unhurt; but the second one was dashed into the first second-class car, and with the latter formed an immense mass of splintors, wood-work, iron-work, bones, brains, mangled flesh, torn clothes, broken rifles, loaves of bread and other eatables, jumbled together as if a mine of gunpowder had blown them into this enormous heap of rubbish. The last second-class car had been driven right upon the roof of the forward first-class car more than half way in length. The weight of it had crushed in the fore part of the car beneath it, leaving the rest of it but little injured.

On both sides of the embankment, below the cars, were the wounded and dying—some of them flung out violently from the wreck, others having crawled down with broken legs, while yet others had been carried to the fires by the passengers. It is shocking even to think of the scene, as it would be utterly sickening to describe the various wounds and hideous mutilations inflicted upon the poor sufferers. Lying immediately under the rear platform of the forward first-class car, he saw the first corpse—that of a child about three years of age. The head was frightfully swollen and discolored. He lifted it up, and found that a splinter about seven inches long, and shaped and sharply pointed like an arrow head, had entered behind the right ear and passed through the right cheek and come out by the side of the nose. He endeavored to pull out the fragment, but was unable to do so. The child was stone dead. An old lady with gray hair, whom he assisted to place on cushions at the foot of the embankment, had both legs below the knee torn open with gashes seven or eight inches in length and an inch and a half in breadth. The bone was completely exposed, and the wounds had all the appearance of having been given by some heavy blunt fragment. The protruding flesh was jagged and torn.

A colored man, of large and powerfully built frame, was lying a little below the first baggage-car, with both legs broken, the bones being thrust through his pantaloons as though cut off with a cleaver. His mouth was filled and his face about covered with a large mass of what appeared to be the purest white foam. He was one of the brakemen on the gravel train. Another of the colored brakemen on that train, he found lying on his face on a gravel heap on one of the cars with his head as if beaten with a heavy mallet into the gravel. His leg had been literally torn off from the middle of the thigh, and was hanging down, being caught between the two cars in falling, the sole of the foot being uppermost, and the sinews, arteries of the limb and shreds of flesh dripping and dangling about. From the forward window of the half-crushed car, the neck and shoulders of a muscular man were thrust out, the head having been cut off as if with a guillotine. He looked for the head but could not find it.

One thing which attracted his notice was the discoloration of the bodies—buried up in the ruins, bearing the appearance of bruises and suffocation.

Upon the conductor and others cutting their way through the foremost first class car into the wreck, and clearing away the fragments, they found some twenty bodies of men, women and children, wedged in together with the fragments of the cars. The stain at the bottom of a ditch in front of a battery of canon, could not have presented a more horrible spectacle. There were two or three layers of these bodies and ruins, and they were packed and pressed together as if a heavy slab of iron had fallen upon and crushed them. There was very little blood flowing from any wounds, but their tongues and eyes were forced out of their sockets and mouths as though they had been choked. In this car occurred an almost incredible escape. A young man, about twenty-three, stoutly built, had been flung up against the roof of the car which was forced off at the time, and his left leg and arm were pushed outside, but the platform of the next car forward had fallen upon him at the moment, and had tightly fastened him. The left leg and arm were outside of the car, with the rest of the body hanging inside of the car, with the face looking downwards.

The conductor was the first to discover him, and immediately exclaimed on finding him alive, that he must be saved. Making their way through the ruins and over the dead bodies, the conductor and the party with him reached the spot where the poor fellow was clinched and rivited between the timbers. He was full of heart, and bade them work on, and that he could hold out if they could. He must have been some three hours and a half in this position before he was discovered and found to be alive. After half an hour's work a saw was found, and three men, Mr. Edwin A. Skeele of St. Louis, a man from Vermont, and Mr. Meagher, relieved each other in sawing him out. This was accomplished in about three-quarters of an hour, the man suffering intensely the while. Two or three times he fainted and dropped his head, but fortunately they were enabled to recover him with some brandy which Prof Brownson, of Boston, happened to have with him, and which he placed in Mr. Meagher's hands for the sufferer. Upon excavating the man they found that the thigh was badly crushed, as also the arm and lower part of the stomach. The left side of his face and forehead were also lacerated, but, apparently, no other or mortal injuries had been inflicted. He was brought out and laid in one of the uninjured cars which had been, meanwhile, fitted up for the reception of the wounded, by placing boards upon the top of the seat-backs, so that when the surgeons reached the spot they found nearly all the injured lying in two rows on either side of the cars, from end to end. The children were placed underneath upon the seats. The havoc among the children was dreadful—several of them being killed outright, some in their mother's arms, while those who were alive were, many of them, badly maimed. As an instance of this, it may be mentioned that four children had their legs amputated. One beautiful girl, about six years old, with black hair and eyes, was found with her right leg broken about three inches above the ancle—the little foot being connected to the limb only by the flesh, causing it to hang down.

Previous to the arrival of surgeons, the passengers generally were busied on all hands in attending to the wants of the wounded, carrying them water, bathing their foreheads, washing away the blood, and administering such other relief as lay in their power. One old gentleman had discovered a package of tea in the rubbish, and having procured a large kettle, was busily engaged the whole morning in making and distributing it to the sufferers. His name is not known. Others of the passengers, assisted by several workmen, were occupied in laying out the bodies of the dead, and covering them with the torn canvass of the cars.

It is undoubtedly, taken altogether, the worst accident by railroad collision that has occurred on this continent, and it is to be hoped that the day is far distant that will witness its like. Most of the killed and injured were second class passengers, who were emigrants. We should say that, except the Bodfish and Oakes family, there was not an American among the dead. Of this, we could not be positive, as the faces were horribly gashed, besmeared with blood, and begrimed with the sand and gravel of the embankment. The entire attention of those on the spot had been bestowed upon the wounded to the necessary neglect beyond the reach of mortal aid and the endurance of lingering pain. The dead bodies were taken to Chatham last evening, where the coroner's jury met this morning to investigate still farther this matter. It will be seen by the list which we secured from the coroner, that there were forty-seven killed on the spot. We were informed by Dr. Brodie, of this city, who was at Chatham nearly all day yesterday in attendance upon the sufferers, that one died—a woman—shortly after reaching that place. She had a terrible gash in the head. This makes the total, thus far, forty-eight. There were exactly fifty taken to Chatham badly wounded, and say thirty others more or less scratched.

The engineer and fireman of the passenger train had a wonderful escape. They went down the embankment with their engine, and were rescued from under the mass unhurt. We will relate one of the many touching incidents with which our paper might be filled, attendant upon this disaster. A German woman and her child, between three and four years old, were on their way to Chicago to meet her husband, who was already there. After a while she was dug out from the ruins comparatively uninjured, but she was separated from her child and began searching for it. Conductor Nutter, before this, had taken several children, more or less hurt, but all alive, back to one of the cars on the track and safely deposited them there. The mother found the shoes of her little one among the rubbish, and began moaning and crying over them in a piteous manner. When asked by conductor N what was the matter, she could only reply in her dialect, "Bobby, Bobby," signifying that she had lost her baby. Mr. N. went back to the car, for he dare not rouse her hope without good reason, and examined the children already there. One of them had no shoes, they probably having been torn off in the collision, and he immediately made up his mind that this was the lost one.

He went back, and by signs, called the mother to the car, where, with a mother's quick eye made keen to perceive by the intensity of her love, she recognized her little boy whom she had mourned as dead. Conductor N. described the meeting of the two with a shake of the head as he wiped the tears from his eyes—we could imagine the rest.

BLACKWOOD ON AMERICA.

With the exception of the London Times, there has never been any European paper or periodical more diligent in its detraction of every thing American—more constant in its abuse and misrepresentation of our people, our policy and our character, than Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine. Sidney Smith hated the United States after a manner that would have eternally exclaimed him to Sam Johnson, and gave evidence of his hatred in articles that were bitter if they were not true, and frequent if not just. Kit North had his grudge also, though from what cause it morse no one can say, and contributed a part of the abuse that was heaped on us by his magazine. It was Blackwood that sneeringly asked, "Who reads an American book?" It was Blackwood that reviewed with so great gusto the travels of Mrs. Trollope, the voracious chronicles of Capt. Hall, and the authentic notes of Charles Dickens, and it was also Blackwood that damned the nation for the repudiation faults of Pennsylvania and Mississippi.

The Times has not yet been able to find any thing praiseworthy in our people or in our institutions. It is as bitterly hostile to-day as in 1812, and makes the most of every opportunity for abuse and detraction. Wonderful to say, however, Blackwood has taken a new tone and can now commend an American book, approve of an American principle and even defend slavery and our longings for Cuba. In an elaborate review of a recent work published upon this side of the water, we find the following language concerning slavery, which most assuredly would not have been used in years previous:

One and all of us consider the continuance of slavery, as it exists in America, a foul blot upon the nation, which precludes itself as peculiarly free, and we have said so in any thing but indecisive terms. Still, what we have said, is the expression of an opinion only. We may object to slavery in America, as we may object to the same institution in Turkey, or to serfage in Russia, or to any thing else beyond our cognizance and jurisdiction; but we do not establish many the right, when one separate nation possesses or regulates its own laws according to its peculiar position. We say, then, because of late years, the leads now towards popular demonstrations and sympathizing meetings in England has increased to such a degree as even to embarrass our relations with foreign powers.

We ought, in common decency, to remember that no very great tract of time has elapsed since slavery was abolished in the British colonies; and as in matters of this kind, interest is always a ruling motive, we should also bear in mind that the prosperity of those colonies has been increased by the substitution of free for forced labor. Very few of us, on this side of the Atlantic, are able to give a competent opinion as to what effect immediate and unconditional emancipation might produce upon the slave-holding States of America; and therefore we are hardly entitled to do more than assert the general principle, which condemns the absolute property of man in man.

We cannot take upon ourselves the responsibility of urging an immediate change, which might have the effect, in many important respects, of deteriorating instead of bettering the condition of the black population. What we say, by any possible effort, can the people of Great Britain do than they have done?

Most assuredly we have no right to dictate to other nations, or to insist that they shall adopt our views in the regulation of their internal policy. We might just as well attempt to coerce them in matters of religion and, founding upon our belief in the purity of Protestantism, insist that the Established Church shall become the conductor of the Americans. Certainly we shall not improve the cause of the American negro by indulging in bitter terms and unlimited objurgation against the States which do not, as yet, see their way to immediate emancipation. All the great reforms of the world have been progressive.—To hasten them unduly, and until men are fit to receive them, is the mere work of anarchy; and the world's history of the last 60 years shows us that all social ameliorations must be carefully and cautiously introduced.

This language is certainly very strong and unexpected. It must have come from some one better acquainted with our institutions than seven well-educated Englishmen generally are, and more liberal and just in his sentiments than the majority of magazine writers. Its insertion indicates a change of public sentiment, and a more friendly feeling toward this country—an indication strengthened by the tone of an article in the October number of the same periodical on the subject of "Spanish Politics and Cuban Perils." The views therein presented are not wholly correct, and yet they are so generally true, and withal are so favorable to this country, and so much in accordance with the feelings of those here who advocate the annexation of Cuba, that we are induced to make the following extracts. It will be seen that the writer deems annexation a question of time only, and is strongly in favor of the purchase of the island by our Government:

Supposing that, in the autumn of 1854, an American expedition, starting from Florida, or from one of the small islands in the Bahama channel, made a descent upon Cuba, were entirely worsted, and cut off or compelled to reembark. How long a time would elapse before a third expedition were got ready? Would not the interval probably be shorter than the one between the Lopez expedition and the present date? The dogged tenacity of a certain class of Americans when bent upon acquisition, is well known. And is it not probable that such expedition would succeed if the preceding one, in struggle, until one party found strength enough to triumph? The passage of the island from the feeble hands of bankrupt decrepid Spain into the strong ones of the young and vigorous Union, is a mere question of time, unless other nations interfere. Are any prepared to do so? England and France are of course the only powers to which Spain might look for aid to prevent her being robbed of her last valuable colony. And would she not look to them in vain, at least under present circumstances? I do not believe that the Spaniards reckon on such assistance. The reflecting portion of the nation—those who think upon the subject at all—seem convinced that the island must sooner or later pass from them. Some would be disposed to sell it, while it still has value, before the Americans feel so certain of getting it by other means that they will no longer feel disposed to disburse.

The Spaniards themselves admit that a part of the Creole population would be glad to see the Island detached from Spain. To these I suppose we may safely add, as partisans of Cuba's becoming a State of the Union, all the Anglo-Americans resident in the Island. Beyond this, I am in possession of no trustworthy evidence; and when I say that only a small portion of the Creoles or native whites are disaffected to the Spanish Government, I state it, as you will observe, on Spanish authority. As to the native Cubans, many of them would be likely to join the Americans, if these were strong, and gained advantages at first starting; but if the invaders were worsted, the Cubans would fly to arms and vaunt their fidelity to Spain. The negroes, who have no wish to exchange Spanish for American masters, and who are aware of the many disadvantages under which even a free man of color labors in the States, would all be ready to fight if arms were given to them.

The writer proceeds to review, at length, the financial condition of Spain; showing that her expenses have exceeded her revenue, that heavy debts have been incurred, and the income from all important sources mortgaged for years to come. The expenses of the army and navy continue to increase, however, and the administration of the Home Government is so situated as to be unable to economize. The article closes with the subjoined paragraph:

While contemplating the gloomy, or at least uncertain prospects of the Spanish treasury, I am forcibly reminded of Cuba, and of American proposals for its purchase. I have not heard a statement of the exact amount the States are disposed to give; but I have been assured, on no mean authority, that it would suffice to pay off the whole of the debt, home and foreign, and that a handsome surplus would still remain for roads and railways. Besides these advantages, Cuba once sold, Spain might safely reduce her fleet and army, for she would then have no reason to apprehend war with the United States, as she at present has none to anticipate aggression or interference on the part of any European power. Relieved of her heaviest burthens, and blessed with an honest government, Spain might soon and easily forget the loss of that cherished colony, whose retention, under present circumstances is more a question of pride than of profit, and to whose loss without compensation she must, I fear, by the force of events, be prepared sooner or later to submit.

We have copied thus much from Blackwood, not only as showing the change of English sentiment concerning American affairs, but on account of the soundness of the opinions as to slavery and Cuban annexation—their entire accordance with the opinions held here and the high character of the source from which they emanate. Slavery is a thing not to be disposed of—Cuba an acquisition that will eventually be made. If all of the English journalists would trouble themselves to look more closely and carefully into those American matters which they discuss, they would find far less reason for complaints and crimination, and do much towards fostering that friendly feeling which is so much to be desired by the commercial interests of both.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.—The expenses of this structure for the month of October have been $2000 82. The contributions by visitors $218 10, which, with those of the military, made on the 19th ult., of $319 79, make the whole receipts $537 89.

Details of Foreign News by the Pacific

The steamship City of Manchester from Philadelphia arrived at Liverpool on the morning of the 19th after a run of twelve days and 13½ hours, town time.

The clipper ship Red Jacket arrived in the Mersey on the morning of Sunday the 15th, with sailors from Melbourne of August 1 having accomplished the return trip in 76 days, notwithstanding having lost some time in the ice. The Red Jacket made the run out from the Mersey to the anchorage at Melbourne in 68½ days thus completing the voyage from Liverpool to Australia and back in five months and eleven days, being the most rapid voyage ever made. On her voyage out her average days work was 293½ miles, the equal of express steamers, and her greatest 400 miles in twenty four hours. On her return the average speed was 231 miles—fastest day's run 311 miles; greatest 370 miles. The Red Jacket brought 4,000 ounces of gold and 28,000 sovereigns. She reports the Lightning and Champion clippers arrived out. The Gulding Star had also arrived at Liverpool with 50,000 ounces of gold and Melbourne dates of July 25.

The Canadian mail steamer Illinois arrived at Liverpool at 5 o'clock on the 19th, also without intelligence of the Arctic.

The royal mail steamer Canada, spoken on the 14th inst., by the steamer Arabia, on her homeward passage, requests us to communicate with the latter and the only news heard was—saved. She then telegraphed the number and several other signals, but the vessels were by that time too far apart for them to be made out.

The arrival of the Hermann was looked for with anxiety, in the hope that she might be the bearer of gratifying news.

The Czar has declared martial law in the Governments of Charkow, Poltowa and Kiew.

The Council of Panzimal has been appointed in accordance with the decree of the Sultan, mentioned some time since. Ali Pacha is President, but Fuad Effendi is the ruling spirit. The second member of Ali Pacha, Mehemet Rauduli, Riaad and Ruiz Pachas, Rauhi Molla Effendi, Fuad Effendi.

Gortschakoff it is said, is appointed Generalissimo of the forces on the Austrian border.

At the recent great fire in Memel the whole place would have been burned down had it not been for the exertions of the American and English admirals then in port.

Mr Upton, an Englishman settled in the Crimea, son of an engineer of fortifications in Scotland has been taken prisoner by the Russians, and is sent to Lord Raglan's headquarters, to have information extracted from him respecting the works.

Advices from Portugal are very unfavorable both as regards the wine districts, and the general position of affairs commercially. Extensive commercial failures had occurred, including some of the French houses established there, as well as several native firms.

Sir Edward Belcher are under trial by court-martial at Sheerness, Kinsbead, for his mismanagement of the Polar expedition. The inquiry is now proceeding.

Prayers have been offered in some of the Irish Roman Catholic Chapels for the souls of the brave who fell at Alma.

Cholera continued to spread in Dublin.

Dispatches from Madrid of October 11th state that the foreign refugees have received orders to leave that city within eight days. Those only who can give good reasons for their residence, or can offer security for their good conduct, will be allowed to remain.

The Bulletin de Lois contains an imperial decree declaring M. Lucien Bonaparte in his quality as Frenchman. His son, Count Bonaparte, has joined the army in the East.

The following telegraphic intelligence of the 5th ult., from Constantinople, is from the Presse: "For the first time for four hundred years, a cross was publicly erected in the Turkish capital. It was while a funeral mass was read for Marshal St. Arnaud."

The London Times says:—The accounts of the state of trade in the manufacturing towns during the last week show some dullness although, with the exception of Manchester, confidence is very much maintained. At that place the transactions have been limited, and the depression caused by the recent failures has not passed off. The Birmingham reports describe no alteration in the iron trade. The demand is generally steady, and in the manufacture of plates for ship building there is increased activity, caused by the government orders for gun boats, to be completed early in the spring. Sentiment in Sheffield, the present unsatisfactory state of the cutlery trade, some persons entertain doubts regarding the winter, owing to the continued augmentation of fuel and provisions. In the copper trade there is renewed firmness, and the business in the district altogether is still characterized by freedom from failure, chains being in almost all instances well met. At Nottingham, although the American orders, in consequence of the embarrassments on that side are nearly evidentially small, quantities are steadily and the home demand is active. In the woolen districts no party shall prevails. The Irish linen markets continue heavy.

THE WAR.

The news from the Crimea is—nothing. A multitude of private letters, telegraphic despatches, and revivals of old news, is found in the English and Continental papers, but none of these state that Sebastopol is taken, or that the allies have made such progress towards taking it. They have not even heard of the exertions of Mr. Upton, an Englishman settled in the Crimea, son of an engineer of fortifications in Scotland, who

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP LOUISIANA.

The steamship Louisiana, Smith, master, arrived yesterday morning from Indianola, via Galveston, bringing dates from the latter place to the 5th inst. Her manifest and list of passengers will be found elsewhere.

The Galveston Times of the 4th states that the health of the city is excellent, and that the yellow fever has entirely disappeared.

The Austin State Times says that the rangers are to be placed in immediate service. Measures are recommended to be taken for the procurement of ample supplies of camp equipage, subsistence, etc., so that issues may be made to the different companies by the first of this month. In fact, it is said that the necessary requisitions have already been made upon Quartermaster Belger for every thing that will be needed.

The Tyler Telegraph states that the company of Rangers called for from the Fifth District have been organized at that place, and says:

The counties of Harrison, Cass, Panola, Rusk, Upshur, Titus, Smith and Wood were represented, and we do not believe that a company of finer looking men can be started any where.

Our previous advices from Texas informed us that a battle had taken place between the U. S. troops and the Indians, on the Limpia (Indian territory.) In the Galveston Times, we find the following particulars of the affair:

Mr. James Campbell, on his way to California with a drove of cattle, had a visit from a party of Apaches at Eagle Springs during the night, who helped themselves to a part of his stock. He was proceeding with the balance towards the Rio Grande when he met Gen. Smith, escorted by Captain Walker's company of mounted Riflemen. Gen. S. ordered this company to proceed in pursuit of the Indians, whose trail they followed that and the next day, traveling also by moon-light. On the third morning a few Indians were discovered herding about 100 horses and mules, which were immediately captured. The Indian camp or village defended by about two hundred mounted warriors, was next attacked—the Riflemen divided into two parties, one under Captain Walker, and the other under Lieutenant Carr, charging simultaneously. Although the Indians occupied a strong position, they could not stand the deadly aim of the rifles and were driven up the mountains, (where pursuit became impracticable,) with a loss of ten or twelve killed and fifteen or twenty wounded. Lieut. Carr was wounded in the abdomen by an arrow, and one of the men were killed. The wigwams of the savages was totally destroyed. The soldiers fought with great bravery.

A communication, received by Maj. G. T. Howard, from Fort Clark—the substance of which is given in the San Antonio Ledger of the 23d inst.—confirms the statements above given.

There was a rumor current in Austin, to the effect that the Indians and Dragoons had been engaged in a fight recently, near a place called the Enchanted Rock. The Dragoons are reported to have lost seven men and all their horses.

The San Antonio Ledger informs us that a man named Stauffacher, an esteemed citizen of San Antonio, was stabbed in the back by a man named Marcellane, who was insane.

PEONS.—The Austin Gazette says that the vigilance committee have discharged their duties, and that no peon now remains in the city, who is not vouched for by respectable citizens.

We learn from the Victoria Advocate that a Mexican was recently caught in the act of running off with a negro woman, in Goliad county. He was tried by a jury of twelve respectable citizens—Judge Lynch, presiding—and sentenced to "hug the whipping post," to the tune of one hundred and fifty lashes on his bare back; and to be branded with the letter T on his forehead.

"A gentleman by the name of Gentry, who resides some six or eight miles below town, was killed a few nights since under the following circumstances: He had but recently settled in this county, and for want of the necessary outhouses, was induced to put a quantity of corn in the upper story of his dwelling, and on the night in question lay down to sleep upon the floor with one of his children, his wife, with other members of the family, occupying a bedstead in the corner of the room. About 12 o'clock the joist which supported the upper floor gave way, and the entire quantity of corn, with the yielding timbers, were precipitated upon the sleepers below, killing the unfortunate owner immediately. The other members of the family luckily escaped with slight injury. He was from Georgia, and had lived in the county but a short time."

The Lavaca Register says the late storm did serious damage to the pecan crop, in the coast region of Western Texas, by blowing the nuts from the trees before they had fully ripened. But few had arrived in that market, up to the 26th ultimo, and they found ready sale at from $2 50 to $3.

HOUSTON RAILROAD.—In answer to the inquiries of a correspondent, the Houston Telegraph states "that the route of the road has been surveyed and located from this city, via Boon's (formerly Hamblin's,) on Cypress creek, to within five miles of the Brazos River, in the vicinity of Warren and Rock Island, end thence to the Navisoto, at a point about half way between Washington and Anderson; and from the Navisoto the route is surveyed via Boonville and Wheelock to Horn Hill, near the 32d parallel. Twenty-five miles are graded, and ready for the ties. This is undoubtedly the best route for a railroad in the State, over which there is a greater thoroughfare and heavier transportation combined, by fifty per cent., than any other in the State. We believe the Lacy road has been reconnoitred from this city, via Montgomery and Polk counties, to the Trinity River, in the direction of Henderson, but the route has not been located.

We learn from an extra issued on the 30th ult. from the office of the Austin Times, that the stock offered as a deposit by Walker, King & Co., has been refused by the Governor.

HEALTH OF CORPUS CHRISTI.—The Nueces Valley announces that quite a number of cases of fever, of a malignant type, have recently occurred in Corpus Christi, some of which had proved fatal. Some little alarm prevailed among the citizens, in consequence of the sudden death of several who were afflicted with the disease, as it was supposed by many to be the yellow fever. The editor thinks, however, that it is nothing more than the common congestive fever.

BRAZOS NAVIGATION.—It is said that two of the gentlemen, Messrs. Tarver and Wilkins, composing the Directory for improving the navigation of the Brazos, have collected for that purpose the sum of ten thousand dollars.

CONVICTION FOR MURDER.—George Jones and his mother Nancy Jones, were convicted last week in Madison county, before Judge Jewett, for the murder of the father of the first and husband of the latter, in that county some two or three years ago, and have been sentenced to be hung. An appeal has been taken, however, and the decision of the Supreme Court at Austin, will necessarily have to be heard, before the unfortunate prisoners will know definitely what disposition is to be made of them. George, we are told by a gentleman who was present, manifested much nerve when interrogated by the Judge as to what he had to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him, and with the greatest equanimity and entire self-possession replied to his Honor that he could only say he was entirely innocent of the charge preferred against him. The old lady on the contrary was moved to tears, and although she had no fears of death, expressed a regret that she should be doomed to leave her children, some of whom are quite young. She declared her innocence, and affirmed that some of the witnesses had testified falsely against her. She stood charged in the indictment with being an accessory before the fact, George being the principal.

A daughter who was indicted as an accessory also, was acquitted. [Central Texian, 25th ult.

The Austin Gazette gives a particular account of the capture by Lieut. Givens, near Fort Belknap, of a strange and formidable animal resembling a lion. The Gazette says:

Lieut. Givens has endeavored to produce a breed of hounds combining the strong scent peculiar to the fox hound, with greater speed than they usually possess. He has succeeded in this by retaining only the swiftest and healthiest in the pack, and crossing the swift ones with those having a fine nose, but keeping the blood pure. His pack fight well from always running with a bull terrier, whose example teaches them courage—they have also been trained to chase wolves, which also developes that quality. The pack he now hunts with is considered unusually fast for fox hounds, besides having a good nose. The blue hound is the swiftest, the yellow largest and strongest, the black the most courageous.

THE UNITED STATES AND ST. DOMINGO—Advantage of Samana.—The American papers have recently contained allusions to a project which is on foot for gaining partial possession of the Republic of St. Domingo, and which is perhaps regarded in some quarters as a collateral step toward the design on Cuba. At present the avowed plan is simply to secure a station in the Bay of Samana, one of the finest harbors in the world, and which is alleged to possess an abundant supply of coal fit for steam purposes, and so situated that vessels might even load alongside of the mines.

In the Times, more than two years back, an attempt was made to awaken the commercial world to the advantages of this place, lying, as it does, on the highway from Europe to Central America, and across the Isthmus to Australia; but, although the question of the rapid development of the shortest steam route to the gold Colonies was in a great measure dependent upon an abundant supply of fuel being opened up at a midway station, nothing was done even in the way of inquiry. Since that time we have seen the high price of coals in the West Indies and on the Pacific put a stop to all immediate prospect of the only true route to Australia being brought into operation, while the Royal Mail Company, of whom it may almost be considered the especial duty to watch for every opportunity of forwarding any thing that can assist the progress of steam navigation in those regions, but who have apparently taken no steps in this case, were themselves, a short time back, nearly crippled from the same cause. A repetition, therefore, may possibly be about to take place of what was witnessed in the opening up of the Nicaragua transit, the feasibility of which, after having been vainly urged in London, was suddenly demonstrated in the course of the following year with enormous success by a few private adventurers in New York. At the same time, if the capabilities of the Bay of Samana should now, in the simple interests of commerce, be thus fairly developed by American enterprise, and the allegations regarding its coal mines should, on investigation, prove correct, there will be no reason for any thing but congratulation. Looking, however, at the fact that the movement seems to be generally regarded in the United States as a political one, the inference is suggested that it is not for that creditable end. The entire population of the republic of St. Domingo amounts only to about 200,000 persons, and, as these are nearly all of Spanish and African origin, it is difficult to conceive, especially after what has been witnessed in Texas, that any footing which may be obtained among them by the people of the slave-holding States of the Union can be otherwise than dangerous to their liberty.—[London Times.

ARREST OF AN AMERICAN CITIZEN IN TUSCANY. We find the following in the foreign correspondence of the Newark (N. J.) Advertiser:

Sympathy with the war against Russia is a symptom of rebellion against law, in the judgment of the political doctors of Italy. It is not surprising, therefore, that they should have prescribed total abstinence and increased caution. Its rulers are haunted by fears of revolt and overthrow, and keep a jealous vigilance over every movement and incident. Spies and informers frequent the hotels, cafés and other public places; no one can enter or leave the country without official observation and consent. Every man's pursuits, intercourse and habits are known to the police; if two or three meet for conversation in the refreshment room of a theater, some one is there to note it; nor does the table-talk of the hotels escape observation. This system of espionage is in fact the nearest earthly type we have of omniscience.

The recent arrest of an American citizen in this city is an illustrative incident. It shows to what indignities every visitor is constantly exposed. Mr. Quin had taken passage for the United States. During the evening before the day of his departure he was reading a newspaper article in a cafe, with some marks of displeasure, which two young Austrian cadets remarked, and thus opened a conversation. Affecting agreement with him, he was betrayed into a rather free expression of American sentiments, after which they parted, without any apparent discord. Soon after, however, he was arrested and thrown into the military prison of the Austrian garrison. The United States Consul, J. A. Binda, Esq., a citizen of South Carolina, though by birth an Italian, having heard of the case, forthwith waited upon the Tuscan authorities, and demanded their interposition, and the release of the prisoner, or at least a trial, according to the civil laws of the country. But he was told that the city was under military law, and that he must call upon the Austrian commander-in-chief. He protested, that as an American Consul in Tuscany, he had nothing to do with Austria, and he pressed his suit in vain, and left, but not, however, without a formal protest.

In the hope of effecting a speedy release of the prisoner, he repaired to the Austrian headquarters, where he was told, with an air of profound solemnity, that the man had been guilty of an enormous crime; nothing less than an attempt to seduce the young cadets and excite insubordination, not one word of which had the slightest foundation in truth; and that the penalty was death, and that he must be tried by the military tribunal. After reasoning the case without success, he closed the interview with an assurance that he should forthwith communicate the case to the commander of the United States squadron, (Com Stringham) now fortunately in the Gulf of Spezzia, on this coast.

The next morning a letter was received at the Consulate from the Chief of the Austrian forces in Tuscany, at Florence, saying that the prisoner, in consideration of his being a stranger, against whom there appeared to be no testimony of other disorderly conduct, and an American citizen about to leave the country, would be restored to liberty! It was carefully added, in a postscript, that the threat of sending for the squadron had not had the slightest influence in the case! The security of the Tuscan Government against its own people is only secured by the presence of 6,000 Austrians, which cost it, according to the last treasury report, nearly a million of dollars annually. The Grand Duke is himself a Prince of Austria, and belongs to the House of Hapsburg. On the receipt of the recent triumph of the Allies at Sebastopol, he discredited it with indignation, and declared to the circle around, him that the post was impregnable—an illustration of his sagacity and proclivities.

DENTISTS AND DENTISTRY.—The Journal of Commerce, in an article under this head, says, the profession of dentistry is perhaps more largely infested with quackery than most other professions. Nevertheless, the studio of a scientific mechanical dentist affords an excellent opportunity for witnessing a remarkable display of ingenuity and skill. The Journal of Commerce thus describes the ordinary method of manufacturing teeth:

"The principal materials used in the manufacture of artificial teeth are silex or quartz, koalin and feldspar. The due proportions of these are finely levigated, and when as impalpable as flour, are commingled until of the consistence of dough, after which they are moulded and partially baked, so as to become sufficiently hard to bear handling, the raw material being exceedingly friable and frail. They are then enameled with spar and flux, and covered with titanium and gold for the faintly yellow shade, and with platina and cobal for the points, which are of an almost imperceptible blue. Returning to the furnace and again baked, they emerge in the form of a natural and beautiful row of teeth, according to the skill of the artizan. The coloring requires extreme care and judgement, for the lucrativeness of the business depends upon this entirely. Two rows, or one set of teeth alone, without any gold, are worth in the trade $14, and the operator whose factory we saw stated that he could easily turn out a set every day. He manufactures them only for his own private use. A bungler, however, would find it a losing business, for reasons just mentioned. Like all other professions, dentists have no regular prices; some of the magnates receive five dollars for what the smaller fry are willing to do for fifty cents; others, again, like Tombs lawyers, take any thing they can get. The sterling value of gold used in inserting a complete set of teeth is from twenty-three to twenty-eight dollars; add the cost of the teeth, and at the minimum prices charged, the dentist is left a very fair margin of profit. The price of an entire set of teeth varies according to the prestige of the B. B. S. whom you employ. The minimum rate is $100; then the scales ranges upwards to $250, for the supriority of which, over the others, the toothless must be their own judges."

COLLISION ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—Great Loss of Life.—The accident reported by telegraph a few days ago on the Great Western Railroad of Canada, occurred through the bursting of the head of the cylinder, which threw the train out of time. After a delay of two hours the train proceeded at the rate of 20 miles an hour, and when near Chatham, in a dense fog, came in collision with a gravel train. A passenger furnishes the Detroit Tribune of the 27th ult. with the following particulars:

Our locomotive was completely thrown over to the right, the express car thrown over and crushing the first and second class cars into mere splits, demolishing the next and making a wreck of the third car and driving in the end of the fourth. The passengers in the last cars escaped unhurt or with slight bruises. Almost the entire load of the second class cars were killed or wounded—some cut completely in two, others with mangled heads and bodies, and without limbs. The screams and groans of the mangled were awful in the extreme. Every effort was made by the conductor and passengers to relieve the suffering; but, notwithstanding the almost superhuman efforts to relieve them, all were not extricated until more than four hours after the collision. Heaps of the dead and wounded were found in the ruins, piled together in all mangled shapes.

One poor fellow was cut out of the express car, his limbs hanging out of the side fifteen feet from the ground. One of the strangest features of the accident is, that all the gravel cars were demolished and piled upon each other, with the tender of the engine store in. The conductor of the gravel train was on the rear car, with his signal light, and a negro boy at his side. The conductor saved himself by jumping; the negro was killed.

At the time of the collision there was a dense fog, it being almost impossible to see lights. Where the blame belongs we know not, but there is gross and culpable negligence in the affairs of the road. The conductor of the gravel train says he was ordered out by the superintendent of the gravel pit.

We ought to mention that on the third car from the rear, we had no light at the time of the collision and were in total darkness, nor had we any thing but pieces of candles stuck in the seat any time. The sun had gone out at the time of the collision.

The dead are lying around, and being mostly emigrants their names cannot be readily got. There was one woman buried under a mass of rubbish, and lay there over four hours before she was extricated. She must die. We were 32 miles from Detroit and 13 from Chatham, the surrounding country for miles a vast swamp and no aid or physicians at hand which, with the clamorous of the fog and frightful screams of the wounded for help and water, rendered it the most appalling scene imaginable. It was heart-sickening. Yet all was done that could be during the long five hours that the miserable unfortunates lay waiting their turn for assistance. One man had six friends with him—all killed. There are whole families killed, and we can not ascertain their names.

It has been ascertained that forty-seven men, women and children were killed, and fifty-five wounded, many of them fatally. It is the most awful railway accident that has occurred in America.

LATER FROM BROWNSVILLE.—Acquittal of the Revolutionists.—Through the politeness of Capt. Staples, of the schooner Wm. Mason, we have received a copy of the Brownsville Flag of the 21st ult., in which we find the following in regard to the examination of the persons accused of setting on foot, within American jurisdiction, a movement against the Mexican Government:

After a very patient investigation of witnesses before the Commissioner's Court, in this city, the prisoners who were arraigned for trial were discharged. Some sixty witnesses, as we understand, were examined, embracing some of the first men of the place, but from none was information of a character that would have led to the conviction of the accused elicited, and hence their discharge from custody.

This clearly proves the movement to have been purely Mexican in its character; to have been managed wholly by leaders of that nation, who knew the unlawfulness of organizing on this bank, (if done here at all, and public opinion, though there be no positive proof, fixes the fact that it was)—and who were particularly cautious that the facts of such an organization should not transpire.

These men of Mexico have never asked for either men or money of this Government. They only asked what the well known genius of our institutions, and what precedent, at least, gave them a right to expect—the temporary hospitality of this, from the oppression of their own Government. That hospitality was generously extended, and if it has been violated, the same has not been made manifest by proof.

A frequent repetition of such grounds of complaint, however, would not be reputable either to the honor of this Government, or the valor of the people said to be engaged therein. Better would it be for them to copy the example of the first conqueror of Mexico, the valiant Cortes, and once the sword is unsheathed, to throw away the scabbard; and, destroying all means of retreat, look only to that "victory or death" which was made the war cry at the beginning.

We find also the following items in the Flag:

EXECUTION OF DESERTERS.—It seems that a new and pitiless panic of His Highness line caused the deliquency of desertion to be persecuted and punished with harhurons tenacity among our neighbors. Three unfortunate persone were shot in Matamoros, on Monday last, with as much atrocity and cool blood as if they had been mad animals.

DROWNED.—On Sunday morning last, at the mouth of the Rio Grande, a promising boy, son of John and Cornelia Brown, of this city, was accidentally drowned, in attempting to pass from the bank to the steamer Camanche. Little Frederick was, we believe, the only child of his loving parents, and the sad accident has clothed both their hearts in sable mourning.

ANOTHER POST-OFFICE ROBBERY.—Mail and post office robberies have become quite numerous. The Cleveland (Ohio) Leader gives an account of one. It appears that, various sums of money having been lost through the mails between Cleveland and Wheeling, a special mail agent, named Shallcross, undertook to ferret out the robber. Suspicion finally rested on the Wellsville office. Eighty dollars recently mailed at that place were abstracted, and the robbery traced to the son of the post-master, who was arrested and taken to Columbus.

The present number closes the Ninth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, and the Publishers embrace the opportunity to renew their acknowledgments to the Press and the Public for their continued confidence and support. The circulation of the Magazine is now greater than at any previous time since its publication was commenced, and is still steadily and rapidly increasing. The same plan which has made it so popular hitherto will continue to be pursued. It will aim to present regularly, in more elegant dress and at a cheaper rate, a larger amount of better reading matter than has ever been given to the Public in any similar periodical, either foreign or domestic. Its contents will be made up with a constant reference to the wants and tastes of the great body of the American people, rather than those of any particular class or profession. While it will be the endeavor of its conductors, in all its departments, to combine entertainment with instruction, special care will be taken to exclude everything that can give just cause of complaint to any interest or any section of the country, and especially every thing that can offend the most fastidious on the score of taste or morality. A large number of interesting and valuable articles have been prepared for the next year, the series of Historical Articles, written by the most popular authors, and illustrated by the most gifted and popular artists in the United States, expressly for the Magazine, will be continued; the choicest productions of American and European literary talent will be selected for its pages; the variety, latest, and attractiveness of its Editorial Departments will be increased; and nothing will be left undone to merit that large share of public favor with which, thus far their enterprise has been received.

CONSUMPTION.
AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a cure has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indispensable proof of these statements

August 4, 1853.
J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your CHERRY PECTORAL in California in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.
Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.
I am yours, with great respect,

DR J. C. AYER: Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any cough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel grateful in seeing the benefit it confers.
Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours, with respect. JOHN P. WHITLOCK

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of recommendation.
Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many ladies as the circumstances may require.
One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session by some gentleman of established reputation.
The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.
The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dauklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.
The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the Institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.
The Trustees and friends of the Institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.
D. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.
N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.
The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug5—6m20

Marion Female Seminary,
MARION, PERRY COUNTY, ALA.
THE EXERCISES of this institution will be resumed on Monday, the 2d day of October, under the charge of the Rev. Jas. K. Armstrong as Principal, assisted by nine Professors, Teachers and Officers.
It has just closed its present session with one hundred and thirty-three students, seventy-seven of which number were boarders. There is but one session of nine and a half months.
Pupils can enter at any time during the session, chargeable from the beginning of the month in which they commence, to the close of the session. No deduction will be made but at the discretion of the Principal.
The Principal, with his family, resides in the building. The female teachers also reside in the Seminary. Boarders in the institution are under the control of the Principal at all times. A Steward, in the employment of the Principal, of experience, urbanity of manners, and faithfulness to his duties, a Matron who constantly and kindly ministers to the private wants of young ladies, and especially in sickness, a Governess who directs them in their exercises and amusements, superintends the order of their private apartments, instructs them in certain domestic duties, and guards their private, personal habits, manners and morals, always aided by the presence and active cooperation of the female teachers. The Principal and his lady secure to those committed to their charge every necessary and proper comfort and kindness. Here they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations respecting neatness, order, punctuality and economy. They have regular hours for study and recreation, for rising and retiring, for eating, domestic duties, and social enjoyment among themselves.
The institution is furnished with a new and superior apparatus in the departments of Chemistry, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy. There is also a large collection of Maps, Charts, Plates, Diagrams, Globes, etc., for simplifying the principles of Geography, Physiology and Astronomy.
In the department of Drawing, Painting and Embroidery there is a fine collection of Drawing Cards, Engravings, Pictures, Paintings, Patterns, and every other convenience important in the prosecution of these departments.
There is in connection with the institution a Library of more than one thousand volumes, and a Cabinet of several hundred specimens.
The institution is furnished with six Pianos, five Guitars, and one Harp.
MUSIC.—The Professor at the head of this department is equal to any in the country. He is a superior vocalist, a fine performer on the Piano, Harp, Guitar, Violin, Violoncello, etc. He has enjoyed ten years experience as a teacher of music in the best institutions in the Union, is profoundly versed in the principle of harmony, and is a real amateur of the sublime science to which he has devoted himself.
LOCATION.—Its salubrity, intelligence, morality and public spirit are unsurpassed.
PERMANENCY.—Parents may send their daughters here with confidence in their completing their education under the same course of instruction and system of discipline. Every thing conspires to make the permanency of the Principal a matter of duty, pleasure and interest.
TEACHERS.—The Principal, himself a native of Alabama, surrounds himself with a corps of teachers of known efficiency and tried success, nearly all of whom have been reared in the South, thus ensuring a better acquaintance with Southern peculiarities and sympathy with Southern views and interests. Thoroughness is our motto in teaching. We ascribe the true importance to the harmonious development of the physical, intellectual and moral nature.

IN THE MEADOWS.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

I lie in the Summer meadows,
In the meadows All alone.
With the infinite sky above me,
And the sun on his mid-day throne.

The smell of the flowering grasses
Is sweeter than any rose,
And a million happy insects
Sing in the warm repose.

The mother lark that is brooding
Feels the sunshine on her wings,
And the deeps of the noonday glitter
With swarms of fairy things.

From the billowy green beneath me
To the fathomless blue above,
The creatures of God are happy
In the warmth of their Summer love.

The infinite bliss of nature
I feel in every vein;
The light and the life of Summer
Blossom in heart and brain.

But darker than any shadow,
By thunder clouds unfurled,
The awful Truth arises,
That Death is in the world!

And the sky may beam as ever,
And never a cloud be cursed,
And the airs be living odors,
But death is in the world!

Out of the deeps of sunshine
The invisible bolt is hurled;
There's life in the Summer meadows;
But death is in the world!

SES AND GEOLOGY—NATURAL DEATH.

Brethren McTyeire: I have been requested by several friends, to write a series of articles for your paper, showing the coincidence between the Mosaic account of the creation and the facts of geology, and giving in addition thereto, my views of the origin of natural death.

ARTICLE FIRST.

If the Bible were false I should not wish to believe so. Its precious promises—its inspiring hopes—its eternal rewards are all too dear to the heart of a good man to be cast away lightly. And, moreover, if there be no solid foundation here, wither shall we go? Take away the scriptures and the question put by Simon Peter to his Lord would be the fit and agitated cry of every heart: "To whom shall we go?" Where shall we land? We are at sea without chart or helmsman, with no port in view, driven at the mercy of wind and wave, sooner or later, inevitably, to be wrecked and engulfed. Such would be man's inevitable destiny should the Bible be untrue. But it has hitherto stood its ground against its fiercest foes. It has more than stood its ground. It has defended itself nobly and triumphantly, and turning upon its foes its weapons of immortal temper, it has every where spread its conquests, making even its enemies willing subjects of its authority. But infidelity though routed upon a thousand fields, and overborne in every battle, may yet be seen in every direction rallying his scattered and afflicted forces. His boldness is, doubtless to be admired though we may not be able to say much for his prudence. The old gentleman has on a new garb, and presents his arguments under new formulas, but the same features may be seen amidst all his disguises. You never hear him speak of the old, well established and mature sciences. But the new, half developed and partially arraigned sciences are his delight. And running out into these new, almost unexplored fields, he seizes upon the half developed facts, and with pretence of vast learning, frightens away from the new paths of science the faint hearted and weak minded christian, so that some of the natural sciences are looked upon as profane, and mentioned, almost, with horror. But the God that inspired the Bible is, also, the author of nature. For myself, I hesitate not to risk the truth of God's Book upon its agreement with the facts recorded—written every where upon God's world. Let the witnesses be brought up face to face. Let the facts be submitted to mankind. Let the voice of God in His Word and the voice of God in his Works be heard and understood, and then shall be such an agreement, in the two, as shall convince every truth loving mind, that both voices are utterances of the same Being.

But while we fear not for the facts themselves, let us be careful to not mistake the facts. Let the facts be carefully and certainly ascertained, and then let them be fearlessly compared. Now and then an isolated fact may come up not in seeming harmony with the written word. But let us be patient for a season. Before long it shall be found the basis of a new and better interpretation of scripture, or it shall be so modified and shaped by other and adjacent facts, in the sciences themselves, as completely to harmonize with the scriptures. At first it was confidently asserted, that the Copernican system of the universe contradicted the facts of revelation. If the motion of the earth caused day and night, the Bible spoke falsely it was, said, when it represented the sun as standing still, by command, and he moving back its shadow upon the dial. But then the fact came up to notice, that the Bible was not written, so much for the few men of science, as for the great masses outside; and that its facts in this instance, though verbally incorrect, were ideally true. The sun to a common observer did appear to rise and go forward to its setting. If it had been otherwise represented in the scriptures, that representation (to be understood) must have been accompanied by a long and labored treatise on astronomy. And every man in order to understand the truth as revealed would, necessarily, have become a man of science, which would have been an impossible requirement to the majority of mankind. This verbal inaccuracy has thus been disposed of, and approved by all candid men because of its ideal truthfulness, and the wisdom of the scriptures therein vindicated.

The hypothesis of progressive development in the vegetable and animal races is constantly becoming more improbable as the science of geology progresses. The discovery of vertebral fossils in the upper siluvian formations, (the upper and lower silurian are really but one formation;) the discovery of the foliage of dicotyledonous trees, in strata forming the base of the cretaceous system, by Dr. Debey, and the statement of Sir Charles Lyell, that the ancient fauna is in some instances, as examined by him, so rich as almost to imply a more perfect development than now; these, with other facts that might be mentioned, indicate, that the progressive developement theory may not rest on so firm a scientific basis as its friends have been wont to imagine. There doubtless have been great transmutations or successive creations, but this (as we shall see) harmonizes with the statement of Moses, as to the genesis of life in its multifarious forms.

BYHALIA F. INSTITUTE.

November 1, 1854.

Bro. McTyeire: I made a short visit to the Memphis Conference, now in session at Somerville, Tennessee. It may be interesting to some of your readers to learn something concerning its transactions and other matters.

SOMERVILLE.

Is the shire-town of Fayette, one of the wealthiest counties in this great State, and is situated at the terminus of a branch of the M. and C. Railroad. The population is about fifteen hundred. The Railroad has made it a place of considerable business, the borders have been greatly enlarged and many fine large private buildings have been recently erected and many improvements made.

THE PEOPLE

Have a well deserved reputation for hospitality, which is scarcely surpassed by any other village in the South-west, and the great number of respectable visitors can give testimony of the liberal and cordial welcome afforded them by the intelligent and agreeable citizens. The crowd was immense, and yet all were well provided for, and none have reason to offer the least complaint. The people of Somerville, will be long remembered and cherished by a multitude of visitors, who spent the hours of their sojourn so pleasantly during Conference.

THE CHURCHES,

There are three commodious, neat brick churches, Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist. These were crowded at every appointment, during the three days I remained in Somerville. The congregations were, for the most part, remarkably quiet and orderly. But notwithstanding the great interest manifested there was very little exhibition of religious excitement, at any hours service.

MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY.

Rev. Dr. McFerrin and E. C. Slater, addressed the crowd at the Methodist Church, and Rev. Dr. Taylor and Wm. McMahon, entertained them at the Presbyterian Church. About $1400 were collected for this glorious cause. The addresses were spoken of in very commendable terms. Dr. McF. was so successful in calling for contributions, that he finally arose and called on the people to stay their benificence, but they continued to give. Generous people!

SYSBATH SCHOOL ADDRESS.

Not being able to hear Dr. Taylor at night, I went early on Sunday morning to the M. E. Church, to hear him address the Sunday School. Bro. Collins, the stationed preacher, had the pupils and teachers arranged in fine order, and their happy and expectant faces beamed brightly. The church was thronged, and eager listeners ardently drank in the Doctor's intensely interesting narrative, many a face was suffused with tears, and many a heartfelt prayer was offered to God in behalf of the poor deluded Chinese. Oh! the contrast between christian and heathen youth. It was a happy thought that moved the Doctor to visit our Conferences, and become acquainted with the people. An abiding interest is thus awakened, which otherwise could never be felt. God bless him.

THE PAPER QUESTION.

To the no little astonishment of many fast friends of the M. and A. C. Advocate, Dr. McFerrin, proposed the union of this paper with the Nashville Advocate. The Dr. had made his opening speech on this subject before I reached Somerville. Early on Monday morning Bro. Cobb replied, and set forth the claims of his paper in an able and effective speech; Bro. McFerrin's rejoinder was characteristic of his remarkable genius. Bro. Cobb closed with an earnest argument, but nothing like as strong as his effort in the morning. These speeches occupied the whole day. At the close, a motion was made to refer the matter to a committee, which was ordered to be laid on the table. A resolution was then offered not to concur in the proposal, pending this motion, Conference adjourned until morning.

The late General Conference, ordered certain loans to be made to several of our Advocates, and a donation of $5000 to the M. and A. C. Advocate, and $6000 to the N. O. C. Advocate. Now it seems, the book agents are unwilling to make these donations, unless an indemnifying bond be given by the publishing Committee, or they be in some way secured from loss. The agents propose to pay a debt of $5000 against the Advocate and take it and the editor up to Nashville, if the other arrangement is not made. Bro. Cobb demurs to this, strongly. The Dr. says he will furnish the subscribers a better and cheaper paper, and that the plan will be much safer and better every way for the Church. He argues precedent in the case of the Expositor, which, as a Conference paper, was amalgamated with the Nashville Advocate. The Holston Advocate has been united with the advice and consent of Bishop Soule. Bishop Soule recommends the Memphis Conference to do likewise. Will they take it?

To return, the subject was resumed on Tuesday morning, and after several short speeches from members of the Conference, the whole matter was referred to a Committee. The result may be delayed a few days longer, I was compelled to leave at this juncture.

A caucus of some twelve or fifteen persons, strong friends of the Advocate, met in the Chancery Hall, according to appointment, on Monday night. After various suggestions suggestions and plans, it was finally agreed to get up a subscription to pay off the debt of the office. Nearly a thousand dollars were promised before they adjourned.

This affair has created great excitement, and may occasion some bitterness. This consolidation or centralization of power at Nashville, is thought by many to be a result to be feared and deplored. It does seem, however, that one Advocate is sufficient to meet the wants of the State of Tennessee. No other State in the South has more than one. Will not the N. O. Advocate meet all the wants of our people in that direction? It is only a small number who love the M. and A. Advocate, that object to the arrangement because of its local character. Will it not be much better for the Church to dispense with it, and thus curtail expenses and render the paper more valuable in execution, material and matter? Local prejudices are strong, and it will produce some small fissure in a few places, but it may prove of more value to all interested, as the concern is likely to be a continual weight to the Conference and its friends. For want of space I cannot enlarge on the subject. Conference will not adjourn, it is thought, until Thursday or Friday.

J. W. Shelton.

Subsequent to our correspondent's date, the proposition of Dr. McFerrin was rejected by a considerable majority. We do not endorse our correspondent's view of the matter. We are glad that the Memphis Advocate has determined to live. It may not be better for Nashville, but it will be better for Southern Methodism. [Ed.

IMMEDIATE STATE OF THE DEAD.

The clear light of revelation upon this subject, seems to be this: The righteous dead are represented as being with Christ. Such seems to have been the view of the first martyr when he cried, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." Such also seemed to be the view of St. Paul when he expressed "a desire to depart and be [not in the place of separated spirits, somewhere this side of heaven, but] with Christ, which is far better." Phil., 1: 23. And again, when not only speaking for himself, but for the great body of believers he says, "Therefore, we are always confident, knowing that while we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord; we are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord." 2 Co. 5: 6-8. The apostle here expresses the strongest conviction that believers from the moment of death, instead of being in a separate place, are "with the Lord." But where is the Lord—where is Christ? Most certainly he has not only ascended on high, but he has entered into heaven itself. "For Christ is not entered into the holy place made with hands, which are but the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. 9: 24. And again: "Of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: we have such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" Heb. 8: 1. From these facts, it is clearly evident that death ushers the believer into the immediate and glorious presence of Christ.

"One gentle sigh their fetters breaks,
We scarce can say 'they're gone,'
Before the willing spirit takes
Her mansion near the throne."

How consoling such a truth! To know that we shall be with Christ, sweetens the bitterness of the dying agony. Death removes us from our kindred here, but it brings us into the presence of that Friend who is dearer than any brother. What enlargement and beatification of the soul's power shall be realized even at the hour of death, and how glorious shall be that transition—even though made through pain and agony—which brings us into the presence of Christ! Feeble nature may drop her tears of sorrow over the departed good,

"But reason and religion, better taught,
Congratulate the dead, and crown his tomb
With wreath triumphant."

[Exchange.

What will you Give for the Souls?—Mr. Temple states that during the almost seven years that he lived in Malta, he was witness regularly on Monday morning to a solemn and admonitory scene. A man passes through the streets ringing a bell in one hand and rattling a box in the other, crying at every corner. "What will you give for the souls?"

MATERIALS FOR PREACHERS.

In an important sense, it does not belong to the church, but to God, to decide the question, who and how many shall become preachers of the Gospel. He is the author of their regeneration; and when converted, it is his prerogative to call such as he pleases to the office of the gospel ministry. But there is also an important sense in which his people are responsible for the preparation of those materials out of which preachers are ordinarily called; and also for the proper direction of their minds to the question of personal duty with regard to this office. The materials for future ministers are generally found in the bosom of our churches; either as communicants, or in a state of ecclesiastical pupilage. Hence the churches may be properly appealed to on this subject; and if delinquent, they should be exhorted to employ scriptural means to bring young men into the sacred office. To the use or neglect of these means, may be ascribed, as we believe, in a great measure, the large difference between the number of candidates in different churches.

We could name one church which has been organized twenty-five years, and has furnished from her members twenty-five candidates; and a second, older and stronger than the other, which has furnished only two or three. The latter church too has enjoyed, as well as the former, some precious revivals of religion, and the additions to her communion have consisted of a good proportion of young men. But their attention seems not to have been called particularly to the subject of personal consecration to the ministry. As laymen, they are useful men; but many of them might have become acceptable and some of them able preachers! We consider it a great privilege for a church to have constantly among her members one or more candidates; and if this should be made one of the objects for which she daily and weekly offered up her prayers, and should have its appropriate place in the instructions of the pulpit, we doubt whether she would remain long without enjoying this privilege.

The Two Keys.—Once from the pulpit, at an ordination of elders, the late Rev. Mr. McCheyne made the following declaration: "When I first entered upon the work of the ministry among you, I was exceedingly ignorant of the vast importance of church discipline. I thought that my great and almost only work was to pray and preach. I saw your souls to be so precious, and the time so short, that I devoted all my time, and care, and strength, to labor in word and doctrine. When cases of discipline were brought before me and the elders, I regarded them with something like abhorrence. It was a duty I shrank from; and I may truly say it nearly drove me from the work of the ministry among you altogether. But it pleased God, who teaches his servants in another way than man teaches, to bless some of the cases of discipline to the manifest and undeniable conversion of the souls of those under our care; and from that hour a new light broke in upon my mind, and I saw that if preaching be an ordinance of Christ, so is church discipline. I now feel very deeply persuaded that both are of God, that two keys are committed to us by Christ, the one the key of doctrine, by means of which we unlock the treasures of the Bible, the other the key of discipline, by which we open or shut the way to the sealing ordinances of the faith. Both are Christ's gift, and neither is to be resigned without sin."

Domestic Piety.—If there be one cause more bitter than another to man, it is to be the offspring of an irreligious home; of a home where the voice of praise and prayer ascend not to God, and where the ties of human affection are not purified and elevated by the refining influence of religious feeling; of a home to which, if the cares or sorrows of life shall bring religion to the hearth in after days, that heart can not turn without bitterness of feeling, without anguish and vexation of spirit. If there be a curse to any country where the truths of religion are known, the deepest and bitterest curse which can be inflicted on it is a multitude of homes like that which I have supposed. Such homes send forth their sons unchecked in evil thoughts, unhallowed in their habits, and untaught in love to God; the name and cross of Jesus Christ stamped perhaps upon their forehead, but not written in their hearts: and they send them forth to prey upon the land, and to become its curse and its destruction. But on the other hand, there is a blessing to the religious home, which no tongue can speak, no language can describe! The home where in early years the heart is trained to a love of God, and to take pleasure in his worship and service, interwoven with the existence of many holy affections which die not with the circumstances that gave them birth—which last long, even though they may for a season be forgotten and neglected, and which exercise at least some check upon the evil of the human heart, and often, nay, commonly, recall it to hear again the voice of God, and turn to the paths of holiness and peace. How great, how unspeakable, is the happiness of a land where homes like this are common. [Rev. Henry John Rose.

Noah's Ark.—The largest ocean steamship, (says the Sailor's Magazine,) now plying on the Atlantic, bear precisely the proportions in length, breadth and depth, that are recorded concerning Noah's Ark. The dimensions of the Atlantic steamers are, length 322 feet, breadth of beam 50 feet, depth 28½ feet. The dimensions of the Ark were, length 300 cubits, breadth 50 cubits, depth 30 cubits. The Ark, therefore, was nearly twice the size, in length and breadth, of these vessels, the cubit being nearly 22 inches; both had upper, lower, and middle stories. After all the equipments of forty-two centuries, which have elapsed since the Deluge, the shipbuilders have to return to the model afforded by Noah's Ark

THE TEST OF COURAGE.

One evening, a short time after the battle of Fontenoy, (1745), a group of the King's body guard was congregated near the Latona basin, at Versailles, listening to two of their number discussing a subject which at that period was rarely a matter of controversy in military circles.

"Refuse a duel after a public affront!" exclaimed the tallest of the speakers, whose bronzed features were rendered almost ferocious by a thick red moustache; "it is a stain that all the waters of the deluge would not wash away."

"I repeat, Monsieur de Malatour," replied the other in a calm, polite tone, "that there is more true courage in refusing than in accepting a duel. What is more common than to yield to passion, envy or vengeance; and what more rare than to resist them? Therefore it is a virtue when exhibited at the price of public opinion; for what costs nothing is esteemed as nothing."

"A marvel! Monsieur d'Argentre, I would advise, if ever the king gives you the command of a company, to have engraven on the sabres of the soldiers the commandment, 'Thou shalt do no murder.'"

"And wherefore not? His majesty would have better servants, and the country fewer plunderers, if we had in our regiments more soldiers and fewer bullies. Take, as an example, him with whom you seem so much incensed; has he not nobly avenged what you call an affront, by taking, with his own hands, an enemy's colors, while you knaves most likely formed a prudent reserve behind the baggage?"

"Cowards themselves have their moments of courage."

"And the brave also their moments of fear."

"The expression is not that of a gentleman."

"It is that of Monsieur de Turenne, whose family equaled either of ours, and who avowed that he was not exempt from such moments. Every body has heard of his conduct to a braggadocia, who boasted in his presence that he had never known fear. He suddenly passed a lighted candle under the speaker's nose, who instantly drew back his head, to the great amusement of the bystanders, who laughed heartily at this singular mode of testing the other's assertion."

"None but a marshal of France had dared to try such a pleasantry. To our subject, sir. I maintain that your friend is a coward, and you—"

"And I—," repeated D'Argentre, his eyes flashing, and his lips firmly compressed.

"Hollon, gentlemen!" exclaimed a third party, who, owing to the warmth of the argument, had joined the group unperceived. "This is my affair," said he to Monsieur d'Argentre, holding his arm; then turning to his adversary, added, "Monsieur de Malatour, I am at your ordere."

"In that case, after you, if necessary," said D'Argentre, with his usual calmness.

"By my honor, you charm me, gentlemen! Let us go."

"One moment," replied the new comer, who, young as he was, wore the cross of St. Louis.

"No remarks. Gentlemen, hasten."

"Too great haste in such cases evidences less a contempt for death than an anxiety to get rid of his phantom."

"I listen, sir!"

"Monsieur d'Argentre just now stated that the bravest have their moments of fear. Without taking as serious his anecdote of Monsieur de Turenne, I shall add that, with the exception of the difference that exists between muscles and nerves, the courage of the duelist is more an affair of habit than of principle; for it is the natural state of man to love peace, if not for the sake of others, at least for himself. Do you wish me to prove it.

"Enough, sir: we are not here to listen to a sermon."

"Yet a moment. Here is my proposition: we are all assembled this evening previous to our leave of absence; I invite you, then, as also these gentlemen present, to a bear hunt on my estate, or rather amongst the precipices of Clat, in the Eastern Pyrenees. You are very expert, Monsieur de Malateur; you can snuff a candle with a pistol at twenty paces, and you have no equal at the small-sword. Well, I shall place you before a bear, and if you succeed—I do not even say in lodging a ball in his head, but merely in firing upon him—I shall submit immediately after to meet you face to face with any weapons you choose to name, since it is only at that price I am to gain your good opinion."

"Are you playing a comedy, sir?"

"Quite the contrary. And I even repeat that this extreme heat shows more the courage of the nerves, than of this true courage arising from principle."

"What guarantee have I, should I accept your proposition, that you will not again endeavor to evade me?"

"My word, sir; which I take all my comrades to witness, and place under the safeguard of their honor."

There ran through the auditory such a buzz of approbation, that De Malatour, though with a bad grace, was obliged to accede to the arrangement. It was then agreed that on the 1st of September all present should assemble at the Chateau du Clat.

Whilst the young lord of the manor is making the necessary preparations for their reception, we shall explain the accusation of which he was the object, yet which had not branded him with any mark of disgrace among a class of men so punctilious on the point of honor.

The young Baron de Villetroton, in entering among the gentlemen who formed the household guard of the King of France, carried with him principles which remained uncorrupted amid all the frivolities of one of the most licentious courts in Europe. Such, however, is the charm of virtue, even in the midst of vice, that his exemplary conduct had not only gained him the esteem of his officers, and the friendship of his companions, but had attracted the attention of the King himself. One alone among his comrades, Monsieur de Malatour, took umbrage at this general favor, and, on the occasion of some trifling expression of gesture, publicly insulted him. Villetreton refused to challenge him, as being contrary to his principles, but determined that this seeming cowardice, in not fighting a well-known duelist, should be redeemed by some action of éclat during the campaign just commenced. That moment had arrived; and for his noble conduct in taking the English colors at the battle of Fontenoy, he received the cross of St. Louis from the King's own hand on the field, the eulogium of Marshal Saxe, and a redoubled enmity on the part of De Malatour.

The first care of the young baron on arriving at his estate was to call his major-domo, an old faithful servant.

"I have business with thee, my master," said he, cordially, shaking him by the hand.

"Speak, monsiegneur," replied the parcur, who was deeply attached to his young lord; "you know the old hunter is yours to his last drop of blood."

"I never doubted it, my old friend. Did you receive my letter from Paris?"

"Yes, sir; and those gentlemen, your comrades, will have some work before them."

"Are there bears already on the height, then?" asked Villetreton, extending his hand in the direction of one of the lofty peaks, whose summit, covered with snow, glittered in the morning sun.

"Five in all—a complete ménage—father, mother, and children; besides an old bachelor, whom the Spaniards had driven to this side."

"In less than a week we shall go in pursuit of them. Do you know, parcur, some of my comrades are rather rough sportsmen, there is one of them who is able to snuff a candle with a pistol at twenty paces."

"Easier, perhaps, than to snuff a bear at four," replied the old man, laughing."

"That is what I said also. But, as I should wish to judge for myself of his prowess, you must place us together at the same post; at the Bridge of Maufe, for instance."

"Hum!" said the parcur, scratching his ear; "it would better please me to place you elsewhere."

"Why?"

"Because, to guard this post, a man ought to be in a state of grace, for he will be between two deaths—the bears and the precipice."

"I know the one, and do not fear the other; thanks to your lessons."

"I am sure of that. But, with your leave, I should like to guard the bridge myself."

"You are sure, then, that the bears will pass this way?"

"Sure—yes; quite sure—no. Recollect that they are sullen and prudent beasts, which never confide their plan of route to any one."

"It is agreed on. I shall guard the bridge with my comrade. Now go, and have the trackers ready."

"Very well, very well," murmured the parcur, as he retired, "I shall have my eye on him."

Eight days afterwards, all those invited, not excepting Monsieur de Malatour—who, despite the delicate attentions of the host, preserved a cold reserve—were assembled at the chateau. The magnificent grandeur of the Pyrenees, their shining summits relieved against the blue sky of Spain, was an unlooked-for pleasure to the greater number of the guests, who, for the most part, belonged to the rich and fertile plains of the interior.

The morning following the arrival, a body of trackers and scouts, provided with all manner of discordant instruments—trumpets, saucepans, drums, etc., etc., were assembled under the walls of the chateau, with the parcur at their head; while by his side stood the mastiffs, who proudly guarded a dozen large mastiffs, held in leash by his vigorous helpers. The young baron and his friends, armed with carabines and hunting-knives, had scarcely appeared, when, by a sign from the parcur, the whole troop moved silently forward. The dogs themselves seemed to understand the importance of this movement, and nothing was heard but the confused tramp of feet, blending with the noise of the distant torrent, or, at intervals, the cry of some belated night-bird flying heavily homeward in the doubtful glimmer of the yet unopened day.

As the party reached the crest of the mountain, which immediately overhung the chateau, the first rays of the sun breaking from the east glanced on the summit of the Pyrenees, and suddenly illuminating the landscape, discovered beneath them a deep valley, covered with majestic pine trees, which murmured in the fresh breeze of the morning.

Opposite to them, the foaming waters of a cascade fell for some hundreds of feet through a cleft which divided the mountains from the summit to the base. By one of those caprices of nature which testify the primitive convulsions of our globe, the chasm was surmounted by a natural bridge; the piles of granite at each side being joined by one immense flat rock, almost seeming to verify the fable of the Titans; for it appeared impossible that these enormous blocks of stone could ever have been raised to such an elevation by human agency. Sinister legends were attached to the place; and the mountaineers recounted with terror that no hunter, with the exception of the parcur, had ever been posted at the bridge of Maure without becoming the prey of either the bears or the precipice. But the parcur was too good a Christian to partake of this ridiculous prejudice; he attributed the fatality to its real cause, the dizziness arising from the sight of the bears and the precipice combined, by destroying the hunter's presence of mind, made his aim unsteady, as his death the inevitable consequence. He could not, however, altogether divest himself of fears for his young master, who obstinately persevered in his intention of occupying the bridge with his antagonist.

After placing the baron's companions at posts which he considered the most advantageous, the parcur rejoined his men, and disposing them so as to encompass the valley facing the cascade, commanded the utmost silence to be preserved until they should hear the first bark of his dog. At that signal the mastiffs were to be unleashed, the instruments sounded, and all to move slowly forward, contracting the circle as they approached the cascade. These arrangements being made, the parcur and his dog, followed by the mandrin alone, disappeared in the depths of the wood.

For some minutes the silence had remained unbroken, when suddenly a furious barking commenced, accompanied by low growling.—Each prepared his arms; the instruments sounded; and the mastiffs being let loose, precipitated themselves pell-mell in the direction of the struggle. Their furious barking was soon confounded with the cries of the hunters and the din of the instruments, mingled with the formidable growling of the bears, making altogether a hideous concert, which, rolling along the sides of the valley, was repeated by the distant echoes. At this moment the young baron regarded his companion, whose countenance though pale, remained calm and scornful.

"Attention, sir!" said he, in a low voice. "The bears are not far from us; let your aim be true, or else—"

"Keep your counsel for yourself, sir!"

"Attention!" repeated Villetreton, without seeming to notice the curly response, "he approaches!"

Those who were placed in front of the cascade seeing the animals directing their course to the bridge, cried, from all parts, "Look out, look out, Villetreton!" But the breaking of branches, followed by the rolling of loosened stones down the precipice, had already given warning of the animal's near approach. Malatour became deadly pale; he, however, held his carabine firmly, in the attitude of a resolute hunter.

A bear at length appeared, with foaming mouth and glaring eyes, at times turning as if he would fain struggle with his pursuers; but when he saw the bridge, his only way of escape, occupied, he uttered a fearful growl, and raising himself on his hind legs, was rushing on our two hunters, when a ball struck him in the forehead, and he fell dead at their feet.

Malatour convulsively grasped his gun, he had become completely powerless. Suddenly new cries, louder and more pressing, were heard.

"Fire! fire! he is now on you!" cried the parcur, who appeared unexpectedly, pale and agitated, his gun to his shoulder, but afraid to fire lest he should hit his master.

The latter, perceiving his agitation, turned round; it was indeed time. On the other side of the bridge, a bear, much larger than the first, was in the act of making the final rush. Springing backward, he seized the carabine of his petrified companion, and lodged its contents in the animal's breast ere he could reach them. He rolled in the death struggle to where they stood. All this was the work of an instant. The knees of the hardy old parcur shook with emotion at the escape of his young master; as for Malatour, his livid paleness, and the convulsive shuddering of his limbs, testified the state of his mind.

"Take your arms," said the young baron, quickly replacing in his hands the carabine; "here are our comrades—they must not see you unarmed; and, parcur, not a word of all this."

"Look!" said he to his companions, as they gathered around, pointing to the monstrous beasts, "one to each. Now, Monsieur de Malatour, I wait your orders, and am ready to give the satisfaction you require."

The latter made no reply, but reached out his hand, which Villetreton cordially shook.

That evening a banquet was given to celebrate the double victory. Towards the end of the repast, a toast to "vanquishers" was proposed and immediately accepted. Mons. d'Argentre, glass in hand, rose to pledge it, when Malatour, also rising, held his arm, exclaiming, "To the noble vanquisher of the day! to our noble host. It was he alone who killed the two bears; and if, through his generosity, I have allowed the illusion to last so long, it was simply for this reason; the affront which I gave him was a public one, the reparation ought to be public likewise. I now declare that Monsieur de Villetreton is the bravest of the brave, and that I shall maintain it towards all and against all."

"This time, at least, I shall not take up your gauntlet," said Monsieur d'Argentre.

"There's a brave young man!" cried the parcur, whom his master had admitted to his table, and who endeavored to conceal a furtive tear. "Nothing could better prove to me, sir, that with a little experience you will be as calm in the presence of bears, as you are, I am sure, in the face of an enemy."

AFRICAN EXPLORATION.

A correspondent of Her Majesty's ship Pluto writes to the London Athenæum, under date, Fernando, July 25:

We have had a most exciting cruise. After leaving this place, and communicating with the senior officer at Loando, we were sent up the river Congo to settle a dispute between the master of an English merchant brig and some Portuguese. After this was arranged we returned to Loando for our letters, but the Polyphemus not arriving in time, the ship sailed again for the Congo, and I was left behind in one of our gigs, with four kroomen, for the mail. During our stay I met, at the house of one of the commissioners, one of the most extraordinary men I have ever seen—Dr. Livingstone; he has just arrived from the Cape overland; a most arduous undertaking, and one never accomplished before, although often attempted. His plan of proceeding differed very materially from any of his predecessors. Instead of setting out with half a hundred attendants, horses, bullock wagons, etc., he commenced his journey carrying with him only a sextant, gun, chronometer, tent, four servants, and as many days' provisions, relying on Providence and his gun for a supply when these were gone.

After leaving the Cape Colony he was obliged to travel a long way to the North-east in order to avoid the deserts and hostile tribes in their vicinity that lay on their left; crossing in this route a great many branches of the river Zambegi and others, the names of which I have forgotten, till he arrived at a large town. There, as the chief was very hospitable, he remained a short time to recruit his health, having been nearly drowned and starved half a dozen times during the nine months it took him to perform this part of his journey, and his arm badly broken in two places by a lion. It appeared he had wandered one evening from his attendants, after they had pitched their tents, in quest of game, when he came suddenly on a large lion crouching down ready for a spring at him; without waiting a second he fired, and must have been knocked down at the same moment and stunned, as he remembers nothing from the time he fired till he was found by his servants next morning. When they came up they found the Doctor insensible, and the lion lying dead alongside him. When he left, the chief, who was very desirous of finding a route to the westward for the transmission of his ivory, gave him twenty-four of his people to assist him on his journey.

After leaving he again traveled to the North-east until he arrived in the parallel of Loando. Now came the tug of war. He had upward of a thousand miles to travel across the unexplored countries of our charts, a tract never hitherto trodden by any white man, and wholly unknown even to the blacks he had seen as yet; however, this part of the journey proved to be the easiest, and it was not till he arrived near Cassanga, on the Portuguese frontier, that he met with any molestation. The country he found to be thickly populated, and the inhabitants very peaceably disposed. From their never having seen a white man before, you may fancy what an object of curiosity he became to them; wherever he stopped the people from far and near flocked round him with astonishment pictured on their countenances. As the Doctor was very much sunburnt, his color did not so much surprise them as his hair, which was very long; this was the object of attraction wherever he went, and highly favored did those fancy themselves who who became the possessors of a lock of it. Every tribe he met with had some idea of one Supreme Being and a future state of existance, though they all worship, in addition, various animals that they hold sacred. At every place he stopped they supplied him liberally with provisions; and it was not, as I mentioned before, till he arrived near the Portuguese territories that he met with any trouble.

There the inhabitants have been in the habit of kidnapping the people further inland, to sell to the Portuguese for slaves, and fearing, should a road be opened that way, it would spoil their traffic, they became very troublesome, and wanted the Doctor to pay toll nearly every step he took; however, by putting on a bold front, he managed to make his way through, and arrived at Loando safely in the beginning of June, making it exactly two years since he left the Cape. The Doctor is very much emaciated from the hardships he has undergone, and has not recovered the use of his arm entirely yet; but as soon as he is well he is determined to return, trying this time to find a shorter road than the one he came by. He had the whole of his attendants on board, and showed them over the ship; having never seen salt water before, or any thing afloat larger than a canoe, they were very much surprised and delighted, though they told the Doctor they would never be able to get any of their people to believe them on their return, so perfectly astonishing did every thing appear to them.

SINGULAR FEATURE IN LUNACY.

A writer in Church's Bizarre, gives us some interesting facts and remarks, concerning the unfortunates in a lunatic asylum. A peculiar condition of lunacy is thus described:

"There are seasons when most of the patients—especially those whose lunatic attacks are only intermittent—are dreadfully weary of their confinement and would get away if they could. And why do they not get away? How is it, that half a dozen attendants are able to control a hundred men, four-fifths of whom, perhaps, are physically as strong, if not stronger, than themselves? If the patients, or even a score of them, could harmonize and combine, they might bind and gag every attendant, take their keys, unlock the doors and escape. But the simple fact is, lunatics cannot combine for effecting a common end; this is one of the most marked features of their malady. A single maniac may employ a great deal of cunning dissimulation, and is capable of carrying out a complicated and lengthened series of measures for accomplishing some purpose of his own. But when two or more of them attempt to unite their forces and confer on some plan to be executed, they either can not agree at all, or, if they agree for a short space, one or another is sure very soon to betray the rest, to disclose their intents, and perhaps help to defeat them. So that practically, each lunatic stands alone in opposition to the whole number of attendants and cannot rely on the slightest aid from scores of his mad companions. So striking is this feature of lunacy, that we may well regard it a providential arrangement, which deprives of a terrible power of working mischief those who have lost their capacity of self-control.

"Something of the same conservative providential arrangement is witnessed in the case of the criminal and vicious. They can not rely on each others' fidelity, but are ever ready to betray each other, and rend in pieces the very schemes they have aided in forming, and have sworn to help to execute. By this means, society is preserved from the measureless evil which might be done by a combination of men, with all their intellectual powers in full vigor on the alert, and totally free from restraints of conscience and principle, if at the same time, they could hold together and be as true to each other, as the virtuous part of mankind. But evil is self-defeating, as well as lunacy, and Heaven be thanked for both these ordinations."

DR. TAYLOR.

On that pleasant morniag of Thursday last, we found a quiet stranger in the southwest corner of our sanctum, busy with the old files, apparently searching for something on his own account. Abont five feet eight in stature, with the stoutness of Gen. Taylor or Napoleon, and with a face full of wholesome color and honest hearty meaning. An honest man thought we, and one who appreciates the papers. No reed shaken by the wind we mused on; but we never dreamed that he was more than a prophet.

So it was the veritable Taylor, the embodiment of the China Mission. We had heard and read so much about the Doctor, that his actual presence, the real shake of his hand, and his own look and words, made us "like them that dream." It was like a breeze in August—like a cheerful sunshine this November day. God bless the man and his mission more and more! We like this movement much. It brings the church and people face to face with the objects and results of their Christian liberality and prayers.

Dr. Taylor purposes, at no distant day, to return to his field of labor and sacrifice; is sanguine of China ultimately, and of present good, not a little. He is now on his way to his home Conference, South Carolina, and will be in New Orleans the second Sabbath of January, on his way to the Louisiana Conference. The Doctor, in the last three months, has visited seven Conferences, and traveled more than five thousand miles, in conveyances of every description, from skiff and cart to steamboat and car.

YELLOW FEVER.—During the past week the city and the regions round about have been visited by two or three heavy frosts. We may certainly assure ourselves and our readers that the healthy season has now set in, and that our old scourge has disappeared. We hear of no new cases in private practice, and very little in the hospital. We do not hesitate to pronounce the city perfectly safe for the unacclimated.

GREENWOOD CT., ALABAMA CONFERENCE.—It is a source of pleasure to me to inform you that God has revived his work on this circuit, to some extent. We have had some meetings which resulted in great good; the membership of the Church have been greatly stirred up and blessed, and about forty added to the Church. L. PATTERSON.

FELICITY STREET.—The revival at this Church has terminated its fourth week. Upwards of sixty conversions, and the church greatly refreshed. Mourners still at the altar and conversions nightly. The pastor takes occasion to acknowlvdge the valued help of Rev. Dr. Harmon during the week, and that of Brothers Keener and Walker in the earlier progress of the meeting. Persons of every age have been the subjects of converting grace. Several of fifty years and upwards have for the first time tasted of the power of the world to come; and quite a number of the Sunday School children have been hopefully converted. Some from other denominations have sought and found pardon at the altar. One or two Roman Catholics have made profession of religion and united with the church. Backsliders have been reclaimed, and many seekers, in the church, have received the witness of the Spirit.

Notice.

The Preachers of the Alabama Conference, on their arrival in Talladega, will call at the store of Major J. G. L. Huey, north-east corner of the Square, where they will learn their destination during Conference.

D. CARMICHAEL.

TALLADEGA, Nov. 7, 1854.

REVIVAL.—We hear of a glorious work at Swan Lake, Montecello Ct., Louisiana, under Brother Hallberg—Brother Harp assisting. The latter in a private note says:

"The meeting continned nine days, and there were between forty and fifty happy conversions, (in fact, I believe there were fully fifty,) and thirty-five were added to the Church. Some were sanctified, all were edified. At the altar were seen several aged men and women, who had witnessed the frosts of three score winters, who had not bowed to God before, but now with streaming eyes and throbbing hearts, they came bewailing their sins, while their deep groans and ardent prayers touched the hearers and excited the pity of angels, but blessed be God their mournful appeals were not in vain, for while they wept heaven smiled, and the voice of Jesus bid them weep no more. Some of the spies of Satan, who attended to take items, were arrested by the spirit, who opened to their minds the appalling future to which they were hastening, and caused them to surrender themselves as prisoners of Christ. The meeting was not commenced, to be protracted, the house was incommodious and open, the nights frosty, the people busily engaged gathering their crops, but notwithstanding all this the work went on for nine days and nights. Brother Hallberg is doing a glorious work through the Lord. I was able to attend, but too much debilitated to be of much service."

HEALTH OF YAZOO CITY.—The Yazoo Democrat reports white frosts on the nights of the 4th, 5th and 6th inst. The Democrat says the city is healthy, cotton is arriving in increased quantities, and trade is rapidly reviving

The following vindication of the Lectures on Daniel, is from the pen of Dr. Scott himself, and addressed to the Presbyterian of Philadelphia. It is with pleasarethat we give space to the article, and we are glad that the Doctor speaks for himself.

DR. SCOTT'S VINDICATION.

MESSRS. EDITORS—A northern journal accuses me of having transferred to the pages of my volume of Lectures on Daniel "entire sentences of description, illustration, argument and appeal," from Dr. Cumming's Lectures, "without the least acknowledgment;" and a few other papers have given currency to the charge. I cannot doubt that the accusation was made without due consideration. If the facts in the case may be allowed to speak, I am quite willing to abide by the decision they shall dictate.

1. A frank and full acknowledgment is made in my preface, calling attention to the authors I had used, among whom Dr. Cumming is named. "The authors that have fallen, in my way, and to which I am more or less indebted for help in preparing these lectures, are the following." Then the names of the authors are given, and the paragraph concludes with the following sentence:—"And especially do I desire to acknowledge my obligations to the lectures of Dr. Cumming of London, on Daniel." See preface. The above, "more or less," was intended to cover all of my indebtedness, much or little, not otherwise specified. It was thought the preface and the repeated references in the lectures did ample justice to my authors.

2. "It is well known, also," says a writer in a New Orleans paper, speaking as a friend while I was absent in California, "by thousands of persons who heard this series of lectures, that early in the delivery of the course on Daniel, Dr. Scott urged us to procure Kitto's Bible Illustrations, and Gausen's Lectures. He also called particular attention to Dr. Cumming's Lectures, saying, that to the student of prophecy they would well repay the perusal. It is also well known that he repeatedly—in almost if not quite every lecture—named the authors from whom he quoted—sometimes telling where the rare works could be found, and urging the young men especially, to procure and read them for themselves."

3. And not only so, but about a score of times, the authors I used are named in the body of the lectures themselves. On page 37 Dr. Cumming is expressly named, and the following sentence is found: "I have named these authors, because as many of you (speaking to young men, whom I addressed and considered very much in the light of a large Bible class,) are blessed with a liberal education, you may be inclined to devote some portion of your time to mental and moral improvement by giving your attention to some of them." And again on pages 226-7: "Repeatedly have I asked your attention to three works on the book of Daniel, which I again name, and hope you will procure and read as far as you have opportunity." Then the authors are named, one of whom is Dr. Cumming of London. It is not true, therefore, that there is not the least acknowledgment of my "Scottish brother."

4. There is much in the circumstances detailed in the preface and in Dr. Sprague's introduction, under which these lectures were prepared, and in the circumstances that prevented their revision, although not prepared originally with any thought of publication, that might be urged as an extenuation or excuse for many grave errors. In fact it must be confessed, that owing to the pressure of official duties during the awful epidemic referred to in my preface, most of the lectures were sent to the publishers just as they were delivered, without having been read over at all with a view to their coming before the public. These were never copied. They are first drafts. Moreover, the proof sheets were read here while the manuscripts were with the printer in New York. I had no copy to read by, and last of all the manuscripts were burned in the great Harper fire. Some of the corrected proof sheets were either lost or so delayed in the mails, that considerable portions were published without the author's revision. I never saw Dr. Sprague's introduction, nor the volume, until several weeks after its issue, and then in California, when it was too late for errata. Those facts are certainly sufficient to account for errors and omissions, and there are a number, and also for negligence and inaccuracy in the use of quotation marks.

5. As to the four extracts made by Norton's Gazette, three are in references to Dr. Cumming; and one to Dr. Kitto. As to the first, from the 38th page of my lectures, there is an error in placing the quotation marks. The inverted commas are there, and begin at the right place, but do not close on the right word. This is obvious on the very face of the page itself. And besides, this extract is on the very same leaf with the extract referring to Dr. Camming, as just given from page 37. The other two extracts are also from lectures in which Dr. Cumming is named, acknowledged and recommended. One of them is from the very same lecture, in which I say: "Repentedly have I asked your attention to three works on Daniel, which I again name, and hope you will procure and read as far as you have opportunity"—page 226. One of these works here described, is by Dr. Cumming, and so stated in the lecture. And moreover, these sentences are but paraphrases, with additional matter introduced—such paraphrases as occurred to my mind after reading my authors, and as I felt authorized to make, after having requested my hearers to read and study these authors for themselves. These sentences were not intended to be thought original, nor were they marked as quotations, for they were not verbatim. I beg that the lectures may be compared.

As to the extract about Kitto, the critic overlooks two facts: 1st. There are only a few words identical. There is a similarity—just such a similarity as would be likely to occur between writers on the same text, while looking at the same original sources of description. 2d. There are two notes at the bottom of the page which closes the paragraphs referred to, in which it is true, however, the printer has not completed the sentence, as is seen from the note itself, which stops with a comma, and not with a period. The corrected proof of this sheet was probably lost in the mail. Pages 332-3 should have been printed in the note with pages 91 and 92. Certainly the critic did not see my preface, and did not see pages 37, 226 and 227, and must have wholly overlooked the many references made to the authors which I was studying at the time, and urging my hearers to study at the same time with myself. The sentences quoted by Norton are not fairly given, because there is an omission of intervening matter, and the connection is suppressed. The plan and purpose of Dr. Cumming's volume are altogether different. His Lectures are not addressed to young men. He is a strong millenarian, and his volume is mainly devoted to the prophecies, while my Lectures are plain, expository "Tracts for the times," addressed to American young men of the nineteenth century. The plan of my volume is my own. The plan of each lecture is my own. The order and arrangement and mode of presentation and adaptation are all my own. And even according to my critics themselves, only a small part of the materials used are borrowed as I have shown with ample acknowledgments at the time.

6. Again, authors, especially commentators on old writings, must draw from a common source. Kitto is used as a dictionary. Facts, historical illustrations, and descriptions of things (as of the image of Dura and of the soothsayers of Babylon, if correct) must be very much alike. All that I attempted was, with such helps as I had, to make such a fresh compilation or combination of facts and thoughts as would best bring out the meaning of the text, and bring my hearers into direct contact with the mind of the Eternal Spirit, speaking to us from the prophet's pen. Had I been less candid in my acknowledgments, I should doubtless have escaped this ungracious imputation. But I frankly proclaimed all my indebtedness. It is true, however, that in some instances I did not then myself know, nor do I know now, nor shall I probably ever know, with absolute accuracy, which words and and thoughts should be considered original and which borrowed. It is difficult, perhaps impossible, for any man who reads at all, and has any ideas of his own, to analyze and distinguish the sources of his thoughts. I availed myself of the researches of travelers and savans, and of my own notes of travel in the East, and of as much historical and exegetical illustration as I could, which seemed to me pertinent; and by life-like associations I sought to introduce my hero to young men as one they would admire and imitate.

This simple statement of facts shows, 1st. How and why it is there are errors and omissions and inaccuracies in the use of quotation marks, as well as in reference to other things. And 2d. That the charge of using Dr. Cumming's work "without the least acknowledgment," is not true. It is impossible for any man in his right senses to have designed to make any improper or concealed or dishonorable use of authors, which at the very same time and in the same breath he was urging his hearers to study with himself, and from which, with acknowledgment at the time, he was reading some of the sentences quoted by the critic.

This statement of facts would have been made sooner, but that I knew nothing of the accusation till I returned from California. W. A. SCOTT.

CONFERENCE AT TALLADEGA.

MR. EDITOR—As there seems to be considerable uncertainty among the members of the Conference in reference to the route to Talladega, allow me to give them some information through your paper.

There will be no reduction of fare by any public conveyance, I believe. The fare from Selma to Montevallo, by R. Road, is $1 75; from thence to Talladega by stage, on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, $5. And there will be a hack at Montevallo on Friday and Monday preceding the Conference, to convey passengers to Talladega, at the same price. So that from Thursday to Tuesday preceding the Conference, conveyance can be had from Montevallo to Talladega, by a limited number of persons.

From Montgomery there is a daily stage, fare $5. The result is, that the great body of the Conference will have to go by private conveyance. From Montgomery the distance is about seventy miles, and there is a plank road most of the way. J. HAMILTON.

PRAIRIE CREEK MISSION, ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

REV. H. N. MCTYEIRE, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South:

DEAR BROTHER—As the Conference year will soon close, I now send you the last report from this mission that can reach you before the meeting of the Annual Conference. There are, I think, about eight hundred persons embraced in the missions; all of whom are under catechetical instruction. There are thousands more within the borders of the mission, and bordering on it, who have few if any privileges of receiving religious instruction. Many of these, no doubt, could be reached, if we had the men for the work. "The harvest is plenteous, but the laborers are few." There is, certainly, no work that has higher claims upon the Church than the religious instruction of the colored people, whose lot Providence has cast among us: and none in which a minister can have stronger assurances that he is doing the work of God. All things considered, there is, perhaps, no field of Gospel labor that yields a richer harvest.

There have been seventy-nine received into the church, and, I have reason to believe, a goodly number of sound conversions. A few have been expelled. Fifteen infants and twenty-two adults have been baptized. The mission may be regarded as in a prosperous condition. With gratitude to God, I record the fact that there has been no disagreement with either patrons or overseers. I feel sufficient interest to prompt me to write much more on this subject, but I fear this article is already too long.

Your Brother in Christ,

J. C. HUCKABEE.

PROPER OVERSEERS FOR SOUTERN PLANTATIONS.

MR. EDITOR—I have read with interest several pieces in the Advocate on the subject of our domestic missions. I heartily appreciate the various suggestions contained in those pieces for the improvement and success of this great work, and hope that each piece and every suggestion may be attended with the desired good. But there is one important item that has been overlooked by them all which is the securing men of good moral and the right sort of principles as overseers. There is no question but many owners are continually at fault on this point. So the men they employ is a farmer and understands having work done, he is their man. It matters not as to his morals, or as to his views on the moral and religious training of servants. Now it does appear to me that the morals of a man occupying this responsible station ought to be right as well as his business talents. If his morals are bad it is certain that his influence over the blacks will be bad, and greatly retard if not entirely counteract the efforts of the missionery among them, and methinks if the missionaries among this people were to speak what they know of the influence of corrupt overseers, it would doubtless cause some masters to tremble on account of the injustice done their poor servants, and the embarrassments thrown in the way of the success of the gospel among them. I am glad to know that there are men in this business of sterling worth whose deportment and views are right on this subject, but then I am pained to know that there are others whose morals and views wholly disqualify them for this station. I will not dare attempt the portrayal of their morals in this; were I to do so I know you would draw your pen across the dark picture, you, doubtless, would not admit the portroyal of a character in your paper that would pollute the morals of the plantation negroes. But listen how they talk. One says he "sees no use for all this missionary business, were he an owner it should not be allowed on his place," another says "he is afraid of religion among negroes, not afraid of fiddling and dancing but afraid of an effort to make them fear God and regard man, and occupy a servants place; a third "has no confidence in a negroes religion," inform the fourth of the signs of success among his people, and he will reply "now is the time to look out for the pigs," etc. Now while men of such principles are in charge of our missionary appointments we cannot expect reasonable success.

I am pleased to know that employers are improving on this subject. A gentleman not long since asked the writer to recommend a suitable man to him, "he wished a man whose deportment would elevate the morals of his people." A lady, also, in the same vicinity, before employing her overseer, "wished to know if he swore, or drank drams, or gambled, and if he prayed and was in favor of having missionaries preach to servants." This lady is not a member of any church, but evidently has proper views of the character an overseer should possess, and sets many a churchman an example in this matter worthy of imitation. I shall not attempt to argue the propriety of guarding this point well, it is so obvious that the thinking can see it at once. I would say however to all concerned, if you have not been sufficiently judicious in selecting men for this responsible trust in the past, endeavor to do so in the future; and, doubtless, the effort made to benefit your people religiously, will be attended with greater success. You may not meet with the amount of success you desire, but a faithful effort will succeed sooner or later. And let me here suggest that owners and missionary labor and pray specially for the conversion and reformation of those overseers now unconverted. Their cases can be reached as well as other men, and special attention to them is generally appreciated and often attended with success.

MEMPHIS CONFERENCE.

This body, Bishop PAINE presiding, adjourned on the evening of November 2. It concurred unanimously in the action of the Tennessee Conference, advising the removal of Lagrange College, to Florance Ala.

The question of most interest, touching the union of the Memphis, Arkansas and Nashville Advocates, was decided on these resolutions:

Resolved, 1st, That we do not consent to the memorial from Tennessee Conference, proposing an alliance between the Memphis, Arkansas and Nashvill Advocates.

Resolved, 2d, That we pledge ourselves to each other and to the Editor, to more thorough, hearty and persevering efforts in behalf of the Memphis and Arkansas Advocate than we have ever yet made, and that we will endeavor to increase the subscription list, by at least one thousand good, paying, new subscribers as soon as possible.

Resolved, 3d, That the Publishing Committee be requested to enquire into the expediency of reducing the whole business of the Advocate to the cash system.

Resolved, 4th, That we request the Editor to have all the old accounts forwarded to us as soon as possible, and that we will try our best to collect them all.

Dr. Taylor, the friend of China, was in attendance, and this is what they think of him, and what they will do for him:

Rev. Dr. Taylor, Missionary to China, by permission from the Bishop, addressed the Conference at some length concerning his field of Missionary labor. He gave an interesting history of the intestinal war now being carried on in that country. He predicted for China a brilliant future, however distant; and with great feeling desired the members of the Memphis Annual Conference to grow not weary in the responsible work of advancing the great and glorious cause of Foreign Missions. At the close of Dr. Taylor's address, Bishop Paine, with the consent of the Conference, offered up a fervent prayer in behalf of the cause of Missions, and particularly invoked upon Dr. Taylor and his family, the richest benedictions of Heaven.

This solemn and interesting occasion will doubtless be long remembered by all the members of Conference in attendance.

The following Resolutions, offered by Rev. D. J. Allen, were then unanimously adopted by the Conference:

Resolved, That we, as a Conference, have been greatly pleased and edified by the visit of Dr. Taylor, and that he carries with him on his way back to his great field of labor, our hearty prayers for his success, and the well-being of himself and family, together with an assurance of all the aid we can supply.

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves as a Conference, that should Bishop Andrew select one of our body as a Missionary to China, we will pay all his expenses, build him a house, and continue to support him when there, regarding him as our representative in that great field of Christian enterprize.

The following were admitted on trial:

CONFERENCE HIGH SCHOOL.

HOMER, LA., Nov. 2, 1854.

At the fourth Quarterly Meeting for Homer Circuit the following resolutions were adopted, to-wit:

WHEREAS, The Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at its last annual meeting, appointed a committee of three to take into consideration the expediency of establishing somewhere in North Louisiana, a High School to be under the patronge and control of said conference:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Quarterly Meeting of Homer Circuit, Ouachita District, now in session convened, it is expedient and highly important to the best interests of the Church in this Conference, that such High School should be established for the purposes proposed.

Resolved, secondly, That, in view of the known healthfulness of Homer, in Claiborne Parish, and in view of its central and convenient situation, and other circumstances and influences surrounding it, it is the wish of this Conference that the attention of said Committee be specially invited to Homer as the most suitable place in North Louisiana for the establishing and building up of such an institution.

Resolved, further, That these resolutions be published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate, so that the Committee may have an opportunity of seeing them.

The following amendment was offered by Rev. James T. Wafer, to-wit: That the original resolution be so amended as to include Forest Grove with Homer, which amendment was lost by one vote.

The original resolutions were then adopted unanimously.

What Would Have Been Said if the Change Had Been The Other Way?

MR. EDITOR—I have reliable information that two hundred members of the Baptist Church have left that communion and been received into our Church in one District in this Conference, during the term of its present Elder, and among them two ministers. Now we rejoice in this, only so far, as this change of church membership has been attended by an improved christian experience and character. Mere change from one church to another is no increase or extension of Christ's Kingdom, and none but a blind Bigot can think it is.

But if these changes had been from the Methodist to the Baptist Church, what would have been said? Judging from the specimens we have had, would not capitals, italics, and notes of admiration, failed in certain offices long since! There would have been a complete immersion of glorying in certain quarters, and bright glimpses of the millenium would have been enjoyed by more than one.

But let our Baptist Brethren, with whom we sincerely desire to live in peace, study this case, and learn the lesson from it. Its history is simply this. They had harped upon the thread-bare and over-done subject of Baptism, until they provoked retaliation in the form of a searching, protracted discussion of the subject—pushing its facts and arguments home upon their people, and here is the consequence. Let them beware; for the peace and prosperity of their Church in many places, depends upon the silence and forbearance of those opposed to them. But why should churches strive about so LITTLE—so VERY LITTLE a thing as the MODE of baptism! P.

SAAL I PRAY TO CHANCE!—An English lady, who had forsaken her God and the Bible for the gloom and darkness of infidelity, was crossing the Atlantic, and asked a pious sailor one morning how long they should be out. "In fourteen days, if it is God's will, we shall be in Liverpool," answered the sailor. "If it is God's will," said the lady: "what a senseless expression, don't you know that all comes by chance!"

In a few days a terrible storm arose, and the lady stood clinging to the side of the cabin door in an agony of terror, when the sailor passed her.

"What do you think," said she; "will the storm soon be over!" "It seems likely to last for some time, madam." "Oh," she cried, "pray that we may not be lost." His only and calm reply was, "Shall I pray to chance?" [Am. Messenger.

INFLUENCE OF MIND ON DISEASE.—It would seem as if the study of certain diseases sometimes favored their real or imaginary development. Laennec died of phthisis, and Corvisart of diseass of the heart. When the celebrated Professor Frank was preparing his lectures at Pavia, on disease of the heart, his own heart became so disturbed that he was obliged to rest for a while. Rumor says that no less than five of the professors in one of the medical colleges have unjustly suspected their hearts. Medical students, exhausted by a winter session, are apt to be special subjects of real or imaginary irregularity of the heart. A young friend who attended our lectures last winter, on diseases of the chest, felt an unusual knocking of his heart after ascending the long college stairs, and required several examinations to satisfy him that there was no danger. JACKSON, La. Nov 13, 1854

EDS. CRESCENT—Gentlemen: We are all astir here. The Mississippi Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church is holding its thirty-eighth annual session Bishop Early opened the Conference on Wednesday morning last. About one hundred ministers are on the ground and they are ploughing it up, you may depend on it. Meeting three times a day—morning, afternoon and night. The congregations large; Conference in session from 9 a. m. to 1 p. m. This is much the largest ecclesiastical body in Mississippi—numbering last year twenty-five thousand members. There has been considerable increase over the figure from the labors of the year just closing, which is reported as prosperous. They say yellow fever and short crops are good for religion.

The Bible doctrine is true of us all—fat and sassy. Job Darrah waxed fat and kicked against his Maker. Human nature cannot be trusted with too much health and prosperity. In an old Baptist Hymn Book of my grandmother, I remember to have read the following poetical version of that affair. Pardon Ba Introduction:

"Jeshurun waxed fat,
And down his body hung;
He kicked against his God,
And up his buttocks flung."

Again I once saw a lean brother who had been working hard and living hard and keeping all the hot days, confessed another neighboring sin at two hundred and thirty. "Ah, my dear brother," said the first, "the best for godliness—too fat for godliness." These three texts will not be taken as per usual to any reverend gentlemen in our city.

These preachers look like hard workers. Many of them own nothing but a horse and saddle-bags. They live it, work and die at it. They follow up the squatters and immigrants, penetrate the darkest corners of the land, and preach even in the poorest settlements. If they get the salary, it is not much—only $150; if they don't get it, well—no back accounts are kept. Those who labor in more liberal and wealthy regions, bring up an average, they may receive and a special collection below to help the among these destitute ones. By this system of light and love and mutual intercession and assistance the whole body lives and moves vitally on. This brings about a strong spirit de corps among them. They live one another and stand by each other as they stand by their Church, to the death.

It may strike you as odd that the Mississippi Conference should hold its session in Louisiana. The reason of Conferences are not strictly confined to State bounds but natural ones. This place is on the edge of the Mississippi Conference, near the Louisiana.

Many of your citizens remember the early Methodist preachers who were the pastors and guests of their parents, long ago. Few men are held in greater veneration. By their efforts the foundations of Christianity and of their own denomination especially, were laid broad and deep in the developing territory. Their churches rise in every where—in town village and cross-road, and the great mass of wealthy and intelligent citizens are in the communion.

Several young men have just joined the Itinerant ministry. They promise usefulness. Two of them were selected for the Presbyterian ministry at Danville, Ky. Seventeen in all, have joined—some of them middle aged. Inerant is a common word, and applicable. They take appointments annually from the Bishop, and go where he directs, from the river-swamp to the sea-coast, and from Pearl River to the regions above the Yazoo.

The collections for Missions this year are about $70. One of the members, Rev Mr. Sawhorth, has a son in China, who went out as missionary a year ago.

These old parsons tell amusing stories touching the childhood of some great men. I heard a good one of a Senator and eminent Senator, well-known in your city—over California. "Billy Gwin," said he, "Oh, I knew his father and family, and Billy too. His father James Gwin was a good old Methodist preacher. Billy was a particular boy. He had the thickest skull again. Often I have seen Billy Gwin for a good big red apple, run on his fours and butt against a stump like a ram, and hit so hard his heels would fly up."

Put that down, Messrs. Editors for the National Patriot Gallery. Men are but grown up boys. I wonder if politicians are not seen every day doing about the same thing for a golden apple. Oh, for thick skulls!

CENTENARY COLLEGE, long established here, is delapsed. In its various departments one hundred and sixty students are in attendance; in the College classes proper one hundred. The professors are able and faithful instructors. This College is growing in public favor, and is contributing more to Southern education than any institution of the South. Doctor Drake who had been elected President, sends an unwelcome message to the Board of Trustees, that he cannot come to that post. The recent overflow of yellow fever makes it a scary post. Dr. Drake is in North Carolina. The Board will meet to-morrow to elect one in his stead. It demands the highest talent, and will doubtless secure them.

Yesterday Bishop Early preached at 11 o'clock, in the College chapel, to an immense congregation, following a sermon with ordinations. Rev Mr. McTyeire, of New Orleans, preached at the same hour in the Presbyterian Church; Dr Keener, in the afternoon, in the chapel. Bedford county, Virginia, is the native place of Bishop Early. The same county has also produced Bishop Otey, of Tennessee, and Bishop Cobb, of Alabama—worthy prelates of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Mr. McTyeire is here, representing the interests of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, a religious weekly, of which he is editor, under the patronage of the Methodist Church, and extensively circulated in Louisiana, Alabama Mississippi, East Texas and South Arkansas. It has over six thousand subscribers, and they aim to have ten thousand, which can easily be done, as the paper is but only in its fourth year. I believe the Christian Advocate has the largest weekly circulation of any newspaper in New Orleans. They say that the challenge of the Western Delta, and the bet offered by its proprietors, of having it larger at weekly circulation, was in peril of being accepted by the Christian Advocate, when it was withdrawn. I would have looked ugly for Christian folks to be swapping off stakes. Did the Delta get the wind of any thing that the challenge was withdrawn? Such being the facts it is singular that your keen commission merchants, grocers, dry-goods men and others, seeking for country customers, do not take advantage of advertising in its columns. An advertisement in the Christian Advocate would bring more business to a house than the same amount of advertising in any other two weekly papers issued from New Orleans. Mark that.

I must not omit to mention the funeral sermon of Col. D. J. Flinker, by Dr. Lacey, on yesterday. It was a solemn service and well attended. Col. Flinker died on the inst. of yellow fever, at his own residence in this parish. A very wealthy man and noble citizen was Col. F. He was honorably spoken of by his fellow-citizens for a seat in the Governor of Louisiana—a capital one he would have made. How fast the Democratic party of this State is losing by death, great and leading men! Downs, a tower of strength, dead; Palmer dead; John R. Grymes—a Webster of the South—threatened with paralysis; Flinker, Porter, one of the noblest Romans of all, in feeble health. Not long ago I saw the Colonel at his high post of duty at the Custom-house; polite in manner and generous; noble in mind and social too; but I marked, with sadness, as he hugged his cloak about him with luvalid anxiety, the windy and chilly currents repassed around. Alas! Colonel live a thousand years! No gallnes in that strong box of Uncle Sam that he keeps, is of purer gold. Time will soon be room for new men and new measures. Some of their successors are now butting their heads against stumps! Let them be careful, for the skulls are soft.

Col Flinker had begun grinding, and at that crisis the crop stayed sky and night at his sugar-house. A bale of blankets lately arrived for his negroes from New Orleans. The Colonel had opened and slept under them. He caught the fever, and died of it. I understand there was no other case about. Does not this show the impossibility of yellow fever?

Last night we had a first class frost. This morning broke ice on eighth of an inch thick. It is said cold contracts, but it has lengthened the countenances of planters behind hand in their grinding. They felt too poor to take sugar in their coffee at this morning's breakfast.

Very respectfully, CRESCENT.

GEN. PUTNAM'S WOLF DEN.—A gentleman who recently visited the den in Pomfret, down which Putnam descended with a rope round his leg and a musket in his hand, describes it as being at least twenty-six feet deep and on an average two feet square, though in some places much wider. It extends directly into the mountain, and is slightly descending. The wall above and on either side is of rock. It is so formed that a furious she wolf could keep at bay as many dogs as could be sent against her. She was crouched in the farthest end upon a shelf of rock, and the passage being rather crooked, the General must have penetrated at least ten feet, and probably more, unless he had a gun so favorably contrived that he could shoot round a hay stack. The visitor crept in a distance of twenty feet, and since there was no wolf there, he congratulated that he did not meet with a few rattlesnakes to make the descent a little perilous. THURSDAY, Oct 19, 1854.—An American Artist executed in Paris under the Extradition Treaty.—An American by the name of Ansley, was arrested here last week, under the international treaty to that effect for forgery committed upon a bank in New Orleans—the Louisiana Bank, I believe. The Prefect of Police received from the authorities of New Orleans a description of the man, and a notice that he had crossed the Atlantic. He immediately gave notice to the American Legation in this city, and took such other measures as would prevent his leaving the French territory. On Monday last the American inspecting gentleman called at the Legation to get his passports, (which gave him the name of Bunnell) and asked for Italy. Mr. Platt at once "spotted" him, and had him arrested. He now lies in the Conciergerie awaiting orders from New Orleans. [Correspondence Cincinnati Gazette

HYMENEAL:

MARRIED—In Prattville, Alabama, Oct 9 by the Rev. ELISHA PHILIPS, Mr. THOMAS GARLEN, of Donesboro, Alabama, to Miss MARINE M. MIMS, of Prattville, Alabama

OBITUARY:

DIED—On the 20th of October, in Montgomery, Alabama, Mrs. ELIZA P., wife of Mr. BLUE. She was the first probationer in the M. E. Church at Montgomery, having joined it twenty-six years ago. Naturally of a meek and quiet spirit, her piety flowed in the same channel. The consistency and firmity of her religious life attested the depth of its principle and the purity of its source. She was spared to see seven children out of eight members of the same church with her, and one in the Ministry, for whose pastoral care her last days were spent. In four short days the yellow fever, night her down to the grave, and she fell asleep with the name of Jesus trembling on her lips. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." O. R. B.

SARAH JANE RUSH, wife of WM. M. RUSH of Okalh, Miss., and daughter of BENJAMIN MARY MOORMAN, of Carroll county, Miss., formerly of Richmond county, N. C., died in the 23d year of her age, at the residence of Uncle's (Miles J. Rush,) at 3 o'clock, on October 25, 1854—leaving an infant of twelve days old, a devoted husband, affectionate parents, relatives and friends, to mourn her loss. Sister Rush embraced religion in 1847, at the Springhill camp ground; joined the M. E. Church South, of which she continued a faithful and acceptable member. The circumstances connected with her sickness and death, were painful in the extreme to the attentive companion and absent parents. But the anxious husband, as he watches the progress of her disease, and hopes her excited mother will arrive in time to see her once more. See that mother as she says, four long days, anticipating a happy and pleasant stay with her lovely daughter. Had been mostly absent since her marriage (December 7, nearly eleven months,) coming just in time to hear it said—"We have just this hour returned from the burial of our Sarah Jane."

Oh! the disappointment, the anguish of a mother's heart, as the expressions burst from her lips: "My Jane, my Jane, my dear Jane—follow her to the lonesome grave—and hear her talk with her pious friend, and as she leaves says: "farewell, farewell my daughter, till we meet up yonder."

The collection of friends and relatives around her grave evinced their grief in losing one they loved so well, and the heavy tears of that bosom for whom she had died a paternal roof, told how his poor heart bled.

Friends of Sarah Jane, both in Carolina and Mississippi, weep not for her. The blessed Savior, said: "I am the ressurection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

The evidences of her having believed, and her devoted husband a few days before her decease giving himself to the Savior of God, and joining the Church of her Church, makes us happy to remember. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life;" he who wept at the grave of Lazarus, remember the weeping and bereaved husband, parents, relatives and friends of Sarah Jane, and bring us all at last (with the sweet babe) to meet in Heaven.

STEAMBOAT SARANAK SUNK.—A dispatch dated Smithland, Ky., November 3, says: "The steamer Saranak struck at the head of Island No. 8, in seven feet water at low and ten feet at the stern. All the freight in the forward part is wet. Her deck load is only slightly damaged. The boat will in all probability be raised soon."

HURRICANE AT SEA.—The ship Break O'Day, Capt. Birk, which arrived at Mobile on Friday last, reports that she experienced a severe hurricane off the Bermuda Isles. The ship was thrown on her beam ends for 36 hours. Two of her men were lost overboard.

The public sale of the Parker Vein Steamboat took place in New York city on the 9th. They were purchased by Mr. A. C. Halt, of Baltimore. The Locust brought $11 000; the George's Creek $14 000; the Alleghany $13 000; the Piedmont $9 000; the Westport $15 000; the Caledonia $13 000; the Mount Savage $9 000; the Parker Vein $12 500, and the Jackson $5 000. The sale of the Tottan was deferred. These steamers were purchased by Mr. Hall for an association of gentlemen, who have organized a new company, under the name of the Baltimore Steam Ship Company, and that it is their intention to dispatch four boats a week from New York and Baltimore, and in every respect to conduct the affairs of the company in such a manner as to give entire satisfaction to every one doing business with them.

INDIAN TROUBLES.—The Creeks and Keechies.—The Fort Smith Herald of the 28th ult., says:

We learn from Mr. A. W. Washbourne, Seminole agent, who arrived in town on Tuesday last, from his agency, that the Keechies some time since came into the Creek country and stole about forty head of horses, and several of the cattle killed a horse and row and ate them. A party of about three hundred Creek warriors, with Tuckabatchee at their head, started last week in pursuit of the Keechies to recover their horses and cattle, and to punish the thieves. The Creeks have also ready one thousand warriors, in the event of any of their men being killed by the Keechies, and they say if the Keechies kill any of the Creeks they will exterminate the whole tribe.

A small German boy was shot in the city of Baltimore on the 9th, by another boy named Lengus, who says that he did not know the pistol was loaded. The ball was lodged in the temple, and it was thought the boy would not recover.

THE CITY AND SEASON.

After a summer of unusual warmth and unexpected sickness, we have the pleasure of announcing the return of cold weather, health and business. Yellow Jack has taken his departure unregretted and unlamented, and left the city safe for all who choose to visit it. Winter has made its appearance with most unmistakable proofs. The thermometer yesterday sank to 50°. Window blinds, signs and shutters swung creakingly to and fro and clouds of dust moved up and down the streets. Fires and overcoats both came into requisition.

The highest mortality we have had this season was during the month of September, when there were 508 deaths in one week, of which nearly 400 were from yellow fever. Week before last there were but 162 deaths in all, including 12 from fever. We have not received the returns of the cemeteries for the past seven days, but the appended report of the Charity Hospital shows all that is necessary to prove our exemption from disease and warrant the safety of visitors. There are still a few cases of fever remaining from weeks past, but none whatever which have originated recently. New Orleans is now as healthy and as safe as any city in the Union.

The abatement of sickness has had a most favorable effect in increasing business. One hundred and twenty ships, thirty barks and a proportionate number of smaller craft lie along our wharves. Steamboats loaded with passengers and produce arrive daily. The levee roars under the activity that rolls over it. Our citizens have all returned, our hotels all reopened and our theatres commenced their winter business. Those who intend visiting New Orleans the present winter may feel perfectly safe in coming at once.

The report of the Charity Hospital for the past eight days is as follows. It will be remembered that during the week before last, with forty-two deaths from yellow fever in the hospital, there were only eight in private practice. A corresponding diminution the last week would leave almost no sickness at all, and the existing cold weather is proof that from the present time there is not the slightest danger:

THE ACCIDENT ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILROAD.—The Toronto Colonist states that the grand jury for the county of Kent, after hearing the Honorable Chief Justice Macauley's charge, made their presentment on the 4th inst., in which they attribute the recent great loss of life on the Great Western Railway to the culpable carelessness of D. W. Twitchell, the conductor, and J. Kettlewell, the engineer on the gravel train, St. Lawrence, both of whom are presumed to be guilty of manslaughter, by their conduct, which was in opposition to their written instructions. After the presentment, the Judge issued his warrant for the arrest of the parties named, one of whom (Kettlewell) has been arrested and is now in jail having been refused liberation on bail. The jury also recommended that no gravel train be allowed to use the track at night.

On the evening of the 8th a colored woman named Sarah Jane Williams was arrested in New York on suspicion of attempting to poison the inmates of a disreputable house in Church street, by putting arsenic in the coffee prepared for breakfast. Five persons partook of the coffee, but all of them subsequently recovered from the effects of the mixture, except one girl, who was taken to the hospital in a dangerous state.

On the 6th inst. a riot occurred near Pittsburgh, on the Pittsburg and Steubenville Railroad, in consequence of a difficulty between Mr. James Wolf, proprietor of an extensive rolling mill, and the Railroad Company, in regard to compensation for running the road through lands belonging to the former. The aid of the Pittsburgh police was summoned, but they were beaten by the forces of the rolling mill man, and a number of persons, laborers on the roads and others, were severely injured. Warrants were issued for the arrest of Mr. Wolf and the other ringleaders.

On the night of the 7th inst., at the menagerie in Cincinnati, a small lad was pushed against the tiger's cage, and had his eye torn out and his cheek lacerated by the paws of that animal.

Dr. Abrnham Gould, a well known physician of Lynn, while riding in a buggy on the afternoon of the 4th, was run into by the Saugus train, and had his horse killed, his buggy smashed, and himself severely if not fatally injured.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT ON THE SOUTH SIDE RAILROAD.—The mail train on the South Side Railroad, going up to Lynchburg, was thrown off the track Thursday morning, by running over a cow. The accident occurred about half-past 8 o'clock two miles past Rice's station, in Prince Edward county, and about one mile this side of the High Bridge. The train was going at full speed, and was precipitated down an embankment about thirty feet high. The engine and cars were crushed almost to atoms and hardly a passenger on the train escaped injury. A number of the officers and leaders of the road were on board returning to their homes from the regular annual meeting in Petersburg. One of the firemen on the engine was instantly killed. [Richmond Enquirer, 11th.

At an early hour this morning the body of a well dressed and remarkably handsome man, about twenty-five years of age, was found lying on the levee, near Myrtle street, face downward and dead. The blood was streaming from the mouth and face, and his eyes were much swollen and purple with extravasated blood. There was no wounds of any kind perceptible and the whole appearance was that of a person poisoned with strychnine. On his person was found the following letter:

"I beg that those who find my body will make no search, for the murderer is myself.

"My name is Francis Henry de Longville, born at Paris April 4, 1823. My family was ruined by an extensive speculation in 1849. I married one of those girls of whom the world has few, and thought my happiness secured. I quit my native land with my little family in the month of May, and disembarked at New Orleans, July 24, 1854. But alas, having tasted happiness only during fifteen days, a frightful calamity covered me with mourning. My poor beloved wife was attacked with the terrible cholera; after two hours of horrible sufferings she expired. Hardly was she buried, when my poor little boy aged three years, died of the same disease—my despair was very great. But God had still left me a little daughter of thirteen months, whose smile gave me new strength to resist in future, for in this poor little innocent, I saw all the sweetness of her beloved mother. I asked nothing more of God than to live for my child. But God was pleased to strike me again, taking from me the only good he had left me in the world. The 20th October was the unhappy day on which I closed the eyelids of my last treasure. Having, then, no consolation left, I resolved to make an end of it. Let no one blame me, for every man of feeling must understand what a burden life had become to me."

ANOTHER DREADFUL RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—The following dispatch gives some further particulars of the recent catastrophe on the Chicago and Rock Island Railroad, some account of which has been already received here by telegraph:

CHICAGO, Ill., Friday, Nov. 3.—The passenger train for Rock Island, which left Chicago at 11 o'clock on Wednesday night, met with a most frightful accident, from the breaking of an axletree of the engine, when near the Mineka Station—the result, it is said, of running over a horse on the track. The engine and a portion or all of the cars were thrown from the track with great violence, breaking the ribs of the engineer, and killing or wounding and scalding from thirty to forty first class passengers.

The citizens of Joliet promptly rendered all the assistance in their power to the wounded.

Physicians who were present report that at least ten or twelve of the scalded will die within twenty-four hours.

At the latest accounts all the sufferers had been removed to a large stone building on Scott street in the village of Joliet; and the employees of the Railroad Company, as well as the people of the village, were using every effort to alleviate their sufferings.

It appears that when the engine was thrown off the track, the two forward passenger cars were thrown on its top, and the steam escaping, was driven with tremendous force through the dense mass of human beings, packed closely among the wrecks of the cars.

The engineer, W. G. Brown, was fearfully scalded. His brother, acting as fireman, had both of his legs broken.

A gentleman named Carpenter, from Poughkeepsie, N. Y., was terribly burned and scalded.

C. W. Allison, of Monroe co., Ohio, was also badly scalded; Enoch Allison, do do., burned and scalded.

Mrs. Cox, of Washington Co., Iowa, was severely injured.

Catherine Laughlin, of Washington Co., Iowa, was also very seriously injured.

Margaret Laughlin, of Gettysburg, Pa., was also among those who were seriously if not fatally injured.

We have been unable to learn the names of the other sufferers, but are assured, on what we have reason to believe is respectable authority, that the whole number of passengers who were seriously wounded is not under forty. We shall endeavor to get full details without delay.

The conductor of the train, Mr. Van Burkett, escaped with but slight injury.

When the messenger left the scene of the disaster, (10 o'clock yesterday forenoon,) several of those who were scalded remained insensible, and others were writhing in their last agonies.

ARRIVAL OF THE ATLANTIC.

NEW YORK, Nov. 12.—The Collins steamer Atlantic arrived here today at noon, bringing dates from Liverpool to the 1st inst., four days later than the accounts brought by the America. Her advices report a moderate demand for Cotton in the Liverpool market, with sales for the three business days preceding her departure of 20,000 bales, of which 2000 were taken for speculation, and 2000 for export, leaving about 16,000 bales for the trade. Prices remain without any change of moment, the quotations closing as follows: Fair Orleans, 6½d; Middling Orleans, 5½d; Fair Uplands, 6d and Middling Uplands 5¾d per lb.

There was considerable reaction in the market for Breadstuffs. Flour had declined 2s per bbl. Wheat fell per 70 lbs., and Indian Corn 2s per quarter.

Official advices from Sebastopol to the 20th of October represent affairs there as unchanged. Private accounts, however, of a later date have been received, with the intelligence that two of the outer forts of the harbor had been destroyed by the Allied fleet. Accounts of the 21st of October state that a breach had been in the walls of the city, but not of sufficient size to justify an attempt to storm the place.

The Russian official accounts to the 21st have been received. They state that the garrison of Sebastopol had made a successful sortie, destroying one of the French batteries, and capturing an English officer, Lord Dunklin.

Two of the sons of the Emperor of Russia had arrived on the Crimea.

IMPORTANT FROM CUBA.

CHARLESTON, Nov. 14.—The steamer Isabel has arrived here from Havana, with dates from that port to the 11th inst. The Havana correspondent of the Charleston Courier, under date of the 10th inst., states that two American schooners, with arms and ammunition, have been seized by the authorities at Baracoa, and all the parties with the vessels have been imprisoned. It was reported that 300 men were landed from the schooners. Gen. Mezazie (?) left Havana for Baracoa on the 9th inst., to investigate the matter, and report the facts to the Captain General. Several persons who had been pardoned by Marquis Pazuelo were arrested on a charge of being concerned in landing the arms, etc.

It was reported that there was a general outbreak at Puerto Principe.

NEW YORK, Nov. 12.—In the last sortie made by the garrison at Sebastopol, the Russians succeeded in spiking sixteen of the guns of a French battery.

The siege was progressing slowly, and so far only two of the smaller Russian outworks had been silenced.

WRECK OF THE SHIP NEW ERA.

NEW YORK, Nov. 13.—A ship from Bremen, with upwards of 200 German emigrants on board, has gone ashore near Sandy Hook, and is breaking up. Many of her passengers have been washed overboard, and it is feared that very few will be saved.

NEW YORK, Nov. 14.—The ship reported ashore yesterday proves to be the New Era, bound from Bremerhaven to this port with about 200 German emigrants on board. She ran ashore on Dead Man's Beach yesterday morning, and with a heavy sea running, it is believed that about seventy of her passengers were washed overboard. So far about fifty dead bodies have been picked up on the beach. Some boats from the shore yesterday succeeded in boarding the wreck, and the remaining passengers, numbering about 130, were safely landed this morning. The ship is much broken up, but her masts are yet standing.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

NEW YORK, Nov. 15.—The Cunard steamer Asia has arrived here, bringing dates from Liverpool of the 4th instant, three days later than the accounts brought by the America. The following is a summary of her news:

Liverpool Markets.

LIVERPOOL, Nov. 4.—There has been only a moderate demand for Cotton here since the departure of the Atlantic, and the sales of the entire week reach barely 47,000 bales, of which 3000 have been taken for speculation and about 4000 for export. Prices have generally been firm, and the Middling grades have improved about 1-16d per lb, the quotations, according to the circular of Messrs. Dennistoun & Co., closing as follows: Fair Orleans, 6¾d; Middling Orleans, 5¾ to 5 5-16; Fair Uplands, 6d; and Midding Uplands, 5¾ to 5 3-16d per lb. The market for Breadstuffs opened with considerable heaviness, but toward the close the rates improved. Yet the week closes with a decline of about 1s per bbl for Flour, 3d per 70 lbs for Wheat, and 1s per quarter for Corn. The quotations are, for Western Canal Flour, 41s; for Ohio, 42 to 44s per bbl; for Wheat, 12s for White; and 11 to 11s 9d for Red and Mixed; the closing rate for Corn being 44s per quarter for Mixed, Yellow and White alike.

The Provision market, according to the circular of Gardiner & Co., continues active. Pork, Beef and Bacon were firm at previous rates. Lard was quoted at 54s per cwt. with a good demand. Tallow was in limited request, and the rates were more in favor of buyers. Naval stores were active at full prices.

Money and Trade.

The Money market at London has been without any change of moment. Messrs. Baring, Bros & Co., report a moderate demand for American stocks at unchanged rates. Consols are quoted at 94¾ to 94¾. Trade in the manufacturing districts has been heavy, and the rates have slightly declined.

General News.

The latest advices from Sebastopol report that a force of 30,000 Russians had made an attack upon, and recaptured one of the forts occupied by the Allies, and that a great battle had been fought near Balaklava, in which the Russians had been driven back, and the Allies remained in possession of the field. The accounts state that the siege was proceeding favorably for the Allies. Two Russian ships in the harbor had been destroyed, and the quarantine battery had been silenced. One of the bastions of Fort Constantine had been considerably damaged by the explosion of the magazine.

ARRIVAL FROM BERMUDA.

NEW YORK, Nov. 16.—A vessel here has just arrived from Bermuda, bringing dates from that island to the 8th inst. Her advices state that a British ship of the line had sailed for San Juan, and that the British fleet was concentrating at the latter place. The papers in Bermuda anticipated serious difficulties between the United States and England relative to the destruction of Greytown.

Passengers by the Asia.

NEW YORK, Nov. 16.—Among the passengers brought by the Asia are Mr. George F. Weise, of the Bee, and twelve other persons belonging to New Orleans.

Cincinnati Banks.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 15.—The notes of the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank of Cincinnati are taken on deposit by the other branches of the State Bank of Ohio, as the latter is bound for their redemption.

Ohio River—Markets—Bank Troubles.

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 15.—The river here is now rising, with 34 inches water in the channel.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 15.—The river here has fallen 3 inches during the last 24 hours. Flour is in fair request, with sales at $7 75 to $7 90 per bbl. Whisky is firm at 30c per gallon. The excitement in the Money Market still continues, and has been increased by the failure of the Mechanics' Bank, which is a branch of the State Bank of Ohio. The house of J. H. James at Urbana, was mobbed last night. Mr. James was largely concerned with the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank, and failed last week.

LOUISVILLE, Nov. 15.—The river here is stationary; weather moderating.

New York Markets.

NEW YORK, Nov. 15.—The demand for Cotton in this market is yet quite limited. Middling Orleans is quoted at 10½c per lb. Flour is active, and prices have advanced, with sales of Ohio brands at $8 65 to $9 per bbl. Corn is in moderate request at 80@100c per bushel for Mixed Western. There is a fair demand for Pork, at previous rates. Lard is quiet at unchanged prices.

BATTLE AT BALAKLAVA.

NEW YORK, Nov. 16.—The Asia reached her wharf this morning at nine o'clock. Her papers contain the following interesting intelligence:

THE RECENT BATTLE.—The Russian dispatches state that the Allies had suffered two severe defeats near Sebastopol. In one of the engagements the French outworks were destroyed, and sixteen of their guns spiked, and in the other the English were routed with the loss of five hundred horse. The French account is not given, the papers only giving an explicit denial of the Russian dispatches, and stating that their story is improbable.

The facts appear to be that the Russians unexpectedly attacked the forts at Balaklava, on the 25th October, when the Turks belonging to the garrison inglariously fled. The Scotch regiments in the forts, however, remained firm, but the Russians succeeded in seizing their guns, and turned them upon the Allies. Other forces of the Allies came up and the main body of the Russians were compelled to retire, though they still held possession of the forts, from which they kept up a continual fire on the French and English. Three regiments of the British Cavalry were exposed to a cross fire for some time and suffered terribly. The French acted with great bravery, but their loss was not so great as that of the British.

The next day the attack was resumed by Menschikoff, and a sortie was made simultaneously from the garrison of Sebastopol. The result, however, was that the Russians were driven back with immense loss.

The loss of life in Sebastopol is said to have been so great that large numbers of the dead remained unburied, and the atmosphere was tainted by the effluvia from them.

According to the statements of some of the wounded officers of the Russians, who had been taken to Balaklava, Sebastopol would soon be in the hands of the Allies. In the mean time, Lord Raglan prefers to continue the bombardment, rather than make a sudden assault, which must be attended with immense loss of life.

The Russian accounts represent their losses as small, and their affairs generally in a very favorable condition.

Reinforcements—Spy Detected.

Both the Russian and Allied armies had received further reinforcements to a considerable extent.

Lord Raglan's chief interpreter, a Greek, had been discovered to be a Russian spy, and had been sent to Constantinople for trial.

Successful Attack by the Russians.

Letters by the Asia state that on the 25th a Russian force attacked a detached camp of the English, taking four redoubts and eleven guns, and causing a heavy loss of British Cavalry. The account of this affair was confirmed by advices received by the Greek merchants at Odessa.

Russian Admiral Killed.

Battle of the Alma.

Menschikoff's official report of the battle of the Alma states that the losses of the Russians are 4500 killed and wounded.

Latest from Sebastopol.

A dispatch from Lord Stratford de Redcliffe was received on Saturday morning, (4th inst.) confirming the report of a Russian attack on the forts at Balaklava, and of the great battle that followed. The accounts are mostly conflicting.

France and Mr. Soule.

The Paris Constitutionnel has a long and temperately written article on the relations between France and the United States, and states that these relations which should be friendly have been damaged by the indiscreet conduct of Mr. Soulé.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that he is informed that the French Government is in possession of positive evidence of Mr. Soule's participation in a vast plan to revolutionize nearly the whole of Europe, and it is even added that these plans occupied the attention of the American diplomatic Congress at Ostend.

Mr. Mason has received assurances from Louis Napoleon that at a proper time he would give a satisfactory reason for the exclusion of Mr. Soule from France. The particulars of Mr. Mason's interview with Louis Napoleon have not transpired. It is understood, however, that the whole matter would be referred by Mr. Mason to the Government at Washington.

Spain—Protection of Cuba.

The latest advices from Madrid report all quiet in Spain.

El Clamor Publico states that France, England and Spain will send a combined fleet to Cuba, if necessary, for the protection of that island from any attack from the United States.

Incidents of the Battle of Alma.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM A PRIVATE TO HIS WIFE.

At last we were ordered to advance. I had to step out to the front, Mason on my right and Sergeant Spence on me left, six paces in front of the lines, directing the advance, when the bullets went whistling past me thick as hail. At last we came to the river, which we had to ford, and in doing so it took us up to the middle in water. After we got through the river, we were out of the fire of the Russians, and it caused the 7th, 23d, 33d, 77th, 88th and 17th regiments to be a little out of order, all being so eager to get at the Russians. We never waited to form line properly, but up the embankment we went in great disorder, when a regular volley of musketry and grape commenced to be poured into us, and then we commenced firing too, and a regular engagement took place, which lasted for an hour, the Light Division being all the time engaged, the others looking on. After being engaged half an hour, Mason was shot through the thigh. One ball had hit the peak of his cap and slightly grazed his forehead; another ball went through the leg of his trousers, and another cut the string of his water barrel; so he had many a narrow escape. He was carried to the rear on a stretcher, by Sandy and Dr. Marison. Many of the wounded had to lie all night in the field, no body apparently caring for them. I was wounded about two minutes after Mason. I went to the rear out of shot, and remained there till the fight was over, which lasted three hours and a half. Then I went and joined my regiment, and went among the sick the following morning. It is supposed that the Russians had 800 killed and double that number wounded, our side perhaps 600 killed and 700 wounded.

LETTER FROM A SURGEON—WOUNDS AND CHOLERA.

I have seen some curious wounds from the course taken by the balls. One man, who fell by my side, roared out: "Oh, Doctor, I am killed!" but, on tearing open his clothes, I found that the ball had not gone deeper than the skin. A common ball passed close to me and over the head of a man who was lying on the ground; you could see the ground shot passing by you like a swift bowling at cricket. The Russians had an ugly trick of lying on the ground, pretending to be wounded, and firing on us as soon as we passed, so our men massacred them right and left.

I am sorry to say the cholera has broken out among us. I lost one man this morning, and have sent two others to the head hospital. They are taking the wounded, also the prisoners, on board ship. It is delightful, now the struggle is over, to see the kindness exhibited both by our men and the sailors in giving the Russian prisoners water, etc. Many are coming in and giving themselves up. They only expected to meet Turks.

A YOUNG CLERGYMAN'S EXPERIENCE.

The following extremely interesting letter from the seat of war has been addressed to his mother, the Countess Annesley, by the Hon Hugh Annesley, of the Fusileer Guards:

H. M. S. London, Sept. 21

My Dear Mother— * * * We forced the passage of the Alma yesterday, and defeated the Russians most gloriously, though with great loss to ourselves, owing in their extraordinarily strong position. (Old officers say it was as strong as Torres Vedras. The Russian army was drawn up on the heights, upward of 40,000 strong, and with immensely heavy artillery, 24 and 32 pounders. The light division advanced to the attack, supported by the first division (Guards and Highlanders). They got across the river, and then advanced against the entrenchments. The 23d was in column when the brigade of Guards charged in line.

My company (4th) was next to the colors, and in the very centre of the line. We got up to within fifty yards of the ditch, when the regiment before us (which has had three senior officers killed) turned right about and came down in our face, thus breaking our line. We were about thirty paces then from the ditch, and the fire was so hot that you could hardly conceive it possible for anything the size of a rabbit not to be killed. I kept on shouting, "Forward Guards!" to the few men who were not swept away by the ——, when a ball came and stopped my mouth most unceremoniously. It entered the left cheek and went out at the mouth, taking out the front teeth. I instantly turned to the rear, feeling it was about one hundred to one against my ever getting there, as the bullets were whizzing around me like hail, I tripped, and thought it was all over with me. However, I got up again with the loss of my sword and bearskin, and at last got into the river, and out of fire.

I had then another struggle on the other side, where grape and round shot were plowing up the ground, and shells bursting; however, I stumbled on, and at last got out of fire and sat down among wounded and dying soldiers and horses. The doctors gave me some water and then were obliged to go to others; so when they left, I sat there for above half an hour before I could find out where the hospital was. At last an officer of the 19th, though wounded himself, gave me his arm, and took me to the Fusileer Hospital, where I got some water, and sat down to bathe my face.

There were six or seven of our fellows there; one with five balls in him, another three, and a third with his leg broken. My servant got me some blankets, and we then got a stable, half burned down, cleaned out, and five of us lay there for the night, very wretched as you may suppose, operations going on all around us. Some weak brandy and water and some tea was all we had. The shed we were in was a horrid thing; the heat, and dust, and flies intolerable.

Poor B—— came to me in the hovel we were lying in, and burst into tears when he recognised me, I was so altered. Of course one cannot have an ounce of lead through one without swelling, and my face is like a good sized turnip; my mouth much larger than I have any desire to see it in future. I do not suppose the ball could have hit me in any other part of the head where it would have been attended with more danger—a most summary dentist the ball was, to take out all of my teeth at one smash, except four grinders, (there was a decayed one, which I hope has gone with its brethren, but I can't make out yet if it has or not.) There is a good bit of tongue gone also, but the doctors say that will not not signify, and that I shall speak as plain as ever, or, at most, only with a becoming lisp; so, altogether, I think even you must allow that I have every reason to be thankful, and I hope you will not allow yourself to feel the least about me.

Just as we were charging the great redoubt, I prayed "O God! spare me!" and I really no more expected to return alive than if I had been tied to the cannon's mouth. Only fancy grape or canister being fired at us within thirty yards, besides a whole battalion letting drive as hard as they could into us. Both the other officers in my company were wounded. The colonel (Berkely) had his leg broken. All the sergeants were wounded, and two killed, and, I believe, at least twenty or thirty of our men.

I was close to Lindesay when the Queen's color was smashed in his hand, there were twenty bullet holes in it yet he was not touched. The fifth company, which was next to mine, has every officer wounded. Sir George Brown says he never saw so hot a fire; and he was all through the Peninsula and at Waterloo. Seymour was not wounded, but hit in the watch which saved his life.

Long after night had closed, faint lights might be seen moving over the frightful field, marking the spots where friendship directed the steps of some officer in search of a wounded comrade, or where the pillager yet stalked about on his horrid errand. The attitudes of some of the dead were awful. One man might be seen resting on one knee, with the arms extended in the form of taking aim, the brow compressed, the lips clinched—the very expression of firing at an enemy stamped on the face, and fixed there by death; a ball had struck this man in the neck. Physiologists and anatomists must settle the rest. Another was lying on his back with the same expression, his arms raised in a similar attitude, the Minie musket still grasped in his hands and undischarged. Another lay in a perfect arch, his head resting on one part of the ground and his feet on the other, but the back raised high above it. Many men without legs or arms were trying to crawl down to the water side. Some of the dead lay with a calm, placid smile on the face, as though they were in some delicious dream.

From the London Times Correspondence.

Sept. 23.—Brigadier General Tylden, died in his tent early this morning of cholera. He was buried in the valley under the heights of Alma. The remains of the deceased officer were followed to the grave by a number of officers, and by all the members of his staff. He is succeeded in his command by Lieutenant Colonel Alexander, R. E., who is the next senior officer, but the gallant officer in question has not been promoted to the rank of Brigadier. Many men died of cholera last night. My sleep was disturbed by the groans of the dying, and on getting up in the morning I found that the corpse of a Russian lay close to the tent in which I had been permitted to rest. He was not there when we retired to rest, so that the wretched creature, who had probably been wandering about without food upon the hills ever since the battle, must have crawled down towards our lines, and there expired in the attempt to reach them. Several men had died close to our tent during the night. Late last night, orders were sent round the divisions to be prepared for marching after daybreak, and early this morning we left the blood-stained heights of the Alma—a name that will be ever memorable in our history.

Soon after dawn, the French assembled all their drums and trumpets on the top of the highest of the hills they carried, and a wild flourish and roll repeated again and again, and broken by peals of sound from the bugles of the infantry, celebrated their victory as they departed. It was spirited, stirring, and thrilling music, and its effect, as it swelled through the darkness of early morning, down over the valley, can never be forgotten. Our watchfires were still burning languidly as the sleepers roused themselves, all wet with dew, and prepared to leave the scene of their triumphs. The fogs of the night crept slowly up the hillsides, and hung in uncertain folds around the summits, revealing here and there the gathering columns of our regiments, in dark patches on the declivities, or showing the deep black looking squares of the French battalions already in motion towards the south.

Dimly, as in the distance, the dust was moving along slowly by the line of the coast, rolling lines of smoke trailing back on their wake that what is that grey mass on the plain, which seemed settled down upon it almost without life or motion? Now and then, behind a gun, may be seen waved aloft, or a man raises himself for a moment, looks around, and then lies down again. Alas! that plain is covered with the wounded Russians still. Nearly sixty hours they have passed in agony on the ground and now, with but little hope of help or succor more, we must leave them as they lie. All the nameless, inconceivable misery, their cureless pain—to be caused by the caprice of one man. Seven hundred and fifty men are still upon the ground, and we can do nothing for them. The wounds have been bound and dressed; we have done all we can for them, and now, unable to carry us to take them along with us or to send them away, we must depart. Ere our troops marched, however, Gen. Estcourt, by order of Lord Raglan, sent into the Tartar village in the valley, into which the inhabitants were just returning, and having procured the attendance of the head man, he proceeded to explain to them that the wounded Russians would be confided to their charge, and that they were to feed and maintain them, and when they were all well to let them go their ways. In order to look after their wounds an English surgeon was left behind with these 750 men. This most painful and desolate duty devolved on Dr. Thomson, of the 14th Regiment. He was told his mission would be his protection in case the Cossacks came, and that he was to hoist a flag of truce should the enemy appear in sight, and then, provided with some rum, biscuit, and salt meat, he was left alone with his charge. Ere the army went, however, one of the Russian officers addressed the wounded and explained the position in which they were placed, and they promised to obey Dr. Thomson's orders, and to protect him as far as they could, and to acquaint any Russian force which might arrive with the peculiar circumstances under which he was among them.

It was nearly 8 o'clock before the tents of headquarters were struck and the march began. We had heard from the fleet that the enemy had not only left the Katcha, but they had even refired across the Belbek. Our course was directed upon the former stream, almost in continuation of our march on the 20th, before the battle. As we moved along, the unfinished stone building intended by the Russians for a telegraphic station, came into view. The French had cut upon the entablature the simple inscription, Le Battaille d'Alma, 20 Septembre, 1854. A similar building was visible further on towards Sebastopol, and on reaching the top of one of the mills on our way, we could see the white light-house of Sebastopol at the end of the promontory which juts out into the sea. The country through which we marched was hilly and barren. Amidst steep hillocks, covered with thistles, and separated from each other at times by small patches of steppe, or by more undulating and less hillocky ground, winds the road to Sebastopol—a mere beaten track, marked with cartwheels, hoofs, and the nails of gun-carriage wheels. We advanced uninterruptedly at an average rate of two and a quarter miles an hour, halting occasionally to rest the troops and allow the baggage wagons to come up. At 3 o'clock the beautiful valley of the Katcha came in sight, its opposite side formed by a ridge of hills clad with verdure and with small forests of shrubs, through which here and there, shone the white walls of villas and snug cottages. The country over which we were marching slid down as it were gradually to the level of the river, whose course was marked all along the base of the hills by lines of trees, and by the most luxurient vegetation, forming a strong contrast to the barren and bleak looking tract on which our troops advanced. Lord Raglan and his staff rode on considerably in advance of the troops, to the great astonishment and indignation of a Prussian officer, who loudly declared that such conduct was quite opposed to the rules of war.

Fitzclin himself could not have been more angry at such disregard of martial etiquette than the gallant gentleman in question, and certainly our chief did show marked contempt for the enemy and the most superb disdain of his famed Cossacks. The fact was that 200 cavalry of the smallest enterprise might have cut off my Lord Raglan, his aides, his Generals of Artillery and Engineers, and their staff, his Quartermaster General and his staff, his Adjutant General and his staff, Sir John Burgoyne and his staff, and all the staff doctors, at any time for hours during the day. However, there was not a trace of the enemy, except that which we found soon afterwards in the houses. The Katcha is a small and rapid rivulet, with banks like those of the Alma. We found the whole course was marked by neat white cottages and that it watered the most delicious vineyards and gardens, amid which their habitations were placed, but there were no inhabitants visible. Wheeling over the bridge, we turned eastward towards the little village of Eckel, on the left bank. The first building on the road was the Imperial Post-house, with its sign post of a double-headed eagle, and an illegible inscription. The usual wooden direction post, with a blueish ribbon painted round it diagonally on a white ground, informed us that we were on our way to Sebastopol, distant about ten miles. The place was abandoned, and the houses destitute of the smallest particle of furniture. The road now assumed the character of an English byway in Devonshire or Hampshire. Low walls at either side were surmounted by fruit trees laden with apples, pears, peaches, apricots, all ripe and fit for use, and at their feet clustered grapes of the most delicate flavor. The first villa we came to was the residence of a physician or country surgeon. It had been ruthlessly destroyed by the Cossacks.

A verandah, laden with clematis, roses and honeysuckle in front, was filled with broken music stools, work tables, and lounging chairs. All the glass of the windows was smashed. Every thing around betokened the hasty flight of the inmates. Two or three side saddles were lying on the grass outside the hall door, a parasol lying near them, close to a Tartar saddle and huge whip. The wine casks were broken and the contents spilt, the barley and corn of the granary were thrown about all over the ground, broken china and glass of fine manufacture were scattered over the pavement outside the kitchen, and amid all the desolation and ruin of the place a cat sat blandly at the threshhold, winking her eyes in the sunshine at the new comers. No pen can describe the scene within. Mirrors in fragments were lying on the floor, the beds had been ripped open, and the feathers littered the rooms a foot deep; chairs, sofas, fauteuils, bedsteads, bookcases, picture frames, images of saints, women's needlework, chest of drawers, shoes, boots, books, bottles, physic jars, all smashed or torn in pieces, lay in heaps in every room. LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM CALIFORNIA.

Reprise of the Allied Fleets at Petropolowski

STUPENDOUS FRAUDS IN SAN FRANCISCO

LOSS OF THE YANKEE BLADE.

More Indian Troubles in Oregon, etc.

Perhaps the most interesting item of news by our last California mail is the account of the attack by the combined French and English fleets upon the Russian defenses of Petropolowski, on the western coast of Kamschatka, in which it appears they were repulsed with considerable loss. The San Francisco Times and Transcript gives the following version of the affair:

By the arrival of the French frigates Forte and Euridice, and the French brig Obligado, we have stirring news from the first scene of conflict between the Allied Powers and the Russians, on the Pacific.

On the 1st and 4th of September an attack was made by the combined fleet on the fortress of Petropolowski. The English vessels of war comprised the President, the Pique and the Virago, and the French the Forte, Eurydice and the Obligado. The action was a very severe one, the English vessels firing 3000 balls. Two of the Russian batteries were destroyed and two crippled. The loss on the side of the latter was very heavy, but is not ascertained. Of the English and French forces, sixty-four men fell during the assault. The Russian frigate Aurora, of forty-four guns, and the Diana, of twenty guns, were moored inside and protected by sand banks, behind which they operated as beyond the reach of the French and English.

One of the English vessels suffered severely in the fight, having lost her foremast, but the fleet is expected to arrive in the course of a few days, and we suppose will be recruited by the addition of the Amphitrite and Trincomalee, which with the French corvette Artemese, now cruising on our coast, the combined fleet of five British and four French will then probably proceed to Petropolowski and complete the work.

When leaving the port and a short distance outside, the Russian merchantman Sitka was captured by the allied forces and sent to Vancouver. A Russian supply vessel was also taken and burnt. Throughout the siege, we learn that the Russians fought with great courage, as the result proves. The information afforded in regard to the details of the battle is, however, meager and unsatisfactory. It does not appear that the British and French have come off with any very distinguished honor, but they may fare better on a second trial. The defences of Petropolowski undoubtedly render its capture quite a formidable undertaking.

The Forte is a ship of sixty guns, the Euridice of thirty guns, and Obligado of thirty guns. The fleet is anchored off North Beach. The Russian ship Sitka was captured on the 8th of Sept. She carried ten guns, a crew of thirty-five men, and had twenty-five passengers. The crew and passengers were taken on board the Forte and Euridice, and the ship was taken charge of by the President, Pique and steamer Virago, to be conveyed to Vancouver's Island. The Sitka was loaded with provisions for the Russian settlements and had touched at Ayan, where she discharged part of her cargo, and was bound thence to Petropolowski, when she fell in with the fleet and surrendered at discretion, declining to engage in a conflict with the odds of seven to one. It is reported by the Euridice that one American vessel was lying at Petropolowski (probably the brig Noble) off the Sandwich Islands a Dutch ship, 130 days from Hong-kong for San Francisco, was spoken, short of water, and intending to put in at Honolulu. Her name was not learned.

The death of the English Admiral Price occurred on the 31st August, and was not caused by a wound received in the siege, but as we gather the facts from the discharge of a pistol which he was picking up. There is no reason to suppose that the act was premeditated, and the coroner's jury found that the unfortunate occurrence was purely accidental. Capt. Frederick, of the Amphitrite, succeeds in command of the fleet. A bearer of dispatches for England has arrived on the Forte, and will leave on the steamer of the middle of the month. The French fleet have been twenty-six days from Petropolowski.

We regret that during the presence of so large a French and British force in our harbor, there are none of our own vessels of war here of a large class, to reciprocate those national courtesies so appropriate to the occasion. As the United States steam frigates Susquehanna and Mississippi are shortly expected from China and Japan, we hope they may arrive before our European friends take their departure.

In the news summary of the San Francisco Herald, we find the following account of the extensive swindling operations of the two brothers,

Henry and John Meiggs:

On Saturday, the 7th inst., the city was thrown into the greatest excitement in consequence of the circulation of a rumor that Henry Meiggs, late a member of the Board of Alderman, and one of the most extensive lumber merchants in the State, had failed for $800,000—that several forgeries had been discovered—that Meiggs had purchased the bark American, fitted it up in a splendid style, and taking with him his family, and his brother John G. Meiggs, recently elected Controller, and a large amount of treasure, set sail for ports in the Pacific. The greatest excitement prevailed for two or three days, and for some time no idea could be formed as to the extent of the forgeries. The matter has been pretty extensively investigated since, and the following is probably not very far from the true amount of the loss sustained by Meiggs's operations:

Amount of failure	$800,000
Controller's Warrants forged	500,000
California Lumber Company forged	300,000
Forgeries on sundry firms	60,000
Total	$1,660,000

The warrants were generally made out in favor of Jesse L. Wetmore, and in sums of from $200 to $1000. At first it was thought that the plate, as well as the signature, were counterfeit, but it is now ascertained that the former was genuine, and so admirably were the latter executed that the late Mayor and Comptroller each pronounced them their own writing. In addition to the above, it is believed that some $300,000 or $400,000 of the forged Comptroller's warrants have been hypothecated in New York.

The amounts here set down are probably greatly exaggerated. The Transcript, in estimating the amount real ized by Meiggs outside of the failure in his proper business, says:

There is as yet no sure indication of more than $400,000 of warrants having been forged; these were received at 50 cents on the dollar, and the loss thus ascertained is $200,000. Placing the forged notes at the highest estimate, does not add more than $50,000 to this amount; and the extent of the fraudulent issue of Lumber Company Stock not yet calculated over $300,000, hypothecated at twenty-five cents on the dollar, would be $75,000 more which makes the aggregate cash defalcation amount to $325,000.

AN ALLEGED EMBEZZLEMENT.

On Saturday, the 14th inst., a great deal of excitement was created in the city, by the circulation of a rumor that Mr. Smyth Clark, Secretary of the late Mayor, had been arrested on a charge of embezzling $303,000. In notes and City and State scrip, deposited in his hand as Secretary of the Committee on Land Claims, and received from the purchasers of the Slip Property. On investigation it was found that the rumor, so far as the allegations were concerned, were correct, and that Mr. Clark was in custody. One hundred and ninety thousand dollars of the above amount were in notes drawn to the order of the late Mayor, and were deposited at Page, Bacon & Co's. and were not negotiable. The remaining $113,000 were in City and State scrip; and Mr. Clark, it is alleged, when requested by the Treasurer to give an account of the numbers and amounts, returned an evasive answer. The Recorder having fixed the bail at $303,000, Mr. Clark, on Saturday night, demanded an immediate trial, but the application was denied, inasmuch as the case had been postponed previously, at the request of the defendant, on Monday, and in consequence of that postponement the prosecution were unable to go on with the trial.

LOSS OF THE YANKEE BLADE.

This fine steamer, says the Herald, left our port on the 30th of September for Panama, and when twenty-five hours out struck on Point Aquilos, about twelve miles to the northward and westward of Point Conception. She struck at 5½ o'clock on the afternoon of Sunday, and a portion of the wreck remained together until 10 o'clock Tuesday morning, when it sank. She had on board, on leaving San Francisco, about 900 passengers, and as reported by her agents at the time of her sailing, $215,000 in treasure as shipments, which, added to the amount in the hands of the passengers, would raise the total to at least $225,000. The number of passengers lost was between forty and fifty, and many of the survivors suffered to the utmost extent of human endurance. On the receipt of the intelligence of her loss, an intense sympathy was created among our citizens, and the Agent of the Nicaragua line immediately sent one of their steamers to the assistance of the survivors, who have all arrived here with the exception of eight or ten, now at Los Angeles and Santa Barbara.

Most of the passengers were taken from the wreck by the steamer Goliah, and taken to San Diego, and it is said that on the passage to that place three suicides occurred. Two men suffering from derangement, caused by losses of family and money, threw themselves overboard. Another person, who had reason to believe that measures were being taken to inquire into his conduct on the wreck, deemed it best to get out of the way, and jumped over the guards, the wheel passing over him. None of these were rescued.

The Herald gives the following account of the conduct of a gang of villains on board the ship after the accident:

No sooner had the boat struck, than a large band of men, armed to the teeth, consisting of notorious shoulder-hitters and ruffians from this city, and a portion of the firemen and crew of the ship, rushed below and commenced pillaging the baggage. They burst into the staterooms, ripped open carpet-bags and trunks, plundered them of all the money and valuables they found, and cast the rest aside or overboard. They displayed knives and revolvers, and threatened the lives of all who attempted to interfere with them, or who even made an effort to get at their own baggage. After the rise of the water drove them out of the cabin, they betook themselves to the upper steerage, of which they took complete possession, and commenced a scene of wild riot. They got ahead of the liquors—many of them drunk themselves furiously drunk—ransacked all the luggage—obtained a large amount of gold—attacked, beat, cut and shot all who got in their way, and became, indeed, a band of infuriate fiends. They stationed a guard at the gangway to prevent the better portion of the passengers from coming down. Some of the passengers attempted to force their way in, when they were dreadfully cut with knives and bottles, and even their persons robbed of their watches and valuables.

Our informant saw one man stagger out with his head dreadfully cut and streaming with blood. He saw the ruffians throw a cloth over the head of another, who appeared badly wounded, and force him into a dark recess of the steerage. He (or not doubt they dispatched him. They picked another, robbed and wounded him, and placed him under a guard of half a dozen drunken savages. They expressed their determination to kill him, but becoming too drunk to guard him, he managed to make his escape on deck. This scene continued nearly all night. Towards midnight three shots were fired, the lights were instantly extinguished, cries of "murder" were heard, and shortly after, at least thirty more shots were fired. There is every reason to believe that several of the passengers were thus murdered.

After the boats had stopped running, and right with all its horrors, had set in the scene on the deck was horrible beyond expression. All the after part of the ship and the lower steerage were under water. Upon the forward deck and in the upper steerage, were crowded nearly eight hundred souls wet by the surf that broke over them and chilled to the marrow by the cold. All that dismal night, they huddled together, expecting every moment that the hulk, which was quivering and wrenching at every dash of the waves, would go to pieces and launch them into eternity.

From the news summaries of the San Francisco papers, we extract the following items:

The trial of Col William Walker, ex-President of Sonora, for a violation of the neutrality laws, was commenced on Thursday the 12th, in the United States District Court. After the jury had been empaneled, the counsel for the defence demanded a subpœna for Mr Dillon, the French Consul, as a witness. The point was ably argued and the Judge (J. S. K. Ogier) reserved his decision on the point to this morning. It will be recollected that a similar application on the trial of Dillon, French Consul, created a good deal of excitement, in consequence of Judge Hoffman having one day decided that Mr. Dillon was subject to the process of the Court, and issued an attachment for him, and next day when he was brought into Court confessed that his previous opinion was wrong, having been hastily given, and that Mr. Dillon was exempt under the Convention.

The Bankers of the City and Stockton have adopted resolutions to the effect that in consequence of the increased charges on freight, coin, gold dust and bullion, they find it necessary to increase the rate of sight exchange to 3-1-2 per cent premium. They also give notice that on and after the first day of December next they will receive the French franc only at 20 cents, and other foreign silver coin in proportion.

Since the 1st inst. there have occurred an unusual number of burglaries in this city, owing it is supposed in a measure, to the disorganized condition of the police force.

A resident of Tuolumne county, named M. C. Keys, was arrested recently about ten miles up the Tejon Pass, on his way into the Indian Agency, on the charge of being the murderer of Captain William Stringer, who was shot from an ambush, a short distance from his residence, on the 18th of June last. Keys had a family living in Tuolumne county.

Thomas Milgate has been convicted of the murder of Henry Tillman, committed on the 18th of August last.

The mansion of Mr D E Gish, about two miles from San Jose, was accidentally set on fire by a little girl and entirely consumed.

Hughes, the famous pedestrian, commenced on the 11th instant, in Sacramento, another attempt to accomplish the feat of walking one hundred consecutive hours without rest.

The Bodega Flouring Mills, at Bodega, together with a considerable amount of grain and flour, were totally destroyed by fire on the night of October 10th; loss, $65,000.

Pedro Badillo, a second Joaquin in crime, was captured at the Mission of San Jose, on the 10th inst., by two San Francisco police officers. He has been sent to Tuolumne county for trial.

The Supreme Court of this State decided that cases cannot be transferred from the State to the U. S. Courts, or appealed from the State to the Supreme Court of the United States. It has also decided that the testimony of Chinese cannot be received in our courts of justice against white persons.

Drs. Haight and Toby have discovered a new pass through the Sierra Nevada, near the head of the middle fork of the river San Joaquin. By this pass a road can be constructed direct from Mariposa to Salt Lake, the distance being estimated at less than five hundred miles.

The decision of the U. S. Board of Land Commissioners, upon the claims of the city to Pueblo lands, was informally announced on the morning of the 3d October, and is favorable to the city title.

The annual Industrial Exhibition of the California Agricultural Society was opened at Musical Hall on the 4th October. On the 6th and 9th a portion of the display consisted of a grand cattle show at the Pioneer Race Course. Many persons attended the exhibition, and the display was not only interesting, but highly creditable to our young State, and the enterprise and mechanical and agricultural skill of our people.

Miss Sarah Pellett, a "strong-minded lady," lectured on Sunday, the 1st inst., in the afternoon on temperance, and in the evening on political reform. The audience, at the opening of the evening lecture, consisted of ten, which, toward the close, had dwindled down to the other and a nodding urchin. Miss P. has since left for the interior, and was amusing the miners at last accounts.

A gambler, named Green C. McMichael was murdered in the Eureka Gambling Saloon, on Commercial street, on the evening of September 30, by a man named John York. The accused and McMichael had some trifling dispute, which ended in York drawing a knife and stabbing, deceased in the abdomen, causing almost instantaneous death. York made his escape, and has not yet been arrested, though a reward of $500 has been offered for his apprehension by Mayor Webb.

The Mayor, Boards of Aldermen, and other members of the new Municipal Government were sworn into office on the evening of October 2. The customary oaths were administered by Judge T. W. Freelon, of the County Court.

A splendid fire engine, built for Pennsylvania Company, No. 22, by Agnew, of Philadelphia, arrived on the 2d inst., in the clipper ship Golden Age.

The steamship Uncle Sam, recently purchased by the Nicaragua Transit Company, arrived from San Juan on the evening of Oct. 12, making the quickest time on record from New York to this port. The Sam brought New York dates to Sept. 19.

Several of our principal streets are being paved with square blocks of granite taken from quarries near Monterey.

Mr. and Mrs. Barney Williams are still performing with great success at the Metropolitan. The net receipts of the house, during the first seven nights of their engagement, amounted to $14,000.

The second trial of Daniel C. Ball, upon charge of having murdered his infant child, was terminated on Thursday, Oct. 12. The jury were out but a few minutes and brought in a verdict of Not Guilty.

The mines continue prosperous.

The arrival of immigrants in various parts of the State from the plains has fairly commenced. Several parties who have arrived at Sacramento report that out of two hundred and fifty cattle, the number which they started with, one hundred were lost on the road. On Bear River, about the 1st of August, one of the trains were attacked by a large party of Indians supposed to be exiles from the Snake tribe, and robbed of a portion of their stock. A little while after their departure, another train headed by Mr. Cooper, coming up, the two companies pursued the depredators and attacked them. In the fight thirty of the Indians were killed and many wounded. The whites lost one man and only three were wounded. The stock, however, was not recovered. The savages give no trouble to the emigrants, except in the vicinity of Bear River.

It is feared that the rain which has fallen in considerable quantities, has destroyed a large crop of wheat, which farmers were harvesting.

A man named Wm. B. Cooper committed suicide in Oakland, on the 8th inst., by shooting himself. From a letter he left, it seems that in the East he stole nearly a thousand dollars, which so preyed on his mind that he killed himself.

The telegraph wires are to be extended to Downieville, Columbia, Sonora, Mukelumne Hill, and to Stockton—and thence to Oakland, opposite San Francisco.

A grand Indian Council was held at Storms's Ranche on the 2d instant, at which General Wool, Senators Gwin and Weller, and Col. Bealey were present. The latter suggested to the tribes that they prepare to move to the Tehama reservation; when King Weimar replied that he considered the Indians had a better right to remain than the Chinese, and that the Chinamen ought to be moved first. He promised, however, that a delegation of the tribe should be sent to the reservation to help put in the crops and examine the country.

The Chinese continue to be persecuted by the miners and others in the interior. On the Calaveras, on the 4th inst., a party of Irishmen attacked their huts and drove them from their claims. The property of the Celestials was wantonly destroyed, and finally their dwellings also. The sheriff subsequently arrested them, and they were placed under bonds to answer for their conduct.

A bloody affray occurred in Sonora, on the 4th inst., between James H Lyons and M. B. Duffield, neighboring ranchers. The parties met in the street, and Lyons made some remark calculated to lead to a collision, and placed his hand in his bosom as if to draw a pistol, when Duffield drew a revolver and fired. Previously, however, Duffield was shot from behind by a friend of Lyons. Duffield fired two more shots at Lyons. He then turned and fired at Lyons's friend, the ball entering the shoulder. Duffield was arrested and subsequently discharged.

Two Indians arrested for the murder of Capt. Spalding, at Nelsonville, on the 20th ult., were hung by the people on the 1st inst. Two others were shot. Their was no doubt of their guilt.

By the arrival at the Southerner on the 3d, we have interesting news from the Colorado and the Plains. A Mr Medlure who arrived at the ferry on the Colorado on the 30th ult., reports that he was robbed by the Apaches, numbering two hundred in all, who took away his stock, about two hundred head. There was great excitement at Tejon about the alleged discovery of new gold mines within sixty miles of that place. It was stated that miners were averaging three ounces per day. There has been nonsuch cable rain at that place. No cholera or sickness on the Plains. Another emigrant train had arrived at Los Angeles in a destitute condition, their provisions and cattle having been stolen by the Apaches.

The shock of an earthquake was distinctly felt at Humboldt, on the 20 inst.

A tea tree called by the Indians "Maltole," has been discovered, the valley adjoining which is described as being very rich and open to cultivation.

The salmon fisheries in this State will be on an extensive scale during the next season, and many companies are forming to catch and put up the fish for export. On the Sacramento the fishermen have commenced spreading their nets, and many hundred men will find employment in the business.

FROM OREGON

Gov Curry had revoked his call for volunteers to punish the Rogue Indians for their recent outrages on the ground of insurmountable obstacles to the success of such an expedition. The citizens of Portland held an indignation meeting on the 20th of September and passed resolutions declaring the Governor a coward, and pronouncing him unfit for office.

More massacres by the Indians are reported. On the 19th of August, about ninety-five miles east of Fort Reese on the Jeffers Road three men named Geo Lake Walter G Perry and F. B. Chatfield attacked to an immigrant train were met by the Indians and being behind their companions, were about leaving the Indians, when the latter fired at and wounded the two former. The whites killed two of the Indians and in a running fight which ensued Chatfield was killed. The wounded men subsequently died. Great indignation is exhibited against the agent of the Hudson Bay Company at Fort Hoke, who continue to sell arms and ammunition to the Indians. They say that they will continue so to do until other orders are received.

One party were saved from slaughter by a Half-breed, who told the Indians that the company were not immigrants but attached to the settlements of the Hudson Bay Company. At this they evinced much friendliness. Full details of the news from the Territory have been published in the Herald.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The whaling fleet has not yet arrived and the general trade of the Islands is depressed in consequence. The papers profess profound ignorance regarding the annexation schemes of Kamehameha and Mr Gregg. The steam communication with the Island is opposed by the natives, on the ground that it is the prelude to annexation.

Later from Texas.

The Galveston Civilian states that the yellow fever is at an end in that city for the present season. Not a single case exists in the hospital, and several hundred German emigrants had been permitted to land.

The fever was increasing at Lavaca, according to the latest accounts. The Register says that the following persons had died on the 3d and part of 4th days of this month: Mrs. Beaumont, wife of F. Beaumont Sen.; Mr. Haines, carpenter, an Englishman; and James McDermot, a Scotchman, and unacclimated. There was one other person in a dying condition.

Five companies of Rangers were mustered in the service of the State of Texas at Austin, on the 3d instant. The Governor has determined to accept their services until he can hear from Gen Smith, and send two of the companies to the vicinity of Fort Worth, and the other three to the vicinity of Fredericksburg and Fort Mason.

AMERICAN INDIAN MURDER AND ABDUCTION.—

The San Antonio Star has the following account of another Indian outrage:

Mr. R. Williams was killed by the Indians on Sunday last. He went to haul a barrel of water, and his wife hearing him hollow, ran to see what was the matter. On arriving near she saw six Indians, who had just finished the brutal murder of her husband, and were on their way to her camp, where they took every thing they wanted—also her three children—after which they went a short distance off and sat down to eat, where she went and begged from them her two youngest children. The Indians took her eldest child Fanny, and the horses, and left. Mrs. Williams, in making her way to Caruther's, got lost, and did not find the house until daylight this morning.

This happened on the Medina, about fifteen miles from San Antonio. Pursuit was made too late and the murderers escaped. The Western Texan of the 20th inst says:

The company that went out a few days ago in pursuit of the Indians who last Sunday murdered Mr. Williams, on the Medina, and carried off one of his children, came in yesterday evening. They report the Indians to have been Comanches. They trailed them some distance, and finding it impossible to overtake them, returned. Near Quihi they stole some horses, and pressed on with a rapidity that proved they were for getting out of the way, and expected pursuit. When they commit such outrages it is entirely useless to pursue them, unless pursuit can be commenced almost simultaneously with the commission of the act, as they travel night and day until conscious that they are out of harm's reach. The only sensible course to take is to guard against the perpetration of such acts of violence; let our action precede and not succede them.

The Nautilus brings us the Brownsville Flag up to the 4th inst., but we find nothing from that quarter of the least importance. Affairs beyond the border are still in a feverish state; but at present the party of Santa Anna seem to have things all their own way. So they will as long as the money received from the United States lasts. The Flag ridicules the boasting of the Mexican General over the late reverses of the Filibusters.

NEGRO STEALING IN NAVARRO COUNTY.—The Leon Pioneer, of the 1st inst., learns that two likely mulatto boys were recently stolen or decoyed from Col. Ellis, on Richland Creek, taking with them two fine mules, saddles and bridles, a double-barrelled shot-gun, and all the fine clothing of their master. Also, the Colonel's and his wife's gold watches—the latter being worth three hundred dollars. It is thought the negroes were decoyed off by white men; and one individual upon whom strong suspicions rested, was seized by a posse of the citizens, but he managed to get away from them and escape to parts unknown. Several other persons in that neighborhood are also suspected.

SPRINGFIELD, Texas, Nov. 4, 1854.—Editors News: Our whole country has been wild with excitement, in regard to a murder said to have been committed about two weeks since, in Navarro county, upon the body of one, Mr. Wells. The body was found on last Sunday, in Chambers' Creek bottom, by a parcel of men hunting for cattle. Soon after, eight men were arrested on suspicion, and were tried during the present week, and acquitted. The whole town of Corsicana was alive with people armed with guns, pistols, etc. Some for the prisoners, and others against them. Fears were entertained at one time that the prisoners would be mobbed, which was the cause of so many of their friends appearing armed. There were men from Freestone and Limestone counties, who were friends to the prisoners, and lest there should be some hard feelings against them, I will take occasion to remark that their intentions were to see the law of the land executed. If their friends had been proved guilty, they would have acquiesced. There is still great excitement in Navarro county.

The body of the murdered man was found about twenty miles from the residences of the parties accused. I refrain from giving an opinion as to their guilt of the murder.

One of the parties accused, lost a couple of negros some months since; and it is supposed by a good many persons that the man Wells instigated the boys to run off, and that he was hung for it.

From the San Antonio Ledger of a late date we learn that forty Polish families were on their way to Castroville; all substantial men, farmers, mechanics, etc. Also sixty families from Saxony, whose destination is the Medina. The banks of the Medina are certainly destined to be densely settled.

SUGAR CANE ON THE THE GARDALUPE.—Several planters have tried the experiment of growing sugar cane on the Gaudalupe with the best possible success. The Victoria Advocate alludes to specimens of new sugar of light color and beautifully granulated. The same paper furnishes the following instance of the capacity of the soil for growing cane:

Capt. J. B. Reid, of this county, has on his plantation about twenty acres of sugar cane, which, as he is not prepared for sugar making, he allowed to grow without cultivation or the least attention. It grew and flourished notwithstanding, and is now pronounced by competent judges to be as fine a field of cane as can be produced in Louisiana by the most careful and scientific cultivation.

From such facts continually multiplying, we are forced to the conclusion that the soil and climate of Texas are peculiarly adapted to the culture of this great Southern staple, and that in a few years it will be produced here in great abundance, and quite profitably. It is undoubtedly the surest crop that can be grown in Texas.

The Gonzales Inquirer states that a company of Texas Rangers recently passed through that place on their way to Austin. They were "a nable-bodied, fierce-looking set of fellows."

The yellow fever has carried off several prominent citizens of Corpus Christi during the past season. Among these the names of Dr. Trahey, of the U. S. Army, and Mr. B. F. Somerville, of the Quartermaster's Department; Mrs. Smith, the wife of Gen. P. F. Smith, is reported very ill. The Nueces Valley does not call this the yellow, but malignant fever.

SUBMARINE SERVICE IN THE BLACK SEA.—Sergeant William Carne, 1st company Royal Sappers and Miners, left Chatham to embark on board the Prince, steamship, for the Crimea. This non-commissioned officer is joined by privates Lewis, Price and Tooker, of the same company, and also by two civilians, selected by the Government. These men are well known for their ability in the duties of submarine explosions, and are excellent divers. They go out for the purpose of removing the five ships sunk by the Russians at the mouth of the harbor of Sebastopol. They take with them four sets of diving apparatus, and all other necessary implements, and twenty galvanic batteries, with five miles of copper wire. The charges to be used will be from one ton and a half to two tons of gunpowder, and will be fired at a distance of about two miles. The operations will be confined to the especial charge of Sergeant Carne. Messengers will be at his command to transmit every intelligence to Lord Raglan and the works of the submarine ships proceed. Sergeant Carne left the headquarters at Chatham full of spirits, having parted with his friends, being in full confidence of his success, not only of his completing the destruction of the ships, but also in removing and recovering the guns. AYER'S

BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

AMONG the numerous discoveries of science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this contribution of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the Lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any proportion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars and indisputable proof of these statements.

Office of Transportation, Laurens R. R.,
August 4, 1853.

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your CHERRY PECTORAL in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found a decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect,
J. D. POWELL, Supt. Trans., L. R. R.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Since your medicine has become known here, it has a greater demand than any enough remedy we have ever sold. It is spoken of in terms of unmeasured praise by those who have used it, and I know of some cases where the best they can say of it, is not too much for the good it has done. I take pleasure in selling it, because I know that I am giving my customers the worth of their money, and I feel gratified in seeing the benefit it confers.

Please send me a further supply, and believe me yours, with respect, JOHN C. WHITLOCK.

P. S. Almost any number of certificates can be sent you if you wish it.

THE DEDICATION.

Let me while in the morning of my life
Before the pleasures of the world have pulled,
Or the tired heart hath sickened of the strife
Which never satisfies, but still enthralls,
Remember my Creator, God, while yet
The evil days come not, or years draw nigh
When earthly pleasures will no more beguile,
And life be but an ever-breathing sigh.
Yes, I will early put my trust in Him;
For He hath promised, and His word is sure,
To guard and guide when the life's light grows dim.
No like the soul who, helpless to endure,
Still struggles with the boisterous, whelming wave,
And seeks no refuge till it nears the grave.

MOSES AND GEOLOGY.

ARTICLE SECOND.

We will now come more directly to the points at issue. Before entering, however, into the discussion, suffer me to say that I differ from the vulgar or common interpretation in reference to the universality of the Noachian deluge and the genesis of life. I shall attempt to show that geological facts are not in conflict with the Mosaic statements in these two particulars. I might refer to other and clearer instances of harmony, but I have selected these, the most difficult, because if there is no conflict here, there can be none elsewhere. I am aware that I may encounter opposition from men, who, though they may be very confident of their own opinions, are ignorant of the science of geology, and therefore of the real magnitude of the objections to be answered—objections that can not be answered satisfactorily, in my opinion, to the scientific mind, by the old modes of interpretation. But still I am prepared, because I expect to be censured in certain quarters. Proud est, ut credere possis, they will say. It will be a wonder if some do not say, proude, o proude este, profane.

But the truth, bright and glorious, in its own eternal grandeur, shall move on, regardless of a blind and bigoted zeal on the one hand, and of a proud and boastful scepticism on the other, until science and religion, wedded together in a holy and inseparable marriage, shall blend their rays and mingle together their lights over the whole field of possible progress and development.

It is assumed by geologists (and truly, no doubt,) that there has not been—within the historic era, if ever—a universal deluge. And it is assumed, furthermore, by some, that this fact is in conflict with the Mosaic statement. Now I believe that the Mosaic statement is in harmony with the theory of a partial deluge. It is only necessary to the coincidence that the whole world then inhabited by man should have been submerged. The waters prevailed, and all the high hills that were under the whole Heaven were covered, and all in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the land died." Now if we bear in mind the object of the historian, we shall see that the extent of the deluge is merely an incidental circumstance, and not the main fact to be revealed. The main fact to be revealed is the destruction of all mankind by the deluge. And if the waters did thus destroy him, by covering all his habitations, we need not stagger at the strong general terms in which the announcement is made. Especially, should we not be astonished at this mode of expression, since we find that this is very often, if not generally, the manner in which the Holy Ghost makes his revealments. We read: (Gen. vi. 12,) "All flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth." Yet, it is manifest that Noah is excepted. We read in the first epistle of John, (chap. v. 19,) that the whole world lieth in wickedness. He excepts the Christians, as if they were no part of the world. See, also, (Luke ii. and i.) "There went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed." All the world here is evidently limited to the countries under the Roman dominion. By analogous exegesis, "all the high hills that were under the whole Heaven," may be limited to that extent of country inhabited by man. Moses describes the deluge as a historian upon the spot at the time would have done, as it appeared to Noah himself. He does not stop to inform us that there are other lands beyond the bounds of this deluge. That was in no way essential to the narrative of man's corruption, and consequent punishment. God reveals whatever is essential but impossible, having, as every good teacher should do, most of the possible problems to be worked out by the pupil himself. I will close this communication by a few remarks in reference to the azoic formations, sometimes called the primitive rocks. The extent of this formation is vast, but as yet, perhaps will ever be, unknown. These non-fossiliferous rocks may have been formed by the immediate agency of the Creator "in the beginning." But as some of them, at least, like the protozoic are stratified, there is reason to believe that they were formed by secondary agencies operating under the direction of the great first Cause. If they were formed by secondary agencies, there was ample time for this, perhaps, from the beginning, after God had created the heavens and the earth; while as yet "the earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep." For, after the creation of light, "the evening and the morning," produced by that light, "were the first day:" hence the creation of the world was at some indefinite period before the first day; therefore we may speculate as to the operations then going on without running in contact with revelation. Here may have been millions of ages, for aught we know unmeasured by solar or sidereal time. During this vast, unknown and indefinite period, the azoic rocks may have been formed by their strata indicates. The earth may have been gradually prepared for vegetable and animal life.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE REPORTS.

ON EDUCATION.

Report of the Committee on Education to the Mississippi Conference.

Your Committee find on examination that Centenary College of Louisiana is yet in an increasing state of prosperity. It has a full corps of faithful, competent and laborious teachers. The classes in all departments are full, and their progress in study satisfactory to patrons and the public. The college is out of debt; it has good buildings; a fine library and philosophical apparatus; it is in a healthy locality; surrounded by a highly intelligent and religious community; and being located only twelve miles from the Mississippi River, it is comparatively easy of access to students from any portion of Louisiana, Mississippi or Texas. It opens its doors for the gratuitous education of the Sons of Itinerant Ministers, and in this way annually by the education of a large number of young men, sons of traveling preachers, increases its claims upon our prayers and labors, for its perpetuity and prosperity. It is doing a good work, a great work for the Church and the world, and is worthy of our confidence and support. To do this work more effectually, and to place the college above contingency, it is deemed important to erect a large center building, to contain a chapel, recitation rooms and society halls; and to increase our Endowment fund to at least fifty thousand dollars: and measures are in progress to have both of these objects speedily accomplished. For these ends we think every member of this Conference ought to pray and labor. We hope that the session of this conference, held upon the ground consecrated to this noble educational enterprise, will be followed by the best of consequences, not only to the Church of Christ but to our College; and that the college will yet become more thoroughly the nursery of piety and of learning. Here let the young men of our country be brought in contact with holy men, with sanctified science, with the Bible, with Methodism, with the pure religion of Jesus Christ; that prejudice may be removed, the mind and heart illuminated and purified, and then the ultimate though now unseen result will be glorious to science and the general Church of Christ. To do this each man has his duty to perform, by instructing parents and children from the pulpit and around the fireside, by presenting our claims to patronage and pecuniary aid. This conference, though it might have done more, has yet by its past labors shown, not only that the interests of education and religion are not antagonistic, but that they mutually aid each other. We believe that no branch of the Christian Church can, without jeopardizing its prosperity, and the purity of the faith once delivered to the saints, refuse to employ as instrumentalities the various grades of literary institutions. Acting under this conviction the conference has shown by past labors that the important educational interests of our Church are safely intrusted to its keeping. May each feel his individual responsibility.

From the Report of the Trustees of Sharon Female College, we learn that President Eckles and Lady have resigned, and that at present it is under the care of Miss. Ann Shrock. The Trustees have made provision for the erection of a new building, and will soon employ a competent gentleman to take charge of the institution. It is in a healthy and flourishing condition, and promises much good to the church in the great cause of female education.

The Report of the Trustees of the Raymond Methodist Female Seminary, taken under the fostering care of our Conference at its last session, shows that it is in a flourishing condition. It had over one hundred students during the past year; has a full and competent faculty; good buildings, that have undergone a thorough repair during the past year; a boarding house under the care of Rev. H. J. Harris, a healthy locality, and promises much usefulness. The property is worth about $6000, and is a monument of the liberality of the citizens of Raymond.

From the report of Brother E. R. Strickland, general educational agent, we learn that most of his services have been devoted to the Wesleyan Female Institute at Jackson, Miss. From this report we learn that he has purchased a beautiful site and buildings for the school, near or within the city, for about $17,000; for payment he has become personally obligated. He has secured, as near as we could learn, about $5000 in subscriptions to aid in liquidating the debt. The Institution is now ready to go into active operation, and promises great usefulness. Your Committee would further speak of Port Gibson Female Academy, under the care of Dr. Capers; of Fayette Female Academy at Fayette, Miss., under control of Rev. Wm. M. Curtis; of Wilmarth Female Academy, under control of Dr. Speer at Natchez; of the Feliciana Female Institute, under care of Rev. Benjamin Jones of this place, and of the school of Sister Wall of Clinton, La., as schools within the bounds of our Conference worthy of the confidence and support of our people. In conclusion, we would offer the following resolutions for the action of the Conference:

Resolved, That we still feel a deep interest in the cause of education, and that we will do all we can, within the bounds of our respective charges, to arouse our people to a sense of duty towards their children, and toward our Literary Institutions.

Resolved, That we have full confidence in Centennary College of La.; in Sharon Female College; in the Raymond Methodist Female Seminary; in the Wesleyan Female Institute, under our patronising care, and in the other schools mentioned above, as colleges and schools well adapted to the educational wants of our people, and that we will continue to recommend them to all as worthy of patronage and pecuniary aid.

Resolved, That we recommend the presiding Bishop of this Conference to appoint Rev. L. Campbell as agent of Centenary College of La., and Rev. E. R. Strickland as agent for Wesleyan Female Institute.

Resolved, That we recommend the Bishop to appoint a visiting committee to each school under the fostering care of the Conference, whose duty it shall be to visit said schools as frequently as possible, and especially at their annual examinations, and to report to our next Conference.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN C. MILLER, Chairman.

ON TEMPERANCE.

The Committee on Temperance beg leave to report that this subject has been duly considered, and that they are gratified to be able to state that so much has been done in this great cause during the past year.

The history of the Temperance Reform movement in other States, as compared with its progress in our own, exhibits Mississippi as the most thorough temperance State in our Union. While the friends of humanity every where have been zealous in the promotion of temperance principles, and while several States have enacted strong prohibitory laws for the suppression of the traffic of intoxicating drinks, Mississippi has not lagged behind in the great reform movement, but has gone far in advance of every other Southern State, and since your last session the Legislature has passed a law, which, without the slightest tendency to infringement upon private rights or personal liberty, has all the moral force which the deliberate approval and stern purpose of the people can impart to its provisions.

Regarding the vice of Intemperance as one which stands more than all others between men and the Gospel of God, they feel justified in urging upon the consideration of your body the claims of the Temperance Reform movement. Standing, as it undoubtedly does, intimately connected with the prosperity of our holy religion, it should be considered at once a pleasure and a solemn duty by every Christian, to aid in the furtherance of temperance principles. Your Committee submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this Conference views with pleasure the high stand taken by the people of Mississippi, and especially by the Legislature of that State, upon the principle of prohibition.

Resolved, That we regard the enactment of a judicious prohibitory law as the only certain means of suppressing the traffic in intoxicating drinks.

Resolved, That our preachers be earnestly requested to present to the people in their various charges the importance of this subject, and its claims upon them as citizens, as Christians, and as friends of humanity.

Respectfully,

H. T. LEWIS,
J. L. FORSYTHE.

ON MISSIONS.

The Committee to whom were referred the Missions and Missionary operations of the Methodist E. Church South, within the bounds of the Mississippi Annual Conference, respectfully report that it is perhaps unnecessary to enter upon a detail of the number and state of our missions, the Treasurer and Secretary of the Missionary Society having made special reports concerning those matters, all of which your Committee understand are to be published. This Conference, and the people of our charge, can but rejoice in the prosperity of the cause of God, and of the salvation of the hundreds who have been converted to God during the past year. God has been every where within our borders, reviving his work, and especially so on the Missions. We respectfully suggest that all that can be made self-sustaining, and whenever it can, be done, that churche shall be erected convenient to the farms, that permanency may be rendered to the same; that there may be as small a demand as possible for Domestic missions, that the Foreign Missions of the Church may be effectively sustained.

The Committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1—That the prosperous condition of the missions under our care, and the gracious work of God, which has been going on in almost all of them during the past year, demand our thanks to Almighty God, and encourage us to go on.

Resolved, 2—That we pledge ourselves to renewed efforts in the great work of carrying the Gospel and its blessedness to the colored population within our limits, to whom in the Providence of God we may have access.

Resolved, 3—That this Conference renews its pledge to support our beloved Brother Jas. Wm. Lambuth and his Wife, who are engaged in the Missionary work in China, and that our prayers are offered to God that he may grant them success.

Resolved, 4—That the Secretary of the Conference be and he is hereby requested to address to them a letter as soon as convenient, and represent the confidence reposed in them by this Conference, the renewal of our pledge, to support them in China, and that our prayers are offered to our Heavenly Father, that he may sustain and keep them to everlasting life.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

BIBLE CAUSE.

Your Committee beg leave to report, that they look with no ordinary interest on the brightening prospects and increasing usefulness of the "AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY." The prime object of its organization is, (to use the language of its constitution,) "to aid in the wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures in all lands," and we may add, in all the languages and dialects of this "babbling earth."

But let us notice somewhat in detail the various fields attempted to be supplied by this Society with the Word of God, which is able to make men wise unto salvation.

1. Those of our own favored land, who through ignorance, neglect or penury, are without the word of life. It is delightful to see the various agencies of this noble institution placing the blessed Bible, without note or comment, in the hands of all who are found without it. Go where you may, whether in the older settlements or on the out-skirts of civilization: whether in our hotels or public conveyances, or wherever else destitution has been found, and you find copies of this Holy Book, bearing the imprint of the American Bible Society.

2. Another very important and truly necessitous class which are being supplied with the pure Word of God by this Society, is composed of the foreign population, which is being poured by thousands upon our shores. In their Fatherland they were not only destitute of the Bible, but taught to believe it to be a sin of uncommon magnitude to read its holy pages covered with the riches of saving truth. But here some of them, at least, soon learn that it is both their privilege and duty to "search the Scriptures" for themselves, and our American Bible Society supplies them promptly with the Holy Scriptures printed in their own language wherein they were born. If a great moral battle is to be fought in this Republic between Protestant Christianity and Romanism, the most effectual weapon to be used by the former is "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." Then let this foreign population have the Bible.

3. Another interesting class of human beings to be supplied with the history of man's ruin by sin, and means of recovery by "the redemption that is in Christ Jesus," is composed of the aboriginal tribes of our continent. In their darkness and destitution they have been visited by Christian Missionaries, who have systematized their various dialects, and reduced their vernacular tongue to a written language, and in that language our noble Society has printed the story of redemption as given by the Holy Evangelist, and placed the precious volume in the hands of these sons and daughters of paganism. So let it continue to be done, until every tribe and family shall have, and learn to read this Holy Book.

4. Another region looked upon with increasing interest by the managers, agents, and patrons of our Parent Bible Society, is found in the Mexican and South American States. Already the way is open at several important points for the introduction of the Bible into those regions of Papal darkness and superstition. And suppose an ignorant and licentious priesthood should now and then succeed in collecting and burning a few copies of the Divine Word? Our noble Society intend to keep on hand a supply to replace them at the earliest opportunity.

5. But the charities of this noble institution known as the "AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY," of which the nation is proud, are not confined to the American continent. They are sent abroad to the islands of the sea—to the teeming millions of Asia, and to large portions of continental Europe, especially France and Germany, and to some extent, even Italy. But now the question comes up, how is the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY to prosecute successfully its great object of giving the Holy Scriptures a wider circulation in all lands? It must have money to purchase materials for the manufacture of Bibles—to pay its one thousand operatives—and the incidental expenses of sending abroad and distributing one million copies of the Holy Scriptures annually; and as it proposes to promote the cause of Protestant Christianity, by placing the unadulterated Word of God in the hands of people of every clime and every caste, Protestant Christians of every name should rally around it, and by their liberal contributions sustain it in its holy enterprize, until that time of universal light shall come, "when one need not say to another, know the Lord, but when all shall know Him, from the least unto the greatest." In conclusion, your Committee beg leave to offer the following resolutions for the adoption of the Conference.

1. Resolved, That we acknowledge our gratitude to Almighty God for the increasing prosperity and usefulness of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, and that we humbly pray a continuation of His blessing upon it.

2. Resolved, That we will extend the hand of paternal greeting to the accreditated agents of the Society whenever we meet them, and will aid them in their work.

3. Resolved, That, as far as practicable, we will carry out the rule of the Church passed at the late General Conference in reference to this subject.

Finally, your Committee report the following sums of money as having come into their hands for the Bible Society:

Bayou Pierre Circuit per Rev. Peter E. Green	$21 00
Vernon and Livingston, per Rev. J. A. Light	46 80
Attala Circuit, per Rev. E. J. Woodward	22 00
Canton, per Rev. H. U. Light	5 00
Black Hawk, per Rev. J. Nicholson	5 00
Raymond and Spring Ridge, H. J. Harris	46 00
Pearl River, G. D. Wade	2 00
Total	$112 80

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The principal of an academy, in his advertisement, mentioned his female assistant, and the "reputation for teaching which she bears:" but the printer, careless fellow, left out the "which," so the advertisement went forth commending the lady's "reputation for teaching she bears."

ONLY THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

In this busy and unthinking world, pretensions are too often allowed to pass as claims, and noise for work. What is unpretending has small chance for notice; and whatever claims a great deal is pretty sure, if not of having them allowed, at least made more of than they actually deserve. We have often seen a lusting noisy fellow thrust his betters aside, and quiet sensible people not made much of, because they were too humble to make much of themselves. A man is nowadays expected to be his own advertisement, and the gaudier the colors and the more capacious the type he uses, all the better for the purpose he has in hand. There is nothing, many people will tell you, like blowing your own trumpet, and when once you have the instrument in your hand, they will enjoin you to blow long and loud. We cannot but think that Sunday schools have been kept too much in the back ground in the estimation of the public, because their work is so unostentatious, and they do their good in such a quiet way. While ladies' colleges are puffing away, and astonishing us with new and hitherto unheard of names, such as "lady principals," and "lady professors," and every newspaper chronicles the advantages of Hive Seminary, or Jerkin Hall, the Sunday school is little heard of in the world; it spends very little in advertising, and when now and then a good natured minister makes room, amid his many claims, for a Sunday school sermon, few mind what is said about it, or drop more than a sixpence or a shilling on the plate. "What notice was that the minister gave out!" said deaf old Mrs. Newsome to her niece: "Another charity sermon, eh! what is it for?" And, Miss Platt replied, "Only the Sunday school!" Whereupon Mrs. Newsome descended to the lower key, and her wrath passed calmly away, for she thought—"Sixpence will do for that!" We fear very much that Miss Platt's prefix "ONLY" is a very common one indeed, and that the words only the "Only the Sunday school!" are heard much oftener than is usually supposed.

This is said by the public generally. As in Mrs. Newsome's case, a sixpence will do for that Sunday school sermon, and it is very hard to get up much sympathy for it; as to enthusiasm, that is out of the question altogether. The public pay little heed to the preacher's appeal for teachers, take little notice of the children as they pass along the streets, or occupy their places in their several houses of worship. Just as if they don't know all about it; "it is only the Sunday school!"

While twenty or thirty sympathizing ladies or gentlemen will step forward to collect for some new and perhaps interesting mission, which has something romantic about it; while they will venture into filthy rooms, and even dangerous courts, in search of some special objects of charity which have become the fashion for awhile, they give no response to appeals in behalf of the Sunday school, which is often too hum-drum for those excitable minds which cannot do good at all, except under the influence of some violent stimulus.

We need scarcely say that this indifference on the part of the public deprives our Sunday schools of much help which they very greatly need. Because it is "only the Sunday school" people think that no money can be wanting for good, none for the annual expenses, none for rewards because there are no paid teachers, the public cannot understand why any contributions should be required, and all because the public will not take the trouble to think. There is nothing easier than to put down its claims with that one slighting little word "only." "Tis only the Sunday school!"

SORROW ON THE SEA.

Among the sermons preached last Sabbath in this city, on the loss of the Arctic, that by Rev. Dr. Adams was one of the most appropriate. His text was Jer. 49, 23: "Hamath is confounded and afraid; for they have heard evil tidings; they are faint-hearted; there is sorrow on the sea."

We make the subjoined extract from his sermon:

"Nevertheless one will sleep as safely 'rocked in the cradle of the deep,' and will as certainly be restored again, as if interred in the shadow of the Church where he was baptized. 'The sea is His, and He made it.' It lies in the hollow of God's hand as really as the solid earth, and just as sure is it to render up the dead who were committed to its keeping as is any quiet church-yard. The sea has entombed many more precious than the pearls and treasures which lie around them too precious to be forgotten of God in the day when He maketh up His jewels. There is Samuel J. Mills, the pioneer of modern missions, who was buried at sea, on his return from the exploration of Africa; Professor Fisher, whose loss in the Albion made science and religion to mourn; the youthful Laurie, thrown overboard in a missionary town by Chinese pirates; Chamberlin and Wyman, seeking temporary rest from missionary toil, and finding a longer rest beneath the Indian Ocean; the eloquent Cookman, who went down in the President. There was many a godly man and gentle woman, who, sinking with the Home and the Pulaski, were denied interment by the kindly hands of bereaved friends, and among them my brother in Christ, and in every pleasant affection, who went from our communion table to his watery grave, and whose last words, as heard in the howlings of the fatal tempest, deserve to be written in the cabin of every ship that floats: 'He that believeth in Jesus is safe; even amid the pearls of the sea!' Precious are the words of God. The sea shall give up the dead which are in it." [N. Y. Chronicle.

"What will you give for the souls?" The children and women came out of the habitations of poverty, and cast their mites into the box. When it is full of money, it is carried to a neighboring convent, to pay the priests for praying the souls of the dead out of purgatory. Thus this gross superstition is supported by money gathered from the hand of penury itself. Thus the sympathies of the ignorant are excited, to maintain wicked men in praying useless prayers for those who are beyond the reach of prayer or mercy. By this affecting practice the faithful missionary was reminded of his obligations to pray, and toil, and suffer for those souls which are yet prisoners of hope, and to which the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ may come. And surely those who abide at home, and are excused from the perils and sufferings of the enterprize, may well be inquired what they will give for the salvation of men. It is true the gift of God cannot be purchased with money. Money cannot become a ransom for immortal spirits which ruined by sin. But it can feed and clothe the heralds of salvation. It can move the press, that shall publish in every language the Word of Life. It can furnish the school, that shall teach young immortals who it is that bears prayer, and who as a prince has power with God and prevails. Reader what will you give for the souls?

PULPIT ILLUSTRATIONS—ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.—Give Him All.—An Indian, who heard a sermon in a Christian settlement, was much moved by the claim that he should give up all to God. The duty pressed upon his heart; he returned to his wigwam; he meditated much upon it; and at length solemnly resolved to do what God required. First, he took his rifle and set it apart for the Lord; then his fishing apparatus; then his scanty furniture; then his blanket—repenting as he set apart each article, "Here, Lord, take that." Finding himself utterly destitute, having given up all, he yet felt that he was forsaken of God, and was in great distress. The darkness of despair came over him. In this last extremity, he laid himself upon the altar, saying, "Here, Lord, take too poor Indian." The offering was accepted; and there, alone, bereft of human help or hope, this poor despised savage was delivered from the power of sin, and made an heir of glory. He soon learned to read, and was supplied with a Bible, which he made his daily companion; he was happy in solitude, or with Christian friends, to whom he often remarked, that when he gave himself to the Lord, the Lord gave him "all things," for the life that now is, and that which is to come. [Tenn. Hap.

YOUNG MAN ASLEEP.—Acts xx. 9, 10.—See the zeal of Paul in preaching the Gospel of Christ in Macedonia. Acts xx. 9, 10. While engaged in that work, a young man got asleep, and fell from the third story, and was taken up as dead. How zealous was Paul to preach the Gospel at midnight he was engaged in the work. See the influence of the body upon the mind. Some fell asleep while an inspired Apostle was preaching. Eutychus died by sleeping when he ought to have been awake. No age is exempt from death. He was a "young man," and yet he died. He died too in a remarkable place—at meeting while Paul was preaching. How noble and tender-hearted was Paul. He said, trouble not yourselves. He was like Elijah compassionating the widow of Sarepta. Great men in every age exhibited this trait of character. [Christian Register.

HEROISM.—The brave Dorian, the third officer of the Arctic, gives an interesting account of the disaster:

"One incident particularly attracted his attention, and that was the fidelity exhibited by a young gentleman named Holland, of Washington, who was on board the Arctic for the purpose of gaining instruction in engineering. He had been deputed by the captain to fire the signal gun (when all others had fled,) and amid the melancholy wail he pursued his duty. When all hope had fled, and the vessel nearly level with the sea, he was seen busy at the gun. His last shot boomed out as the Arctic sank, and he went down with her persevering in the strict performance of his duty."

Noble youth! His efforts were unavailing, but his example of courage and self sacrifice will stimulate many a young heart to deeds of heroism. Nat. Era.

THE LITERATURE OF DISPATCHES.—Critics at clubs are divided about the excellence of the dispatches of Lord Raglan and Admiral Dundas. They are looked at (we suspect) with too literary a turn, and are contrasted unfavorably with the Duke's dispatches, and Sir Harry Smith's admirable Aliwal Dispatch. This is unfair. But is not the last dispatch ever written that of Admiral Sir George Walton, who died in 1729? The brave George Walton was knighted for his skill and valor in capturing the Spanish fleet in the expedition to Sicily, in August, 1718. His ship was the Canterbury, and he had five other ships with him. He served under Admiral Byng, and the service on which he was ordered was of no slight kind. Like an English seaman of the Blake and Raleigh school, he did his work, and did it unostentatiously. Of course (he was indeed a sea captain) he took the pen!

Sir,—We have taken and destroyed all the Spanish ships and vessels which were upon the coast. The number as per margin.

I am, etc.,

G. WALTON.

MORE SPIRITUAL MANIFESTATIONS.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer has a traveling account of the experience of sundry persons who went from that city to a "place" in Athens county, Ohio, for the purpose of witnessing the fantastic tricks of the spirits. We copy the most striking portion of the evidence:

From Cleveland we went to Columbus by railroad, thence to Millfield, a distance of seventy miles, by private conveyance over roads quite rough and hilly. On the third day from Columbus we reached Millfield. Here we found two log-houses fitted up as Spirit Rooms. These houses are about three miles apart, and are each composed of a single room, about twelve by fifteen in size. One house is on the farm of Mr Kerns, the other on the farm of Mr Tippie, and both were built under the direction of Spirits, and are used only for Spiritual Demonstrations. We stayed two days and nights at Mr Tippie's, and carefully examined each of the rooms, and their contents, to prevent any collusion or deception. In each of the Spirit Rooms stands a table, on which is placed what is called a "Spirit Machine."

Then follows a description and a cut, which we must omit. The account proceeds:

This machinery was constructed under the direction of Spirits, and is used by them in collecting and raining electricity and is charged at every circle before any demonstrations are given. On the table, and by the side of the machinery, lies a violin, an accordeon, a triangle, two drumsticks for the large and two for the small drum. There is also on the table a common sized dinner-bell, a harmonica, a tamborin, and a trumpet about two feet in length.

* * * * * * *

After the company were seated, the lights were extinguished and the room darkened as much as possible, and in about five minutes the presence of the Invisibles was manifested by several very strong blows on the table, the ceiling, and the walls. These blows were apparently produced by use of the drumsticks, and their power and frequency rendered them exceedingly disagreeable and almost deafening. A reveille was then beat on the drums which would do credit to experienced drummers. The violin, an old one not worth fifteen cents, was tuned. In the process of tuning the keys slipped in the head a number of times. The bridge also slipped out and fell to the floor, but it was soon replaced on the violin. One of us found fault with the tuning, as it was not on concert pitch, and on his giving the true pitch the instrument was quickly and accurately tuned, when a number of airs were played on it, not with a bow, but pizzicato. The violin was not on the table during the whole time, but was carried by invisible hands all around the room, now passing near to our heads, now near the ceiling, and now resting on our persons. It was placed on the knees of one of our number, and turned over, so that the strings were on the under side, and while his hands were passing all around it so as to cut off all connection with it, a tune was played.

The accordeon was played on, not only while it laid on the table, but while it was floating through the air, through all parts of the room. A number of airs were given through the harmonica with occasional bursts of full harmony. The tamborin was also used, and while moving around the room, the various sounds usually produced by the instrument were heard. At our request it was placed successively on each of our heads. It was also passed completely around the circle, and in its way rested on the arms and hands of each of us. We also heard speaking, whistling and singing through the tin horn. The horn appears to be the chief medium used by the spirits at these rooms for vocalizing. It is impossible to convey an adequate idea of the musical performances. While each of the musical instruments was used, the time was regularly and accurately marked, now on the drums, now on the triangle, now on the tambourin, and with the bell, and now with the use of all combined; and when all the musical instruments were simultaneously used, the effect was not only novel but highly pleasing. While this concert of music was being given, articulate words were heard from the horn, indicating that one of the invisibles presided over the others, and directed the arrangements. Through the horn many amusing and interesting comments on the instruments, the musicians and their music were made, sometimes commanding and sometimes severely criticising.

The manner of using the horn deserves notice. Before using it for speech, it would be raised into the air, then a sentence would be distinctly articulated through it, when it would fall to the table. When we asked any questions, as we did repeatedly, the horn would rise, the answer be given, and the horn again fall to the table. At our request, they extended the horn to us, and allowed us to take hold of the large end of it, while at the same time conversation was directed through it to us.

That is, the Spirits talked and sung "in a horn"! Curious, but very likely.

But no more miraculous development still came next—namely, that the Spirits can be seen and handled!

One of us remarked that we had heard it said that Spirits had the power to exhibit a spirit hand so as to be distinctly seen by natural eyes, but that we doubted their ability so to do. Presently a piece of sand paper was covered with phosphorus, producing a strong, clear and steady light, which revealed to us a hand entirely disconnected with any mortal body. The phosphorus paper was taken between the thumb and fingers of the hand, and carried to all parts of the room, now rising to the ceiling out of our reach, now passing repeatedly and slowly around the circle within a few inches of our faces, thus giving each and all of us an opportunity to examine it. All portions of the hand were distinctly visible in the phosphorescent light, and to all appearances it was perfectly natural. We then requested that a communication might be written to us by the hand on some paper which we furnished. Through the horn it was said, "We have no pencil; can we borrow one?" One of us reached a pencil, and the hand, still holding the phosphorus paper, came and took the pencil from her hand, and wrote following:

TO THE FRIENDS FROM OLIVELAND

The spirits who produce manifestations in this room write these lines for the sake of convincing you of their varied power, and for the sake of removing doubts that exist, not only in your minds, but in the minds of spiritualists generally, and for the benefit of the whole subject. If the friends will certify to the writing of these lines, and cause them to be published, peradventure it may be instrumental in removing existing doubts, and in convincing skeptics that spirits who once inhabited mortal bodies still live, and can and do hold intercourse with the inhabitants of the earth.

While the above was written, the phosphorus light was so strong that we could all of us see every mark made on the paper by the hand and pencil. It was written in less than half the time any of one of us could have written it, with the pencil. We then requested that we might be allowed to touch the hand and was then handed to us. We followed to the head of the circle, and while still holding the lighted spirit hand. Instantly it passed with all the paper, passed around and shook hands with the sceptic and the believer alike receiving the last proffered hand. It was a perfect hand, at least as perfect as our own. It was as tangible and as real as a human hand, and yet we had the most unmistakeable proofs that it was not human.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD.—The Louisville Times, of the 13th inst., speaking of the progress of this road, says:

"The branch leading into Paducah is 60 miles long; of this there is 40 per cent. of the work completed, leaving 60 per cent yet to be done. Ten miles are ready for the ties and rails, and three miles of the track have been laid and are now in use. There is iron enough at Paducah and New Orleans, awaiting shipment to complete the road 15 miles; and a locomotive, cars, etc., will be put upon the track in a few weeks, or as soon as they can be brought up the river."

NEW PAPER.—We are pleased to see the editor of the "Central Texian" in the city. This is one of our late and best western exchanges, published by T. D. and R. A. Van Horn, in Anderson county, Texas. They are negotiating for new type and press—signs of prosperity. From the same office will be issued, after Jannary next, "The Texas Baptist," edited by Rev. G. W. Baines, at two and a half dollars per annum.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.—Our excellent representative, Judge Perkins, is not unmindful. By mail, under his frank, we have "Compendium of U. S. Census 1850."

THE NEW BAPTIST CHURCH. — The new Baptist Church, corner of Camp and Basin streets, has been completed so far, that for the last two Sabbaths services have been held in the basement, by the pastor, Rev. W. C. Duncan.

BISHOP KAVANAUGH.

We are pleased to learn that Bishop K. is moving through his list of Annual Conferences West of the Mississippi, in good health. From Tallequah, in the Creek Nation, where the Indian Mission Conference was held, he drops us a note dated 30th October:

"I have progressed so far in good health, my wife with me. Since the intensity of the summer heat has subsided, her health is improving.

"The Lord willing, I expect to be at Washington, Arkansas, on the 22d of November; and after the adjournment of that Conference, it is my present purpose to visit New Orleans, and probably Mobile.

"Should I determine to visit Orleans certainly after the Washita Conference, I may give you further notice.

"Truly yours,

"H. H. KAVANAUGH."

IMPROVEMENT.—The relation of the Church to missions is not only becoming, but vital. One of the best indications of a church's efficiency and prosperity is the state of her missionary work. We believe these facts are admitted. Upon them we draw an encouraging conclusion as to the condition of Methodism. Thirty-five years ago the missionary collections made about one-fourth of a cent average per member. Now the average is about twenty cents per member.

CHURCH DEDICATION—SERMON.

The Hinds County Gazette describes an interesting occasion—the dedication of a Methodist Church in Brownsville, Mississippi.

At an early hour on that day, pursuant to previous notice and special invitation, the Masonic Fraternity from Raymond, Clinton, Jackson, Edwards' Depot and Vicksburg, assembled at the Lodge Room of Tappan Lodge No. 59, for the purpose of uniting with the Methodist Church in the interesting ceremonies of dedicating their New Church, a chaste, roomy and beautiful edifice, erected by the munificence of the members, aided by the liberality of the good citizens of Brownsville and vicinity.

The ceremonies concluded, among which was pouring corn, wine and oil on the Altar and the floor of the church, dedicating the house to the service of the only true and living God—the propagation and dissemination of Christianity, and universal benevolence and good will to man, the sermon was preached by Rev. J. A. Godfrey. A copy has been furnished us, and well deserves the tribute of the Gazette—"An able eloquent and impassioned Dedicatory Sermon, of nearly two hours in length, in all which time there was the most perfect order and marked attention, although the house was densely crowded."

At the close of the sermon, Dr. T. J. Catchings, on behalf of the Church and and others, ascended the pulpit, and in a very appropriate address presented the Rev. Mr. Godfrey with a very valuable Gold Watch, as a slight testimonial of their appreciation of him as a gentleman and worthy Christian Minister.

After which a collection was taken up to assist in paying for the church, and over $500 obtained, which speaks well for the liberality of Brownsville and vicinity.

A row took place in a German Catholic Church at Utica, N. Y., on the 12th inst., growing out of a difficulty between the priest and the St. Joseph's Society, concerning a banner. Legal measures had been resorted to which had resulted in favor of the Society, and the priest not relishing the decision which had been rendered against him, closed yesterday from his pulpit that there were thieves and liars present, and that he could not proceed with the services of the church until they left. He then withdrew, when a fight followed among the congregation. Four of the rioters were arrested and held to bail.

The interior of the new capitol, at Washington, is to have ornamental columns, pilasters and panels, of rare antique marble from Vermont, mingled with those of white marble.

To double the amount of light given by a spirit lamp, stick the point of a pin in the wick, and let it stand perpendicular in the flame.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

The thirty-eighth session of this body met in Jackson, La., 8th inst.—Bishop Early presiding. A large proportion of the ministers were present. Rev. W. H. Watkins was elected Secretary, and Rev. H. J. Harris and W. P. Barton Assistants. Conference was held in the Baptist Church.

The Spirit of God had blessed the labors of the ministers, and his Providence been tender of their lives and health. Only one had died during the year—Rev. J. B. Daughtry, a superannate, of whom a memoir was presented attesting his faithfulness in a ministry of forty years.

The Conferences claimants were paid off at 63 per cent.

A cheering feature of the Conference was the large number of well prepared young men presenting themselves for the itineraney. They are precious answers of the Lord of the harvest to the prayers of his servants for more laborers—raised up among themselves—recommended from their own Quarterly Conferences, and not borrowed or fetched from abroad.

Admitted on Trial—J. J. Wheat, Wm. R. Millsaps, E. F. Mullin, Wm. S. Townsend, Wm. W. Hurst, Wm. B. Johnson, Deacon; Leander Cately, Deacon; D. W. Dillehay, Jas. M. Pugh, Elder; Whit. Harrington, H. D. Berry, Samuel F. Gard, and Daniel McNeal.

Re-admitted—Wm. M. Curtiss, Jas. English, Thomas Price, and Washington Ford.

Located—A. H. Thomas, J. H. Laney and R. H. Herbert.

On Sabbath Bishop Early preached in the College Chapel, 11 A. M. As we were deployed, at the same hour, to service at the Presbyterian Church, we can not report the Episcopal sermon. The Episcopal acts following were the solemn ordination of—

J. A. B. Jones, A. B. Nicholson, James Shelton and B. J. Woodward, traveling Deacons; Geo. L. Crosby, Jas. H. Mnse, W. R. Scales, D. W. Dillehay, Charles Powers, John S. Arbuthnot, and Hiram Enlow, local.

In the afternoon, after sermon by Rev. J. C. Keener, the Bishop ordained J. B. Bewen and Wm. Wadsworth traveling elders; Newton L. Huff, S. R. Hyde and D. W. Bond, local.

Sabbath night was of memorable blessedness. In the same spacious building the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered to the ministers and members by Revs. Lane, Drake, Campbell, Fly and Jones. These exercises were followed by another becoming them. Mourners were called up, and many presented themselves. Prayer and praise were mingled. It must not be emitted that this gracious meeting was preceded by a sacrifice. Rev. A. G. Miller opened it with excellent judgment and propriety, by taking up the Conference collection for widows and orphans, and preachers deficient in their support. Six hundred dollars were contributed. The table of the poor having been supplied, the Lord's table was spread to the refreshment of his children. Our goodness extendeth not to THEE, Lord, but Thine does to us, when ours is extended to those within reach of it—the excellent of the earth and saints who are thy delight!

The anniversary of the Conference Missionary Society on Saturday night drew a crowd, intelligent and wealthy. Millions of property were represented there. Bishop Early took the platform in person, and plead the cause powerfully. But somehow or other the money did not come; only $700, all told, and one-half of that from the preachers. The collection was not successful. We are not among the advocates of the too common methods of making Annlversary Missionary collections. In the hands of some persons it may succeed in raising money, but nothing else is raised. No missionary spirit, or prayers, or vows. The gift is bare, if not meagre. We never could see any laughable point in the Missionary Cause—any point on which a jest could be rested. It is a serious business. In that light it ought to be held up. On the surface of the congregation there may, indeed, be a cheerful ripple; but underneath, depth and calmness. A collection need not be taken up as though a painful and perilous operation in surgery were about to be performed. The Lord loves a cheerful giver. We suggest, without any personality, for the evil is too general to admit of personalities, that our Missionary Anniversaries would be more profitable and proper, if the nature of the subject were kept more steadily in view.

For the engagements and success of this Conference in the Domestic and Foreign field, we refer with pleasure to the brief and pertinent report of the Conference Missionary Secretary and the Committee. Dr. C. A. Taylor made an address on Monday night. He inspired a general and profound interest in the China mission. The total collection for missions was between six and seven thousand dollars—an advance on last year. Those for the coming year are ordered to be made in April.

At the suggestion of the venerable Thomas Clinton, the Friday before Easter next, commonly called Good Friday, was appointed for general fasting and prayer, for the blessing of God upon His Church; services to be held in the churches.

Rev. H. J. Harris is to preach next Conference sermon. All persons to be examined on the course of Ministerial Study are required to meet the committees at sent Conference the day before session.

A Tract Society, as recommended by late General Conference, was formed: President, H. H. Montgomery; Vice President, H. J. Harris; Secretary, J. A. Light; Treasurer, W. P. Barton.

Managers—H. M. Booth, D. M. Wiggins, L. Wiley, J. G. Jones, A. T. M. Fly, W. B. Hines, of the ministry. E. G. Cock, J. W. Burrass, R. Abbey, S. Johnson, Geo. J. Dix and Ellis, of the laity. Rev. John Lane was elected Vice President of the Parent Tract Society at Nashville, to which this Conference Society is auxiliary.

The Conference took the following action touching the Book depository. We hope the Agents will not suffer themselves to be overruled in carrying out their purpose:

"Resolved, that the Book Agents be requested to establish a Book Depository in the city of New Orleans as soon as practicable, and we pledge our best efforts to sustain it."

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate we have the prospect and pledge of prosperous years of enlargement in the bounds of the Conference. With Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana side by side in its support, the Advocate has a field for operation not surpassed, if it be equalled, by any of the family of Advocates—especially when to these are added such portions of East Texas and South Arkansas and West Florida, as find our point of publication more accessible and suitable to them than any other. These united in its support, contributing to its columns, and planting it in every family, would give a patronage, a literature and circulation in the first rank of periodicals. Nothing less than ten thousand subscribers can be entertained, and that right early. The following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas the late General Conference adopted the New Orleans Christian Advocate as one of the Church papers, therefore

"Resolved, That we will recommend it to our people, and use our efforts to sustain its interests in the Mississippi Conference."

A salient feature of the Conference was the devotional. The preachers declared gratification at seeing a bishop invite up mourners and labor with them! Bishop Early introduced every day's session with an hour prayer-meeting, punctually led by himself. The effects of such an introduction to business may readily be imagined. It softened the heart, chastened and subdued the conflict of opinions, purified the vision, and promoted dispatch as well as good temper. It was no ordinary scene, to be sure, to enter the Conference room at half-past 8 A. M., and find a prayer-meeting in progress, and weeping penitents being pointed to Christ—the Bishop passing among them, talking, encouraging and calling on this and that brother to lead in prayer for "these dear souls." The hour of 9 A. M. arrived, and sometimes encroached upon a little, the prayer meeting was closed, spectators retired, Secretary read his minutes, and business set in.

This spirit ran out. Three times each day preaching was attended. There was a Conference revival. A happy central influence has gone forth. About seventy were added to the Church. The conversions were not a few. Many of the young men of the college shared in these spiritual benefits. A finer order of young men we have not known, than is here. May prophets be raised up from among them. Amen.

Tuesday morning, at half-past 8, the Conference room was a preaching place; Dr. Winans the preacher. The sermon was reckoned, by his old friends, an indication that his bow abides in strength. It fell in with the tone of spirituality, and promoted it. To vigor of thought and distinctness of outline was added a gracious unction. The sermon was asked for publication, and has been conditionally granted. Meantime as we have NOTES, we may do him the injustice and our readers the pleasure of publishing them.

And why should there not be a revival at Conference? Is it not reasonable that the religious element there be prominent? Better be seasons of edification than dissipation.

By a rising and unanimous vote the Conference—

"Resolved, That we tender Bishop Early our thanks for the dispatch, the kind and able manner in which he has conducted the business of this Conference, and that we will rejoice to hail his return among us, whenever in the economy of our Church and Providence of God he may find it convenient to do so.

"W. WINANS,
"G. M. ROGERS."

The Conference adjourned on Wednesday, 4 P. M. The next session to be held in Vicksburg.

Among the superannuated and older members of this Conference, which is a sort of Jerusalem Conference, the mother of us all, are names cherished and honored in and out of the church. Their successors stand ready, and are even now coming forward and being seen and felt—a fine body of young and middle-aged men in the maturity of their powers, zealous, progressive and thoroughly itinerant.

We cannot close without acknowledging the genial hospitality of Prof. J. C. Miller and family, upon whom was devolved, much to their own comfort and happiness, the care of ourself and a large number of other guests.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

SHILOH, LA., Nov. 10, 1854.

MR. EDITOR—The election came off last Monday in our village—"License or No License." The result was a glorious victory by the Temperance party. Ont of the numerous voters of our happy ward not one vote was cast in favor of a "Retail Grog Shop."

On the first Monday in May last we had a similar election, and the temperance party got bent six votes. Since that time we have had a great change for the better, owing in a good degree to the energies of our Lodge of the Knights of Jericho, which have rapidly increased in numbers; both males and females have joined, throwing their influence together in this great ontorprise.

I must mention to you that every member of our church here readily become members of this order of the "Temperance Reform." So, dear editor, you see that the Methodists here are truly methodical.

I will also say that there have been other influences at work for us. Philanthropic men and our Baptist brethren have helped us; and none more in our election than the gentleman who was engaged in retailing in this village, who seeing the dire effects of intemperance, came forward and manfully voted with us for No License. His copartner a few weeks since withdrew from the nefarious traffic, and himself and lady became members of our Lodge of the Knights of Jericho.

My best wishes and prayer for the advancement of the Advocate.

Will you please give this victory a notice in your columns, for the encouragement of the friends of temperance.

Yours in Christ,
MATILDA TABOR.

We suspect the ladies had a hand in it. "Our election"!! When it comes to that, the election is obliged to go right. And truly the mothers, wives, daughters, sisters, WOMEN all, have an interest in these elections that well entitles them to say "our election." The victory is theirs. Let them engage elsewhere, as at Shiloh, to win it.—[Ed.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE MISSIONARY SECRETARY OF THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

The increasing interest felt by the Church for the promotion of a wider diffusion of religious knowledge, and a higher order of religious experience, may be safely regarded as a favorable indication.

The ignorance and infidelity at home create a necessity as deeply felt as the ignorance and idolatry abroad. Both call loudly for a freer hand and a more prayerful heart. Nor are we able to define the point where either should supercede the other. It is certainly the duty of the Church to seize the present moment and pass at once into the doors which the various fortunes of the nations have opened for the introduction of the high prerogatives of civilized and Christian life.

Commerce, national sympathy, ambition and adventure, are thrusting the men of Christian education into contact and association with all the nations of the earth. Along with these should the Church send the Bible and the missionary. Our vast and fruitful territories are inviting the oppressed and the poor of other nations to successful labor and a peaceful home. They come to us retaining something of their national fealty, and a great deal of the bigotry and superstition of the religion of their fathers. We cannot expect them to adopt heartily our country as theirs, or look with approval or tolerance upon a system of religion they were taught to despise as a "damnable heresy."

Something must be done for these. Along with the education and the political elevation they reach, there must be imparted a better knowledge of Christianity and a better spirit of religion. The industry of others should provoke us to labor in good works, that their systems be not grafted upon us, but that ours may displace theirs. We feel no trembling alarm, but we do feel that prompt, vigorous and telling efforts should be made by the Church to substitute the truth of God for the traditions of the fathers, and to hold in check the rationalism, fanaticism and superstition which our political institutions allow and protect.

Another, and a most interesting department of our missionary work, looks to the religious training and teaching of the thousands of slaves which are found within the limits of the Mississippi Conference, and in our division of the Methodist Church. In this work we claim precedence over others.

The colored people generally receive our instructions gratefully, and many of them are soundly converted, live religiously, and die as none but Christians can die. Most of our missionaries are employed in this vast and widening field. The simple earnestness of our system suits their natures, and they are made better and happier.

We employ a single foreign missionary. Since the last meeting of our Conference, by the recommendation of that Conference Brother J. W. Lambuth, accompanied by his intelligent and self-sacrificing wife, sailed for China. Aside from the common solicitude of all who love the Saviour and pray for the salvation of the heathen, we have now an identity with that promising field of labor. One of us is there, and while we and our wives and little ones enjoy the comforts and luxuries of home, our prayers and our solicitude follow our brother and his wife to the far-off land, where the Saviour is claiming the heathen for His inheritance. The Conference, by formal resolution, has pledged itself to the support of this mission, and we feel assured that its pledge will be redeemed.

All of our Domestic missions are represented as prosperous. In some of them gracious revivals have taken place. Not one of them is to be given up; and an increased demand is made for men to occupy this growing field.

The following abstract shows the number and condition of our domestic missions:

Within the limits of the Conference there are in all—

31 missions. 24 are filled by members of the Conference, the others by L. Preachers.
11 of these are wholly or in part to whites
20 exclusively to the negroes.
There are 172 Preaching places.
769 White members.
4535 Colored.
2300 Children are catechised.
18 of these missions are self-sustaining.
7 of them receive aid from the Parent Missionary Society, to the amount of $2100.
6 do not give adequate support to the missionary, nor do they receive any aid from the Missionary Society.

W. H. WATKINS, Secretary.

The special Washington correspondent of the New York Times says:

"The President still suspends the appointment of a successor to Brigham Young. There is undoubtedly a good reason for this. I hazard little in saying that the President has determined to make the issue with the Mormons, to see at once whether they intend to maintain the attitude of defiance to the Federal authority which their present Governor and spiritual leader has assumed for them. Young certainly will not be reappointed, and ought not to be. If his successor is to have a struggle with the people of Utah, it is better that he should go out there armed with all the moral power of the Government possible; and to this end probably he will not be appointed until the Senate is in session to confirm the nomination at once. A rare combination of wisdom, firmness and courage will be indispensable to the successful nominee for this important station."

FROM SICILY—TERRIBLE RAVAGES OF THE CHOLERA, ETC.—By the bark Ithonia, Captain Morton, from Palermo, we have advices from Sicily to Sept. 17.

At Messina, the cholera was making frightful havoc, taking off from eight to eleven hundred per day. On the 15th the report was, that about one-half of the population had been carried off.

The disease extended even to animals—mules, cats and dogs dropping dead in the streets.

All the physicians who had not fallen victims had fled the city.

The Government had issued a proclamation calling for medical volunteers from the neighboring cities, guaranteeing payment to them. There were ten who had gone from Palermo. On the 13th, 1000 soldiers or convicts had been sent from Palermo to Messina to cleanse the streets and bury the dead.

At Naples, August 18, the disease had abated, the deaths amounting to about 300 per day, and on the 23d the deaths daily had decreased to 20 or 25.

At Palermo, 26th, about 350 per day was the number. The whole number of deaths at Palermo was estimated at 12,000, and at Messina 45,000. [New York Times.

MAGAZINES AND QUARTERLIES.

BLACKWOOD, October.—The leading article at least to American readers, is on "Spanish Politics and Cuban Perils." Mr. Soule is charged with complicity in the Madrid revolution and the ultimate accession of Cuba to the United States is given up as only a question of time. Our own news columns of this week present a full and considerably advanced act of this drama.

WESTMINSTER REVIEW, October.—An insipid number, which is unusual.

EDINBURGH REVIEW, October.—The article on "Vestries and Church-rates" overhauls, with the hand of a conservative-reformer, the Establishment. It is one of those for which these Reviews are honorably famous—instructive in its facts, and elevated and cogent in its argument. With the Establishment, it is pretty much as Moore sung of the Irish harp. The only sign of its existence is the noise, from time to time, created by the snapping of some mouldering chord. Plans for reform are discussed in this order: 1st, To consolidate the church rates with the revenue of the State. This would make the taxation less palpable and direct, and so less odious to non-conformists. 2d, Abandon the whole system, without a substitute. 3d, Retain the legal obligation on churchmen and exempt Dissenters. This last is espoused by the writer, and the indications of Parliamentary action and feeling are alluded to, hopefully, for its adoption. An element of voluntaryism would thus be introduced, and a higher order of lay-organization is outlined—more spiritual, less political—the whole fabric conformed to the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

GODEY, December.—Godey does much to inspire art in his readers: witness the elegant lessons on drawing, crotchet work and embroidery. The plate embellishments are very tasteful. Of this, and the monthly just noticed, we feel bound to say, that the tendency of their literature is upward. Solid and scientific papers are found in them. We say this now, and have marked it with pleasure, as a favorable sign of popular taste.

These prompt and excellent republishers, L. Scott & Co., New York, have by dus course of mail enriched our table with the latest and best English periodicals.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEXAS.

The letter following, from one delay and another, is out of date—if such things ever get out of date. It shows the heart and struggles of a Protestant missionary. Such men—aye, and such women too—are more than a match for Jesuits. Our remarks about the money received from the Southern Aid Society were dictated by a distinct and wider policy, and not from a want of sympathy with a suffering brother. We yet adhere to that policy as safe and self-preserving. This example of suffering patience and sacrifice shows that an Apostolic Ministry yet lives. Where is the response from the liberality of Apostolic times? Answer, ye stewards.—[Ed.

DEAR BRO. MCTYEIRE—Yours of the 31st of August came to hand by due course of mail, but for the first time since Conference I was absent from home, though not from my post. I was traveling partly for health, and partly to help myself and the church. I am indebted to mechanics $150 yet. They need the money. I have paid out my own money for the church, and suffered for necessaries; yea, I have paid money for the church which my wife (who is now forty-nine years old) earned both in the school room and at her sewing table; but not without her consent. She is a missionary.

I have written three articles for the New Orleans C. Advocate, and have not heard of the publication of either. I have written to Brothers personally, and I wrote an article and directed it to judge M. of Miss. What more could I do? The Jesuits are at work and around me, and unless I receive help from Heaven or earth, the world or the church, I am doomed to ruin. Strange indeed, if any person would blame me for receiving money from the Southern Aid Society, when it was known that that institution bestowed favors without regard to the subject of slavery, and was charged by abolitionists with being tainted with Southern principles, and courting commercial favor, etc., etc. I could have received money enough if I had left the word SOUTH out of the deed for the church property; or if I would have said what was truth, even then I could have received all needful aid. I have never owned a slave; I never expect to own one; and that avowal publicly would have obtained all the money I needed; but I will not say it as a Northern man. I was born in the State of Georgia, educated in Tennessee and Arkansas; my father owned slaves. I have fought the North all the time, because they are the enemies, and the South the friends to the negroes. Old father Griffin tells a good deal of truth in the matter. I expect to act conscientiously in all things; do all I can; and if I starve to death, I expect to get to Heaven.

But I am well satisfied if the people of Mississippi and Louisiana knew our wants, they would be relieved. I do not at the present know any paper to write to but our own church paper. I am here almost solitary and alone. Last year my presiding Elder visited me once. This year he has come only once; there is no local preacher in reach of me; no other stationed or traveling preacher to reciprocate labors with me. I feel very grateful for the money you sent me. I pray God abundantly to bless the donor.

A few days since one of the P. Elders of this Conference wrote to me and advised me to leave the station for a while and recruit a little. But I replied that I would sell every book, except the Bible, Hymn book and Discipline, and hire myself out to work by the day, before I would leave, unless the Conference or my own P. E. told me to leave. I never ran away but once in my life, and that was from a camp meeting. I thought the preachers were about to preach me to death. Andrew Hunter, of Arkansas, one of the preachers that I run away from. I left in the night.

Well, pardon my useless remarks. By the help of God I will do the best I can. Pray for us, and help us if you can. Five dollars each from one hundred persons would make a very sensible difference in the condition of this mission. For $230 dollars I could put up a room for the preacher to live in, if he was a humble man, and had a humble wife whose hearts were in the work, as Jesus was, when in love with a damsel. My house rents amount to $180 dollars per annum. Please let me hear from you, and occasionally send me a paper.

Pardon the length of my letter.

Yours, in fraternal bonds, and fellow-laborer in Christ. H. S. LARRABEE.

REVIVALS IN COLLEGES.

The Church has a concert of prayer for Revivals in Colleges do not interfere with [illegible] order, government or study. In the [illegible] these are promoted. A few recitations [illegible] be missed—but these are more than compensated for in the conscience of duty that [illegible] future labors and the suppression of vicious habits, among which are idleness [illegible] eye-service.

We hope the good work that begun in Centenary College, during the late session of Conference will be carried on. It is fortunate in special reference to this, that Dr. [illegible] was constrained against his will, to continue awhile longer, in connection with the college. He has a work that would fill an angel's [illegible] and may he, and his associated brethren, be blessed of God in carrying forward the work till scores of students, as well as citizens, are converted.

Prof. Waddel, of the "Mississippi University," writes 31st Oct., to the "Western Christian Advocate," of a Revival there. He says—"The [illegible] inhabitants' declare that no such [illegible] deep and extensive awakening has ever been witnessed in this place. Certain it is that the power of the gospel has never before [illegible] our University in such a glorious manner."

President Longstreet was fully in the work, and other ministers:

"In addition to these ministerial labors, and the aid of many pious laymen, old and young, of all the churches, [illegible] the most delightful of the concomitants of the meeting has been, that all denominational differences seemed forgotten for the time, and all lines of separation melted away—harmonizing in promoting the great work. The venerable Father Brown, of Tenn., also with us, greatly to our edification. The meeting continued for nineteen successive days. We had preaching every night—inquiry meeting in the early part of the day, and a prayer meeting every afternoon. The plan of conducting these meetings was as follows: After sermon, followed by an exhortation, persons concerned on the subject of salvation, were invited to present themselves near the pulpit, for the purpose of obtaining the special prayers and counsels of God's people. When there assembled a number ranging from twenty to thirty, the first offered prayer for them, then the mourners were addressed collectively by some one of the ministers present, who counseled, and encouraged them in their efforts. The instructions have been, for the most part, in the shape of a brief, and very plain comment, on the answer to some one of the questions in our Shorter Catechism, as for example: "What is Prayer?" "Effectual Calling?" "Faith?" "Repentance?" &c. The result has been that, in more than one instance, light has come into the mind during the delivery of these brief addresses. And this result we are warranted to expect, as it is through the Truth that Christ prays his disciples should be sanctified. This company of anxious persons assembled every day at the inquiry meeting, when they were conversed with individually, and prayed with, by the ministers and people of God; in addition to which a prayer meeting was held every afternoon with strict reference to the continuance of holy influences with us. The results were as follows: From first to last, not less than seventy persons have been converted. About fifty have professed to find the Saviour precious. Some have gone back, sad to say, have "grieved the Spirit." Others are serious. On last Sabbath, we received into the communion of the Presbyterian Church twenty-seven, and we had previously received two by examination, and one on certificate; this makes an accession of thirty to the Church, in the space of two weeks. Others have been added also fifteen to the Methodist Church. Others are expected to connect themselves with the various Churches in Oxford very soon. These results are glorious. Of the converts, one is an accomplished and valued Professor, and thirty-two or three are students of the University, and some have been and influential persons of the town, while scores, have become disciples of Jesus. In the University we have now not less than seventy-five professors of religion, out of 140 students, and in our Senior Class, numbering twenty-eight, there are nineteen pious students, for whom twelve or thirteen have the missionary view."

MONTICELLO, LA. — Rev. C. J. Hill writes 11th instant:

"The Lord has been very gracious to us on Monticello Circuit. We have just closed a meeting at Swan Lake. There were about forty conversions, and thirty-five connected themselves with our church. There has been gracious revivals on the part of the Circuit. About one hundred and ten have been received during the year on probation, nearly all of whom continue steadfast.

"Brother Harp has done us good service."

WARSAW, ALA.—I have just closed a protracted meeting at Cookville, of four weeks continuance, during which time I was assisted by Bros. Foster and Masingale, of the [illegible] and Brothers McMoane and Gilbert of Gainesville Circuit, all of whom rendered very efficient service. God was present to bless throughout, and in spite of New-schoolism, and its influence, He graciously revived his work. We are not prepared to say how many conversions there were; some of whom are of the Baptist and Presbyterian persuasions, and will join those churches. The church has been greatly revived and built up; besides we had some forty-one accessions to our church, (29 whites and 12 colored); to God be all the praise. R. Y. REW.

Nov. 14.

GENEVA CIRCUIT, ALA.—The Lord has been with us this year....At Asberry Chapel a protracted meeting commenced on the 18th August, held by some of the local brethren, together with Brother James M. Campbell, (my colleague) which continued eight days; twenty-two joined and many converted. At Claybank there have been two protracted meetings this year, held by Bros. Campbell and Bros. R. C. Gibson. Glorious times. Some 30 or 40 joined and many converted. To God be all the glory. On September 9 a meeting commenced at Pleasant Hill, held by Brother Campbell, R. C. Gibson, and D. J. S. Sappington. The people were wonderfully blessed; seventy were added to the church, and the professor built up and scores converted. A holy atmosphere seemed to pervade the whole place; the people about Pleasant Hill will long remember it. At Coffee camp ground a protracted meeting commenced, held by Brother F. M. Field, myself and others, and truly God was there. We had refreshing seasons from his presence; twenty-four joined and dozens converted; thanks be to God. At Auburn Hill they have had glorious times in the building up of the church and conversion of sinners. Brother Campbell, Brother Skipper, and myself have just closed a protracted meeting at Zion of ten days continuance. God was with us most gloriously; thirty joined and many reclaimed and converted. There have been some 325 net increase in the members of the church this year. In short, a revival influence seems to pervade this whole country. God is making "the wilderness and the solitude to rejoice and blossom as the rose," and God over and every where is blessing.

WM. H. CARTER.

MARION, ALA.—It may not be uninteresting to you to hear that the Lord has been gracious to us in this charge, during the year that is about to close. At this place and Hamburg, which is under my charge, we have had fully thirty-three conversions among the whites, and about the same number among the blacks. The membership of the church is much revived, and I think are daily increasing in spirituality and zeal.

Nov. 16. T. Y. RAMSEY.

"The good work is still going on in are town. Ten joined the Church last night and several converted.

OBITUARY.

DIED—In Clark county, Ala., 6th of September, 1854, MRS. LUCRECIA WOODARD, wife of JESSE J. WOODARD, in the 39th year of her age.

Her parents being Baptist, she was raised under the influence of that faith, and joined that church. After remaining a while she became dissatisfied, and attached herself to the Methodist Church.—a short time after she professed religion, and from that time lived a faithful followor of her Lord. I have often seen her rejoice in the Lord, looking forward with glorious anticipation to that time when she would be released from this troublosome world, and he admitted into the realms of eternal life. She said a short time before she died that she was going to die, and called a servant and told her where she would find her clothes that she wished to be buried in, and said that she was prepared and was not afraid to die.

Sister Woodard was a woman of many amiable traits. Her course through life well deserved imitation, and I hope that her Christian example may be a way mark for her dear children through life. Though she is lost to them, yet she has left them an example, if practiced, will lead them through earth up to glory, where they will find her again. F. G. F.

In Clark county, Alahama, September 8, 1854, JESSE J. WOODARD, in the 46th year of his age.

His father was among the first settlor of Alabama. Brother Woodard when a young man was very wiokod, and has told me that he often derided and made all manner of sport that a man could of religion, but God saw fit in his mercy to stop him in his course, and if I mistako not he was arrested by the Spirit of God under the preaching of Rev. A. S. Dickinson. He soon saw the awful condition that sin had placed him in; he sot out seeking salvation, and never rested until God delivered him from sin. In the M. E. Church he was a faithful member till his death. He loved the people of God, and delighted to talk on the principles of Christianity. His house was always open for the reception of preachers.

God saw propor in his dealiags with them not to seperate them long; they both passed from earth to Heaven in quick succession. It was not known to Brother Woodard that his wife was dead before he died. What joy there must have been when they met each other on the other side of Jordan! F.

MRS. ELIZABETH JANE LINDSEY, departed this life in Drew county, Arkansas, October 31, 1854, in the 42d year of her age. She was the daughter of JACOB and NANCY OAGE, who emigrated to South Alabama when she was in her twelfth year. Soon after her marriage she professed religion, and joined the Methodist E. Church, of which she ever lived an exemplary member. The writer of this visited her in her last affliction, and found her calm and serene in reference to death. As she neared Jordan the manifestations of her acceptance with God grew brighter, and she was enabled, to shout victory over death and the grave. She called her husband, children and friends around her bed, and requested them not to weep for her, but to meet her in Heaven. She embraced her infant, and said she should soon meet with the sainted forms of her little children that had gone before.

In Claiborne, La., October 3, MRS. MARY MCLENDON, in the 54th year of her age. She was a native of Georgia, and the daughter of REV. JOHN COOK. In early life she embraced religion and became a member of the M. E. Church. She was left a widow with the charge of a large family in 1819. She suffered exoruitatingly but with Christian fortitude for some four weeks, when, on the 3d of October, she fell quietly asleep in death. She leaves many afflicted friends, also twelve children to share this sad loss. Sister McLendon was a devoted companion, an affectionate judicious mother, a kind, mistress, a quiet accommodating neighbor, and an exemplary christian, having the esteem of her many friends, but especially endeared to those related to her by christian affinity. On her departure she took leave of her family with impressive solicitations that they should meet her whore there is no more death. They are, with mingled affection and hope, living in expectation to join her company again, on the morning side of the death stream.

A FRIEND.

CONFERENCE AT TALLADEGA.

MR. EDITOR—As there seems to be considerable uncertainty among the members of the Conference in reference to the route to Talladega, allow me to give them some information through your paper.

There will be no reduction of fare by any public conveyance, I believe. The fare from Selma to Montevallo, by R. Road, is $1 75; from thence to Talladega by stage, on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, $5. And there will be a hack at Montevallo on Friday and Monday preceding the Conference, to convey passengers to Talladega, at the same price. So that from Thursday to Tuesday preceding the Conference, conveyance can be had from Montevallo to Talladega, by a limited number of persons.

From Montgomery there is a daily stage, fare $5. The result is, that the great body of the Conference will have to go by private conveyance. From Montgomery the distance is about seventy miles, and there is a plank road most of the way. J. HAMILTON.

Novomber 10.

The Preachers of the Alabama Conference, on their arrival in Talladega, will call at the store of Major J. G. L. Huey, north-east corner of the Square, where they will learn their destination during Conferenos.

General Intelligence.

MOBILE, Nov. 21:—The weather here has been very cold. Two men, named Mordecai Thompson and Adolph Henry, were yesterday frozen to death in a boat while gunning in the bay.

Measures are being adopted in the different towns and cities of the North to break up the schemes of the coal monopolists. The quantity of coal quarried and sent to market from the Pennsylvania and other mines is estimated to exceed that of last year by twenty-five per cent., and yet prices are even higher now than then. Congressional action is recommended as a check to the evil.

Nearly every ship arriving upon our shores from Europe reports having lost passengers by cholera. Among the vessels lately arrived at New York are the ships Coosawette, of Savannah, from Bremen, which lost twenty-three of her passengers, and the Canton, from Antwerp, which lost twenty.

NATIONAL KNOW-NOTHING CONVENTION.—The New York Herald of the 15th says:

We have received an interesting dispatch from Cincinnati—very interesting, if true. It is to the effect that a National Convention of Know-Nothings is to be held in that city at noon to-day, to nominate a candidate for the Presidency, and that the nominee will be either Millard Fillmore, of New York; Sam Houston, of Texas; or Jacob Broom, of Pennsylvania. One of our telegraphic dispatches published yesterday stated that Sam Houston had lately been very busily occupied in organizing lodges or councils throughout Texas; he has already received the nomination for the Presidency from the "Old Guard" of New Hampshire. Millerd Fillmore, it is stated, is a member of the Order in Buffalo, and Daniel Oliman was his candidate for Governor at the recent election in this State. Jacob Broom was the Native candidate for the Presidency in 1852, and received twenty-five hundred Votes. He was elected to Congress in October by the Know-Nothings of the Fourth District of Pennsylvania. Our dispatch says that John M. Clayton is out of the question, so far as the Know-Nothings are concerned, and that twenty-eight States—even California—will be represented.

THE ALABAMA RIVER.—A telegraphic dispatch was received here late Sunday evening from Montgomery, stating that the rivar at that point had fallen three feet in twenty-four hours and was still receding slowly. That would leave only three foot and six inches water in the channel. [Mobile Register.

USURY LAWS.

We learn from late English papers that a bill has been recently reported by a special committee appointed by the House of Parliament, which materially modifies the existing English laws with regard to the hire of money. The particulars of the bill are not given, nor the reasons of the committee for the course they have pursued. It is probable that we shall be compelled to wait some time for this very desirable information, but it is gratifying to know that a calm and considerate body of men—taking a full view of the subject—have concurred in opinions so long entertained by those who had the most direct and immediate interest in their success, but whose views have, until now, been in advance of their time.

We see also that, in our own country, the State of Delaware has taken almost similar and concurrent action upon the subject of usury—materially modifying the existing ordinances and letting down the bars towards their utter abolishment. The question has come up prominently in other States, and is being widely discussed. The foolish and absurd notions which have obtained up to this time are being found untenable and abandoned. It is confidently hoped that ere long our statute books will be rid of all their existing laws as to the use and worth of money, and leave men as free to trade in gold as grain. Why should it not be so?

This usury question has been before our own Legislature once or twice, but failed to pass.

In Louisville, Ky., a few days ago, a couple of foolish fellows having a lot of knotty saw logs, butts of trees, etc., which they could not chop, saw, nor split apart, got them together in a pile, on Thursday evening last, at the corner of Twelfth and Main streets, bored a hole in the largest log, filled it with powder and blew up the whole lot with an explosion which caused the spinters to fly in all directions. One chunk went through a wagon standing on Main street, killing two men who were standing on the sidewalk, one of whom was much bruised and his clothes nearly torn from him. The same splinter also knocked a hole in the door of a house, and another fragment demolished a window on each side of the house.

A gentleman informs the editor of the Norfolk Beacon that soon after a late heavy thunder storm, he went out into the woods, and while examining a tree that had been struck by the lightning, discovered flocks of partridges, ten in number, lying dead at the roots. The breast of each one was bare of feathers, which was the only mark the lightning had left.

A yonng gentleman went to sleep in Baltimore the other night with a lighted cigar in his mouth, and on returning to consciousness found that he had nearly burned up the bed as well as himself.

A musical instrument maker of the Paris Boulevards has lately exhibited in his windows a monster fiddle, which is to be his contribution to the Exhibition of 1855. The strings are young ropes, and the instrument itself measures about eight feet and a half, so that it would be impossible to reach the upper part with his fingers without the aid of a ladder; but to accomplish this in a more artistic manner, a sliding apparatus is fixed, which acts much in the same manner as the tube of a trombone. The tone is fully an octave deeper than that of the double base.

The tunnel bridge on the Baltimore and Susquehanna Railroad burned down a few days ago a few minutes before the express passenger train was due, leaving a gap of sixty feet in width, with a rocky bottom twenty feet below. Among the persons present a boy of twelve years, named Eli Rhem, was the only one who had the forethought to warn the approaching train. He ran back along the road and placed himself upon the track, where he remained and compelled the engineer to stop or run over him. The gratofut passengers, when they saw the frightful fate they had so narrowly escaped, raised a considerable sum of money for the boy, and the Board of Directors presented him with $100.

On the 9th inst. the trial of Capt. James Smith for being engaged in the slave trade was concluded in New York. The penalty is death, and this is said to be the first conviction under the law that has occurred in the United States. The counsel for defense asked for time to move for a bill of exceptions, which was granted.

A correspondent of the London Times has taken offense at a remark of very doubtful significance used by the French Emperor, and comments upon it in the following style:

The words "in spite of timid counsels," which occur in Louis Napoleon's letter of condolence to Madame de St. Arnaud, published in the Moniteur, cannot be passed over as words of slight importance. On the contrary, they are of the highest importance. It is impossible that they can apply to the French, because, if the Emperor had been so dissatisfied with the timidity of his own officers as to have induced to complain publicly of the character of their counsels, he would have given the shorter course of superseding them. Those words must, therefore, apply to the English; for, however great may be the interest of the Turks or the Austrians in the present contest, it was not for either of them to have an influential voice in deciding on the invasion of the Crimea.

We have, then, the opinion of our Imperial ally, officially proclaimed to the whole world, that the counsel of Englishmen, touching the invasion of the Crimea, was tainted with timidity. A graver charge it is difficult to imagine. That the Emperor preferred it otherwise than as the result of his firm conviction, and after careful consideration of its probable effect on all concerned, it is impossible to suppose. In ordering the publication in the Moniteur of these opinions words, the Emperor must have intended either to brand with ignominy the character of one or more of our generals or admirals in the Black Sea, or to point at senile incapacity.

Whichever was his intention, the duty of the Government is clear. They are imperatively bound to guard the honor of our army and navy. They are equally bound to satisfy the nation on whatever affects the national honor. Their first duty is to ascertain the precise meaning and object of the Imperial accusation. Their next either to refute it or to consign the justly accused to merited punishment.

"Last night about 11 o'clock, a terrible riot occurred in Williamsburgh, in which considerable blood was shed. The scene of the riot was on North Sixth street, between Third and Second streets, and the difficulty was entirely between the Americans and Irish. About 10½ o'clock a party of about three hundred Americans came over the Grand street Ferry from New York, and, having formed in column, marched from the ferry up Grand to Fifth street, and thence down Fifth to North Sixth street, the place where the riot occurred on election day. As the procession moved along, they discharged a number of rockets with red lights. On arriving at the place above mentioned, the Americans came suddenly upon a body of Irishmen, when, at the instant, several shots were exchanged between the two parties. The fight now became general, and the firing, which continually kept up, drew thousands more to the spot. Muskets, revolvers, clubs and other weapons, were freely used—the Irish being armed with muskets and clubs, and the Americans with revolvers. After half an hour's hard fighting, the Irish were driven away—many retreating to the houses in the neighborhood, where they quietly remained. Several Irish were shot and otherwise badly injured. Only one American was seriously injured. Upon the retreat of the Irish, the Americans again formed in procession, and marched down Second to Grand street, where they fired into the air the remaining charges in their revolvers. They then quietly dispersed. No arrests were made.

"As the Americans, in the offset, were proceeding down Fifth street, they were met at the corner of Grand street by Mayor Wall, who stopped them, and then read the Riot Act; after which he made a brief address, warning them to keep away—that they would regret it the longest day they lived, etc.

"The Mayor's speech was received with hisses and groans. After he had finished, the mob again took up their march, and on Fifth street fired several shots into the dwelling-house of Alderman Linsky, but fortunately the occupants escaped injury."

The Journal du Havre says: "Last evening the piers were crowded by spectators to witness the curious pyrotechnical experiments made by M. Guerard, the artificer of the port. At 9 o'clock, from a boat at a short distance from the wharves, he let off several brilliant fireworks, which, after vivid illumination, sunk beneath the surface of the water and, for a moment disappeared; and as instantly emerging from the deep, they flamed as brilliantly as ever. Whether this invention of M. Guerard can be advantageously applied in maritime combats, we have yet to learn; but it was a beautiful spectacle to see these lights bursting from the waves and shedding their rays in every direction."

Paris thieves must be cute customers. A thief entered one of the fashionable ready made linen shops in Paris, and asked to see sundry articles for his wife, for whom, he said, he was preparing a pleasant surprise. "But," said he to the attending damsel, "I wish to be sure of a correct fit. My wife is about your height; she has, like you, a fine figure and the carriage of a queen. Will you be so obliging, since my wife is just about your size, or very near it, to try on this chemise over your dress?" She complied, and the thief, pretending to draw it down, attached it, by means of a large carpet pin, to all her clothes. He then ordered a dozen like it at five francs each. The shop girl, well satisfied, attempted to take off the chemise, but finding that, as she raised it, her clothes came up with it, she ran into an adjoinina room, when the thief made off with all he could lay his hands upon.

SHIPWRECK AND GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.—In the New York Herald of the 14th we find the following particulars of the loss of the emigrant ship New Era on the Jersey shore, involving great destruction of human life, the news of which was received here some days ago by telegraph:

The New Era was built by Messrs Hitchcock & Co., of Bath, Me., during the present year. She was of thirteen hundred and twenty-eight tons burthen, and was valued at seventy-one thousand dollars.

About the 22d of September last she sailed from the port of Bremen, under the command of Capt. Henry on her first voyage, for the port of New York, having a heavy incumbrance of freight in Bath, Me., and Boston, with charges amounting to nearly six thousand dollars, secured in Wall street in this city.

She was consigned to Messrs. Charles G. Bunnan & Co., of 52 South street.

The emigrants were all Germans.

After a somewhat tedious passage the New Era came fully in sight of land about midday of Sunday, the 12th inst., and continuing her course in a dense fog, she ran ashore between Deal and Long Branch during the same night.

At an early hour yesterday morning she was perceived lying with broadside to shore, with a very heavy sea on which was breaking over her and washing her decks.

At 12 o'clock noon there were perceptible signs of her breaking up.

From the moment she was seen every effort was made by the people on shore to save the passengers. Early in the afternoon they had succeeded in passing lines to the ship, and in a short time after Capt Henry with twenty of his passengers were landed in safety.

From them it was learned that before they left the vessel over one hundred and fifty of the remaining passengers were dead, having been either smothered between decks, drowned by the flow of water, (which was continually surging over them,) or been swept overboard.

Renewed exertions were made from the beach to save the balance of the people on board, but up to the moment of our last accounts, they were attended with very little success.

As the emigrants on board were all Germans, it is most likely that we shall never be able to find out the list of the names of the people who have been suddenly lost; and this fatal shipwreck will, in all probability, have to be classed among the sorrowful reminiscences attending the loss of the Powhatan, on the same shore, when not even one human being was left to tell the sad tale of the calamity.

The New Era is aground on the Jersey shore, between Deal and Long Branch, about fifteen miles below Sandy Hook, and nearly thirty miles from New York. The beach is sandy, black, and at this season of the year very dangerous. Shrewsbury Inlet is on one side of the vessel and Shark Inlet and the rugged beach of Squan on the other.

Nothing could be seen on the wreck, holding their little ones with one hand, while the other, bleached by the spray, clung with a death grip to the railings, some with no garments except their night clothes. The heavy waves were continually washing men, women and children into the surf.

It will be remembered that a later telegraphic dispatch to this city stated that the number of lives lost amounted to 250.

MORE INDIAN MURDERS.—The St. Louis Republican of the 12th publishes the following letter:

CAMP ON THE BANKS OF THE PLATTE RIVER,
October 23, 1854.

"MR. EDITOR: I seat myself to inform you of another massacre, which occurred night before last. Our party, composed of eight, camped, on the evening of the 21st instant, at an old camping place of the emigrants, about two hundred miles above Fort Kearny, South side of Platte. During the day of the 21st instant three Indians came to the camp and seemed anxious to trade, but were informed by a young man by the name of Wolfe that it was not our object to trade at that time, but he would give them some tobacco, which he did; they then left and seemed contented.

We were congratulating ourselves on the success of this plan of making the Indians leave without giving them something more valuable, or having trouble with them.

We seated ourselves to partake of our evening repast, and considered ourselves perfectly at home; laughing and joking was the order of the night. But

"Mirth's joy and joyous hours
Bloom but to fade."

For while we were seated the crack of a rifle soon changed our joy into sadness. The report of that rifle told too true a tale, for by my side fell as fine and as promising a young man as ever walked this earth. We grabbed our rifles, and soon reached the wagon; we there had time to ascertain the strength of our enemy; fifteen composed their company. Half naked, half starved, and well-armed, they seemed ready for any kind of hellish work. I ordered every man to pick his man, and when I gave the word every rifle told, for seven fell to the ground; the rest retired for a time in the woods. We thought that they had left, but Wolfe said that he would go and see; so he went slowly and cautiously towards them; hardly had he advanced twenty paces when eight of them ran towards him. We fired and killed or wounded two, but in turn they killed three of ours, and wounded Mr Wolfe in the ankle. We ran towards them, and they ran towards the woods. What the extreme pleasure of seeing them land on the other side of the Platte, but not without many a ball passing near their heels or bodies We then returned to camp. The excitement soon subsided on our arrival there, for now came the melancholy duty of burying the dead. I cannot, Mr. Editor, say any more about this, for my feelings will not let me. I am an old man, and have seen many a hard time, but none ever tried me so much as this. I will give you the names of our company:

Elijah Wolfe, New York, wounded.
Harvey Wickoff, New York.
Benjamin Woods, St. Louis.
Saul Mantel, St. Louis.
Silas Nodway, killed.
Hiram Woodruff killed.
Henry Law, New York, killed.

Mr. Wolfe being the youngest in the company, it behooves me to speak of his actions. During the hour of danger he exhibited a rare example of fortitude and heroism. Respectfully yours, SAUL MANTEL.

The new gun, of which Austrian military men are so proud, only differs from the common musket in the fact that six very superficial grooves are cut down the inner surface of the barrel. The surfaces of the lower part of the bullet, which is very soft lead, is deeply notched, and the action of the ramrod naturally forces the projecting edges of the bullet into the grooves. The barrels are furnished at the breech with what is technically called a "thorn." This thorn, or tige, is a round solid piece of iron, projecting nearly an inch and a half into the inner and lower part of the barrel. Round the thorn, that is, between the thorn and the inner surface of the barrel, there is naturally an empty space, and into this the charge of powder falls. When the imleted or ortimpled bullet is rammed down, it completely fills the lower part of the grooves, but can descend no further than the point or top of the thorn; "and the consequence is, that the powder, being subjected to no pressure, every grain of it ignites at one and the same time, and propels the ball with prodigious force."

"The Lunatic Committee have got back, ma'am," said the Alderman to Mrs. Partington, touching his hat politely.

She looked him in the eye intently for several minutes, as if she were transforming the glasses of her specs into a pair of scales in which to weigh his brain. "I was astonished when I heard you had gone," said she, smiling, and handling him her box, "for you were the last ones I should have thought of going off under an operation of mind."

She meant aberration, and every body knew what she meant, but the mistake was hardly worth correcting. His Honor, the Mayor, inquiring after her health, changed the conversation, and a few moments' attention was given to the discussion of the theory of administering saffron tea in cutaneous diseases. A PATRIARCH LOCATED.—A clergyman, once preaching a sermon on some particular patriarch, was exceedingly high in his panegyric, and spoke of him as far excelling every saint in the calendar. He took a view of the celestial hierarchy, but in vain; he could not assign to his saint a place worthy so many virtues as he possessed; every sentence ended thus: "Where, then, can, we place this great patriarch?"

One of the congregation, tired at last of the repetition, exclaimed: "As I am going away, you may put him in my pew."

SERPENT FASCINATION.—A few weeks since a little boy, who was known to be frequently absent from school, was noticed in the neighborhood of Privat by a shepherd in the employ of —— Mertinean, Esq., to be very busily engaged in the road. He approached nearer, and was surprised to see him feeding two adders! The boy having crumbled the bread in his satchel, spread it out in his pinaforo, and the addere came and ate the food from his lap, picking up the crumbs with great dexterity. After feeding them he lay on the ground and played with them, all three seeming to enjoy the sport. But, if the little urchin rejoiced in their companay, the shepherd did not, for with much difficulty he killed the adders, to the great distress of their little playmate, who wept bitterly at their destruction. A SOLDIER'S RECEIPT FOR PROCURING SLEEP.—Have all the excitement of landing on an enemy's shore, mixed with as many haversacks, clouks, cold pork, pistols, telescopes, hatchets, etc., as you can carry, and a hearskin cap and epeulets on top of all. Lie down with your conscience at ease, from a sense of doing your duty, and put the caps of your coat bang all over your head, so that you can't feel the rain or dew fall, or be dazzled by the moon or stars, and then commend yourself to God. If you don't sleep then, there must be something wrong in the inside.

A lady wished a seat. A portly, handsome gentleman brought one and seated the lady.

"Oh, you're a jewel," said she.

"Oh, no," replied he, "I am a jeweler; I have just set the jewel!"

Quick Passage of the Northern Light from San Juan to New York.

The Accessory Transit Company's steamer Northern Light arrived at New York on the 14th, in 6 days and 19 hours from San Juan, connecting with the Sierra Nevada, and reducing the time of transit between San Francisco and New York to 20 days and 18 hours, much the shortest passage hitherto made between the two cities.

The trial of Col. Wm. Walker, Ex-President of Lower California and Sonora, which was progressing at the date of our last advices, had resulted in his full acquittal. The valiant Colonel assisted ably in conducting the defense. A San Francisco paper says:

Little interest was felt in the subject; the jury saw the accused deprived, by judgment of the Court, of the attendance of a witness, Mr Dillon, Consul of France, upon whose testimony he relied for some of the most important elements of his defense; and the murder of the Rosecrantz-Hamilton band wrought a marked and decided change in the public feeling on the subject of the invasion of Mexico. So great is the abhorrence in the breasts of the people of that detestable brutality and blood thirstiness to which Count De Raimusel fell a victim, that in an armed expedition were to leave our wharves to-morrow for the invasion of Sonora, there is not power enough in the Federal authorities to prevent it. Any such attempt would be overwhelmed and crushed by an overwhelming public sentiment. Even if Mr Walker had been positively proved to have harbored, before his departure, the intention to invade Lower California, the people would not now regard it as a crime—so deep is their disgust and loathing of the wretched crew who rule the destinies of unfortunate Mexico. All these causes combined together perhaps, with the insufficiency of the testimony, have contributed to the acquittal of Mr. Walker.

The efforts to recover the specie from the Yankee Blade were as yet unsuccessful. Soundings have been placed over the spot where she went down, a few spars only indicating it otherwise.

The body of a man apparently about forty years of age, had been washed ashore, badly cut about the head, and the pockets of his clothing rifled and turned inside out. Showing us they thought that he had been murdered on board the steamer by some of the human gang of whose horrible work much has been said.

From a letter dated Monterey, October 20, and published in the Alta California, we extract the following account of a horrible tragedy near that place:

The citizens of our quiet little town were taken by surprise this morning on hearing that a whole family had been brutally murdered last night by a band of robbers, consisting of Mexicans and Americans, seven in number, at a house kept by a colored man named James Anthony, or, as he was commonly known here, Anton, at the pass at Salinas River, twelve miles from Monterey.

It appears that these men, all armed, called at Anton's for the undoubtle purpose of buying some cigars and something to eat, when they knocked down and nearly killed Anton, and then commenced to rob and pillage the house of every thing that was valuable; but their principal object was money, of which they obtained about two thousand dollars. They then brutally murdered the father, wife and child of the landlord, and a Frenchman, after which they set fire to the house, and burned it to the ground to conceal their horrid crime.

During the robbing and murdering the lights were extinguished, by which means Anton managed to escape from the house, and conceal himself in the bushes till morning, when he gave the alarm to the neighbors.

He came to this morning and related the circumstances, when the sheriff and a dozen men started in pursuit of the murderers. If they be caught, it is very probable they will not have a trial by jury, but be hung on the nearest tree.

The Sacramento Union says that a miner, named Meech, recently found a solid lump of gold in Winter's Ravine, which weighed sixteen pounds. It was pure, and discovered but a few feet below the surface.

FROM SONORA.

COUNT BOULBON'S FATE.—Dispatches dates are to Sept. 1. It is now alleged that the French under Count Boulbon were provoked to an outbreak by insults and outrages heaped upon them in the streets by reckless Sonorainas.

The Death Scene.—He was shot at sunrise on the beach, at a distance from the quarters where the French were confined. He stood erect with his arms folded, and when the word "Present" was given, he locked his hands behind his back—raised his head even higher, and the instant after the discharge fell dead. He received four balls. A platoon of four men were detached to shoot him. Our report states that the first platoon was so deeply affected by his heroic conduct, that they refused to shoot him, and that another platoon had to be sent out by the Governor. It is said that a medallion that he wore upon his breast was struck by a ball, and the party formed into his breast.

On the 16th of July, three days after the fight at Guaymas, Major Roman, the American consul, chartered a boat and sent the details of the engagement by express by way of the Gulf, the Rio Colorado, and the Desert, to Major-General Wood and to the San Francisco Herald. It is needless to say that the express failed, and it is to be feared that the four persons who left Guaymas in the boat have perished. Doctor Dill, for some time a resident of Guaymas, and Mr. Chamberlain, were of the party. The names of the others have not reached us.

FROM OREGON.

The Indians are not to be whipped for their atrocious murders yet. There were reports, however, that Captain Olney's volunteers had reached the scene of the recent Indian massacre and had a battle with the Indians, killing five and taking as many more prisoners, among whom was a pretended chief, who professes to be able to restore stolen property, and to otherwise assist the whites—probably with a view to save his own life. Among the booty recovered from the Indians was some money and a silver cup known to have belonged to the Company massacred. There are two reports as to the future operations of the volunteers; one is that they are pushing on to attack a large body whose retreat they have discovered by the aid of Indian spies.

Mr. H. C Carndner, who reached Fort Boise, of the Hudson Bay Company, shortly after the massacre of Ward's train, writes:

"I saw at Fort Hoise, and within about twenty miles of that place, about one thousand Indians; most of them appeared well armed, and some of them well mounted. At the fort there were about fifty Nesperces, and some Snakes. The former were selling their guns and ammunition to the Snakes, and receiving in exchange American clothing and money. Mr Pearson, who keeps the ferry at the fort, told me that the Hudson Bay men at the fort had been selling ammunition to the Snakes after they knew of the massacre, and expressed to me that it was an outrage, and ought to be stopped. Both Snakes and Nesperces were having access to the fort in the same manner as though no murders had been committed."

Another correspondent remonstrated with the Hudson Bay authorities at Fort Boise, against the selling any more ammunition and guns to the Indians, when they showed evident signs of hostility to the immigrants. The reply of Mr. Ogden, the chief factor, was, "that it constituted part of their regular business; that he had authority to sell from the Governor of the Company, and that he should continue to do so till he had orders to stop from the Governor of Vancouver." At this reply our men were very indignant.

THE LOSS OF THE NEW ERA.

The New York Times of the 16th contains full particulars of the disastrous wreck of the emigrant ship New Era, on Deal Beach, New Jersey. She sailed from Bremen on the 28th of September, with 424 passengers, the majority of whom were Germans. During the passage she lost forty by cholera, and two hundred and thirty perished by the ship wreck, leaving but one hundred and fifty-five survivors. The Times thus describes the appearance of the wreck, and some of the terrible scenes attending the disaster:

About two hundred yards from the shore, the vessel was lying starboard side towards the beach, and embedded in the sand to the depth of twenty-five feet. The vessel was careening slightly to the inboard, and her bows were slightly elevated. Her mizzen top gallant mast was broken off at the crosstrees. The topmasts were set, and as the vessel appeared from the beach, her rigging did not seem to be much injured. The tide was at full flood, and the starboard side was even with the deck, and on the starboard about two feet below. The sea was not running heavily at the time, but sufficiently so as to break over the vessel's deck between the timbers of the starboard bulwarks, the planks of which had been torn away by the force of the waves. Occasionally, the waves would wash over the poop deck. About midway up the main starboard shrouds, could be seen the form of a female in the embrace of death, her chilled limbs hanging through the ratlines. From behind the main chains could be seen protruding the bare head and shoulders of another ghastly corpse, and behind the mizzen chains and partly concealed by a sail which was lying over the side, could be discerned the bodies of two or three others of the unfortunates.

Capt. Davis, commander of the Government schooner which was anchored out a distance of 400 yards from the vessel, went out in a surf boat to the vessel, and by this means the destruction of property, and the loss of life was brought to a speedy termination. On reaching the vessel, and ascending the starboard quarter, a horrible scene was presented to view. In an intervening space of about two feet between the starboard bulwark and the poop were the bodies of over a dozen deceased passengers, old and young, men and women, youths and maidens and children, lying in the greatest disorder, stripped almost entirely by the waves of the little raiment in which they had been able to reach the deck after the vessel had struck, and the waves had commenced to dash in upon them. The sea beating over the poop deck on which our reporter was standing, induced him to ascend a short distance up the shrouds.

Here the peculiar cause of the confused positions of the remaining bodies became evident. The passengers had ascended the shrouds, as has been previously stated, to escape the violence of the waves. Here they remained until chilled or exhausted, and unable longer to sustain themselves in the place they had retreated to for safety (they felt between the ratlines (many of which are now broken,) to the poop deck, in some instances inflicting frightful bruises, and, peradventure, causing death. Here, it not previously, the work of death was completed.

The bodies washed towards the starboard quarter being stopped, in some instances, by the mizzen shrouds, fell between the bulwarks and the poop, in the manner already described. Capt. Davis succeeded in disengaging the body of the female entangled in the main shrouds, which we spoke of as being visible from the beach. It was placed in the stern of the boat and conveyed to the shore. It was the body of a young girl of about seventeen years, with fair and dishevelled locks. On one finger was a ring with the initials D. L. L. engraved upon it. None among the survivors at Mr. Allen's house could identify the body from this description. On the undergarments of one of the other bodies were the initials W. K., and on those of another were the letters C. R. The hatchways, in one of two instances that our reporters noticed, were uncovered, and the water was up to a level with the surface of the sea in the cabin.

From the Albany Register.

Who is the Confidence Man!

We better we took a ride with him the other night; it was dark as Erebus. It wanted five minutes to the moment for the Lightning Express to leave the station; the last trunks were being checked. The laggards were scratching for seats in the crowded coaches. A few were hanging up hats, valises, canes, etc. Some were disposing themselves as best they could for a snooze. Others were quietly reading newspapers, letters and books. A number of "mossers darlings" and "ladder's pets" were carping as if they were darlings and pets "got up" purposely to scream and nothing else.

Outside a storm had set up a dismal howl and roar, and the rain fell in torrents.

But the passengers by rail heeded not the warring of the elements. They were dry, warm and comfortable—they had paid their fare, and adorned their hats with their tickets.

All is ready. The time is up. A warning bell jingles in the office. The conductor cries "all aboard!" and we jump upon the engine with the driver and the stoker bent on a ride with them! The conductor's lamp swings as the little bell tinkles again. "Toot! Toot!" whoops the whistle. The driver moves the lever. Our iron steed, well broken and obedient to the slightest wish of its master, moves slowly, steadily, but with prodigious power, and the long train, with its five hundred beating hearts and its dimly twinkling lights gibbers out of the station, and is off on its journey at—pace. Quicker quicker, and quicker yet, revolve the great driving wheels and speed is created on space.

Where! Before we can compose ourself, or think or get used to this sort of journeying, the stormy night air is filled for miles around with the impetuous roar of the rushing train.

We hold our breath, and clutch convulsively the iron railings of our standing place, and just begin to shape the idea that we should much prefer a seat in one of the coaches, or a firm footing on the surface of mamma Earth.

Good gracious, how we fly on!

Not quick enough yet! Damn the stoker feeds the greedy furnace. Just as calmly the driver turns on the irresistible steam.

We tremble from head to foot. The engine seems to be mad—hastinet with motion—determined to run away! The night is black with darkness. The rain dashes in our face, and there is a tempest of wind to baffle. We cannot see a rod ahead. We hear the train flying over bridges around curves, through deep cuttings and close tunnels and we wonder, as the engine leaps forward like a wild steed on his mettle, and stung with fury—we wonder if all the people in the long train of coaches behind us are sitting quietly in their seats, chatting, dreaming and reading, just as they did when we were among them an hour before.

Just as terror and superstition begin actually to gain the mastery over our quivering nerves, and we begin to think it would be all right to throw the stoker into the furnace, breathe the eternal air, and turn on full head of steam and jump overboard with a wild yell, a little string is pulled, the whistle screeches shrilly its piping alarm, the steam is partly shut off, the speed begins to slacken apace, the brakes are clasped on smartly, and in a minute or two we glide quietly into a station where people are standing about, and stop!—stop just as if nothing extraordinary had happened.

"How did you enjoy your ride, sir?" asks the engine driver.

"Good night, sir," we reply

SPIRITUAL INTERVIEW WITH THE ARCTIC'S LOST.

JUDGE EDMONDS'S LETTER.—The following is the letter of Judge Edmonds referred to last week in the notice we made of Dr. Harris's sermon. We have no doubt it will be read with pleasure; and we hope with thought and attention, as there are some points that may seem new to the spiritual reader. While we are as yet in the infancy of intelligible, and very imperfectly understand its philosophy, it behooves all to be thoughtful and cautious in reading, that full justice may be done to all—the Spirit, the medium and the thought communicated. We have much yet to learn and unlearn:

New York, Oct. 21, 1854.

Dear Sir: Perhaps in your discourse on the wreck of the Arctic you would be willing to have a more minute detail of the events to which I mentioned the other day, and I will, therefore, try to give it to you.

For several days before we received the news of the accident, an attempt was made to communicate the event to my daughter, as she had been a year ago taught the wreck of the San Francisco. But it failed, because of her anxiety about a relative of hers who was at sea, and with whom she associated the wreck the moment the idea was presented to her. Thus were produced confusion and anxiety, which interfered with the clearness of the communication though the idea of a wreck was frequently and vividly presented to her.

On the day before the arrival of the news, she had a call from a lady friend who, in the course of her visit, became entranced and gave a graphic description of some of the scenes which we afterward learned took place on board the ill-fated steamer. But the communication was interrupted, and thus only an indefinite apprehension of some impending misfortune was produced.

On the day after we received news of the wreck, I returned home from my office late in the afternoon, and found my friend Mr. J—— in my parlor with my daughter. Some spirit was communicating through him. I gave my attention to it, and then for about two hours through him, through Laura, through Mr A——, who came in during the evening, and through myself, we had the intercourse with the passengers of the Arctic which I mentioned to you.

I imbibed the idea that there were present with me at least a hundred of them, though only a few made themselves known to us, or spoke to us.

N. B. Hunt, late District Attorney, Bishop Wainwright, Isaac T. Hopper, Dr. Cory, and others of our spirit friends, were also present, and occasionally spoke through, or to some of us.

I plainly saw the whole assemblage, and particularly one of them with whom I had been well acquainted. He was laboring under great mental excitement. He exclaimed to me: "Good God! Edmonds; can this be true? is death, after all, what you said it was; and is this death? Can it be possible that is the change which death makes?"

I answered: "You see. You can judge for yourself. Bring your own clear intellect in bear upon it, and you can understand it."

"But," he said, "where am I? What must I do? Where am I going? Is this to be always so?"

I told him: "No, by no means; it to be always so; but it will be difficult for me to tell you what to do; for I can know all the circumstances which surround you. But there is one close at hand who can tell you, and who can assist you."

"Who is that?" he asked.

I answered: "Our old friend, Hunt."

He said: "Nat! Is he here? Where? Let me see him. Let me hear from him where I am, and what I am to do."

This conversation had thus far been between me and that Spirit direct, and now Mr. Hunt came through my daughter and said: "Judge, tell him I am near at hand, ready to assist him, and he has only earnestly to wish it, to see and hear me himself. Now, his mind is in such uncertainty and confusion that neither his brother nor I can make ourselves visible to him."

This being said to me in an audible voice, was heard also by the Spirit, who no longer paid any attention to me, but turned to where Hunt was, and soon engaged in conversation with him.

Others of those spirits then spoke to me. One said to me, that his last thought on going down with the ship was, that in a few moments he should be reunited again to his wife and children, who went down with him, but he said, and this so much astonished him: "When I awoke, I beheld my wife and children passing away from me in different directions, and I am left alone so near the earth! Is this to be always so? Am I never to see them, never to hear them again? And am I always to hover thus near the earth?"

Another, whom I had well known, said to me with a good deal of emotion: "Friend Edmonds, is it true, then, this which I always thought an illusion of thy lesser mind? It truly seems so. I know I have died; but now I seem as much upon earth as ever, and I talk to thee as plainly as ever I did. Oh! tell me what all this means; and what am I to do?"

I referred him to Father Hopper, who was present, and who could instruct him better than I could. He shrunk from this, and reminded me that he and Mr. H. had not agreed very well upon earth, having had some difficulties with each other "in meeting"—that is, in their religious society.

Mr. Hopper then spoke to me through Laura, and bade me reassure him that no unpleasant recollections of the past dwelt upon his mind; that he was ready to help him; and he added: "Tell him, Judge, that I will be just as quick, now, to take him in as he was once to turn me out of meeting. Tell him so, Judge, will you?"

In reply, I said: "I need not repeat it, for he hears what you say through the medium. Did your allusion to the past difficulties disturb him?"

"Tell him," he answered, "never mind that; it is only matter to be laughed at now, and I desire only to befriend him, and set his mind at ease."

"Yes," I said, "old friend, that you have already done, for he holds out his hand to you." And the two passed away together from my view.

One of the sailors spoke to me, and, though not a man of as much education as the others, he was evidently more at home and more at ease than they were. He said that after the collision he had not thought of himself until the raft shoved off from the ship. He had been very busy trying to stop the leak; and when all work on that ceased, it had occurred to him that he ought to save himself; that he had an aged mother, a wife and some children in New York, and he asked himself: "What will they do this winter without me?" And so he jumped from the ship to reach the raft; but he fell short, and sunk in the water. He came up under the raft, and his head bumped against it until he was drowned.

There was much less agitation in him than in the others, and I obtained from him a clear account of several things. He spoke in great admiration of efforts on board the ship of the one who first spoke to us; said he took a command, and directed much that was done. He was cool, collected and energetic, and made himself felt and obeyed wherever he went.

He also spoke of the general deportment when all hope of saving themselves was abandoned. He said the sight was really sublime. A death-like stillness reigned, and a calm came over them all, as if each was quietly bracing himself to meet his destiny.

I asked him how it happened that they—so many of them—came to us; and if he had not yet met any of the inhabitants of the spirit world besides those who had entered the ship with him?

He answered yes; his father and two other relatives had come to him and welcomed him, and then told him to go with the others, and learn what he could. He could not give me his name, or the street where he resided. There was no medium present through whom the abstract idea of a name could be given.

Among those who spoke to me was a female. She was very cheerful and pleasant, and from what she said it was manifest that her thoughts in life had been more for others than for herself. She understood more clearly the condition in which she found herself, and had come with the others more to aid them than herself.

Bishop Wainwright, through Mr. J——, uttered a most touching and impressive prayer.

And, finally, there spoke to me the spirit of a man, who said that he was a European, whose name was unknown to me, but mine was not unknown to him. He had already given some attention to the spiritual philosophy, and had found in it much that was consonant with his reason, with his instincts, and with what he had learned of nature (and that was not a little, for he was evidently an educated man.

He had been on his way to this country on business, and intended while here to dwell on me. He said that his better had been of vast service to him, for it had not only robbed death of his terrors, but it had enabled him, on entering his new existence, to understand his position, and to know where he was. He had not, therefore, shared the amazement, excitement and confusion of mind which had so much disturbed others.

When that large number of persons had awakened to consciousness in the spirit world, and were amazed at the condition in which they found themselves, a voice had spoken to them, saying: "The gates of Death have been opened to you. Now let the gates of Eternal Life be likewise opened to ye. Go ye to earth again, and learn there how to enter them:" They had, accordingly, come to earth, and scattering in various directions, had sought the medium on this continent. Hence it was that so large a number were now with me.

He said that I could form no just conception of the condition in which they found themselves. No two were alike. To some, blank amusement stupified; in some, terror and uncertainty clothed the form of the excitement of insanity; in some, there was a stolid, hardened indifference; in some, a happy confidence as to the future, without knowing why; and in a few there was a knowledge, imbibed on earth, which inspired hope and confidence. They were the most cheerful and hoping who, on earth, had been least selfish, and most active in their efforts for others.

They were, he said, surrounded by bright spirits, who were willing to aid them; but having been cut off from mortal life suddenly, and without the weaning from earthly ties which old age or protracted disease always produce, their earthly feelings were still predominant with many; and, in connection with the excitement, confusion and uncertainty prevailing in their minds, rendered them insensible to the approach of those brighter spirits. "Why," he added, "we do not all even see each other, though hovering thus together around you. We have, as it were, a dim consciousness of each other's presence, and through the instrumentality of the mediums we hear and converse with you and with each other. For this purpose it is that we are conducted here by our spirit guides, that they may inform our true condition, and through mortal means remove the errors which our mortal life has instilled into us. Speak, then, Judge, to them. You they all can hear, and from your lips they may thus easily learn the lesson of the realities before them, which, sooner or later, they must all learn. Speak plainly, but gently, for oh! you know not how much of sorrow and anxiety there is in the hearts that you can thus relieve."

I accordingly for a few minutes spoke to them. I reasoned with them on the ground of the general doctrine of progression which is now being revealed to man. I reminded them that from birth their life had been one of progression, and now they could readily perceive that his still continued, and with it must continue the influence of that law of progression. It was of importance to them to know this, for then, and then only, could they know how to direct their action wisely and well. And fortunately for them, they were now in a condition where they could ascertain, if they would, how true or false this teaching was.

So, too, if they become satisfied of that, they could readily learn the law by which that progression could be most advanced or retarded. That law was love—love of God and of one another—to be manifested, not in profession only, but in active efforts to do good to one another. That could be done in the spirit life as well, and even better, than in their mortal existence.

So, too, I told them that they were surrounded by bright and beautiful spirits who were ready to take them to their arms, to teach them the holy truths which are now also being revealed to man upon earth, and to point them the way to happier realms, which they may in time attain. And I assured them that they had but to make themselves accessible to their spirit friends by earnestly desiring their presence and aid, to enjoy the inestimable assistance which could soon dispel the gloom of doubt and uncertainty, and open to their vision a bright and holy light from above.

I told them that I did not ask them to receive these things as true because I said so; but to examine them for themselves with all the advantages which they now possessed, and to judge for themselves. It could do them no harm thus to investigate; but if, on investigation, they should find that I was correct, they would also find much that would be of inestimable value to them.

Something more to the same effect I said, and recommending them in few words to the protection of our Heavenly Father, and the guardian care of the bright spirits who were around them, I closed the interview, and they faded from my view. Affectionately, yours,

Rev. T. L. Harris. J. W. EDMONDS.

EXPULSION OF MR. SOULE FROM FRANCE.

Louisa, Friday, Oct. 27.—The steamer of to-morrow will carry the startling intelligence that His Excellency the Minister of the United States of America at the Court of Madrid has been expelled from France, through which country he was returning to his post. The simple ostensible ot such an event is, I think, the best manner of letting you know the extent of the indignation felt here by every American, without distinction of party, and to be felt, no doubt, by all the citizens of our intentionally insulted Republic; so I give you the following details:

Mr. Soule, having spent two days in London, set out last Tuesday for Madrid via France. On his arrival at Calais, he was asked to show his passports, and having done so, was requested to step into an inner room of the bureau de l'Olice. Here he was told that he must leave the country by the next steamer and that he would not be allowed in the mean while to go any where out of Calais, being in fact, placed under surveillance.

"There must be a mistake, sir," said our Minister; "do you know who I am?"

"There is not the slightest mistake, sir," was the reply; "you are Mr. Soule, the Embassador of the United States of America to the Court of Spain, and I have orders not to let you pass."

"Where are your orders, sir?" asked Mr. Soule.

"This is no business of yours, sir; these orders are for me, and I am acting upon them," said the Commissary.

This happened at Calais. Something more was said, but of no public concern. Mr. Soule left by the next steamer, and reached London late in the evening day before yesterday. The news being made known in American circles, the greatest excitement prevailed, and, as may be imagined, measures of all sorts were suggested amid great indignation.

The Legation partook, of course, of the general excitement. I have not had the honor of seeing Mr. Buchanan since his return, but from all I hear, he maintained throughout this irritating affair x dignified resolution to concur in every step to require due apologies for an insult against our national honor. The whole morning of yesterday was spent in consultation, the result of which was the decision to send over Mr. Sickles, in order that he might obtain x real knowledge of what that proceeding really meant. It was thought that the act might have been x mere personal affair, capable of such construction as not to assume the menacing aspect of an insult from one power to another. The mission of Mr. Sickles was, accordingly, to be one of inquiry. He was not to push matters to an extreme if the insulting party should offer explanations that might be accepted, at least for the moment, as an apology to the United States. It was in the spirit of moderation that Mr. Sickles was to go yesterday evening to Paris, in order to communicate the views and the advice of the Legation in London to that in Paris.

I must not omit to say that this moderation was deemed to be mut of season by many. The outrage was palpable, direct, not to be explained away, and consequently not admitting any other step, if immediate satisfaction should not be offered, than that of the withdrawal of Mr. Mason and the whole Legation from France. That act is the answer of European despotism to the Congress of American Democratic Diplomatists. If it were x personal affair, Mr. Soule would not have been allowed to enter France on his leaving Spain, but he was suffered to do so. He went all over the country—nay more, he and his diplomatic confreres held one of their consultations on French territory, at Bonlogne, so if was not the man. Mr. Soule, but the Minister Soule, to whom the affront has been offered. Among the many persons who hold this opinion is Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Baltimore, who wrote in that spirit x very long letter to Mr. Mason.

These were the arrangements yesterday morning. But, sir, Mr. Sickles did not go after all. He was prevented from doing so by x messenger who came over yesterday at noon. Your correspondent from Paris will probably send you his report about what he knows, but I give you, al all events, my account.

Mr. Mason—the news of the Calais outrage having reached him—went to the Foreign Office, and wished to see M. Drouyn de l'Huys immediately. He was left waiting two full hours. Admitted at last, he remarked, first of all, upon his tardy reception. Some apologies were made, but in a tone and manner that convinced Mr. Mason that he had been left waiting purposely. He dropped that matter, however, and passed to the object of his official call, and asked the reason why Mr. Soule had not been permitted to pass through France en route for Spain.

"Well," said M. Drouyn de l'Huys, in a very impertinent tone, "there are reasons for that." Being pressed for these reasons, Mr. Mason was told that there were three of them:

1. The treatment of M. Dillon, French Consul in California.

2. The letter of Mr. Sanders to the French people, and

3. Cuba!

The French Foreign Secretary said that the Imperial Government can not be expected to treat in the usual friendly way the citizens of a State that has behaved in such a hostile manner towards it.

I am told that Mr. Mason replied in the way that will have occurred to every one else on being told those reasons. He said that the affair of Mr. Dillon was, in the worst possible construction, but the mere blunder of a court of justice, and that it cannot, accordingly, be made parallel with a case in which the United States are insulted by order of the highest authority of another State. The letter of Mr. Sanders was the act of an individual who had, moreover, been recalled from an official position before he published any thing. Americans have the right to say what they like, and the Government has no control over their pens and presses. This is a personal matter, which could, perhaps, have excused a discourtesy towards the Citizen Sandere. If he should have presented himself on the frontiers of France, but it certainly did not authorize a step like that against the United States Minister. As to Cuba, Mr. Mason absolutely denied, if I am well informed, the right of any Power to meddle with difficulties that may have arisen between Spain and the United States. He, at all events, could not see how questions of foreign policy can be treated by affronts offered to a friendly Power. The two Ministers parted very much excited, and Mr. Mason was fully prepared to ask for his passports. He sent, however, the special messenger to Mr. Buchanan, before deciding upon that step.

Thus stands the matter now. You shall know its continuation by the next mail. Those who "could not help" admiring the admirable policy of Napoleon III, whom they considered rather "a great man," will, I hope, feel their Anglomania and "respect" somewhat diminished towards that honest man. It is to be hoped that this question will be taken up by the people with all the gravity and determinate energy it deserves. It is to be hoped that the "honor of the United States" will not be made x party question, nor decided by private sympathies or antipathies towards a person who happens to represent it, while it is insulted. I have said my opinion, strongly enough, of Mr. Soule's objectionable qualities, not to be suspected of writing in his favor. His principles, in most cases, are not mine, his policy I deplored very often, and it was yesterday for the first time that I saw him. But his person has nothing to do with the very grave affair, which would have occurred to some other American Minister, not just now, perhaps, but very soon, at all events. He who would judge this matter from a point of view of mere personal rancor toward the man, is absolutely unfit to judge the spirit of European Cabinets towards America.

I have no doubt that our Minister at the respective Courts will have sent such information to the Government at Washington as to inspire a feeling of manly determination to vindicate the honor of the Union. But our Government must remember that this is no Greytown affair No'se and blister are here of no use. A firm adhesion to a duly-worded resolution is the only apology for a gross outrage, is the only best, and sure way to lead to success. It is, in many respects, the heedless and unprincipled policy of our Government that has emboldened them—sooner than expected—to insult our Republic; and it is so much the more the duty of the Cabinet to blot out the shame thrown upon the name of America by the reckless hand of a fortunate criminal, who calls himself Napoleon III.

London, Friday, Oct. 31, 1854.—There is no further news from Mr. Mason, although his hardly expected; in fact has x expected himself, but he will hardly come. English mediation is hard at work, and Mr. Buchanan had an interview with Lord Clarendon, of the result of which nothing has transpired. After all I hear there will be great efforts to lead back the affair to the grounds of personality. Whether the British Cabinet will succeed in this, is, as yet, a matter of doubt. Napoleon's Secretary of State went, in his excited declaration to Mr. Mason, much too far, easily to back out from his position. M. Drouyn de l'Huys spoke besides in a tone, and behaved in x manner, which were clearly not of his own choice, but were the dictations of a higher order. He talked about the "not very friendly" (pas amicale) manner in which Mr. Soule is said to have spoken in private society of the Emperor, but he was much more emphatic and irritated in his reproaches against the general sentiment and policy of America.

I am again assured that a French fleet will soon be sent to the West Indies. The person, who is very positive in his information, writes me that the principal reason of that quarrel is to be sought in the wish to have a pretext for sending a protecting squadron to the waters of St. Domingo, the quasi annexation of which is to be impeded by any means. Another informant is of opinion that the whole affair is but a palace intrigue, concocted and carried out to please the Duchess of Alba, who, as you know, is the sister of the Empress Eugenie Montijo.

However that may be, the Englishare very much afraid of the consequences of that unlooked for affair. They begin, for the first time, to think of the grave difficulties which such an adventurous ally may lead them into. The Times of yesterday had a leader on the matter. It knew, evidently, only the first part of the story; but even that was enough to make it feel uncomfortable. It dares not, of course, to restrain upon censure on the expected guest of the Queen, but it remarks that the step taken in respect to Mr Soule is "unusual," and thinks that our Minister may console himself with the reflection that "thousands of better men than himself are just now excluded from France." The Times knows, as I said, only half the fact, adverts to the subject because it finds that there is some disposition on the part of the Ministers of the United States here and in Paris to give an importance to that affair which it does not possess, and to demand explanation and redress for a measure which the French Government had a perfect right to take, if it thought fit. We hope that we may be permitted to tell these Ministers in a friendly spirit, that if they do really resort to violent measures for such a cause, they will not be supported by public opinion in Europe, or probably in the United States. It can not be supposed that the American people are insensible to the inconvenience of appointing as their envoys in Europe men who set every rule of social and political law at defiance—who mix with gentlemen of character and station only to insult God and mankind—and then fall back into that congenial society which has been thrown on our shores by the political convulsions of former years.

No class of statesmen has been more favorably received or more generally respected in Europe than the Ministers of the United States, when they brought with them the qualities which may be reasonably expected in men filling their position, but it is too much to require that the mere title of an American Minister should exempt such a person as Mr. Soule has shown himself to be from the penalties which attach to his conduct.

If the people of the United States are anxious to maintain the dignity and honor of their representatives, they have only to select ministers on whose hands the character of their legations will not suffer; but it would be the height of folly and inconsistency first to send such an envoy as Mr. Soule to Europe, and then to resent as a national injury what is in fact no more than the result of his own want of conduct and discretion. The French Government will probably decline in such a case to give any explanation and any redress. Their motions for the exclusion of Mr. Soule are clearly understood and justified; but if the American missions are well advised, they will let this foolish affair drop and not convert this private grievance into a cause of dispute between two powerful and friendly States.

Cabinet intrigues may affect just as radical changes. There is great probability that the Cabinet will fall as soon as the Constitutional Assembly shall prove hopelessly adverse to the Napoleonic influence, and the United States will have lost all its allies on the councils of the Madrid Court, if the Thuileries cottage should not be settled to the satisfaction of the Union.

PARIS, Monday, Oct 30, 1854.—The Soule affair is serious, if not threatening. Upon learning the facts, Mr. Mason sent Mr Platt, Secretary of Legation, to London, to see Mr Soule and gather the probable causes of his expulsion. Upon his return on Saturday, Mr Mason sent a letter to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, demanding immediate explanations. At this moment of writing, (4 o'clock P. M.) no answer has been received. I may add that it is not expected that the reply will be satisfactory; and if it is not, Mr Mason will take his passports and at once quit the country. This is the present state of the case. Some weeks ago the Minister of Foreign Affairs intimated to Mr Mason, informally, that he should be gratified if he (Mr M) would privately prevent Mr Soule from coming to France. Mr Mason naturally did not accede to the request. Last Thursday, being at the Ministry upon other business, and yet ignorant of the stoppage of Mr. Soule, he asked M. Drouyn de L'huys why he had desired that Mr S, be advised to avoid France. The Minister replied that they had proof of his having expressed hostility to the present Government of France on returning home he heard of the forcible interdict placed on Mr. Soule's movements.

It is considered at the Embassy that this position, if not receded from, must lead to a rupture, and a rumor circulated day before yesterday that Mr. Mason had already demanded his passports. I may add, that the opinion of our Minister and of Americans generally, is, as I mentioned on my own account in my last, that there was not sufficient cause to require Mr Soule, unless a strong desire to do it had previously existed. We may suppose Louis Napoleon to have been irritated at the presence of this French agitator in France, at the American conclave upon European matters at Ostend, at Soule's associations while in London, while Ledru-Rollin and his band, at his undoubted collaboration in Sanders's letter to the French people, and at the score of other similar offences; and it is not surprising that such an enemy of anarchists and demagogues should issue a ban against the arch anarchist and demagogue pinipotentiary in consequence.

We can hardly suppose the measure of excision to have been ordered in a moment of pet or in x sudden fit of power. Louis Napoleon is believed to be unusually free from such bursts of irreflection. We must suppose, therefore, that the step was in concert with England, in some understanding with Spain, and in the certainty that it would be especially pleasing to Austria. It was said at the Bourse that England was seeking to draw France into a war with the United States. This was developed in a Paris letter to the Independence Belge, and the number containing the letter was freely admitted this morning into the country. It is noteworthy, however, that the Times, alone of all the Paris papers has alluded to the occurrence, and then expressed doubt. This would look as though they had received notice to keep silent.

Among the opinions expressed by Americans upon this affair is one to the effect that this Government might have sought to take the lead of a movement tending to result in the return to the United States of x man repudiated in Europe, and strongly opposed to America—in the idea that the sensible and the respectable classes at home would be too glad to have so dangerous a representative removed from office, even by a process bordering on indignity. This is improbable; and unless the French Government can prove an overt act on the part of Mr. Soule, it must appear that exclusion was a measure not justified by the holding of mere opinions—to which every man is entitled—and that x desire gratuitously to insult us was the ruling motive of the Cabinet.

I have never doubted the hostility of this French Emperor to attack us since his alliance with England. But I did not expect any evidences of it until after the fall of Sebastopol. It may turn out that this rather premature manifestation will be an unlucky step for Louis Napoleon. He wants five hundred millions of francs, and is only waiting for glorious tidings to propose another loan of that amount. If the intelligence is not sufficiently decisive to make the accomplishment of the loan x matter of spontaneous enthusiasm like the last, he may have difficulty in raising the money, and especially if trouble with America be added to trouble with Russia. People would then be very skittish in entrusting any further supplies to the author of the apothegm "L'Empire, c'est la Paix."

War with France on Mr. Soule's account would doubtless be excessively grateful to the embittered feelings of that gentleman, but I do not see that it would exactly suit any one else. It is true that you hear the remark from time to time, "Well now, we must join Russia, and whip them to ——," but this proceeds rather from pluck than from philosophy. You will draw the moral, and apply it to the case of our Government at home. It is Gen. Pierce that is insulted rather than the American people. For one, I have not been able, under the circumstances, to get out of a timely irritation at the indignity put upon my President. His is insulted, but I cannot feel that any portion of the insult rebounds upon the people, whose Embassador Mr. Soule certainly was not. I am willing that the President bear the insult unavenged. He deserved it. And the people, who would certainly prefer that such things never occur, must profit by its experience, and in future use some judgment in the selection of its Chief Magistrate.

[From the London Times, Oct. 3.]

THE EXCLUSION OF MR. SOULE FROM FRANCE—Action of the United States Ministers.—The French Government have taken an unusual, though not an unwarrantable step, when all the facts of the case are known, in declining to allow Mr. Soule, Minister of the United States accredited to Madrid, to enter the territories of the French Empire. We understand that this gentleman expressed himself in very strong language upon his return to London, after an ineffectual attempt to continue his journey through France, from Calais and Boulogne, and that the personal affront in which Mr. Soule conceives himself to have been subjected has been taken up as an affair of national and political importance, by Mr. Mason, American Charge d'Affaires in Paris, and by Mr. Buchanan, the American Minister in this country. It is to be regretted that men who are entrusted with the important and responsible duty of representing such a country as the United States in Europe should display so much sensitiveness on so paltry an occasion. Whatever affronts may befall Mr. Soule, have been richly earned by himself since he set foot in Europe, and while he has forfeited his claim to the courtesy usually shown to strangers, he can claim no especial consideration for his diplomatic character, which is, of course, confined to the country to which he is accredited.

The circumstances of this case are, however, peculiar, and there is reason to apprehend that they will give rise to some discussion. In the first place, Mr Soule is by birth a Frenchman, and although he has done all that lay in his power to repudiate his national character and to assume that of a citizen of the United States, it can hardly be contended that the French Government is bound to take no account of his origin, or to regard him precisely as it would a citizen of Boston or New Orleans. In adopting a new country, it would, at least, have been in good taste if Mr. Soule had not forgotten that he owed something to the land of his birth. The United States not only adopted him, but raised him to the honorable position of one of their Ministers abroad, and President Pierce selected him as his representative in Spain, apparently because he had identified himself with the party which did not disguise its intentions upon Cuba. With the political effects of such a nomination we are not here concerned, but no sooner had Mr. Soule arrived at Madrid, where he was received in official society, than his son tried to pick a ridiculous quarrel with the Duke of Alma, at the house of M. de Turgot, the French Embassador, which was followed by a duel with M. de Turgot himself, in which that gentleman was most dangerously wounded.

The outrage thus offered to the brother-in-law of the Emperor of the French, and to his Embassador, was evidently not x fortuitous circumstance. The career of Messrs. Soule, both father and son, in Madrid, continued in the same course both in politics and society. They freely associated with the revolutionary leaders in different parts of Europe. The Spanish Government was so much alarmed that they traced the active participation of Mr. Soule in some of the disturbances which occurred in Madrid shortly before he left that capital. In the South of France, which Mr. Soule visited for a short time in the course of the summer, he held, without disguise, language with reference to the head of the French Government which was at least indecorous in the accredited representative of an allied State; and more recently he has been playing a part at x so-called conference of American Ministers at Ostend, where, if we are rightly informed, the chief topics of discussion were not exclusively of American interest. In case Mr Soule has done what he could to obtain an unsuitable notoriety in society and in politics, and he can hardly complain if he is regarded in the character he has been so anxious to assume.

The French Government, under all preceding regimes as well as the present, have possessed and exercised the right of excluding from the territory of France such persons as they did not think fit to admit. Not long ago, for instance, M. Kossuth was informed, on his arrival at Marseilles, that he would not be allowed to enter the country. The other day, upon Mr. Soule's landing at Calais or Boulogne, he was politely informed by the police that orders had arrived not to allow him to proceed. No objection was made to his passport, and no reason was assigned for this decision beyond the will of the French Government. Some expostulation followed, and a reference was made by telegraph to the authorities in Paris, who confirmed the refusal of the local police. So Mr. Soule was compelled re infecta to recross the Channel and to return to this country, which is perfectly indiscriminating in its toleration of all who may reach its shores.

No one, we imagine, will see much reason to pity Mr. Soule's wrongs. If he has been affronted, the exception made to his prejudice is obviously on personal grounds, and has nothing to do with his public character, which was not involved in this question. It would be absurd to contend that he has any right to enter the French territory, for whatever right he may have possessed as a French citizen was waived by his own act, and he may consider himself with the reflection that thousands of better men than himself are just now excluded from that soil for which they profess more attachment than he can do. His grievance, if it be one, is a private affair, and though he happens to hold the commission of a Minister of the United States in Spain, he has no public or official character in France or any other country.

We adrert to the subject because we find that there is some disposition on the part of the Ministers of the United States here and in Paris to give an importance to this affair which it does not possess, and to demand explanation and redress for a measure which the French Government had a perfect right to take, if it thought fit. We hope that we may be permitted to tell these Ministers in a friendly spirit, that if they do really resort to violent measures for such a cause, they will not be supported by public opinion in Europe, or probably in the United States. AMONG the numerous discoveries Science has made in this generation to facilitate the business of life, increase its enjoyment, and even prolong the term of human existence, none can be named of more real value to mankind than this combination of Chemistry to the Healing Art. A vast trial of its virtues throughout this broad country, has proven beyond a doubt, that no medicine or combination of medicines yet known, can so surely control and cure the numerous varieties of pulmonary disease which have hitherto swept from our midst thousands and thousands every year. Indeed, there is now abundant reason to believe a remedy has at length been found which can be relied on, to cure the most dangerous affections of the lungs. Our space here will not permit us to publish any portion of the cures effected by its use, but we would present the following, and refer further inquiry to my American Almanac, which the agent below named will always be pleased to furnish free, wherein are full particulars, and indisputable proof of these statements.

Office of Transportation, Laurens R. R.,
August 4, 1853.

J. C. AYER—Dear Sir: My little son, four years old, has just recovered from a severe attack of malignant Scarlet Fever, his throat was rotten, and every person that visited him pronounced him a dead child. Having used your Cherry Pectoral in California, in the winter of 1850, for a severe attack of Bronchitis, with entire success, I was induced to try it on my little boy. I gave him a teaspoonful every three hours, commencing in the morning, and by ten o'clock at night I found x decided change for the better; and after three days' use, he was able to eat and drink without pain.

Its use in the above-named disease will save many a child from a premature grave, and relieve the anxiety of many a fond parent. For all affections of the Throat and Lungs, I believe it the best medicine extant. A feeling of the deepest gratitude prompts me in addressing you these lines; but for your important discovery, my little boy would now have been in another world.

I am yours, with great respect,

MOSES AND GEOLOGY.

ARTICLE THIRD.

Having noticed a method by which the non-fossiliferous formations may be reconciled with the Mosaic account, we will now proceed to a consideration of the vast fossiliferous formations. We shall not be beyond the true estimate, if we assume ten miles as the average thickness of these aggregate formations. Indeed, it is stated upon quite reliable authority, that in England, the silurian alone, added to the unconformable, underlying fossiliferous formations, is about fifty thousand feet, or over ten miles in thickness. The difficulty is to account for such vast formations in a time so short as is usually assigned to the duration of life upon our globe, according to the common understanding of the Mosaic accounts. Most of this difficulty, however, disappears when it is stated that most of these formations are subaqueous. The theory that these vast stratified and fossiliferous rocks were created just as they exist: containing from the first all their organic remains just as they now do, is so utterly absurd as can never satisfy one single scientific mind. It is too, if not utterly impossible, at least, highly improbable, that they should have been formed within the short period of 6656 years, the time elapsing from the creation to the flood, according to our chronology. The causes in operation could not have produced such formations in a million of years. I am aware of the existence and extent of the coral islands in the Pacific and Indian Oceans, and in the Arabian and Persian gulfs, and elsewhere, now in process of formation. Some of these islands, in the Pacific, are said to form a continuous chain, twelve hundred miles in length, three or four hundred in breadth, and that the coral formation extends in depth from twenty-five to one hundred and thirty feet. Now, if we suppose these islands to have been in process of formation for six thousand years, (and no geologist, we presume, would contend that the Pacific has occupied its present bed for a less time,) the rate of deposit is .0216 feet per annum, or 3.7696 feet in 1676 years, and 21,600 feet in one million of years. It is true, this is but the work of polypus, some of them too small to be seen by the naked eye, and that greater causes might have operated greater results. Yet we repeat, it is not probable that such almost inconceivably greater causes did exist, as were necessary to have produced the extensive fossiliferous formations already noticed, and hence, that the world is older than estimated by our chronology.

Various hypotheses have been resorted to by Christian geologists for the purpose of reconciling this, at first, seeming discrepancy. The hypothesis that the demiurgic days are periods or long indefinite periods, seems to me to be a too evident pressure of the scriptures out of their evident and literal meaning. The hypothesis of Dr. John Pye Smith, is worthy of notice. He supposes the world to have existed long before the creation of man, and of the existing animal races; that by volcanic agency, that part of the earth destined for the habitation of man was submerged, and covered with dense foge, that by the same agency it was raised again, and this existing races of animals and man formed and placed upon it. This is a very ingenious theory, and is said to be sustained by a powerful array of learning. (See Hitchcocks' Elementary Geology, pp. 297—98.)

I would hypothetiente that our chronology dates from the fall, and not from the creation of man. This hypothesis admitted, we should have little further difficulty. There was an indefinite time from the creation to the fall, and this is all that geology demands. There was time for the giving of the law, for presenting the temptation, for consideration, and for actual disobedience. Moreover, at the formation of woman, Adam called her name woman, because she was taken out of man. After the fall, and before their expulsion from the garden, Adam called his wife's name Eve, (Life,) "because she was the mother of all living." Those their children, born to them in their sinless state, were not involved in the common transgression, or, more probably, they escaped, and were translated, that they could not see death. Here then, is an infinite time, a free margin of unwritten history, broad enough to admit of speculation as to the vast fossiliferous formations of the earth.

There is a further difficulty in the palæontological view of the question. Geologists are quite unanimous in the opinion that there have been at least five very marked transmutations, or else five successive creations of the inferior animals. If we adopt the first hypothesis, there is something almost analogous to the changes of the conditions of man's existence. Firstly, the sinless and deathless; secondly, his subjection to death, though his life was protracted almost a thousand years: thirdly, the limitation of his existence to one hundred and twenty years; and fourthly, the limitation of his life to its present brief period of seventy years. Now, if we suppose these changes to have been the result of changes in the physical condition of our globe, (and there is strong ground to believe such changes have occurred,) then the change in the condition of life in the inferior animals would be almost analogous to the changes that have occurred in the conditions of man's life. We know, at least, that the types of animal life in the warmer condition of the earth, before the diluvial period, were larger and more fully developed. These changes, however occurred before the death of man, (at least, all but one, the last.) From this, and other considerations, we are inclined to adopt the second hypothesis, to-wit; that there have been successive creations of the inferior animal races. It is worthy of remark, that after the creation of the heavens and the earth; God created nothing but man by his own direct agency. He put into operation secondary causes, by which vegetation and the inferior animals were formed. "And God said, let the waters bring forth abundantly the living creature that hath life." The command to the earth is precisely similar: "And God said, let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind; and it was so." Now, if we suppose the power of procreation originally imparted to the waters and the earth, to be ever active, as occasion shall require, the difficulty of successive creations entirely vanishes, and Moses is fully vindicated.

OBSERVATIONS

Upon "Pamphlets for the People, by a Presbyter of Miss.," addressed to the Rev. J. H. INGRAHAM, of Mobile.

NUMBER TWO.

DEAR SIR: It must be conceded that your pamphlets are written in an amiable spirit. But this ought to have been, for yours has been a favored lot, i. e., viewed from the stand-point you occupy. Your earlier manhood was spent in the regions of romance, communing with heroes whom your own fancy had called into being; and when tired of these, and desirous of taking a step upward, Providence kindly pointed you to the "true church," which, with equal kindness, opened to you the door to the priesthood, and without requiring of you the drudgery of an old fashioned repentance, and change of heart, placed you in the "succession," surrounded you with dignities, invested you with powers hardly equaled by the loftiest heroes of your own creation, and instructed you in doctrines equally romantic, and the creations of fancy with any of those in the realms in which you formerly roamed. One so favored by both heaven and earth ought to be pleasant always. And I have never heard of your being ruffled but once; that was on the occasion when one of your members in Mobile, wearied with the fare at "St. Johns," strayed off to the Methodist church in the vicinity, and found the Savior, and then sent for you to come and visit her! It is reported that then, like Moses at the rock, you spoke unadvisedly with your tongue! But, as the provocation was considerable to one in your situation, we excused you, hoping the like would not occur again. But, recently, we have learned that there is no prospect of another revival there, and such issues may occur again; we advise you to be on your guard. Be as vigilant as a venerable man I wot of: In a certain assembly, which had charge of the interests of religion, both prudential and spiritual, as connected with a particular church, the question often came up, "which is preferable, free seats or pews?" As the members of the body came from different sections of the country, this became an exciting subject. At length, upon its introduction on one occasion, the venerable President threw up his hands imploringly, and exclaimed: "Now, watch and pray, brethren, for the pew question is coming!" So, I would recommend to you, when you discover symptoms of a work of God in the vicinity of "St. Johns," caution yourself thus: "Now, soul, watch and pray, for there is a revival coming!" Such are trying times.

But to your pamphlet. I am glad to see that in stating your ecclesiastical pedigree, in Pamphlets Nos. 1 and 2, you barely glance at the Scriptures, comprising all you have to say on this feature of the subject in some twenty lines, and hastening to the Oriental chambers, of which you insist youre in a "tradril." This is honest and right. To attribute such dogmas as make up the "Church" system to the Bible and its author, would be to insult common sense and contemn God. There is an obvious and striking fitness in tracing such a system to, and connecting "the church tendril" with such communities as the mass of the Greek Church, the Nestorian Branch, and the Churches of Asia Minor and Egypt. Ignorant and degraded, superstitious and debauched, heretical and blood-thirsty, such a system befits them. They are just the community with whom the whole system originated, and to give it the sanction of their names. Such are just the men who, when a missionary comes among them, to preach Christ, would ask, not "what doctrine do you bring?"—that is of little importance; not "what is your life?"—that is of small moment; but "what bishop sent you?" Not "what proof do you give that you are a messenger of Christ?"—that is more bagatelle; but "who is your bishop?"

Your broad recognition of these communities as churches of the living God, indicates clearly your opinion as to the depth of error, heresy and wickedness to which men may sink, and yet be the beloved of the Lord. Sir, allow me to say in all candor, that if your opinions upon these subjects are to be adopted to any considerable extent, it would have been better both for the world and yourself, had you stuck to your "heroics" to the day of your death. They would have made Christians as fast, and as well, as such teachings as those. The sentiment of this one passage in your pamphlets contains the ground of an ample justification of all the opposition to the errors of the Episcopal Church that has ever been exhibited in this country, and a thousand fold more. Men holding and teaching such opinions, have no more claim to be considered and treated as Christians, than the Mormon's.... or the disciples of Paine.

The ascendency of such principles in this country would be an evil more to be deplored by good men, than the scourges of war, pestilence and famine. The country is bad enough, truly, but I must think that it must become much worse than it ever has been, before God will suffer so great a calamity to befal it, or visit it with such an organized form of his judicial wrath. Scattered in small fragments through the land, as now, and disclosing gradually its true sentiments and position, such a church serves an important purpose by furnishing deterring example of the fearful result of "church principles," when carried to their consequences, thus enabling the ministers of Christ to use it in the way of caution to those liable to be led astray. For the most part, men of this kind have been rather wary in avowing their true sentiments fully. In this respect, you have done the cause of truth good service; it is to be hoped you will go still further. A magnet of your faith, who had reasoned a little further towards results, publicly announced, a short time since, that the priesthood of his church would infinitely prefer that their flocks should read obscene works, rather than the English Bible.

I have dwelt upon what might seem collateral points merely because I found nothing like argument in Pamphlet No. 2, to claim attention. As a specimen of reasoning, or as a pretended reply to any portion of Mr. Abby's book, it is utterly beneath notice. Indeed, the whole paper exhibits much more that smacks of the knave, than what indicates the fool; for while, like your bishop, you dare not attempt to reply to his argument, you do studiously misrepresent it. Such conduct can not in your case be placed to the score of mere imbecility.

In perusing your pamphlets, one is painfully struck with the little importance attached to the Son of God, the supposed head and author of the system! He is a mere character of convenience, introduced in the prologue, but is soon made to give place to the more important personages, the Bishops, who take the work into their own hands, and henceforth he is comparatively powerless. He can not issue a new mandate touching his church or kingdom, come what may. He can not send forth a single herald without the consent and sanction of the bishops, though they can send whom they will. Bishops may become heretics and blasphemers, as thousands of them have, he is still bound to recognize them as the sacred vessels of the Lord. The church may become a moral cess-pool, as most of it has been for ages upon ages together, yet the bishops pronounce it to be Christ's spouse, and he must take her to his bosom. Surely, hell must have taxed heavily its productive energies when such a system was produced. To contradict God is among the smallest of its offenses. He says, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice;" but this system says, "mercy is nothing, but sacrifice is everything." Christ said to the Church of Ephesus before St. John's death, "repent, and do thy first works, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place."—Rev. ii, 5; and to the Church of Laodicea, "because thou art neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth."—Rev. iii, 16. These churches neither repented nor reformed, but went steadily down the depths of apostasy and heresy, and yet, Mr. Ingraham only brings them forward as examples of apostolicity! thus making the word of the Most High worse than mockery. Milton's devil had not a tithe of the impudent audacity of High Churchmen. If I can find any thing like argument in the rest of your Pamphlets, I will attend to it in season.

BISHOP EARLY.

MR. EDITOR: At the moment when you are recording the revivals in the Methodist churches in New Orleans, the arrival of this distinguished ecclesiastic is a matter to be particularly thankful for. I presume he is now with you. The blessing of God seems always to have attended his ministry. Since 1821, I have been familiar with his character and career. He is a native of Bedford co., Va., and received his education chiefly at the New London Academy, a venerable institution, of which Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson were trustees, and which they continued to visit to the end of their days. Patrick Henry attended court in that vicinity, and it was in New London that he made his celebrated comic speech in the case of Hook vs. Venable. In 1781, Mr. Venable, a Commissary for the Continental army, had seized two or three of Hook's steers for the use of the troops. Hook was a wealthy Scotchman, fond of his kine, and at the end of the war sued Venable for trespass. Mr. Cowan appeared for Hook, Patrick Henry for Venable. The great orator poured out the most withering sarcasm on the plaintiff. "Where is the man," said he, "who had an American heart, who would not have opened his fields, his barns, his house and his bosom for his countrymen, in those days of peril, privation and famine? Where is the man? There he stands; but whether he has an American heart, you, gentlemen of the jury, are to decide." He then transferred his audience, in imagination, to the plains of Yorktown, and described the triumph and the jubilee, until all present were ready to shout aloud, when suddenly, he cried, "But hark! what notes of discord are those which disturb the general joy, and silence the acclamations of victory? They are the notes of John Hook, bawling through the American camp, Beef! beef! beef!"

The whole audience was convulsed. The Clerk of the Court, the late venerable Mr. Steptoe, rushed out of the court house, and rolled upon the grass in a paroxysm of laughter. "Jemmy Steptoe," said Hook, "what ails ye, man? wait till Billy Cowan gets up—he'll show him the law." Mr. Cowan did rise, but was so overwhelmed by the popular enthusiasm that he could scarcely say a word. The jury brought in a verdict for the defendant, and nothing but his age saved Hook from a coat of tar and feathers.

It was among these reminiscences of the revolution, where the great men of Virginia had left their footprints, that Bishop Early was born and educated. When I was a pupil at the same institution, I often heard him, in the commencement of his ministerial career. At the foot of the Peaks of Otter, in his native mountains; at camp meetings, on the Roanoke; in the the Capitol, at Richmond I have seen and felt the influence of his eloquence; his searching and practical common sense; his earnest and evangelical spirit. He began life with many advantages: the advantage of position, of family influence, and of physical and intellectual endowments, such as few men possess. He has thrown none of these away, as many a spendthrift does, but has employed nobly all the "talents" entrusted to his keeping, and his march has been onward with unflagging steps. No man in Virginia is more honored and beloved by all classes, parties and denominations. It is worthy of note that Bedford, the native county of Bishop Early, is likewise the birthplace of Bishops Otey and Cobb, of the Episcopal Church. It belongs to that district of red lands which, John Randolph used to say, "is prolific of Presidents and fine horses," and we may add, prelates.

JOHN BUNYAN.

A STRONG CHURCH.

"A church may be what the world calls a strong church, in point of numbers and influence. A church may be made up of men of wealth, men of intellect, men of power, high born men, and men of rank and fashion; and being so composed, may be, in a worldly sense, a very strong church. There are many things that such a church can do. It can launch ships and endow seminaries. It can diffuse intelligence, can uphold the cause of benevolence, can maintain an imposing array of forms and religious activities. It can build splendid temples, can rear a magnificent pile, and adorn its front with sculptures, and lay stone upon stone, and heap ornament upon ornament, till the costliness of the altar shall prevent any poor man from entering the portal. But, my brethren, I will tell you one thing it cannot do—it cannot shine. Of all that is formal and material in Christianity, it may make a splendid manifestation, but it cannot shine. It may turn almost everything into gold at its touch, but it cannot touch the heart. It may lift up its marble front, and pile tower upon tower, and mountain upon mountain, but it cannot touch the mountains and they shall smoke; it cannot do Christ's work in man's conversion. It is dark in itself, and cannot diffuse light. It is cold at heart, and has no overflowing and subduing influences to pour out upon the lost. And with all its strength, that church is weak, and for Christ's peculiar work, worthless. And with all its glitter of gorgeous array, it is a dark church—it cannot shine.

"On the contrary, show me a church, poor, illiterate, obscure, unknown, but composed of praying people—they shall be men of neither power nor influence—they shall be families who do not know one week where they are to get their bread for the next—but with them is the hiding of God's power, and their light and influence is felt for eternity, and their light shines and is watched, and wherever they go there is a fountain of light, and Christ in them is glorified, and his kingdom advanced. They are his chosen vessels unto salvation, and his luminaries to reflect his light."

JEWISH PARABLE.

The Jews sometimes display a lofty principle, which shows that the divine light exists among them, although frequently concealed by the old incrustations of Rabbinical institutions. In my own family, an interesting and characteristic incident occurred. My worthy grandfather was a man of great sensibility, and of a warm heart, but easily excited to wrath. He had a brother whom he dearly loved. One day they fell into a dispute, and each returned to his house in anger. This happened on Friday. As the evening drew near, my good grandmother, who was another Martha, full of activity, began to make preparation for the Sabbath day. "Come, dear Joseph," she exclaimed, "the night is approaching; come and light the Sabbath lamp." But he, full of sadness and anguish, continued walking up and down the room. His good wife spoke again with anxiety. "See, the stars are already shining in the firmament of the Lord, and our Sabbath lamp is not yet lighted." Then, my grandfather took his hat and cane, and evidently much troubled, hastened out of the house. But in a few moments he returned, with tears of joy in his eyes. "Now, dear Rebecca," he exclaimed, "now I am ready." He repented the prayer, and with gladness lighted the Sabbath lamp. Then he related the dispute which happened in the morning, adding: "I could not pray and light my lamp before becoming reconciled with my brother Isaac." "But how did you manage to do it so soon?" "O, Isaac had been as much troubled as I was; he could not begin the Sabbath either without becoming reconciled to me. So we met in the street; he was coming to me, and I was going to him, and we ran into each other's arms and wept." Might we not end this anecdote with those simple words of Jesus, "Go and do likewise."

WHOM TO PLEASE.—If thou hope to please all, thy hopes are vain; if thou fear to displease some, thy fears are idle. The way to please thyself, is not to displease the best; and the way to displease the best, is to please the most. If thou canst fashion thyself to please all, thou shalt displease Him who is All in all. [Quarles.

FAMILY WORSHIP.

This important duty, and sacred privilege, should be attended to in Christian families, morning and evening. Morning worship is most appropriately attended to either immediately before or after breakfast; it should at least be at such season as will afford the most convenient opportunity for all the members of the family to attend.

Evening worship should also be conducted with all the members of the family present. A convenient hour would be immediately after the evening meal, before any of the children retire, or the older members are unfitted by weariness or sleep to engage profitably in the exercises. Not only should all the family be present, but if practicable, all take part in reading and singing, so that it may have the appearance and effect of social worship; but it should not be so lengthy as to prove tedious to any.

Not unfrequently, family worship is conducted by the heads of the family, while other members are allowed to be habitually absent, or perhaps, engaged about the room in domestic duties. This is wrong, and utterly defeats an important object of domestic worship. As a general thing, the evening prayer is delayed until the younger members have retired, and the elder ones are admonished that it will not be agreeable to "sit up" any longer. The father proposes that "we have prayers," while reading and singing are dispensed with, and the prayer offered is cold and heartless, sometimes interrupted (as I have seen it) by yawning. This is offering to God the sick, the lame, and the imperfect; and will he accept such sacrifices? "God is a spirit," &c.

Family government cannot be well sustained, nor children reared in the fear and admonition of the Lord, without faithful and seasonable family worship. To attend to the duty when they are not present, or asleep, can be of no direct advantage to them. A weighty responsibility rests upon heads of families. The father, as priest of his house, should diligently gather his family around the domestic altar, and there daily confess their sins, and seek their remission through the son of God; daily invoke temporal and spiritual supplies; and morning and evening commit their bodies and spirits, with all their interests, to the keeping of their heavenly Father.

If God is properly and faithfully served in a family capacity, every one of its members will be brought to reverence and obey him His blessing and Holy Spirit will abide upon them; kind feelings and dispositions will be cherished, each to the other; and a good measure of health, cheerfulness and happiness will be enjoyed. Christian parents, will you carefully consider this matter! [ONE WHO OWES MUCH TO FAMILY WORSHIP.

UNIVERSALISM.

"I am a Universalist," said a boasting fellow, "and you orthodox are not fair in saying that our system is inconsistent with reason," as he addressed one who held an opposite system. "But I will prove the irrationality of your system," said his friend. "You believe that Christ died for all men?" "Yes." "You believe that all for whom he died will be saved?" "Yes." "You don't believe there is hell?" "No." "No punishment hereafter?" "No; men are punished for their sins in this life." "Now, put your 'rational' system together, if you can. It is just this, that Christ died to save all men from nothing at all! Not from hell, because there is none; not from punishment in a future state of being, for he receives his whole punishment in this life. Yours is the maniac effort of seeing a man on dry land, in no danger of being drowned, and at an immense expense, throwing to him ropes and life preservers. What glaring absurdity! Your boasted religion is stark infidelity! If you believed the Bible, you would believe as I do."

THE LAST LOOK.

The last look at the countenance of a dear friend, how tender, how touching, how impossible to describe! The heart goes forth from the eyes to the object, and concentrates upon it its tenderest affection. So the elders of Ephesus fell upon Paul's neck and kissed him, sorrowing most of all, for the words which he spake, that they should see his face no more.—Acts xx, 38. Streaming eyes fastened upon that countenance still beaming with sacred love, and impressed with the deep solicitude just expressed in the pathetic words of his farewell address. It was their last look at a living friend, awaking a thousand thrilling recollections, associated with the grief of a final separation, for time. And how oft we cast the last look upon the pale features of friend after friend, returning no response to our tears, as they lie in the marble sleep of death, and then are shrouded in the darkness of the grave. But the last look for time, between Christ's friends, is not the last for eternity. Soon they will meet and behold one another, as saints in light, hail the glory of that place which the Lord has gone to prepare for them. "If I go away, I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am, ye may be also." O, husband, wife, child or friend of one who has died in the Lord, will thou see that friend again, and enjoy the bliss of heavenly communion? If thy heart and treasure are in heaven, this reunion is at hand; if not, how fearful, how sad the thought that where they are you cannot come; that you have, indeed, if you continue in your sin, taken your last look of departed saints, and you shall see them no more, unless afar off, in the kingdom of glory, while you, alas, are forever shut out!

Many, indeed, are the last looks, the last partings upon earth. The heart and memory strive to retain the image of those greatly beloved, but the eye sees them no more. But there is one look, the look of faith, which fastens the heart unalterably and forever upon its glorious object, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith. This is the steady gaze of the soul upon Him who is infinitely precious, the chiefest of ten thousand, the one altogether lovely. It is not a transient glance, turned off to the fading glories of the world. It binds the affections to the Cross; it penetrates within the veil; it kindles and cherishes unquenchable desires to bear the Savior's likeness, and to dwell in his presence. Infinite grace confers this amazing honor and privilege upon those who give their hearts and lives to him upon earth. "We all with open face, beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." What eye, now tracing these lines, "shall behold the King in his beauty," or,

"Shall see salvation from afar,
But never taste his grace." [Pres. Herald.

AN ICELAND LEGEND.

As early as 988 Errick Rande, an Icelandic chieftain, fitted out an expedition of twenty-five galleys at Sudsell, and having manned them with sufficient crews of colonists, set forth from Iceland to what appeared a more congenial climate. They sailed upon the ocean fifteen days, and they saw no land. The next day brought with it a storm, and many a gallant vessel sunk in the deep. Mountains of ice covered the water as far as the eye could reach, and but a few galleys escaped destruction. The morning of the seventeenth day was clear and cloudless; the sea was calm, and far away to the northward could be seen the glare of the ice-fields reflecting on the sky. The remains of the shattered fleet gathered together to pursue their voyage, but the galley of Errick Rande was not there.

The crew of a galley which was driven further down than the rest, reported that, as the morning broke, the large fields of ice that had covered the ocean were driven by the current past them, and that they beheld the galley of Errick Rande, borne by the resistless force, and with the speed of the wind, before a tremendous field of ice—her crew had lost all control over her—they were tossing their arms in wild agony. Scarcely a moment had elapsed before it was walled in by a hundred ice-hills, and the whole mass moved forward and was soon beyond the horizon. That the galley of the narrators escaped was wonderful; it remained, however, uncontradicted, and the vessel of Errick Rande was never more seen.

Half a century after that a Danish colony was established on the western coast of Greenland. The crews of the vessels which carried the colonists thither, in their excursions into the interior, crossed a range of hills that stretched to the northward; they had approached nearer to the Pole than any preceding adventurers. Upon looking down from the summit of the hills, they beheld a vast and interminable field of ice, undulating in various places, and formed into a thousand grotesque shapes. They saw not far from the shore a figure in an ice vessel, with glittering icicles instead of masts rising from it. Curiosity prompted them to approach, when they beheld a dismal sight. Figures of men in every attitude of woe were upon the deck, but they were icy things; one figure alone stood erect, and, with folded arms, leaning against the mast. A hatchet was procured, and the ice split away, and the features of a chieftain disclosed, pallid and deathly, and free from decay.

This was doubtless the vessel, and that figure the form of Errick Rande. Benumbed with cold, in the agony of despair, his crew had fallen around him. The spray of the ocean and the fogs had frozen as it lighted upon them, and covered each figure with an icy robe, which the short-lived glance of a Greenland sun had not time to remove. The Danes gazed upon the spectacle with trembling. They knew not but the scene might be their fate. They knelt down upon the deck, and muttered a prayer in their native tongue for the souls of the frozen crew, then hurriedly left the place, for the night was approaching.

One hot evening last summer a musquito came into the writer's room, where he was sitting in puris naturibus, and sang in his ear three hundred and seventy-six times. He received from the aforementioned eighty seven bites, of which fifty-nine were about the region of the head. He made thirty-four attempts to catch the insect with his hand, and sixteen with the towel. By means of the first he bestowed on himself a bloody nose, and, with the latter, upset a lamp, spilt oil on the carpet, and got notice to quit from his landlady.

The following lines were originally published in 1850, at the time when the expedition was sent out by Lady Franklin in search of her distinguished husband. They possess a new interest in view of the recent intelligence from the scene of suffering and death:

Lady Jane Franklin's Appeal to the North.

BY WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER.

Oh, where, my long lost one! art thou
'Mid Arctic seas and wintry skies?
Deep, Polar night is on me now,
And Hope, long wrecked, but mocks my cries!
I see like lines! From frozen pinions
In the drear seas and pitiless air,
My dying, lonely heart complains,
And chills in sorrow and despair.

Tell me, ye Northern winds! that sweep
Down from the rayless, dusky day—
Where ye have borne, and where ye keep
My well-believed within your sway;
Tell me, when ye wild y bear
The icy message in your breath,
Of my beloved! Oh, tell me where
Ye keep him on the shores of Death.

Tell me, ye Polar Seas! that roll
From ice-bound shore to sunny isle—
Tell me, when next ye leave the Pole
Where ye have chained my lord the while:
On the bleak northern cliff I wait
With tear-pelted eyes to see ye come;
Will ye not tell me ere too late?
Or will ye mock me in I am dumb!

Tell me, oh tell me, Mountain Waves,
Whence have ye leaped and sprung to-day?
Have ye passed o'er their sleeping graves
That ye rush wildly on your way?
Will ye sweep on and bear me too
Down to the caves within the deep?
Oh, bring some token to my view
That ye my loved one safe will keep!

Canst thou not tell me, Polar Star!
Where in the frozen waste he kneels?
And on the icy plains afar
His love to God and me reveals?
Will thou not send one brighter ray
To my lone heart and aching eye?
Will thou not turn my night to day,
And wake my spirit ere I die!

Tell me, oh dreary North! for now
My soul is like thine Arctic zone;
Beneath the darkened skies I bow,
Or ride the stormy sea alone!
Tell me of my beloved! for I
Know not a ray my lord without!
Oh, tell me, that I may not die
A sorrower on the sea of doubt.

Illustrious Men on a "Bender."

Wordsworth himself, with his grave and settled physiognomy, actually told another of his and Haydon's old friends, in my presence, the following story, which is so good that I feel an inclination to embalm it as nearly as possible in his own words:

"We had been dining out," he said, "with an old friend—a very dear old friend—and it being too late to find a cab when we quitted the house, we were compelled to walk home. He asked me to take a bed; but Haydon had determined to walk home, and it was necessary that I should accompany him."

"Why was it necessary?" asked Haydon.

"Why! Do you ask why it was necessary?" inquired Wordsworth.

"Certainly I do."

"Because," replied Wordsworth, shaking his head, "you had taken a little too much wine—only a little too much."

"Well, go on," said his friend; "if our sins are to be cast up in our teeth by our old age, by an old friend, we can but grin and bear it."

"I had very great difficulty in keeping him straight. He was determined, it would seem, on walking in an extremely Divergent manner, and when we at length turned into the Edgware Road, a young gentleman who had been observing him, stepped up to me and said: 'You seem to have some difficulty in walking home, gentlemen. I am going the same way. Might I beg of you to take my arm?' Although not needing his assistance, I accepted it, in the hope of inducing Haydon to do the same. He did so, and we began to proceed along the pavement in a much more regular manner. I imagined that this young individual might be pleased at knowing whom he was assisting to convey home; thus inebriated. Consequently, I turned to him and observed: 'Young man, it may gratify you to know whom you have upon this arm'—I pressed it as I spoke—'I am—Wordsworth!' He answered nothing when, what must Haydon do, but bellow:

"'Of course. I was not going to be shouted out of my share of glory,' said Haydon, laughing.

"'Yes!' squalmed Wordsworth. 'His stupid object—dead, in the street, and left hold of the railings of the area in front of one of the houses.'

"'And whom do you think I am, young man?' he asked. 'I am Benjamin Robert Haydon, the historical painter!' For a moment the gentleman looked from me to the other, and then said, 'I do not care who or what you are. But my belief is that you are a couple of drunken lying old vagabonds.' I was so thunderstruck that I almost let go his arm. He shook Haydon violently off the other. 'Take care, as a reward for your lying so infernally, that you do not have to spend the rest of the night in the watch-house.' As he said this, he vanished up the street.

Haydon, his friend and myself laughed immoderately. Wordsworth did not even chuckle. His face was engrave and tranquil as before. Singularly enough, this was the only time I ever met Wordsworth, and as I consequently he is enshrined in my memory in connection with a story, which is the last I should ever have dreamt of his being connected with. His quiet and reserved demeanor, especially to strangers, renders it very improbable that, had I ever met him on subsequent or previous occasions, I should have heard him utter any thing which could have imprinted it so powerfully upon my memory.

A FIGHT BETWEEN A MUNGOOZE AND COBRA CAPELLO.—Being desirous of seeing a fight between a snake and its invetorate enemy, the mungoose, (an animal similar to the ichneumon of Egypt) I requested the charmer to exhibit a fight of the kind. He instantly consented (as every one of these men carry not only snakes, but mungooses with them,) and led us out into the compound—the field attached to almost every house in cantonments.

Having expressed our fears lest any of our party might be injured by the reptile, he proposed that the exhibition should take place under an enormous pheasant coop of barked wire, which was lying supposed in the court-yard. This arrangement was acceded to. The mouth of the vessel in which the snake was enclosed was placed under the edge of the coop, and the covering suddenly withdrawn. In a moment after, the cobra capello darted out. The Kedgeree pot was then taken away, and the edges of the pheasantry let down.

During two or three minutes, the monster poised his hood all round the enclosure, evidently wishing to escape; but finding this impossible, he quietly coiled himself up, hissing, however, his mugnifice as head from the folds, and remained in a sort of listening attitude. Presently the man produced the mungoose, and let him into his adversary. Never was I more surprised. This was the first time I had seen one. I had expected to behold a somewhat powerful opponent. Never could I have fancied that so small an animal would have dared to cope with serpents of the largest and deadliest kind; such, however, was the case. The little animal which now emitted round the edge of the coop was about half as large again as an English rat, of a mottled color, with small red eyes, and would have been a very ugly animal, had it not been for its tail, which was long and bushy, in circumference, near the centre, almost as large as the little body to which it was attached.

For a time the mungoose ran about without going direct up to the snake, which, however, having perceived its tormentor on its first entrance, had prepared to give him battle. Suddenly the fiery creature, which seemed to be little more than a single mouthful to its adversary, saw the snake, and, without hesitation, ran up to it. So apparently unequal a contest I never beheld. The cobra capello had reared itself, and spread out its hood—a sort of fleshy cape it inflates when irritated, and which has given rise to its designation. The snake raised his eyes resemble a pair of spectacles. Its marble-colored scales seemed all alive, as it raised itself some three feet high, to meet the attack of the little savage, whose fiery eyes seemed suddenly to glow like red hot cinders as it rushed towards its mighty enemy, and bit it. The snake darted at it, received it, inflicted its deadful wound, and then threw itself back. The mungoose was evidently disabled. Faint, and almost dying, it retreated.

Many of us fancied the battle over, and regretted the untimely end of the courageous little beast. After limping about for some time, and even lying down with exhaustion, the mungoose began to poke its nose in the grass. What it swallowed none have ever been able to trace, though large rewards have been offered for the discovery. What the herb is which this little animal partakes of none can tell, but certainly its effects are miraculous; for no sooner did the creature imbibe the sought-for antidote, than it suddenly recovered its pristine strength, and again attacked the serpent. This scene was re-enacted no less than seven times; each time the cobra appearing weaker and weaker, till actually tired out. The mungoose at length proceeded to entwine the monster by the throat, and destroying it, to the surprise and admiration of all present. [Hering's Miscellany.

CANDOR.—Marivaux, a celebrated French writer of romances, who flourished in the first half of the last century, having one day met with a sturdy beggar, who asked charity of him, he replied, "My good friend, strong and stout as you are, it is a shame that you do not go to work." "Ah, master," said the beggar, "if you did but know how lazy I am." "Well," replied Marivaux, "I see you are an honest fellow; here is a half a crown for you."

INDIAN TREATIES.—Fourteen treaties, says the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun—more than were ever concluded in the space of a twelvemonth—have been made with the Indians during the past fiscal year.

The Cincinnati Times tells a story of a jury in that city who could not agree, and finally cast lots to decide whether their verdict should acquit the prisoners or find them guilty.

Christian Advocate.

Terms: $2 00 per annum, in advance

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2.

Bishop Andrew.—Alabama is to have a resident bishop. Bishop Andrew, we are informed, will fix his residence at Summerfield, Dallas County.

Domestics.—Fifteen hundred dollars a year would be only a living for a small family in New Orleans, the price of provisions considered, with high rents. Flour $10 a bbl., potatoes about three cents apiece, ham indigestible, eggs 60 cts. a dozen. A turkey went gobble at less than $2 50 and $3; butter 45 cts. per lb; a beefsteak 50 cts., and not of aldermanic dimensions; Coal $1 25 per bbl. Our native and Havana fruit is very good, and not so dear. Oranges are juicy and abundant.

G. C. Journal.—We have received a neat copy of the published Journals. They have been admirably edited by Dr. Summers, and admirably brought out by Stevenson & Owen.

Gold Dollars.—Agents or subscribers, having occasion to remit money under a $5 bill, would oblige us by using gold dollars instead of shin plasters. These small bills are barely passable in their own neighborhood. In our hands they are almost worthless. These gold pieces may be neatly fastened upon the letter under a strip of paper.

MISSIONARY APPROPRIATIONS.

M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH.

The sum of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, including government appropriations, was voted as the amount to be appropriated to our missionary work, at the meeting of the Bishops and Board, held at Louisville, Ky., 30th Sept. Of this sum, $10,000 were voted to China, and $14,000 to California; the remainder to be divided upon the basis of the last years' division in each annual conference. We have received, officially, no farther particulars of these annual appropriations. It was certainly an important occasion. To raise missionary money is one thing; to spend it wisely and well, another. The Church should have assurance that the deliberations are full and careful, at which these monies, laboriously gathered up all over the country, are disbursed. An objection which was made at the late General Conference and weighed, perhaps, more with that body than any other against locating the Missionary Board in New Orleans, was that an epidemic might prevent the Bishops from meeting and consulting over the annual appropriations. Yet we have learned from a private and reliable source, that but one of our seven Bishops was present on the occasion. We have also learned that the Missionary Secretary himself, was not there.

M. E. CHURCH, NORTH.

Annual Appropriations for the missionary work for the year 1855.—The general missionary committee, viz: Revs. Dr. Bangs, of New York; George Gary, of Western New York; J. F. Wright, of Ohio; Dr. Webber, of Maine; H. W. Reed, of Iowa; C. W. Houts, of Missouri; and W. H. Collins, of Michigan; together with Bishops Waugh, Janes, Scott, and Simpson, and a committee of seven of the members of the board, were in conference on the 15th and 16th Nov., occupying, with three sessions each day, from 9 o'clock A. M. to 10 o'clock P. M., and reached the following conclusions, which received the hearty concurrence of the board and bishops, and will be the amount for which the Church will be called upon to supply in the service of missions for the year 1855.

I. For the Foreign Work, $75,907, viz: To missions in Africa, $36,407; China, $10,000; India, $7,500; Germany, $10,000; France, $5,000; Norway and Sweden, $2,000; South America $2,000; New Mexico, $3,000.

II. Domestic Work, $184,093, viz: To German Domestic Missions, $46,700; foreign population other than German, i. e., Scandinavian, French, Welsh, Chinese, $17,850; Indian missions, $16,340; to native populations, distributed through thirty-eight different conferences, $103,203. Total, $184,093.

For Foreign Missions,	$79,907
Domestic Missions,	184,093
Aggregate appropriations,	$260,000

GOOD NEWS FROM CALIFORNIA.

Rev. James M. Fulton, of M. E. Church South, writes us Oct. 25, from Vallejo, Cal.:

We have an interesting meeting in progress at this place. Three joined us last Sunday, and one came to the mourner's seat To-night we had two who kneeled for prayers. Late news from some of our valley circuits, informs me of glorious revivals there. Between seventy-five and one hundred professed justification at Bro. Russell's camp-meeting, and near the same number at two camp-meetings held by Bro. Cox, on the San Juan and Santa Cruz Circuit. Besides these, Bro. Bailey and myself have had gracious times among professors and sinners. Several of our preachers, and a number of the lay brethren, have professed entire sanctification. We feel that "the Lord has done great things for us, whereof we are glad." I think we have abundant cause to be thankful, and of good courage. To God be all the glory.

THE "GREAT OFFICIAL" AND THE "YOUNGER BRETHREN."

The venerable senior of the Nashville Advocate, Nov. 23d, gives a spicy and highly grotesque editorial on de gustibus and things indigestible. Alluding to our remarks on his swallowing propensities, he says of his last feat:

"We expect, moreover, to save money by the operation, if our Saturn be not required to devour too many of the family who are indigestibls. It will require close pinning and much grease to enable us to swallow some of the household. There is so much neck and horns, and so little flesh, that it will take hard straining to get them down. If, however, we have to gulp them, we prefer to make the effort before the tail of liabilities becomes too much elongated."

Bro. McFerrin, for a while, cast about with the eye and appetite of an ogre. It seemed that nothing would be too hard for him to swallow. Now he begins to measure neck and horns and calculate the amount of "straining" it will take to get them down. While complaining of indigestion, no friend is near to point him encouragiegly to a pile of horns and hoofs and a long tail of liabilities, lying in the Lonieville Office, which he did not swallow, and say—"Really, brother, you hav'nt cause to be half so unwell as you think." The character he personates—that of a dyspeptie—is the mere grotesque, because no one who has laughed at the broad, and basked in the genial humor of Bro. McFerrin, could be brought to believe he ever suffered from indigestion one hour in his whole life.

He reads us a lectnre about loans and vindication of the agents which we are not aware of having called for. He takes Stevenson and Owen under his wing most patronisingly: "We hope brethren will not press those good men to do what they cannot do before the time"—as though no one else had an interest in them: represents our publishing interests—speaks for the Book Committee—is "the middle man," and brethren must "be careful not to kill the middle man lest the game be up." Our connectional system, changing the figure, is a man, and he is "the heart." "Softly, brethren, softly," for "take the heart out of the man and the circulation will cease and the extremities will become cold and lifeless." We sympathise with our brother, who must be oppressed with a sense of his responsibilities. It is no small thing to be the "great official." And, as though the thing was too big for ordinary expression, it is again varied. He says: "We have heard, too, of 'killing the goose to get the egg.'" If Brother McFerrin alludes to any designs against himself, we beg to assure him we are at the first of it. Our eloquent friend, C. K. Marshall, advocating before the General Conference, Memphis as the location of the Book Concern, said—"If a goose should attempt to swim up Cumberland River, at low water, all the down would be rubbed off her breast before reaching Nashville." We are happy to hear, officially, of the old lady's arrival, and that, too, at an unprecedented stage of low water. Kill her! Never. The following concludes his editorial, 23d ult., in special reference to ourselves:

"One more word:

"If the Book Agents and Book Committee are to become subjects of newspaper invective and personal abuse, because they, in the exercise of their judgment, pursue a sound policy, and act with an eye to the good of the whole church, it is full time they should know it. If Edward Stevenson and F. A. Owen, and their associates, are not worthy of the trust committed to them, and have not sense and experience enough to manage the affairs committed to their hands, they had better resign, and allow their younger brethren who have more intelligence, experience and fidelity, to take the interests of the church under their own control. We think it is time for these censures to stop, unless brethren know whereof they affirm."

1. Now, we have no objection to Brother McFerrin's tickling himself with the idea of being "the middle man," "the heart," "the goose" with the coveted egg, and all that. We are not disposed to disturb the pleasant conceit of the Southern Book Concern, Southern Journalism and Southern Methodism, generally, resting on his shoulders. This is amusing to us of "the extremities," and it passes for a good joke. But we do object to his representing us as hostile to the interests of the Church and obstructing its authorized agents by "invective and personal abuse." We are as good friends of Edward Stevenson and F. A. Owen as he and have their work as much at heart. That they are competent men, and will truly and faithfully perform the severe, onerous, complicated and important duties laid upon them, to the satisfaction of all reasonable men, in the church and out of it, we never doubted and never hinted a doubt. This gratuitous and exclusive championship of the book agents assumed by the Editor of the Nashville Advocate, injures them. They do not belong to his section more than any other, and they have friends elsewhere, as reliable if not as fussy.

2. "Younger brethren"! There it is again! Doctor, (if it's not asking too much,) do give us your age. In quoting your opinions, we can then add, after the D. D., mas——years, ——mos., ——days; carrying up the figures as time advances—and may you live to be a thousand! Folks will understand, by the elongated suffix, that you are twice as wise as those editors half as old. Our readers are not used to such logic, but as the "great official" has adopted and insists on it, we must try and break them in.

Once for all, we tell brother McFerrin that our youth is not our fault. And if it be a disqualification for the editorial office, that is not our fault. We were put in office by the same body that put him in, and with a much larger vote.

METHODIST PRESS.

The number and circulation of our English religious papers, says a foreign correspondent of the Pittsburg Advocate, will bear no comparison with yours in the United States:

"The Church of England has two papers, the Record, published twice a week, with a circulation of 3,369, each number; and the Ecclesiastical Gazette, weekly, with a circulation of 2,750. The Baptists have no paper, but they patronize the Independent denomination. These are, the Patriot, issued twice a week, with 1,268 subscribers; the British Banner, with a weekly circulation of 3,888, and the Non-Conformist, with a weekly circulation of 3,211. The Wesleyan Conference has only one paper, the Watchman, with a subscription list of between 3,000 and 4,000. The Wesleyan Times, the organ of the agitators, is rapidly declining, its circulation having diminished one-half since the year 1851."

The law rules. It is gratifying to find it interfering in such a case as this so promptly. The citizens who procured the arrest deserve credit.

The Texas Advocate 16th inst., says:

"Since our last issue, the German Methodist congregation of this city, under the pastoral charge of Rev. P. Moelling, during a protracted meeting, were interrupted one night by the blowing of a horn or bugle, and other discordant noises round the Church. The offender seems to have been engaged in a crusade against that Church for more than a year past, having disturbed them on several previous occasions. On the night in question, the noise was so great as to attract several American citizens to the place, who remonstrated with the man, and on his refusal to desist, procured his arrest, after a stout resistance on his part, in which some of the officers were hurt. On trial, he was convicted, and sentenced to a fine of one hundred dollars, and tee days' imprisoment.',

The Southern Advocate gives us an item touching Southern Methodism in California.

"Resignation of Dr. Boring.—Perhaps all our readers know that Dr. B. was elected by the late General Conference, Editor of the Christian Observer, San Francisco. We are now authorised by Dr. B. to announce to the friends of that paper that circumstances beyond his control, and demanding his personal attention, render it impracticable that he should undertake this editorship. He adds that it will afford him pleasure to serve its interests as far as may be, as agent, until about the last of January next. His address is Atlanta, Georgia.

Ex-President Fillmore is set down a Unitarian. Some while ago, it was said his brother was a Methodist preacher. That was corrected. The M. P. is only an uncle of the Ex-President. Here he is, and such an one that it is an honor for the Ex-President to be kin to him. The Buffalo Advocate announces:

"Rev. Glezen Fillmore, the new Presiding Elder of the Buffalo District, will hold a Quarterly Meeting at the Swan st. Church, next Sabbath. Many of his old friends will embrace the opportunity to hear him. He has a reputation and standing in Western New York earned by long and valuable service as a minister of the Cross. He has preached longer than many of us have lived. He is emphatically one of us. His extended labors have been confined to that portion of the State embraced in the Genesee Conference. The first Protestant church in the city of Buffalo was built by him."

The Chr. Adv. and Journal, reviewing a book, Organic Christianity, that has been on our own table, delivers a general opinion:

"We read all treatises on Church government with great composure, because with incredulity as to the divine authority of any form of ecclesiastical polity. We find none laid down by our Lord or his Apostles, and that which we may infer, from the Acts of the Apostles and their Epistles, to have existed in any one or more of the primitive societies, or organizations, does not appear to have been the same in all the Churches planted by the apostles, nor in one plan described as obligatory upon the Church in all after time. So that if an old parchment or other record, containing the organization of the Church at Antioch, where the disciples were first called Christians, should be hereafter found, it would be of no more authority than that of the 'Divines at Westminster.' It would remain the privilege, and the duty of every Christian society or church to adopt that form of government which they should deem best calculated, under their circumstances, to carry out the great purposes of such organization, 'the work of the ministry, and the edification of the body of Christ,' the propagation of the gospel, and the building up believers in their most holy faith."

The Christian Guardian, Wesleyan organ in Toronto, Canada, is in controversy with a Congregationalist paper, on terms of membership. The Guardian takes the ground that whenever persons give evidence of a sincere desire for religious instruction, in order to flee the wrath to come, and be saved from their sins, then they are proper subjects to be admitted to the enjoyment of those means which the church employs to aid them in working out their salvation: and so long as they give evidence of the sincerity of their desire and purpose, it is the duty of the Church to afford them just that kind of help which their state requires, both before and after they have attained that state of grace which is termed "conversion." And therefore the terms of admission into the Methodist Church are both Scriptural, and in perfect harmony with the object which it is the work of the Christian Church to accomplish:

"We do not assent to it as an obvious scriptural truth that the 'New Testament requires evidence of conversion in candidates for church fellowship,' nor can this be proved, either by any positive precepts, or facts fairly interpreted or applied. And more than this, the assumption of the Independent is a palpable absurdity, for it requires of candidates for church fellowship the qualifications which it is the purpose and work of the church to assist them in obtaining. Does any school or college require of candidates for admission that knowledge of the arts and sciences that it is the business of those institutions to impart? So, the church is Heaven's School, for teaching mankind the knowledge of salvation, and training them for glory, honor, and immortality; but to assert or assume that a definite and advanced state of qualification must be possessed before admission to the privileges which the church affords for the very purpose of obtaining that state of grace, is to take the unreasonable position of requiring an end, while denying the use of the means provided for its accomplishment. It was bad enough for the hard hearted Egyptian taskmasters to require of the Israelites 'the full tale of bricks,' without furnishing the straw; but the Christian church is surely not such an exacting master. Besides, in the absence of a positive precept on this point, if the syllogism of the Independent proves anything, it proves too much; for with just as much force and authority, we might assert that the New Testament requires evidence of entire sanctification in candidates for church fellowship. It cannot be denied that the design of the institutions of the church is to lead to the attainment of this state of grace, and if evidence of justification is required before admission, where is the scriptural authority for admitting candidates who have not attained all the knowledge and holiness which the gospel makes it the privilege of believers to possess? Will the Independent give us some scriptural light on this point! and tell us what necessity there is for the Church at all, if persons are required to work out their own salvation before they are admitted to the enjoyment of its privileges? If it be urged that the institutions of the Church are for the benefit of believers, then we reply that surely, if persons who are seeking a state of spiritual life do not require the aid of the Church, much less do they need it after they obtain the knowledge and strength which 'true conversion imparts.' Therefore, the Church is not a necessary agency in the work of salvation."

The Western Advocate says:

"Since we commenced editorial life, in December, 1833, we never knew of so much irregularity in the mails as during the last year, especially the last few months. Our correspondents frequently remind us that their papers are detained, and arrive after the proper time, or are never received. Of course, our circulation is suffering in consequence of this irregularity of the mails. We speak now of the letters received by us as editor. The publishers of the paper receive very many complaints, and we know they have been taking every measure in their power to remedy the evil; but thus far they have not succeeded according to their wishes."

The California Christian Advocate, Oct. 27th, exults in the temperance reform:

"We congratulate the friends of this excellent cause upon the success which is attending it all over the state—a success the more signal because of the unusual obstacles with which it has been compelled to contend.

* * * * * *

"Hon. J. W. McGorkle and Ex-Governor McDougal, joined the Sons of Temperance on Tuesday evening in this city."

This paper contains a characteristic notice of a camp meeting, "held in the most beautiful grove of the Monte, near Lexington." The circuit preacher writes:

"At night we had a large congregation, and after preaching, while one of the preachers was exhorting, the Holy Ghost came upon God's people like a rushing, mighty wind, and gave them good measure, pressed down, shaken together, and they run over with joy. I have never witnessed a better sample of an old-fashioned Methodist Camp-meeting shout, which seemed to come from the heart, before. As there are several editors of the Advocate, it may be some one of them will want this shouting part left out, but I want it left in, so that the world may know that there are some in these ends of the earth—amid this wicked and perverse generation, even in Southern California—who are not afraid to say, "Praise God," when God fills their souls. On Sabbath the Congregation was quite as large as we expected. We had preaching at 9, 11 and 3 o'clock. Every sermon was listened to with great attention. After the 3 o'clock sermon, Rev. Mr. Willey, of San Francisco, was delivering a very sensible and spirited exhortation, when it was suddenly announced in the rear of the congregation, by a messenger, that a man was murdered by robbers, not far off, (which was the case). This ran through the congregation like fire in stubble, and the meeting, for the present, broke up in confusion. At night the people returned, and we had a few mourners; but it was very observable that the meeting was disturbed, and that the minds of the people were drawn off, to a considerable extent, from the worship of God; for the man murdered was their neighbor. And immediately after the people were dismissed, an officer requested, aloud, the people to meet in Lexington at the rising of the sun, in order to organize a company to go in search of the murderers, after which the meeting was thinly attended in the daytime. We had a good meeting, however."

CHRISTIANS ARE IMPATIENT OF RESULTS.

In a Missionary Meeting, reported by the Witness and Advocate, Nov. 17, Boston, a speaker, Rev. Mr. Randall, utters words—strong, cheering words after this sort:

"To what, then, may we attribute the present prevailing indifference on the subject of Missions? I shall indicate only one of the many causes to which this supineness may be justly referred. We live in an age of most extraordinary activity, mental and physical. The whole world is astir. Such has been the rapid progress in arts and sciences that revolutions are now effected in a day which formerly cost years, if not ages of patient toil. Changes are wrought in a twinkling—antecedents and consequents are closely linked together—and effects following so nearly upon causes as to almost preclude the idea of the operation of means to ends. This state of things feeds in turn the spirit that begets it, and hence the headlong activity that distinguishes the present times. Is it not true that we have in some measure caught this spirit of the age, and are, unconsciously, perhaps, applying it to the missionary enterprise? Christians are impatient of results, in the great work of preaching the Gospel to all nations. Because the world is not converted in a day, they seem to entertain the fear that it will not be converted at all. Now, this springs from wrong views of the work which is to be done; wrong views of their relation to it; and a wrong conception of facts in respect to it.

"The work of converting the world is God's work, not ours. The plan for its regeneration was devised in heaven long before its was promulgated on earth. This great change for which we are laboring, is not a human experiment for the reformation of mankind. Its principles are not founded in human philosophy—its work is not that of a political or social revolution, to be brought about by the use of human appliances—which may or may not succeed in the end, and which will be ever subject to doubtful contingencies. Very far from it. This is God's world, and the salvation of it is his own great and glorious undertaking, and He will accomplish it in his own time, and in his own way. There can be no such thing as failure in what originates in the counsels of Omniscience, and is executed by the arm of Omnipotence.

"But then, who are we, and what is our business in this relation? I answer: creatures of the dust, whose breath is in our nostrils; who are here to-day, and to-morrow in eternity; creatures whom God has condescended to employ as instrumentalities in carrying forward his plan of saving the world. What then, have we to do with issues that belong alone to infinite wisdom and infinite power? Our duty is done when we have in faith and patience, and with filial fidelity employed the means which have been ordained to this great end, cheerfully leaving the result of our labors just where we shall leave our souls when life's labors are over, in the hands of Him who is too wise to err, who can never forget his promises, nor fail in his purposes. The natural disposition of man is to walk by sight, and not by faith, and men stumble when they attempt to do this in the missionary work. We are anxious, over anxious to see the result of our labors, and if we do not see them immediately, or in the form which we have anticipated, we at once become disheartened. But with these results we have nothing at all to do, except to leave them in the hands of Him who 'sees all things from the beginning.'

"Christians are quite too prone to exclaim in the spirit of despondency; 'I see no signs of the world's conversion; eighteen hundred years have elapsed, and how few of the human family have, after all, been converted. how little progress has the Gospel made for the last half century; true, we have some missionaries in foreign lands, but what are they among so many?' What is all this but repeating from Christian lips the sneering reproaches of the skeptic? It is simply the expression of unbelief, baptized into something like the spirit of religious concern. Though it be in the form of godly lamentation, it has the infidel ring, which cannot be well disguised, and therefore does not become Christian men. Such persons forget that while time is a great matter with them, it is not so with God, since 'with Him a thousand years is as one day, and one day as a thousand years.' The relation of time can hardly be taken into account in a work which originates with a Being who is eternal, and for a purpose which is to be everlasting. Besides, the change to be produced is not such as mark the history of this world—it is not the mere change of opinion, as in politics, nor a change in relations, as in the revolutions in human governments, all which are sometimes the work of a day or an hour. It is, on the contrary, a radical change of character, a regeneration of man's moral nature. Such a change as, from analogy, we should be led to believe, would be gradual—a progressive work. The Almighty's arm, whether in its creative or renewed energies, never works in haste."

BOOK NOTICES.

The publishers, through J. C. Morgan, have furnished our table with the new, rare and valuable. Morgan's Depot, near the Post Office, affords them all on sale, and what not else in his line, it would be hard to say:

History of the Origin, Formation and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States. By G. T. Curtis. Vol. I, 8vo. pp. 519. 1854; Harper & Brothers, N. Y.

The kind and quality of this book manufacture is in the best American: wide margin, large print, white paper and substantial binding. The contents are such as we believe, have not yet taken a formal position in American literature. The signers of the Declaration were great by accident; the framers of the Declaration were intrinsically so. The notices of them personally; the embarrassments and uncertainty that beset their work; the counter influences, prejudices and conflicting interests to be reconciled, all are of surpassing interest. One prizes the Constitution more, and understands it better, by going back to the laying of the beams, and wonders that order was evoked from this chaos. The work is to be completed in two volumes.

History of Cuba, By M. M. Ballou. Boston. 1854; Phillips & Sampson; 12mo. pp. 230.

This book has had a sale. Our copy is out of the "sixth thousand." Copious extracts have appeared in the columns of the Advocate from the work. If the reader liked the samples, he may obtain the book.

A Journey to Central Africa, By Bayard Taylor. New York. G. P. Putnam & Co. 1854. 12mo., pp. 522.

Taylor, as a writer and traveller, stands at the head of the list. This journey into the negro kingdoms of the White Nile, much of it over fresh fields of adventure, brought out some strange scenes and not very orthodox sentiments on the unity question. The book is gotten up in good style, with maps and illustrations by the author.

Illustrated Natural History. By J. G. Wood. New York: Harper & Bros. 1854.

There are 450 original designs, well executed. The explanations of scientific terms, the easy classifications, new anecdotes and lively cuts, render this an excellent popular work.

Elements of Intellectual Philosophy. By Francis Wayland. Boston. Phillips & Sampson: 1854. 12mo. pp. 426.

We have here the substance of Lectures, which have been for several years delivered by the author to the classes in Intellectual Philosophy, Brown University. Dr. Wayland combines, perhaps more than any other living man, the first qualities of teacher, philosopher and writer. His college text-books have been very popular for these causes. His old students in Moral Science and Political Economy are throughout the land. They will possess themselves of this his latest production, and the result of more experience and labor and thought than any of his previous ones. He has taught them to think—they know even his weak point, and these are advantages in pursuing a course of philosophical study.

VARIOUS ITEMS.

A convocation of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, it is said, will take place on or about the 2d of December next. They will meet in Baltimore, and have sessions for several days. Subjects of considerable importance to the vital interests of Methodism will form the basis of their deliberations; whilst it is anticipated to have a missionary demonstration during their stay in Baltimore.

We learn from the Mississippian that the Baptist Convention at Hernando, adjourned after a session of five days. The Reverend Wm. Carey Crane was chosen President, and the Rev. Mr. Williams, of Grenada, acted as Secretary. There were some forty clergymen in attendance, besides a large number of lay delegates. The various missionary causes, both at home and abroad, were well sustained. D. H. Dockery, of Hernando, and Dr. Philips, of Hinds, were appointed a committee to procure funds for the purpose of establishing a Baptist paper in Mississippi. The next convention will meet at Clinton, in Hinds county.

The Baptist Convention.—We see by the Alabama Baptist that the thirty-first anniversary of the Baptist Convention of Alabama will be held at Marion, Perry county, on Friday, 8th Dec.

The Canton (Miss.) Citizen, contains a letter communicated by the Methodist minister of Sharon Circuit:

A Year on Sharon Circuit.—Mr. Editor: Having spent a pleasant, and I trust, a profitable year among the people of the above charge, I would ask a place in your paper, to acknowledge my gratitude to them for the warm, generous, courteous and Christian treatment I have received of them. They are a noble and generous people—far better than I expected to find them. May Heaven's richest blessings rest with them!

I have had eight regular preaching places, which were ordinarily filled once a month. I have during this Conference year preached 142 sermons, heard 77, visited 171 families, made 688 visits, traveled 2,557 miles on land, baptized 42 infants and children, and 36 adults, all by the Apostolic, scriptural mode of pouring, significant of the outpouring of the Holy Ghost; have taken into the Methodist Church South 176 members, (including 43 negroes,) six of whom came from the Baptist Church.

What will Elliott & Co. say to that? Does that look like all the world, "and the rest of mankind," are running into the Baptist Church? There is a waking up among some Baptists in our bounds. They tell their preacher that "sprinkle" is in the Bible, and he need not deny it any longer. One told me that "if he had read his Bible before he joined the Church, he reckoned he would never have joined the Baptists." All this is going on in Madison county, Mississippi. We have built two churches—framed—have one under contract, and nearly enough subscribed to build the fourth.

The people have paid for the support of the Gospel on the circuit about $900, for missions about $180, and for superannuates, &c., about $62, besides incidental expenses. But one little jar has occurred in the church this year, and that, I believe, has passed quietly to rest.

I leave my charge with good feelings for all. H. H. MONTGOMERY.

Nov. 1, 1854.

Since the abatement of the epidemic in most of the towns along the river, the Centenary College, La., has received large accessions to its ranks. The Mirror says:

"There are now upon the record about one hundred and seventy names enrolled; a goodly number of the old students have not got back yet. There appears nothing now in the horizon to dim the prospects of a most successful year to Centenary. The institution is now under full headway—prospects bright."

This is good, very good, if only true. If the Masons and Odd Fellows would put dueling under ban, no telling the influence. "Brothers" ought not to fight. According to the Masonic Register, the following resolution has passed the Grand Lodge of California:

"Resolved, That the practice of dueling is repugnant to the principles of Freemasonry, and in all cases where the brethren resort to this mode of settling their disputes, it becomes the duty of the lodge or lodges of which they are members, or under whose jurisdiction they may be, forthwith to expel them from all the rights and privileges of masonry, subject to the confirmation of the grand lodge; and no brother who may fall in a duel shall be buried with masonic honore."

The following was also passed:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this grand lodge that the use of masonic emblems upon sign boards is unmasonic, and in open violation of freemasonry."

Rev. Dr. Baker.—The Due West Telescope says of this well-known Presbyterian minister, "He has been preaching nearly forty years, and has been engaged in about three hundred revivals of religion, and has been instrumental, he trusts, in the conversion of seven or eight thousand souls, fifty of which number are ministers. At a revival meeting lately, he preached four sermons a day for eight days."

A few Sundays ago the bell of the Presbyterian Church at Urbana, Ohio, rang the second time; the congregation sat watching and waiting, but no minister came. After the lapse of half an hour a note was handed to one of the elders, who arose and read it to the congregation. It was from the minister, who said he would not preach for them any more till his salary was paid up.

Dr. Ives, late Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in North Carolina, who last year went over to the Romish Church, has been appointed a professor in the Roman Catholic College, in Fordham, near New York.

Life of Dr. Newton.—The London Wesleyan Magazine announces that the Rev. Thomas Jackson has engaged to prepare a memoir of the late Rev. Robert Newton, and that it will be issued with as little delay practicable. "It is not intended to publish a large and expensive book, but a moderate sized volume, and at a price that will bring it within the reach of the religious public generally."

RUSSIAN SPIRIT AND RESOURCES.

The New York Tribune of the 21st ultimo contains a very lengthy and able article on the present war in Russia. We are not told from what sources its information is drawn, but the minuteness of detail as well as the harmony existing between its statements and such facts as were previously known, prove that it is not a merely imaginative composition. The opinions advanced in the article to which we allude are briefly these: that Russian diplomacy is finally inferior to its reputation, owed to the other countries; that the Czar is not personally desirous of war, but compelled to it by the national feeling; that the struggle is considered a religious one by the Russian people in general; that the resources of the nation have not been affected, and are sufficient to meet, without embarrassment, a more prolonged contest than the Allies can endure. Two of these opinions are immensely important, if true; for if the national resources are competent to the support of the war, and the national spirit is enlisted in behalf, all ideas of an ultimate victory won by England, France and Turkey, or Prussia and Austria added, are wholly chimerical. Against such a combination no success war can, by any possibility, be waged.

The Tribune holds the following language:

The general feeling in Russia is strongly hostile to diplomacy of Nesselrode. The warlike excitement is general, and still on the increase. This harmonizes with Russian character, which is stimulated by danger or disaster. The war is fully considered as a sacred religious one, and the sacrifices in its favor, great or small, as individual, are immense. Men, who years since left army and have passed lives of pleasure, or acquired lucrative positions in the civil department, return to the field with inferior grades. It would appear at first sight possible, opposed as it is to the general opinion of European journalists, but still it is a fact that the most patriotic individual in Russia is the Czar, with Nesselrode next in point of his adherents. The much admired pluck of Russia resides in the spirit of the nation. There is the real backbone. Now, as in the great struggle with Napoleon in 1812, the national stubbornness is a pedestal for the material force.

The resources of Russia, it may be appositely remarked, are not yet on the decrease. No scarcity of money is felt at St. Petersburg or Moscow, at least not for the incidental expenses. Even according to the British journals, the Russian export trade has not this year been crippled by the blockade in the Baltic, but has been even more profitable—the foreign buyer being obliged to pay heavily for the costly carriage of the produce of the land to Russia, which payments go into the pockets of the Russian peasantry. It seems likewise, that the gold and silver in bullion coming from the mines and being deposited in the imperial vaults, is now taken from circulation and put into circulation.

In the same way the military fund established by law for extreme national emergencies is said to have been mobilised. This fund, organised on the principle of continual yearly accumulations, was used in 1812 but once, since when it has been restored, and since then has increased to an immense extent. But, whatever may be the case, it is a fact that money is comparatively abundant in Russia, the emission of paper is not excessive, and a few years ago gold scarcely produced any premium to sellers. During the current year, likewise, armaments have been proceeding on a colossal scale. By the new levies and additional army has been put on foot, equal nearly to the whole of the Grenadiers are doubled. From the most powerful reserves are organized. These are drilled unremittingly at the rate of eleven hours a day. Up to the time most of the provinces have sustained their contingent cost the reserves formed in their respective limits. The German nobility of the Baltic provinces have spontaneously devoted 10 per cent of their income to the war expenses. The southern provinces, commonly called Little Russia, have delivered without payment thousands of carts and sacks of grain to feed the army. All the money for the sustenation of its war forces comparatively nothing to the Government, and explains why the cities from which Alma the Russian soldiers well clothed, not starved on meager or bad fare, and endowed with unexpected vitality and vigor.

The nation which thus heartily and lavishly backs its Government must naturally expect that its resources will not be squandered through vacillation and imbecility. It was not astounded by the war-whoop, and the only question with it is, that it may be skillfully directed to the end in contest. Thus far, discontent reveals itself, not on account of sacrifices made, but of the manner in which the national means are abused.

The statement concerning the national resources, it will be evident to every one, is of the first importance. All the reports of English and French press have concurred in representing the finances of Russia at an exceedingly low ebb; so low that it was with the extremest difficulty that necessary provisions were provided for the army—so low that famine was prevailing in St. Petersburg, and additional bankruptcy imminent. The Tribune asserts that bullion is not at a premium, that the Government is not troubled for means, that the voluntary contributions are immense, and that the military fund, which has been increasing for years, together with the long hoarded products of the gold and silver mines in Siberia, remain intact. These are the sinews of war. Should they prove to be as abundant as is represented, are not the Russians able to exhaust the strength of the Allies by a 'Fabian policy, if not on equal field, and finally conquer? The spirit of the nation and the light in which the war is generally viewed, can hardly be deemed of less importance than the state of the finances. If the whole people are as enthusiastic as the article in the Tribune and their own conduct represents them to be, the taking of Sebastopol would be nothing, the capture of Cronstadt nothing but a "material guarantee" of another thirty years' war.

We have copied so much of the article in the Tribune as appears above, because, if it is correct, it is far more important than the new battles at Sebastopol, and far more conclusive as to the fate of the war than their results has the appearance of truth.

"TAKING OF THE ALLIES BY SEBASTOPOL."

One of the best squibs we have seen concerning the siege of Sebastopol by the Allied forces appears in the Wall Street (N. Y.) Journal with the caption which we have quoted. In so much fun could have come out of such a locality we are puzzled to know, but come it has, and the best part of the joke is its truthfulness. Our latest news from the seat of war gives the facts on which the Journal's comments are predicated. The English forces marched within a comfortable distance of the Russians and threw up several redoubts, which they mounted with heavy guns and garrisoned with Scotch and Turkish troops—then retired in preparation for the morrow's labors. But, incredible as it may seem, and much as it may be resented against the expectations and comforts of Her Majesty's troops, these same Russians did not await the proper time for being attacked, but, on the contrary, marched out and made the attack themselves!—took the redoubts, driven off the Turks at a hard run, changed the direction of the cannon and killed one thousand English before they could be induced to return! At this rate we entertain fears lest the Journal's article may prove more true than even its wrote anticipated.

"Taking of the Allies by Sebastopol.—By the advices received per steamship Asia, we have information of a very extraordinary character; in fact, of a most unexpected, that we find serious doubts as to its authenticity. We refer to the taking of the Allies by Sebastopol. Believing, as we did, that the Allies were engaged in a very agreeable proceedings necessary to accomplish the boast of soon occupying this important position, we confess ourselves completely taken aback by this unlooked for reversal of our anticipations. We cannot very sincerely regret the change of affairs in that quarter, although we do sympathize with all that portion of their joint majestys' subjects who are sacrificing life and health to accomplish they know not what, and who do not care either. It appears that two redoubts were projected and completed by the very able engineers on the part of the Allies; and we should think from the confidence with which the building of them was finished, and the promptitude with which they were delivered in good working order to the Russians, that it was merely a business contract.

After taking possession of their easily acquired estate, the Russians felt some anxiety to try the mettle and capacity of Her Majesty's artillery which had been presented to them: and no better mark being within range, actually commenced a game of ball with a regiment of her aforesaid Majesty's light dragoons. This animated game of cricket resulted in a loss of five hundred men to the Allies, before the Russians were satisfied as to the quality of their guns. Sly jokers, those Russians! We actually believe they mean to fight it out to the last.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

South Carolina Conference met in Columbia, 15th Nov. and adjourned 20th, Bishop Pierce presiding; Bishop Capers present, in feeble health. From the Southern Christian Advocate we learn the following items:

The number of members, including fifteen on trial, is one hundred and thirty-three.

The Conference collections unabled the Financial Board to pay the claimants upon the Conference funds NINETY-THREE cents in the dollar—being a discount of only 7 per cent., the smallest ever yet declared. The union of lay with clerical members in this Board is working admirably, and the plan is worthy of adoption every where.

The Missionary Collections of the year amounted to $22,000—this being a decrease upon the collections of last year, to be accounted for by reasons assigned. South Carolina has, nevertheless, done well, considering all the embarrassments of the year, and will cost her sister Conferences an effort to surpass her. The Mission Committee appropriated $16,650 to missions in this Conference for the next year.

The following preachers were received on trial: Francis M. Kennedy, Alexander B. Stevens, Capers E. Wiggins, J. W. Crider, James H. Ward, George K. Andrews, L. Connelly, Eugene W. Thompson, William A. Hemingway, Jesse S. Nelson, S. Barkster Jones, and Landy Wood. Tilman D. Pearis was readmitted upon presentation of his certificate of location. John A. Mood and S. W. Capers were superannuated, and H. A. Glass located.

HYMENEAL:

Married.—By Rev. A. H. Mitchell, D. D., Summerfield, Ala., Nov. 24—Bishop J. Andrew and Mrs. Emily W. Childers.

OBITUARY:

Mrs. Amelia Jane Mime.—Our Church recently met with a great loss in the death of this amiable and excellent lady. She was the consort of Col. Wm. C. Mims, for many years a resident of this county, and a member of the Providence Church, Marie Hill Circuit, Alabama Conference. She was a native of South Carolina, born on the 23d of October, 1814, married on the 15th of July, 1830. Sister Mime was converted, and joined the Church under my ministry, in 1839, and has been a steady and consistent member ever since. Col. Mims removed his family to Texas last year; and on the 17th of August, she departed this life, in the blissful hope of immortality. May God comfort the bereaved hearts that are bleeding under this heavy dispensation of his Providence.

GEO. SHAEFFER.

U. S. District Court.—A case of some interest was tried in this Court on Saturday. It was one involving the jurisdiction of the Court over events frequently occurring in waters heretofore considered to be under its jurisdiction. The case is entitled "J. M. Shield Steamboat Two Brothers." The plaintiff avers that April last, at Cincinnati, he furnished labor and materials for the steamer Two Brothers, then at that place, the amount of $426 68, for which he accepted the note of Martin Broderick, the owner. This note has been protested, and the petitioner now prays that the steamboat, which is now in this port, may be libelled for his benefit. The defendant does not deny the allegations of plaintiff, but denies the jurisdiction of the Court, alleging that the contract is not upon waters where the tide ebbs and flows, nor within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of this Court." He also alleges that no the owner of the boat, he was present and assisted in making those repairs, and that the Court, therefore, has no jurisdiction to enforce the said contract against himself or his vessel. The argues, finally, that as the plaintiff took his note for said repairs, he converted his demand into an ordinary personal credit, which cannot be enforced in admiralty either in personam or in rem. After hearing the arguments of counsel, the Court took the case under consideration. Durant and Horner for plaintiff, T. Wharton Colby for defendant.

Consuls can not Celebrate Marriage.—In answering an official question propounded to him, the Attorney General has had occasion to decide that, under the law, Consuls of the United States in Europe have no official power to celebrate marriage, either between citizens of the United States or foreigners. It will be recollected that United States Consuls, in Germany particularly, have been in the habit of celebrating marriage between parties about to emigrate to the United States. In deciding, we take it for granted, has reference to no such case.

The political complexion of the new Legislature of Delaware stands thus: Senate—six Know-Nothings, two Democrats, and one Whig. House—nineteen Know-Nothings and two Democrats.

AUTOBIOGRAPHIES AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

We are being constantly placed under obligation to Northern publishers for advance sheets of new works which they are about issuing, containing extracts which it is expected we shall transfer to our columns, with laudatory notices, as a stimulant to futures sales. Were we to publish all of these specimens and extracts "of a highly thrilling character" which we receive, we should hardly have space for any thing else; and as, in nine cases out of ten, they are utterly devoid of interest, at the expirntion of six months we should hardly have six subscribers left. Were we, in addition, to fill up our advertising columns with the favors of Northern patent medicine manufacturers, at the highly remunerative prices offered, we might calculate on a certain failure at an early day.

It seems to be supposed by a certain class of men that country newspapers in general and Southern newspapers in particular can find nothing more valuable to set before their readers than what is directly or indirectly lifted to some private speculation, for the advocacy of which the publisher is to be recompensed by a copy of the book or a box of the pills puffed. Our opinions on the subject are somewhat different and lead us to decline the new system of gratuitous advertising for any man. If Northern publishers wish their works advertised here we shall be happy to accommodate them, even to the publication of the entire work, for a fitting compensation; and if pill doctors desire to have the efficacy of their medicines made known, we will publish every recommendation they have received or written on the same terms; but we will not take their pills at any price.

We are induced to make this statement by the receipt of about the coolest, as it certainly is the lengthiest, of all the puffing circulars which have ever reached us. Mr. J. S. Redfield, of New York, proposes to publish Barnum's Autobiography, and, in order to make it sell he has struck off a large sheet containing the table of contents and about three columns of matter extracted; all of which we are politely requested to copy "with such remarks as we may deem proper." Having done so we are to be furnished with a copy of the work. Price about $1 25. We respectfully decline. We haven't the room, and if we had, could fill it with much more valuable matter than Mr. Barnum's account of his different deceptions and rascalities. Nor in fact do we think that Mr. Redfield has any need of the press. The Life of Jack Sheppard and the Adventures of Murrell find a ready sale without being advertised, and though Barnum's roguories are not so grand they are infinitely more numerous and most unblushingly avowed. We have no doubt that the book will sell rapidly and extensively, and advise Mr. Redfield to save his money instead of uselessly spending it on advertisements.

Among other notabilities in the same quarter who aim at an early immortality, we observe Horace Greeley and Chevalier Wikoff—the former an ardent Abolitionist, etc.—the latter nothing more than an ardent lover. When Barnum, Greeley and Wikoff are fairly worked off and sold, we shall anticipate the autobiographies of Capt. Rynders and the remaining celebrities of New York. Can't we have them at once? The public mind is on the rack. The lives and speeches of Calhoun, Clay and Webster can only be sold by the hundred, but Barnum is to be "simultaneously published in New York, London, Paris, Madrid, Vienna, Berlin and Leipsic." Viva la humbug!

The Bowie Knife Law in South Carolina. The Greenville Patriot publishes the skeleton of a bill which will be submitted to the South Carolina Legislature to suppress Bowie Knives, Arkansas Toothpicks, and other deadly weapons. The bill prohibits the sale of such weapons under a penalty of a thousand dollars, and imprisonment for twelve months. It also provides that "if any person shall kill any one by stabbing or shooting with a weapon concealed or worn about his person, such person or persons shall, upon conviction, be adjudged to be guilty of felony without the benefit of clergy, unless the judge trying the case shall be of opinion that such killing was in self-defence, then, in such case the jury may find a verdict of not guilty."

Mail Robber's Confession.—Byron, alias McDonald, who claimed to be a naturalson of Lord Byron and who was recently convicted of throwing the cars off the track of the Michigan, Southern and Northern Indiana Railroad, with the intention of robbing the mail and who was for this offense sentenced to the Michigan Penitentiary for life, has since his imprisonment made disclosures and confessions that he and Napier, his companion in crime, robbed the mail on the Michigan Southern Railroad at the time of its collision with the Michigan Central Road, some fifteen months since, at the intersecting point of the two roads. He states that in order to reach the mails, he crawled over the dead and wounded. Napier has escaped and fled to England.

A citizen of Coosa, Ala., named W. R. Penix, was recently seized near that place and forced into a carriage, which immediately started towards the Georgia line. Some of the friends of Mr. P., having learned the fact, started in pursuit, overtook the carriage, and brought back both the victim and his kidnappers. There were two of the latter, one of them being the Sheriff of Floyd county, Ga. The Coosa River Argus says that Mr. Penix had committed no crime; but was simply a debtor to a commercial house in Charleston, and unable to pay; and that it was at the instigation of this house that the outrage was committed. The Argus seems to think that the abductors have got themselves into rather an unpleasant fix. They were held for examination.

A girl by the name of Ellen White took the small-pox in Boston, a short time ago, and before her convalescence was completed, started on board the cars for home in Thetford, Vermont. During her brief journey of a few hours, she communicated the loathsome disease to some dozen people who were on board the train in which she traveled, several of whom have since died.

Protection against Loss of Life.—It has been determined by the Treasury Department to expend the appropriation for saving of life on the coasts of the United States, endangered by wrecks, on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey. Instructions have been issued by the Secretary, directing that the number of life boat stations on these coasts shall be doubled. That is, that there shall be one every five miles, instead of every ten miles, as at present. At each of these stations there is to be provided a house, for the temporary shelter of the wrecked, capable of containing 400 souls. Each station, also, has a life boat, a mortar to throw 300 fathom (900 feet) of hemp shot line.

Prices Now and Then.—A citizen who has ever kept an account of every thing purchased for his family, gives the following list of articles and their prices in 1829, to which he added the price of similar articles at the present time.

Flour per bbl	$3 50	$10 00
Wood, per load	1 00	3 00
Potatoes, per bushel	25	1 25
Beef, per lb	4	10
Veal, per lb	3	9
Pork, per lb	5	10
Butter, per lb	10	31
Cheese, per lb	6	12
Total	$5 03	$14 97

These figures show an advance of about two hundred per cent. in household expenditures during the last twenty-five years. During that same period, the wages of mechanics and laborers have only advanced about twenty-five per cent. The more money that comes into the country, the worse it appears to make it for the man of toil—especially those who tell in the towns and cities. The high prices of food and the low price of labor must give our people a taste for farming. If we are not much mistaken, our land offices will sell more farms during the next five years, than they have for the past twenty. [Albany Knickerbocker.

New York Election Scene.—The New York correspondent of the Raleigh Register says: "When the writer of this went quietly to the polls, the other day, an uncouth German, with a Jesuitical cast of countenance, started up, and with a strong Dutch accent, said: 'I challenge that gentleman's vote, when I was thrust aside as a suspicious and dishonorable character. Waiting until all the loafers in the room had voted, I was then arraigned by an Irish Inspector and called upon to answer a number of interrogatories: 'Shure, and are yer nattl born in this countthry?' 'Yes!' 'Did yer come in this ward for the sake of voting?' 'No!' 'Did any body bribe yer, or promise yer, to get yer vote?' 'No,' (creature understood.) After a few more questions of the import, I became fully satisfied, and had the kindness to administer the oath. 'Angels and ministers of grace defend us!' The most un-American and foreign loving loco foco editor would have felt the blood tingle in every vein. We have had too much of this, and should henceforth have no more."

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The annexation schemes of the United States at the present day seem, by some unfortunate accident, to find just as little favor in English eyes as those preceding ones which gained for us Florida, Louisiana, Texas and New Mexico. Ready as John Bull is to annex to his own dominions all the remaining portions of Christendom—no matter how valueless, how remote or how hardly won—he will not pardon the same spirit in his transatlantic descendants or consider their culpability any thing less than downright rascality. He forgets from whom the disposition was inherited, and obstinately refuses to offset his own conquests in China by our milder victory over Cuba; his inexcusable seizure of Malta by our peaceable possession of Samana; his violent rape of Canada by our purchase of Russian America; his unfounded claim on Australia with our desiderated annexation of the Sandwich Islands.

The fast approaching consummation of this latter scheme has just produced a more violent explosion of English sentiment, and a more laughable one too, than any other that we can recall. Her British Majesty's Consul General at Honolulu had, the wonderful astuteness to discover in some New York papers that a project of annexation was actually entertained in Washington and Honolulu, and that it was fast ripening to perfection. His wrath was beyond restraint. Having demanded an audience of King Kamehameha and obtained it, he proceeded to make a set speech of an hour and a half's duration, in which he called this country all the names he could think of, and while showing the crime of annexation to the United States vigorously urged an alliance with England. We give a report of his interesting oration in the next column of this paper, at length. It is a perfect diplomatic gem; but Sanderses Sanders himself, and goes whole degrees beyond Soule and John Mitchel in the strength of its expressions.

We are not over-credulous that the anger of Mr. Consul Miller or the presence of three British war vessels fresh from a repulse at Petropowlski, will seriously retard the annexation of the Islands to the American Union. We express no opinion as to the policy of the measure, which has numerous arguments on both sides. They have undoubtedly been weighed with care by the cabinet of this country and the authorities of the Islands. If the result has been what the language of the English Consul would seem to indicate—a determination to plant another star in our banner—it will be done, and Uncle Sam will have possessions in the broad Pacific of inestimable value to the commercial interests of the country. We should like a little fuller information on the subject; but as the annexation of the Sandwich Islands is, like the taking of Sebastopol, merely a question of time, we patiently abide the result.

Later From Texas.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER PERSEVERANCE.

By the arrival on Saturday last of the steamship Perseverance, Capt. Place, we have dates from Galveston to the 23d. Her list of passengers and consignees will be found under their appropriate heads.

A German named Adam Hess committed suicide in Galveston on the 20th by cutting his throat with a razor, while laboring under a fit of insanity.

Frost had appeared in most parts of Texas.

A correspondent of the Galveston News, writing from San Antonio under date of the 15th, states that an inundation of grasshoppers was doing great damage to the gardens in that section. The same writer says:

An express arrived this morning from Corpus Christi, being Special Orders No 128 which says instructions have been received from the War Department, under date of Oct. 28, reviving a previous order, which had been suspended, calling for six companies of volunteers. This is rendering for a Government, Col. Wait is directed to muster the six companies into service, without delay; if at Austin, divide them into two equal battalions, and send one to Fort Mason and the other to the vicinity of Fort Clark, instead of to Fort Worth, as previously ordered.

It is shrewdly suspected that an organization of the Know Nothings exists in this city, which originated no doubt from the result of the late election for School Trustees. The candidate brought out on the Ticket received two hundred and thirty out of two hundred and seventy-five votes. The German candidates had no show whatever.

A correspondent of the same paper, writing from Goneales, says:

"Our country is extremely healthy, crops are turning out much better than anticipated. A heavy emigration is pouring into our country, and settling up our rich and fertile valleys. Lands are going up to an exhorbitant price. Our town is also rapidly improving. The Churches, a magnificent Academy, fine dwelling houses, and stately store houses may be seen in every direction. In a word, we are decidedly a fast people" and believe in keeping up with the spirit of the age.

A company of Rangers, on the 16th instant, started from Austin in pursuit of a band of Indians who were reported to have crossed the Guadalupe below Fort Martin Scott. The Rangers took six days rations and started early to meet the redskins.

The San Augustine Red-Lander of the 11th inst., says there is scarce an hour of the day passes without the streets of that place being thronged with emigrants from North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. The streets are continually crowded with carriages, wagons, carts, horses, mules, cows, hogs, white men and negroes, women and children, of every age, size and complexion; all looking well and apparently in fine spirits.

The Northern Standard, of the 28th ult., is informed by R. Regan, just arrived from Tennessee, that the road is perfectly thronged with emigrants, bound for Texas, principally from Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, North Carolina, Alabama, and Mississippi. The greater portion of them, however, from Tennessee.

The Tyler Telegraph, of the 8th inst., speaks of "large trains of emigrants passing daily through the streets" of that place; and, apparently, "having considerable wealth with them." The greater portion of them are from Kentucky, Tennessee and Alabama, and pretty much all bound for Western Texas. The Telegraph states that a train of twenty-eight wagons, containing ten families—in all, seventy-five persons—from Caroline county, Virginia, passed through the city of Richmond, on the 27th ult., en route for Texas, by land.

The Bastrop Advertiser, of the 11th inst., says the Colorado Synod, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, began its session in that place on Thursday, the 9th; Rev. Henry Renick, Moderator.

From the Rio Grande.—Maj. Norton, who arrived at Austin, on the 15th inst., from the Rio Grande brought the following intelligence from that quarter, which we condense from the State Times of the 18th:

Some of the Mexican citizens on the opposite bank of the Rio Grande, and the merchants of Brownsville, have subscribed sixty thousand dollars for the getting up and fitting out of another revolutionary force; provided, that the chief command be given to Gen. Carvajal. He has been called on by some of the most prominent revolutionists, with a view to securing his services, and it is thought he will accept the command. It is, also, said that the citizens of Monterey have guaranteed a contribution of four hundred thousand dollars, on their part, to be appropriated to the furtherance of the same great cause. The principal men of the revolutionary party are favorably disposed towards the acceptance of the services of foreigners in their army.

The arrangement, heretofore made, for the reclamation of fugitive slaves and runaway people can be relied. In consequence of the late order, from the Mexican authorities, prohibiting the crossing over of the Texas side of the river, horses, mules, etc., stock has become scarce and very high priced. The penalty for violating this order—even for passing over the broad-way—is five hundred dollars, and long imprisonment! The killing of any breed of animal is also strictly forbidden. If a Mexican should find it necessary to kill one of his own cows, for his family's subsistence, he must pay five dollars for the privilege.

"Every animal of whatsoever class is taxed—even to the dogs. Chickens and all domestic fowls also. Mexicano, who hitherto rejoiced in reporting long black looks, now have to pay twenty-five cents per month for enjoying that luxury. Doors, windows, in short every thing nameable, are taxed."

Gen. Woll has lately issued an order for clearing every thing from on the west bank of the Rio Grande eighty yards back—from Guerrero to Matamoros. That order was being carried into execution when Maj. Norton left. Fences were being removed, and the materials burnt—corn cut down—in short the whole valley will be almost shorn of its fields. The best and more fertile land is found on the margin of the river. Another order cuts off all communication between the American and Mexican sides of the Bravo. Neither man, woman or child can cross.

It is said that the Mexican troops along this portion of the Northern frontier, are so disposed in small parcels as, that if Gen. Carvajal should cross the river, it would not be difficult to "beat those scattered forces in detail." "Two thousand soldiers, exactly a line of over one hundred and fifty miles." The following is the present order of their disposition: At Matamoras, one thousand men, well armed, equipped and provisioned; also, with a good supply of artillery; at Reynosa, one hundred; at Camargo, four hundred; at Mier, four hundred, with three pieces of artillery; at Guerrero, one hundred.

LATER FROM THE PACIFIC.

IMPORTANT FROM HONOLULU

The United States mail steamer Crescent City, Capt. J. McGowan, arrived at this port on Tuesday from New York, via Havana, bringing one hundred and seventy-six passengers and the California mails, with dates from San Francisco to the first inst., and from Australia to the fourth of August.

In Havana, there was nothing of peculiar interest occurring. The weather on the Island was delightfully mild and agreeable.

The Empire City sailed from Havana for New York at 12 M. of the 23d.

Steamship Falcon sailed from Havana for Apalachicola, with New Orleans mails and passengers at 8:30 A. M. of the 21th.

Steamer Sumprise, Captain Wakeman, four months from New York, had arrived at Panama on her way to San Francisco. All well on board.

Since leaving Havana, the Crescent City has experienced strong northerly and north-westerly gales, accompanied by heavy head sea.

The most important news received from California by this arrival is relative to the conduct of the British Consul at the Sandwich Islands. On the 18th inst. he made a communication of the most violent and abusive anti-American character conceivable, by the alleged authority of the English Government, to which sinlgement a coloring is given by the presence of three British war vessels. We append the Minister's speech:

May it Please Your Majesty—As the representative of Her Britannic Majesty's Government, I have sought this interview to lay before your Majesty the sentiments of my Government in regard to your Majesty's sovereignty.

The subject of the annexation of these Islands to the United States is a matter of daily conversation in Honolulu, and it is even said that a treaty is in course of negotiation to effect that object. These rumors, taken in connection with certain newspaper articles published in the United States, and the studied respect and went of frankness on the part of your Majesty's Minister of Foreign Relations towards myself, imposed upon me the necessity of asking for this audience to ascertain, if possible, from your Majesty, if any change of sovereignty was contemplated, and to give my reasons why no such project should or could be entertained without a violation of good faith with my Government.

I am aware of the countenance and support that the project of annexation to the United States has received from high official functionaries at Honolulu, which has given rise to considerable excitement among British residents. I consider it my duty to remind you that the treaty entered into with the Sandwich Islands by Great Britain was based on the express condition that your Majesty, your heirs and successors are bound to defend, at all times, to British subjects the same advantages and privileges as may be granted to citizens of the most favored nation; and that the Joint Declaration of England and France, of the 28th of November, 1843 was founded upon the clear understanding that your Majesty was to preserve your kingdom as an independent State. I therefore state, to augment your Majesty, in the name of my Government, that any attempt to annex the Sandwich Islands to the United States would be a direct violation of an existing treaty, and could not be looked upon with indifference by the British Government. I would further observe that no Monarch whatever has a right to alienate his kingdom, or enter into a negotiation with that view, without the concurrence of his people.

I cannot believe that your Majesty would for one moment entertain such a scheme, without an official notification to the British Government of a desire to alienate your sovereignty and that of the kingdom. And I feel bound to protest against the project, gotten up by American merchants, landed proprietors and other citizens of the United States as not being sanctioned by the Hawaiian Constitution and treaty stipulations.

I still hope these rumors may prove unfounded and that your majesty may maintain your independence recognized by the whole world and guaranteed by England and France—who are now in closer alliance than when that guarantee was given. But should your Majesty still declare to transfer the sovereignty of your Islands there are many and cogent reasons why a closer connection with Great Britain should be preferred to that of any other nation. Nothing could be more fatal to the future happiness and welfare of your Majesty and your people than annexation to the United States, and I cannot give my reasons against such a project more fully than I have done in a memorandum I prepared some months since to submit to your Majesty and which, if desired, can be read by me and drawn up in English, and Judge Robertson being present as Gen. M.'s interpreter, read the Hawaiian version.

This paper declares that the effect of annexation would be to make slaves of the natives—that slavery is recognized by the Constitution of the United States, and that all persons of dark color are liable to be sold into slavery—that natives from their color could not enjoy citizenship in the United States, and that no treaty provision to that effect would be recognized by the American people. That there is no distinction in rank in the United States—no titles of nobility—and that the King and Chiefs would lose their rank and position and be despised on account of their color. That the institutions of the United States were demoralizing and corrupting and destroyed the amenities of social life. That there was no safety to person and property. Referred to the Blue Laws (Adultery laws of this Kingdom, etc.)

Gen. M. continued by reading telegraphic dispatches and comments on the New York Herald and Tribune of June 29th in reference to annexation—referred to the State of California as an example of the ill effects of annexation; represented the native Californians under Mexican rule as happy and contented—instituting a country club and living in the style of princes—possessing large herds and magnificent pastures—with every luxury and comfort at their doors. "But a change came over the spirit of their dream"—in an evil hour, Mexico, yielding to the necessity of the times, ceded California to the United States, and by the treaty of cession provided for the protection of the lives and property of such Mexicans as should remain in the country. And what was the result? California at once became the rendezvous for cut-throats, thieves, filibusters and all lawless men, and the poor Mexicans were robbed of their herds, had their lands taken from them, and in many instances for simply protecting their property they were wantonly and cruelly murdered. The treaty obligations to protect them were disregarded, and the boasted power of the United States was trampled under foot, society was unhinged, property cast adrift, and the bowie knife and pistol became the law of the land. The few poor Mexicans that remain are monuments, not of the wisdom of their laws, or the power to enforce them, but unwilling witnesses of the violation of the plighted faith of a treaty obligation. The country has not improved since in morals—the printing press and school house have failed in their mission—California has no laws that she can enforce, and disorder, wild riot and crime still pervade the community, men are hung in open day without the forms of law and there is no security for person or property within her borders. Every paper that reaches us from there teems with murder, equatter riots, and lawless acts [Here Gen. M. read some newspaper extracts.]

These are the scenes that your Majesty must contemplate as the result of annexation; these are the ironic that your people will be subjected to. I would not overdraw the picture; but I cannot imagine that I can lift the veil of the future, and see the remnant of your people gathered around some favorite chief, divested of his lands, reduced to beggary and wants, who, as he surveys the ruin and devastation that surrounds him, and views the beautiful landscape that surrounds the grave of his fathers, yields up his spirit, and with his last breath wafts a sigh for his beloved Hawaii nei, and a curse upon those who betrayed her trust.

The law of primogeniture and the English Colonial System has recently been assailed in a public address by a distinguished gentleman (alluding to Mr. Gregg's Fourth July Oration) and he felt called upon to allude to those topics. "The law of primogeniture was good and salutary law; one that kept up the necessary distinctions in society—the proper checks and balances of social life. As to the Colonial System which is so severely assailed (I know not for what reason, save that it is so admirably adapted to the condition of these Islands) I have no defence to make; it needs none at my hands. In these despised colonies slavery is not tolerated, and there is no distinction of color. Titles of nobility exist, and your Majesty and Chiefs would retain your rank and position, and your subjects would enjoy all the proud privileges of British Colonists should these Islands become a British colony. I do not know that England desires such a connection; I have no instructions on that subject, and merely indicate the advantages that might accrue to your kingdom from such a connection.

Under these circumstances I have to beg that your Majesty will take no action on the subject of your Majesty's sovereignty, till such time as I can receive instructions from my government.

I regret the necessity that compels me to allude to the conduct of your Majesty's Minister of Foreign Relations, His Excellency R. C. Wyllie, in terms of disapprobation, but such is my disagreeable duty. Some twelve months since, in conjunction with the Commissioner of France, I had the honor at a private audience with your Majesty to present the joint protest of the Representatives of England and France, and the conduct of Mr. Wyllie was most extraordinary, he not only supplied Mr. Perrin and U. S. Commissioner with a copy of the protest but plainly told his reply and suppressed my rejoinder. A long rigmarole of a reply to the joint protest was sent forward by the same mail that carried the joint protest which was declared for your Majesty's ear alone. That Minister's conduct toward Her Brittanic Majesty's government is not marked by that frankness and candor that should characterize the intercourse between two friendly powers. It is a misfortune to your Majesty's government that so much relating to the Department of Foreign Affairs is published. There appears to be a perfect mania to publish by that Minister. I do not complain individually of a want of courtesy from that gentleman, but if press were published from that Department there would be less and feeling engendered in this community.

I thank your Majesty for the attention with which you have listened to my communication and shall be happy to hear your Majesty's reply.

[Note.—The agreement on Joint Declaration of the 28th November 1843 was to the effect that neither Great Britain nor France would take possession of these Islands as protectorate or otherwise. It was made by their naval forces after both bath made hostile demonstrations upon the King's sovereignty. The Government of the United States was not a party to the engagement, neither was Kamehameha III. This declaration alone prevents the French from taking possession in 1849—as Mons. Dillon will bear evidence.

The King's reply is published as follows in the Polynesian in Italics. The Polynesian is the government organ:

"On Monday, the 18th H B Majesty's Consul General, made to the King in the presence of the Privy Council, in the name of the British Government, a long verbal communication (of an hour which 12 o'clock on the 6th inst. had been appointed. The Consul General was accompanied by Gen. M. Robertson as his interpreter. At the end of the interview which lasted an hour and a quarter, it pleased His Majesty to reply to the following effect:

"I have heard what you have said to me, in the name [illegible]

[illegible] your Government. I am not sure that I have clearly understood it all. But, I shall consider it so far as I may able in reflection. I would prefer that, on all matters which relate to my Sovereignty on which my chiefs and people have a deep interest, communications should be made in writing, so as to prevent misunderstandings and, if taken either by me or them."

The Sandwich Islands Polynesian, having published several extracts from the Kingston (Jamaica) papers commenting the United States Greytown, and Great Britain—highly derogatory to the former—was addressed by Commodore as follows:

U. S. Ship St. Mary's,
Honolulu, S. I., September 16 1853.

Sir: I observe in your paper, the Polynesian, of this date, an article which originated in a British paper published at Kingston, Jamaica, filled with rancorous hatred, which characterizes a portion of the British press towards the government and people of the United States.

As the article is published without comment on your part, and may mislead some of your readers, I beg to enquire whether it is your intention to endorse the charges herein contained against Capt. Hollins of the Cyane, and the people of the United States?

I pronounce the whole article of the Jamaica paper a tissue of falsehood. Captain Hollins is personally known to me, and a more gallant, honorable, high minded straightforward officer there does not serve in the navy of any country.

The charge of intoxication is grossly false, as Captain Hollins is not addicted to the habit. The disinclination which he gave to the filibusters at Greytown, I have no doubt was in strict compliance with orders from the U. S. Government as all such discreet.

I am respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. Bailey, Com U. S. Navy.

E. O. Hall Esq., Editor Polynesian.

The U. S. Commissioner, Hon. D. L. Gregg, also addressed a letter to the editor of the Polynesian, enclosed both by the same publication to which Capt. Bailey alludes:

The Polynesian, after publishing the letter, adds that in also allowing the article to appear in the Polynesian, we had no other motive than to afford our readers a hearty laugh at an explosion of gasconade as harmless as one of Planché's squibs, or Mrs Partington's drolleries".

The San Francisco Herald has the following concerning the case of English interference at the Sandwich Islands:

By the later advices from the Sandwich Islands we have the announcement of the arrival at the British brig of war Amphyrite, the British sloop of war Princemaide, and the French Corvette L'Artemise at Honolulu on the 18th instant. We were recently informed that three British men-of-war, the Amphyrite, the Rattlesnake and the Princemaide, had been ordered to Honolulu as a material force demonstration, in support of the presumptuous and ridiculous threats of a protest by Consul General Miller against the annexation of the islands to the United States. That superannuated official probably expected, by the presence of so large a number of British guns in the harbor of Honolulu, to afford aid and comfort in those of the native population who by his false and insidious misrepresentations should have become sufficiently disaffected towards the Government policy of a union with the American Republic, to create a revolution, and to subjugate, at last, if not dethrone the King. How he has succeeded in this disgraceful intrigue is sufficiently apparent from the condition of affairs at the Islands.

So far from any favor being exhibited towards these schemes of foreign interference, the course of Consul Miller has only aroused the utmost distrust and hatred among the Hawaiians. Had the project of annexation been so far advanced, its consummation would have thereby been more speedy and certain. His folly and incompetency would not at all for any further notice, but from the circumstance of a French vessel of war arriving at Honolulu, which may indicate that the monstrous alliance of France and England has conceived the purpose of bringing its influence to operate against the growth of republican institutions on the Pacific. The progress of the French fleet in our waters has produced a reciprocal manifestation of national cordiality, resulting from cherished courtesies, and disregarding an unnatural conjunction with our worst enemy in a cause with which we have no sympathy.

That ill feeling engendered by the recent note of the French Consul at this point, has also been adjourned at least by respect to the occasion. We are advised, moreover that Admiral Des Pointes had no orders in regard to any movement in common with the British at the Sandwich Islands, and we are unwilling to believe that the visit of the Artimese has sought to do with the proposed interference of Consul Miller. Republican liberty must be let alone in its legitimate progress, however much the despots of Europe dread the contagion of example in the Western World.

Gas Works in Sacramento.—The celebration of breaking ground for the construction of gas works in Sacramento, took place on the 24th. An address was delivered by the Mayor. Champagne followed.

A Sturgeon was caught a short distance below Stockton, on the 22d, and exhibited on the levee, which weighed three hundred and fifty-four pounds, and measured nine feet eight inches in length.

Wells on the Desert.—The Sacramento Union refers to a resolution passed by the last legislature, requesting our representatives in Congress to obtain an appropriation for the construction of wells on the Humboldt Desert. It is said that out of 8839 cattle, which were driven by the Beckwith route this season, only 1910 reached the State alive, most of the loss being caused by the alkaline waters on the Desert.

Extravagant.—Two apples and a pear were sold in San Francisco for the extraordinary price of $20. The apples weighed respectively 2½ and 2¾ pounds, and the pear 1¾ pounds.

Big Lum.—The Sacramento Union says that about ten days ago a miner, named Meech found a solid mass of gold in Weaver's Bar, on Feather river, which weighed sixteen pounds. It was picked up and discovered but four feet below the surface. The lucky Under Quill continues working, in claim with the company.

The P. S. N. Co.'s steamer Santiago arrived at Panama on the 4th with the semi-monthly mail from Chili. Peru and Ecuador, bringing also $800,000 in gold and silver.

There is no political news in Chili. A new treaty has been negotiated with England. Peru and Ecuador have accepted the offered mediation of Chili in the settlement of their difficulties. A legation is to be sent to the United States.

A vein of gold has been discovered in the streets of Santiago in the Cerro de Santa Lucia, in the very center of the city.

H. B. M. steamer Dido arrived on the 11th from a cruise. The French corvette Arentuse sailed on the 7th for Callao and Marquesas.

In Peru it appears that the Government forces, led by President Echinique, have been overmatched by Gen Castilla. The President had retreated to Lima, and when his return was made known great dissatisfaction was manifested, and crowds gathered in the streets shouting for Castilla. The troops were called out, and guards placed over the palace and other public buildings. Various revolutionary proclamations and placards were published, and to a few instances the people and the soldiers came into collision. Private advices state that six or eight were killed on both sides. All business was suspended, and the stores and shops closed.

In Callao the popular feeling in favor of Castilla was very apparent.

Private advices inform us that at the moment of the steamer's leaving Callao, Castilla was very near Lima. He not actually in the city. It appears certain that Echinique is on his last legs; that he has not the courage to meet Castilla, even supposing public opinion was with him, which it certainly is not.

The Lima Foreign News of the 21st says: "Henriette's party, which left this city on a gold seeking expedition on the Amazon in May last, have just returned after a fruitless search. They prospected on the Colorado River and on several other smaller mountain streams, finding gold but in very limited quantities.

The Courier of the 15th ult. says: "During the fortnight since our last steamer edition, little worthy of especial note has transpired upon the Isthmus. Aspinwall has been more frequently and more copiously drenched than we ever remember to have seen it within the same length of time. The profusion of showers has not, however, been distributed along the line of the road.

"The movements for a new Government at Aspinwall are in statu quo, and there is as little doing as possible in the way of mending matters at Panama. The secret of this delay lies in the confident presumption on the part of the wire-workers, that the National Congress has, by this time, or very soon, will declare the Isthmus an independent State, and render necessary a different style of government from that recently contemplated."

The Star of the 14th says:

"It is gratifying to hear of the rapid progress of the Railroad and the prospect of its speedy completion. The whole line is now nearly graded, and the working partiesat both sides are within about half a mile of each other. This track is all laid to ten miles, and we understand that a hand-car will soon be put on at this end."

Export of Gold.—The total value of the gold exported from Australia for the first seven months of 1854, up to April 1, was £6,577,501, or about $30,000,000.

Extraordinary Circus Passage.—Four Hundred and Two Miles in Twenty-Four Hours!—The Melbourne Morning Herald, of July 11, says: Considerable interest has been excited in consequence of the appearance in our bay of one of the finest clipper ships the world has ever produced. THE WIVES OF DAVID TENI S.

David Teniers was scarcely eleven years old when the painter Rubens came one day into the workshop of his father David was daubing a small sketch; at the sight of the great master, the brush fell from his hand. Rubens, perceiving that his presence disconcerted the youth, pinked it up, and added some touches to his work. From that day David Teniers determined to be a great man; yet, during more than ten years he worked as a mere painter of signs, waiting, like our old friend, Dick Tinto, for better days, till the Archduke Leopold appointed him his painter in ordinary, and gentleman of the chamber.

A little adventure suddenly decided his fate It happened that about that time a certain gentleman of the Court, being about to marry, gave instructions to Teniers to paint him a representation of the god Hymen. The gentleman being a connoisseur, Teniers employed upon the work all the resources of his genius; he imitated the graces of Albano and the coloring of Rubens, till his Hymen became more beautiful than Adonis. The painter did not forget the flambeau; never did the hymeneal torch shine with greater brilliancy. On the eve of the nuptials Teniers invited the gentleman to his studio "Here," said he, "you behold the highest ideal of love and beauty which my imagination has presented to me."

"You have hardly been so successful as I expected," said the gentleman, shaking his head with an air of discontent. "I have a better idea of Hymen than this. There is something wanting—a certain expression—a something which I feel, though I can not explain it."

"You are right in not being satisfied with my work," replied Teniers. "It is scarcely dry yet. My colors, like those of our great masters, improve with time. Allow me to bring you this picture in a few weeks. Since your marriage takes place to-morrow, you will have other business to attend to, besides looking at a portrait of Hymen Take my word; and if you find I am mistaken, I renounce my claim to be paid for the work."

The gentleman had nothing to reply; he left the artist's abode to visit his intended bride. She was a Flemish woman, of Spanish origin, as worthy of the pencil of Murillo as that of Rubens; but, as the lady had nothing to recommend her but her face, her mind not equaling her beauty, Teniers, like a sensible man, desired to give the gentleman time enough to recognize Hymen in his actual aspect. At the end of three months he conveyed his picture to the residence of his friend.

"You are right," exclaimed the latter at the first glance. "Time has much improved your picture. Age is necessary even to the most perfect work. You will allow, however, that the expression is a little too lively. It is Hymen, remember, not Cupid, whom you intended to portray. That laughing eye is scarcely natural. Hymen is a reasonable god, after all."

"Excellent!" exclaimed Teniers. "The lover is now only the husband. It has turned out as I predicted. Know, then, that it is not my painting, but your ideal that has changed." For the honor of his wife the gentleman was inclined to be angry; but how could he meet such a triumphant experiment? He offered at once to pay him the stipulated price.

"No," said the painter; "my genius has failed me in this affair. Grant me a few days more."

Teniers set to work again, and accomplished a chef-d'œuvre. By the aid of perspective, he contrived to produce a portrait of Hymen which should app ar charming when viewed sideways, at a certain distance; but which on a closer inspection, should be found to have a slight frown. The Archduke Leopold, having heard the history of this picture, desired that it should be placed at the end of his gallery. The curious, married and unmarried, came to inspect it. Dufresnoy, who relates this anecdote in his witty manner, concludes his recital thus: "The Duke caused the portrait to be placed above a kind of dais, to mount which the visitor had to pass a step very polished and slippery. Below this was the pleasing point of view; but no sooner had you passed the step than, farewell to the charm! It was no longer the same thing."

Cornelius Schut, the painter-poet, first related this little story: "What is more curious," said he in his narrative, "is, that this portrait of Hymen brought about the marriage of David Teniers" Cornelius Schut had a ward named Anne Breughel, daughter of Breughel, of Velours, also a painter. As she was beautiful, and of pleasing manners, old Cornelius Schut took a pleasure in walking abroad with her. Sometimes they visited the studios of Rubens and Van Baelen, who were also her guardians; sometimes the Court of the Archduke; at other times they spent the day in the country, or in making an excursion by water. One day, as they were walking in the Archduke's gallery, and her guardian was pointing out to her the famous picture of Hymen, Teniers happened to come in. After some remarks upon the weather, poetry and painting, Teniers said to the young maiden: "Would mademoiselle like to pass the step?"

"Yes," she replied, perhaps without reflecting "I take you at your word," said Teniers, offering her his hand. Anne Breughel blushed, and refused to pass. Cornelius Schut treated the matter rather as a post than a guardian.

"Why should you object?" said he, smiling. "What would be the advantage," she replied, somewhat emboldened, "since once on the other side the picture changes in color and effect?"

"For you and me, never!" exclaimed the young painter gallantly; "or, rather, I promise you to retrace the fatal step immediately." At that critical moment some strangers happened to come in. Teniers saluted his friends respectfully and withdrew, already in love with the young girl.

The next day, after some hesitation, he entered the studio of Cornelius Schut, who was painting some camelias in a garland of flowers "Master Cornelius," said Teniers, "will you tell me what is the best thing to be done to please a young maiden?"

"Write her some verses," said the poet. "So, you are in love, ah?"

"To desperation; to the point, in fact, that the Archduke says I have lost my senses."

"And with whom, Master David Teniers?"

"Do you not guess?" replied the cunning young artist. "Ah, if I could write verses like yours!"

"I am not master of the hand of Anne Breughel," said Schut, divining the object of his passion. "She has two other guardians—Rubens and Van Baelen. Besides, I take her for a woman of spirit, who will have a husband of her own choosing, and no other."

Teniers, meeting Rubens soon after, asked in like manner: "What was the best thing to be done to please a young maiden?"

"Make her a flattering portrait," replied the great painter.

"Oh, that I had your genius!" exclaimed Teniers. "I would make my portrait even more beautiful than Anne Breughel."

"If it is an Anne Breughel you are thinking of," replied Rubens, "go to our grave friend, Van Baelen; he will tell you, like an old philosopher who has subdued the passions of man's nature, what is best to be done in such a case."

Teniers went directly to the house of the old painter; he found him painting, upon copper, a copy of his great work, "St. John Preaching in the Desert." Teniers had seen the original often in the palace of the Archduke. He came at once to the object of his visit "What is the best thing to please a young maiden?"

"Love her sincerely," replied Van Baelen.

"You are, perhaps, right; and yet I adore Anne Breughel, who, I imagine, is not the least affected by my passion."

The three guardians interrogated their ward in turn. She had not forgotten David Teniers. It turned out that Van Baelen had spoken more wisely than his colleagues. The three took counsel together; they weighed in the balance the talent of Teniers and the fortune of Anne Breughel—the mind of the one and the beauty of the other. After some debats they decided for the marriage. The young pair were brought together at a supper at the house of Rubens, who, as well as his guests, amused themselves with observing their mutual embarrassement At the dessert they told Teniers that they had invited him as a witness to the marriage contract of Anna Breughel, in his character of a disciple of her grandfather, old Peter Breughel. Soon afterward the notary presented himself very gravely; a space was cleared for him at the end of the table. He unrolled the parchment, mended his pen, and prepared to remi the marriage contract of the future partners Young David no longer doubted his happiness.

The marriage contract, still preserved in the archives of the city of Antwerp, is prepared rather in favor of the wife than the husband It stipulates that in case of the decease of Anne Breughel, their children shall receive, not only the property which she brought him as a marriage portion, but also all interest in the joint property settled by the contract. We shall see presently that the clause was strictly fulfilled. The three guardians, artists as they were, had made all their arrangements like sober lawyers The marriage took place a few days afterwards On the morning of the wedding, the Archduke presented Teniers with a miniature portrait of himself and a gold chain Anne Breughel was of a sweet disposition and pleasing manners She brought her husband four children, and loved him to the last as on the first day of her marriage; while he, in his turn, loved her with all the tenderness of his passionate nature. In short, they never saw Hymen except on the favorite side of the step.

In the first years of his wedded life, Teniers continued to reside in the palace of Leopold, working almost exclusively for the king of Spain, who was so delighted with his works that he had a gallery built expressly for them. At first the artist did scarcely any thing more than copy the great masters of the Flemish and Italian schools. After a little while, growing weary of copying others, stroke by stroke, he contented himself with merely imitating them His imitations enjoyed a singular reputation—some persons even going so far as to prefer them to the models. He was particularly successful in his imitations of Rubens, which many mistook for the works of that master. But Teniers at length determined to be in his turn an original painter.

In his leisure hours, remembering the counsels of his aged father, he sketched by a few strokes of his pencil a scene taken near by, of pure and simple nature. Suddenly, he abandoned his grand subjects. Eminently Flemish, he limited his field to a Flemish horizon. He was wearied of gazing upon saints in ecstasy, and penitent Magdalens: he had never met with such things in his simple way of life. Was it not time that the human form should be painted under some other phase, and in a character more true to nature? If painting should be a mirror of nature, why not set that mirror beside the public way, as well as in the unfrequented by-roads? A picture of happiness, fresh and naif, a relief of actual life, can never be unworthy of art; prose may be made pleasing as well as verse. Thus reasoned the young artist.

Adrian Branwer and Van Craesbeck had already taken sketches among the mariners and other frequenters of the cabarets of Antwerp, of all the original physiognomies to be found there. There was not an interior of a public house, nor a droll or characteristic face which they had not copied a dozen times. Teniers saw that he must seek for a new world; but he had not far to look for that. In the little village of Perck, between Malines and Antwerp, there happened to be a chateau to be sold, called the Chateau of the Three Towers, an ancient Gothic edifice, worthy of lodging a prince. Teniers, who was indeed a prince among Flemish painters, purchased it, resolved to spend the remainder of his life there in the study of nature, and in the enjoyment of his good fortune. The place was well chosen—a church with pointed spire, meadow, lake, picturesque inclosure, bowers, copses, cabarets—every thing he wanted was to be found in Perck and its environs He lived here in good style, keeping lackeys and equipages, and his chateau became a celebrated rendezvous for the chase. The Archduke Leopold, the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Marlborough, and many other illustrious persons, visited him there. Twice his extravagant way of life brought him to the verge of ruin; the first time he set to work to repair his fortunes by painting day and night. He did not dispense with a single horse or servant, nor did he even receive fewer of those illustrious visitors from all countries, who, in the Chateau des Trois Tours, fancied themselves in a royal palace. His industry restored his finances. It is said that at this time he even produced as many as three hundred and fifty paintings in a single year; but this extraordinary fecundity disheartened his purchasers, and his works fell in value. There is a tradition—but an improbable one—that he then adopted the singular expedient of spreading abroad a report of his own death, and that his wife even went into mourning, to induce belief in the story, and thus enhance the value of his works.

Teniers was in the midst of his career when his wife died. His affliction was beyond measure; his chateau, so cheerful before, became somber and comfortless; Nature, his ordinary teacher, spoke to him now of nothing but Anne Breughel. His marriage contract compelling him to give up every thing on the death of his wife, the painter found himself by this calamity suddenly reduced to poverty. His children would not have allowed the clauses of the contract to be executed in their favor, but Teniers, in spite of the entreaties of his friends, resolved to strip himself of every thing in the very year of her death; saying that "he would never consent to live on the property of orphans." The chateau changed owners and he retired to Brussels. Here he lived a solitary life, turning his thoughts unceasingly to the remembrance of his dear Anne, and devoting himself to the practices of religion, and to watching over the progress of his children at college.

Though living now in the most humble style, he had been compelled to retain one of his horses—all his pictures being the result of short journeys into the country. On these excursions, he had several times revisited Perck, wandering in the neighborhood of the chateau, and lingering over its association of love and fame. One evening he noticed, through the railing of the grounds of the chateau, a young lady walking in the garden, whose face bore several points of resemblance to that of Anne Breughel. In his surprise he let fall the reins upon the neck of his horse, which began to bite at the hanging branches of a willow. His eyes followed involuntarily the apparition, which seemed to him to be a dream of the past. In a moment the young lady disappeared by a retired pathway leading to the chateau Teniers continued musing, looking now towards the lake, and now towards the spot where she had vanished. "My poor Anne, you are dead to me," he exclaimed pensively. "No you are not dead. I see you every where—under these trees, at yonder window, beside that lake where we have walked so often."

While musing thus, the poor painter did not perceive that his horse, which had also his reminiscences, had begun to take the road to the stables. Upon the bridge, he drew up his reins again, and said, sighing: "No, no, my trusty friend, we have no longer any right to be here" That day, Teniers returned to his solitary home more sad than usual

"Why did I sell the chateau?" said he with bitterness. "There I should have been, in some sort, nearer to my dear Anne. In those old favorite haunts I might still, in imagination, have seen and heard her."

The next day, he could not refrain from returning to Perck. The chateau was then in the possession of a wealthy retired counselor named DeFresne The latter meeting Teniers in the neighborhood, and recognising him, begged him to accompany him to his old home, and consider himself still its master. The counselor presented him to his daughter, Isabella de Fresne. She was young and fair, and had the same tender and simple look as Anne Breughel. Teniers was delighted with her. She painted a little—Teniers offered to give her a lesson A shower of rain began to fall, and the advocate gadly took advantage of the circumstance to detain his guest. The poor painter almost believed himself living again in his ancient splendor. The sweet face of Anne Breughel was missing; but Isabella de Fresne was not wanting in charms.

"What a pity," said his host, over the dessert, "that you should have taken it into your head to leave the chateau! It was to increase the patrimony of your children, I am aware; but that appears to me to be carrying paternal affection too far. Such a genius as yours should have a palace for an abode."

"Nature is my palace," replied the artist, casting at the same time a wistful look at the gilded panels of the Chateau des Trois Tours.

"My greatest pleasure, Mons. Teniers," said the counselor, "would be to see you here till the fine season."

"Ah," said Teniers, "I should be too happy to live in such good and fair society, but my fete-days are past. Once I was not only a painter, but a fine gentleman; now I am only a painter. All my pleasures are now associated with my palisl. I shall continue to depict scenes of happiness, but it will be the happiness of others" So saying, Teniers regarded Isabelle tenderly. The young lady blushed, and turned the conversation into another channel.

The next morning Teniers rose at daybreak to return to Brussels. While his horse was feeding, he took a stroll through one of his favorite haunts upon the borders of the lake. It was a clear, fresh morning; a light wind was slowly moving the mists along the fields of Vilvorde; the country, refreshed with the rain of the night before, filled the air with sweet odors; and the sun, just risen, touched the glittering tree tops and the towers of the chateau. Arnold Houbraken relates this story. Teniers was leaning against the trunk of a tree, surveying the lake and the chateau, lost in thought, when suddenly raising his eyes toward the window where he had often seen Anne Breughel looking out on fine evenings, her image appeared there as if by enchantment. "It is she, with her light hair falling in curls," he exclaimed. "It is the same sweet face, so full of beauty and innocence." But in another moment he recognised Isabelle de Fresne. "Alas!" he exclaimed, it is not she; and yet"—

He returned to the chateau, mounted his horse, and rode away slowly. All that week he did nothing well. He attempted to paint from memory a portrait of Isabelle de Fresne, and failed; and yet, when it was but half finished, the face had seemed to remind him not the same time both of Anne Breughel and Isabelle de Fresne. Those two delightful images were for ever present to his mind; he sought to divert his thoughts from them, afraid of falling in love again. He made a journey into France, and even set out for Italy; but he had scarcely arrived at Lyons, when his new passion compelled him to retrace his steps. On his return he found a letter from the counselor, complaining of his neglect.

"Come, my dear Teniers," he wrote, "the very peasants are anxious to see their old master again; and my daughter Isabelle finds that, even from such a skillful master as you, a single lesson in painting is not enough."

Teniers started immediately for Perck. The counselor pressed him to pass the remainder of the season at the chateau. The painter accepted his invitation, and boldly instruied himself there, hardly sure that it was not more dangerous to fly from the presence of Isabelle, than to see her continually.

It happened—accidentally, no doubt—that the young lady had for an attendant one of the femmes de chambre of Anne Breughel. This was another illusion for the painter, who, when he met her, found himself often about to ask her whether his wife was abroad in the garden, or in the walks in the neighborhood. The woman—by force of habit, no doubt—dressed her new mistress exactly like her previous ones; there was the same arrangement of the hair, the same cap, the same lace, the identical colors. Teniers, meeting this living reminiscence sometimes upon the staire, or in dusky passages of the old chateau, would imagine himself in a dream. More than once, on kissing the hand of Isabelle de Fresne, the old time seemed to him to have come back again Every day he discovered some new point of resemblance. Last night, it was her hand; to-day, it is her foot; to-morrow, she will sing, and her voice will be the very counterpart of Anne Breughel's. Never was illusion more perfect at all points.

"What ails you, my friend?" asked his host one day, surprised at his absent and anxious look. "Does not our way of life please you?"

"Yes," said Teniers; "it is nothing—a passing recollection—a momentary regret. It is gone now."

One evening, after sunset, he was sitting again upon the ground beside the little lake, idly brushing the tall winter-grasses with his feet. Isabella and her servant passed him in the pleasure boat. The light veil of evening falling upon land and water confirmed the painter's misty rarerie; he was no longer master of himself, as in the broad day light. The hand of the skiff grased lightly on the bank; and he rushed forward.

"Anna! Anne!" he exclaimed, when they found themselves alone. "Pardon me, Isabelle, I meant," continued he, falling at her feet in the chivalrous manner of the times.

"Well," said she, carried away by his manner, "Anne Breughel, if you will." It may be easily imagined that the young Isabelle, perhaps a little romantic, had secretly loved Teniers; that touched by his sorrow for Anna Breughel, she had undertaken the task of consoling him, coming by degrees, by means of those illusions, to take the place of his adored wife.

Three weeks afterwards, Teniers married the daughter of the counselor. He returned to the chateau, and took again to his old way of life. Isabelle de Fresne, charmed by the simplicity of his genius, and his noble manners, remained devoted to him till the time of her death. She knew that her greatest charm far him was that she reminded him of his first wife. Far from complaining or feeling vexed on that account, she took pains to acquire the habits of Anne Breughel, with the generous intention of pleasing her husband. Teniers, in his turn, delighted with having found so sweet a companion, loved her for her own and for Anne Breughel's sake.

The painter survived his second wife, and died at the age of upwards of eighty. After her death, he returned to Brussels again, and lived in strict retirement devoted to his art. One of his sons, a Franciscan monk at Malines, held him in his arms as he breathed his last; through the zeal of this son he had become more than ever attached to the Catholic Church. For the convent at Malines, he painted his "Nineteen Martyrs of Goroum." The son has left a biography of his father, interspersed with orisons and litanies; the only interesting portion is the end, in which he describes the death of the great painter.

Already in a state of unconsciousness, David Teniers only spoke at long intervals. In the middle of the night, after a painful sigh, he took the hand of his son with agitation: "See, you, yonder?—youde!" he exclaimed. He saw, no doubt, passing in his mind all the curious orentions of his pencil. The Franciscan looked in the direction which he indicated.

"I see nothing, father."

"Do you see," continued the painter, without heeding his reply, "the alchymist in that laboratory, meditating? He turns toward me to bid me farewell. Farewell, then! What did I say? It is a drinker—there are two—three—four—the odor of their ale rises to my head. O! the deep politicians! these are the men who transport our Flanders into Spain. The drunkards! it is merely that they may drink from glasses overflowing with Malaga. My son, stop that boor from smoking, who has nothing to say apropos. I hear his pipe snap. No; It is the violin of poor old Nicholas Soest. There is a fair, then, in Perck to-day. Open the window and let me hear their cries better. Excellent! how they dance under the balcony! Take care, Margaret! Look at that sly chemist. The old dotard! It is a good thing, indeed, to have grey hairs. I like your violin, Master Soest; but what are you playing there? O my son—my son!—look there! this is fearful indeed!"

The dying painter shuddered from head to foot, and passed his hands over his eyes. "Do you see that doleful dance?—all their mirth is gone now. Old Nicholas Soest is nothing but a skeleton. Look how he whirls in the dust—all hastening to the church-yard. They are gone! Farewell, farewell, my friends. Call my servants it is time to go!"

These were, as nearly as possible, the last words of the laborious painter of nature. In obedience to his wish, the son had his remains deposited in the choir of the church of Perck, under that tower which, in his pictures, stands forth against so many horizons.

Major General Wool, Senator Weller and lady, and two or three others, recently came very near being killed in California by the running away of the horses attached to a stage in which they were passengers. The stage was brought to a stand still. Just before reaching a precipice, by coming in contact with stumps. The driver was thrown twenty feet and had his collar bone broken.

KENTON'S ADVENTURES.

The adventures of Simon Kenton, in the autumn of 1778, afford us another glimpse of the scene of Boone's captivity, and of other Shawanese villages. Col John Bowman was then meditating an expedition against the Shawanese villages, particularly Chillicothe; (Oldtown Green county,) and Kenton, accompanied by Alexander Montgomery and George Clark, undertook to explore the whole route to Chillicothe, and the vicinity and position of the town. This was effectually done, and all risk would have been avoided if the three spies had not yielded to the temptation of running off a drove of horses which they found enclosed in a pound It was late at night, but the noise of the operation alarmed the Indians in the adjacent village. Kenton and his companions were pursued, and although they had reached the northern bank of the Ohio River with the stolen animals, yet, before its passage could be effected, they were overtaken, Montgomery killed, and Kenton made prisoner, Clark escaping.

The Indians were greatly exasperated at their captive, abusing him as a thief, a horse steal, a rescoal!" and he received no indulgence at their hands, except that he was not struck dead with a tomahawk. With his hands tied behind him and his feet lashed under the horse's belly, he was compelled to ride a restive colt through the thickets of the forest, while at night the prisoner was extended upon his back and closely bound to the earth in a painful posture. Arrived at Chillicothe, he ran the gauntlet, but as Kenton saw an Indian in the line with a drawn knife, ready to plunge it into his breast, he broke through the lines and ran towards the council-house with a crowd of several hundred at his heels. Just before reaching that refuge, he was thrown down by an Indian who was in his path, and terribly bruised by the blows of his pursuers. Immediately a council was held, and soon Kenton saw, from the manner of the speakers and auditors, that he was doomed to die When the rots was taken, those who were for his torture struck the war club, which was passed from hand to hand, violently on the ground, their number far exceeding those who simply passed the club to a neighbor in token of mercy. Then arose a debate upon the time and place of the tragedy, and it was resolved that he should be immediately taken to Wapetomika, (now Zanesfield, Logan county.) On his way thither, he passed through the Indian towns of Piqua, (now Boston, seven miles west of Springfield, Clark county,) and Machecheek, (now West Liberty, Logan county,) running the gauntlet at each town, and baffled at Machecheek in an attempt to escape.

Soon after his arrival at Wampatomika, Simon Girty came to see him, and soon discovered that Kenton had been his companion and friend at Fort Pitt and in Dunmore's expedition. McDonald thus describes the scene which ensued: "Girty threw himself into Kenton's arms, embraced and wept aloud over him—calling him his dear and esteemed friend. This hardened wretch, who had been the cause of the death of hundreds, had some of the sparks of humanity remaining in him, and wept like a child at the tragical fate which hung over his friend. "Well," said he to Kenton, "you are condemned to die, but I will use every means in my power to save your life."

Girty immediately had a council convened, and made a long speech to the Indians to save the life of the prisoner. As Girty was proceeding through his speech, he became very animated; and under his powerful eloquence, Kenton could plainly discover the grim visages of his savage judges relent. When Girty concluded his powerful and animated speech, the Indians rose with one simultaneous grunt of approbation, saved the prisoner's life, and placed him under the power and protection of his old companion, Girty.

The British had a trading post at Wapatomika, from which Girty provided Kanton with clothing, and also furnished him with a horse and gun. The two friends were constantly together, roaming the woods and passing from village to village. While they were at Solomon's town, a short distance from Wapatomika, a party of warriors returned to the latter place from an expedition against Wheeling, in which they had been defeated by the whites, with considerable loss; and demanded the life of Kenton. Another council was summoned, and Kenton was again sentenced to death, notwithstanding all the efforts and eloquence of Girty. The latter could only obtain a reprieve until the prisoner could be taken to Upper Sandusky, where the Indians were soon to assemble and receive their annuities and presents from the British agents. As the Indians passed from Wapatomika to Upper Sandusky, they reached a village upon the headwaters of Sciota, where Kenton for the first time beheld the celebrated Mingo chief, Logan, who walked gravely up to the place where Kenton stood, and the following short conversation ensued: "Well, young man, those young men seem very mad at you!" "Yes, sir, they certainly are." "Well, don't be disheartened, I am a great chief; you are to go to Sandusky; they speak of burning you there, but I will send two runners to-morrow to speak good for you." McClung adds that Logan's form was striking and manly, his countenance calm and noble, and he spoke the English language with fluency and correctness. Kenton's spirits instantly rose at the address of the benevolent chief, and he once more looked upon himself as providentially rescued from the stake.

On the following morning, two runners were dispatched to Sandusky, as the chief had promised, and until their return, Kenton was kindly treated, being permitted to spend much of his time with Logan, who conversed with him freely, and in the most friendly manner. In the evening the two runners returned and were closeted with Logan. Kenton felt the most burning anxiety to know what was the result of their mission, but Logan did not visit him again until next morning. He then walked up to him, accompanied by Kanton's guards, and giving him a piece of bread, told him that he was instantly to be conried to Saudusky; and without uttering another word, turned upon his heel and left him.

At Upper Sandusky, Kenton was finally rescued from a death of torture by the interposition of Peter Druyer, a Canadian Frenchman, who was a captain in the British service, and acted as Indian agent and interpreter. It was to this influential personage, probably, that Logan's message had been conveyed. He offered the Indiane one hundred dullars in rum and tobacco, if they would allow him to take Kenton to Detroit for examination by the British Governor, promising to return him when they should require. A slight additional remuneration, afterwards paid to the Indians, completed the ransom of Kenton, who accompanied Captain Druyer to Detroit, and about a year afterwards escaped and returned to Kentucky

FOR THE CURE OF
COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.
OF all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints, nothing has ever been found which could compare in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions. We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.
The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1847; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Art in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the CHERRY PECTORAL, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.
Read the following opinion, founded on the long experience of the eminent Physician of the Port and City of
ST. JOHNS, May 8, 1851.
Dr. J. C. AYER: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.
I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how a better remedy can be made for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.
J. J. DURTON, M. D., F. R. S.
See what it has done on a wasted constitution, not only in the following cases, but a thousand more:
SCHENCY, Jan. 24, 1851
DR. AYER: In the month of July last, I was attacked by a violent diarrhœa, in the mines of California. I returned to San Francisco, in hope of receiving benefit from a change of air and diet. My diarrhœa ceased, but was followed by a severe cough, and much soreness. I finally started for home, but received no benefit from the voyage. My cough continued to grow worse, and when I arrived in New York, I was at once marked by my acquaintances as a victim of consumption I must confess that I saw no sufficient reason to doubt what my friends all believed. At this time I commenced taking your truly invaluable medicine, with little expectation of deriving any benefit from its use. You would not receive these lines did I not regard it my duty to state to the afflicted, through you, that my health, in the space of eight months, is fully restored. I attribute it to the use of your CHERRY PECTORAL.
Yours truly,

THOS. C. BEAGG, A. M., Principal.
Assistant.
This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—a healthy location, we believe, as there is in all the South It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.
Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.
One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.
The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.
The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.
The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the Institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.
The Trustees and friends of the Institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.
D. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.
N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.
The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug6—6m26

MOSES AND GEOLOGY.

ARTICLE FOURTH.

In the preceding articles I have shown that the fossils of the inferior animals are found in the different formations of the earth long before the death of man. From this fact the inference is very strong, that they died before man fell. I state the fact only as a probable inference. On moral questions we are not to expect the clearness and certainty of mathematical demonstration. He who expects and demands this must, in the very nature of things, become sceptical. For, it is in the nature of almost every moral problem, that our conclusions are to be drawn from probabilities, and not from inevitable certainties.

From the scriptural account of the fall and of the death of man, as commonly understood, we should hardly expect to find any antediluvian fossils of the human race, while we might expect the fossils of the inferior animals in abundance. Adam, the first man, lived 930 years from the fall and 726 years before the flood. Methusalah was born 243 years before the death of Adam, and died in the year 1656; the very year of the flood. Now here are two men who lived as cotemporaries for 243 years, and yet their united lives link together the periods of the fall and of the deluge. There were, then, but two generations of man from the fall to the flood, and as these generations started from a single pair the number of deaths could not have been very numerous. Add to this, that the place of man's primitive abode is unknown; but let us suppose that it was in Asia, as is commonly believed, even then it would be almost a hopeless task to hunt for a few fossils of men numbering but two generations, starting off from a single pair and scattered over a continent measuring over seventeen millions of square miles. On the other hand, the inferior animals were formed abundantly in all the seas and in all the earth; they multiplied more rapidly than man; most, if not all of them died sooner than man; and hence we might expect to find their fossils earlier and more abundantly than man's, and this is precisely what we do find. Now, if it could be shown, upon any plausible hypothesis, that the vast formations, that we have noticed, were deposited within the short period of 1656 years, it might be that death was not in the world before the fall. But as we have shown that it was improbable, it follows, to a moral certainty, that death was in the world before the fall.

When the geologist finds a fossil or the organic remains of an animal, he takes it to the zoologist, who determines its genus and species; and, moreover, from its organization its habits may be pretty certainly ascertained. In this way it has been determined that carnivorous animals were amongst the first creations of vertebral entities. From the fact of such organizations it is confidently inferred that some animals were predatory—preying upon the weak and the helpless from the first; and, therefore, that death was in the world from the beginning of animal life. The air we breathe, the water we drink, the earth we tread on, are all teeming with life, so that in breathing, in drinking, in walking, multitudes must have been crushed.

In this position I do not intend to ignore nor negate the great fact announced in the scriptures, of "death by sin." As "all things were created by him (Christ) and for him," —as a special theatre on which to exhibit his scheme of redemption, so I suppose, that the world was arranged—preconditioned in reference to man's apostacy. The one fact is analogous to the other by contrast.

It is a philosophical fact, every where indicated, that there is a tendency in the particles of all organized matter to seek their primitive elementary condition. The sentence pronounced upon Adam, for his disobedience, seems predicated upon the known and acknowledged existence of this broad, universal fact. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Now mark: The reason assigned for his returning to dust is that he is formed of the dust. That he is taken out of the ground. This tendency to decay and death had been, hitherto, counteracted by his access to the tree of life. And, even, after the fall, he would not have died, but that he was denied access to this tree. Is there any doubt upon the question? Let the scriptures settle it: "And the Lord God said, behold the man has become as one of us, to know good and evil. And now lest he put forth his hand, and take of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever, therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken." Here it is plainly stated, that man might have perpetuated his existence by eating of the tree of life, and to prevent this he was removed.

We conclude, therefore, that death is not the result of any change in man's physical organization since the fall, but, simply, in his being cut off from that tree, by whose sustaining virtues his life might have been perpetuated. This conclusion is strengthened, further, by the facts and consequences of the laws of gravitation. We know that the heavenly bodies are held in their orbits, partly, by the forces of gravity. It is not probable that the laws, affecting all the systems within the reach of our telescopes, were changed because of sin on this inferior planet. And, moreover, but for the force of gravity in our earth, the timbers loosened from their roots, and the stones, yea, even the bodies of men and of beasts would have been carried away to other systems, or, at least, they would have held to the earth or have left it as some other force may have operated upon them; and, hence, to keep these in place, the laws of gravitation being in force. Now, the laws of gravitation were in force, projectiles cast into the air would have fallen to the earth. The human body coming in contact with these projectiles and with falling timbers must have been crushed, but for some counteracting provision—the life preserver just named. How this was done we knew not. But we do know that the life is not material. The body when formed of the dust was dead and inanimate. It was the breath of God in his nostrils that gave life. The body then is but the vehicle—the house in which the life dwells. The scriptures so regard it, calling it "this earthly house of our tabernacle." Now a house may be formed of very frail materials, as of thin glass, so that a very slight force would crush it, or by the improved arts of the present age it might be of iron, so that no force, of which man is master, could damage it. The child, we know, is destroyed by a force that would be scarce felt by a grown man. This may be analogous to the human body now and then. The tree of life may have imparted such strength, as that the falling tree should have been as harmless as the falling leaf or straw is now. Or, it may have imparted to the human body the property of elasticity, like that possessed by the atmospheric air, so that no wound or scar could be made upon it. However this may have been, it is matter of gratulation to the Christian to know, that while science makes known the fact that man, even, in his primitive abode, could not have existed without extraneous assistance, religion, even before the disclosures of science are made, reveals that assistance afforded. Thus, science, when she has travelled to the outer boundaries of her province, stops and gazes reverently into the face of her clearer-visioned sister, to see what further truths and lights she brings from afar.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

Notes taken of a Sermon, preached by Dr. Winans, Tuesday Morning, 14th November, 1854, before the Mississippi Conf. in Jackson, La.

TEXT: Isa. LXI: 1-2-3.—The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound;

2. To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn;

3. To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called Trees of righteousness, The planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified.

The prophet personates Christ in these words. He administers the Church—is the head of it. In him dwells all the fullness of qualification for the ministry, the power and the authority. Instruments and agencies, human, he employs in the dispensation of the gospel. He has his ministers under him—appoints and qualifies them, coworks and accompanies them. I pass to consider them—their authority, qualification and service. In Christ, as here set forth, they have their great exemplar.

I. Authority of Christian Ministers: The ministry is Christ's. He is the Minister of the New Testament—the Great Preacher. To Him only pertains the right to call men to share it. The Church cannot make a minister—the papacy cannot, the episcopacy cannot, the congregation cannot. They can only recognise the call of God. The ordination ceremony means no more. When that venerable man (pointing to the Bishop) imposes his hands, saying—"Take thou authority, &c.," the previously conferred authority of Christ has been ascertained as far as possible and is thereby acknowledged. This is proper, and for order and edification, to guard the pulpit and certify the world—but authority lies back of this—is divine.

It it be asked, "How is this call made?" I answer, by and from God. His Holy Spirit makes it known to him that is called. Whether by impression or revelation, the fact is established between Him and His instrument. The duty is made so plain—the duty of preaching the gospel—as to bind the conscience.

That God should do so, is to do no unusual thing. It is to employ no unusual method. Does He not communicate by His Spirit with every converted soul? Does He not by His Spirit assure every heir of heaven of an interest in the Redeemer's blood? It is no more fanatical to hold the one than the other—to profess a call of God to the ministry, than conversion. If it can be depended upon for the convert it can be depended upon for the preacher. It is the same God working in all. It is the same Spirit. There are, who demand for a call to the ministry something more definite, more palpable, more tangible, less open to mistake and delusion; as though the Christian world were not thrown upon this same evidence and method of divine communication, in every instance of the new-birth!

The suggestion of pride is held when that of delusion is abandoned—"It looks like presumption," say some, "that any creature should claim to have been singled out and this high honor put on him, by God." It would be a far greater reach of presumption for any creature to step forward, of his own motion, and volunteer to assume the awful responsibilities of the ministry. To be found in this position without a divine warrant, to undertake this ambassadorship without authority, might well make any man tremble. The charge of pride and presumption justly lies in the other direction.

II. Their qualification: I distinguish here between the incidental and the essential. The incidental qualifications are many, and more or less valuable. Learning is good: eloquence is good: personal address is good—these all may not be despised. But these and more, do not, and never did, and never can qualify for the ministry. There is one essential qualification and only one—the unction of the Holy Ghost. The man who is called of God and has this, is qualified if he does not know a letter in the alphabet. He can preach then and ought to preach. He has his commission and his outfit from head-quarters. Let him go and preach the gospel to every creature. God is with him and his word will be in power.

That God should call one to preach, without qualifying him, is without scripture precedent, without reason and against the analogy of his dealings. That His call should be acknowledged and His qualification not acknowledged is inconsistent. That one whom He has both called and qualified should be considered unfit for the ministry, is an impiety bordering on blasphemy.

We are in danger of confounding the essential and the incidental qualifications of the ministry—of counting those fit who have only the latter, and those unfit who have only the former. This is delicate and all important. The Church durst not prescribe any other essential qualification than "The Spirit of the Lord God." She has no right in any of her capacities, Council, Conference, Synod or College, to lay down any other condition as indispensable. The gift of God is not to be ignored, because other tests are not fulfilled—tests of profane or sacred literature, or science. These she can recommend, provide and facilitate, but not require. Our jealousy for an able ministry, a pure ministry, a powerful ministry, a ministry for the times, should not draw us away from the great truth. God is ever and anon rebuking those who do forget it, in passing by ministers who are the work of men's hands and putting honor on those whose learning is in one book—the Bible, and their qualification in one thing—the Unction of the Holy One. This is the harm likely to come of theological institutions, as such, and makes me deprecate them in the Methodist Church. The human, the scholastic, the incidental surroundings and trappings become unduly rated. Those are forbidden whom God has sent, and others sent whom He has not bidden. In defiance of these tests that have been, in some cases, insisted on as essential to the ministerial office, God has continued to call men who are not agreeable to them and to work by men who have not submitted to them.

This policy and the reason of it is found in this and similar Scriptures: "That the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us." The philosophy of it is illustrated by abundant analogy. From the masses instruments are taken to move them, instruct them and work out their moral and social elevation. Not those lifted up in birth and isolated by education—at a distance, a cold remove; but men who are in sympathy, who approach them understandingly; whose relative position commands the best approaches on every side and subject. Beyond the Church and outside of the ministry, we behold the strong captains, the controlling minds, Napoleon-like, taken from among the people.

Among the first eighteen evangelists and apostles we find but two who, according to their own confession, were not "ignorant and unlearned men." Thus was this ministry begun, which turned the whole world upside down. In this proportion originally stood the essential and the incidental. Yet in the life-time of a man, the gospel was made known and the Church planted throughout the then known world. Acting upon the same principle has the Methodist Church developed a ministry for the times, a ministry that under God has been instrumental in the revival of religion in the last century: that has kept pace with the rapid and overwhelming expansion of our country, and furnished it with the Gospel and ordinances of Christianity in advance of others; and though its centenary year has barely passed, is now the largest denomination in America, and the largest non-conforming body in England; in the old world is spreading, and in this, planted from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Mr. Wesley was, in the beginning, under the prejudice of education on this point. He shrunk from allowing any man to exercise the ministry, however holy and heaven endowed, unless he had taken a College course, passed a University examination and studied didactic and polemic theology, as prescribed. The case of a lay-brother came before him—an unlearned man, but a good and sound man, called of God and qualified by God to preach. Wesley was on the point of forbidding him—holding the essential in abeyance to the incidental. But a wise and godly mother—God be thanked for such mothers—discerned better. It was the crisis of the revival of holiness then kindling. It was the birth time of Methodism. She said, "John, that man is as much called of God to preach as you are."

Am I, then, the advocate of ignorance in the ministry? Do I shield sloth, and laziness, and mental torpor and dwarfishness? Not at all. The minister ought to labor for correct knowledge and enlarged mental culture. Never be unemployed, never trifingly employed. Indolence is inexcusable. He should give diligence to study, to observation, reflection; whatever might invigorate his mind, quicken his perception or rectify his taste. At every stage of his ministry, even when he is old, he should be learning and improving. The whole plan of ministerial education is hinted in St. Paul to Timothy: "Give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine.... Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed," I take it, that Timothy was a young convert, put into the ministry by Paul on a very small stock of experience or knowledge. His reading and exhortation proceeded together. The ministry was his school, as the itinerant ministry is eminently fitted to be. Preach as you learn and learn as you preach. Many have felt themselves the worse for the isolated studies of the theologian on professed preparation. Delayed on entering upon their great and pressing work, they have been poorly compensated for it, in the lumber of doubtful lore and the morbid habits of thought and feeling, and the impracticable views of men and things, they have acquired. By the confession of some they have had to unlearn much that was got in the cloister and the lecture room, and begin afresh, taking object-lessons from men as they are and the world as it is. Lectures and readings on pastoral theology have not made them pastors. And some of their dearly bought errors are never got rid of. But not so the learner who is preaching and the preacher who is learning. Duty is being fulfilled, not postponed to a fitter season. Grace is used as given. Every step in knowledge is practical and need not be taken backward: every acquisition to the point: every moulding of mind, character and habit to the work. He is doing good while getting ready to do greater good. No lesson is learned to be unlearned, but is useful then and ever after.

I have heard it and have no reason to doubt it, that when John Brown, the Irish preacher, applied to the Methodist Conference for license, that, to use his own language, "He did not know B from bull's foot; but one thing he did know—Jesus, as Savior." When they were about to refuse, he besought, saying: "But I do know that Jesus died for sinners, Oh! let me go and preach that." In seven years he was one of the most useful ministers in the Conference and one of the most learned too. So it is in the actual ministry; there is not only felt need for study but opportunity. Redeeming the time, those who begin ignorant need not remain so. The ministry is not elevated when put among the exclusive and learned professions. They mistake its nature, ignore its power, dishonor God, injure the Church and imperil souls, who so hedge it about and restrain its outgoings. Notwithstanding, it is no place for sluggards. Old men should learn. Even a Bishop should be learning.

III. Their Service: The Lord hath anointed them—"To preach good tidings unto the meek." The word meek may be rendered poor. Jesus, as reported by Luke the evangelist, quoting this passage, in its application: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor." He puts the climax upon the identification of his ministry to the inquiring Baptist, by "The poor have the gospel preached unto them." If you are called, by way of reproach, the Church of the poor, the ministry of the poor, happy are ye. It is good, Christian reproach. You are in a safe line of precedents; succession, if you please. The Son of God has magnified your office. Let this be your boasting, in the Lord, and take care that it be true of you. To these you are sent, sent on a gracious business, "to preach good tidings." Carrying out this general mission involves several specialities, touching the heart and appealing to its best sympathies:

(1.) "To bind up the broken-hearted:" O, blessed surgery! Nothing in earth or heaven like it. An angel might envy this office, and desire to fulfil it. To the sin-sick, the alarmed, the condemned soul, the gospel of reconciliation is brought; the free offer of pardon and life: a present and full salvation, in Jesus' name.

(2.) "To proclaim liberty to the captives:" A reference to the Jubilee year. How grateful to be the bearer of such news, to play the jubilant herald! Both light and liberty; unbinding and enlarging; "Opening of the prison:" The gloom of the dungeon! The slavish chains! Is it any wonder that the liberated prisoner, going forth, should shout praises and give glory?

(3.) "To comfort all that mourn:" Inspiring them with hope. Reminding of the exceeding great and precious promises. So large a space, in divine ministration, to this tender and pitying work is assigned, that "Comforter" is the name assumed to a person of the Trinity. Above hope, greater than pardon, is the boon. The bounty of heaven is not satisfied in mere relief. It adds: Beauty for ashes! The oil of joy for mourning! The garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness! These are the services to be rendered by that ministry which Jesus appoints; of which he is the head and exemplar.

(4.) The propitious dispensation for the accomplishment of all this—the season of grace—

"To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord:" This time is now upon us.

(5) "And the day of vengeance of our God:" That too will come. As surely as mercy has her reign, will justice have here. God's truth will be vindicated. They dishonor Him who decline the proclamation of the day of vengeance with the propitious year. Both are his. A system of judgments backs up the system of grace. Mercy is first offered and rejected: long suffering and patience, entreaty and persuasion, are exhausted. Then the day of vengeance dawns upon the finally impenitent. See the prevailing goodness of God, not only in their order but continuance. The acceptable year: The day of vengeance. For a year the propitious season lasts; long drawn out. For a day vengeance rules.

(6.) The end of all and the sum of all is one. This done in such a manner and will result in such a way—

"That He might be glorified:" Nothing to the prejudice, every thing to the promotion of God's glory. Here the various lines of this glorious dispensation meet. To this every act of the various service is gathered, exalted. What of dignity and worth they lacked in themselves, is supplied here. Below this lofty range the eye of the minister must never fall. This single and steady view will at once guide and sustain. Duty done, nothing is lost. The ministry finished, God will be as truly glorified in the condign punishment of those who believe not, as in the shouts and hallelujahs that make the arches of heaven ring. To Him be glory for ever. Amen.

ROME TO BE BURNT OR SWALLOWED UP.—Dr. Cumming, in his "Apocalyptic Sketches," and many other authors, have asserted, as their interpretation of some parts of the Apocalypse, that Rome will be destroyed by fire from Heaven, or swallowed up by earthquakes, or overwhelmed with destruction by volcanoes, as the visible punishment of the Almighty for its Popery and its crimes. Townsend, in his "Journal of a Tour," says he is unwilling to deduce any argument of this kind from the prophecies which are unfulfilled; but he beheld everywhere, in Rome, near Rome, and through the whole country of Italy from Rome to Naples, the most astounding proofs, not merely of the possibility, but the exceeding probability, that the whole region of Central Italy will one day suffer under such a catastrophe. The soil of Rome is tufa, of a volcanic origin; the smell of sulphur, which is found to be most disagreeable, must be the result of volcanic subterranean action still going on. At Naples, the boiling sulphur is seen bubbling near the surface of the earth. When a stick was drawn along the ground, the sulphureous smoke followed the indentations; and Mr. Townsend says it would never surprise him to hear of the utter destruction of the entire peninsula of Italy.

The young and beautiful widow of the old Marshal St. Arnaud, on visiting the corpse for the last time, on seeing blood issuing from his nose was struck with the idea that he was not yet dead, and he said to have fainted, but from what feeling is not stated.

AN IRISHMAN'S WILL.—"I will and bequeath my beloved wife Bridget, all my property without reserve; and to my oldest son Patrick, one half of the remainder; and to Dennis, my youngest son, the rest. If any thing is left it may go to Terence McCarty.

BARNUM ON LOTTERIES.

In the course of his forthcoming life, Barnum gives an interesting and instructive sketch of his lottery experience. It ought to open the eyes of the "green ones." With another party, Mr. B. determined to go into the lottery business. Preparatory to this, he visited New York for the purpose of getting information on the subject. He says:

"Our visit to the New York lottery managers greatly enlightened me in regard to the profits of that line of business. I had been in the habit of selling tickets for Washington Yals, the editor and printer in Danbury, and also for O. W. Sherwood and his cousin Samuel of Bridgeport, for a commission of 10 to 15 per cent.; but in my interviews with Mr. Gregory, I learned that the managers, taking to themselves the 15 per cent. deducted on all prizes, furnished tickets to their agents at what was called "scheme price," which allowed the agents from 25 to 30 per cent. profit. The lotteries being drawn by combination numbers, the public generally had no knowledge whatever of the number of tickets in a lottery. The managers, therefore, made the prizes amount to less than the retail price of tickets by 25 or 30 per cent. This extra per centage was a shave additional to the fifteen per cent allowed in old-fashioned lotteries. I also learned that the process of arriving at the number of tickets in a lottery is this: Multiply the three highest combination numbers and divide by six; the quotient is the number of tickets.

I am continually annoyed, even at this late date, by lottery schemes sent by various agents at the South, where lotteries are still legal. I received one yesterday from a lottery firm in Baltimore. One of their schemes is as follows. My object in inserting it will, I trust, be appreciated: (We leave out the scheme referred to.)

It will be observed that there are seventy-eight combination numbers in this lottery. The number of tickets, as I have remarked, is determined by multiplying together the three highest combination numbers, 76, 77 and 78, and dividing by 6, which gives 76,076 tickets.

This number of tickets, at $10 each, amounts to	$760,760 00
Whereas, the prizes amount to no more than	570,570 00
Leaving a Profit of	$190,190 00
Add 15 per cent. deducted from $570,570 00, the aggregate of prizes	85,585 50
Making the entire profits on a single lottery	$275,775 50

In the above lottery the agent procures his tickets at $7 50 each. The whole number of tickets, multiplied by this price, amounts exactly to the sum set apart for prizes, $570,570; and the manager gets 15 per cent. drawback, or $85,585 50.

Thousands of persons are at this day squandering in lottery tickets and lottery policies the money which their families need. If this expose shall have the effect of curing their ruinous infatuation, I, for one, shall not be sorry.

After learning the profitable basis of the foregoing facts, I went to our Connecticut lottery managers, and from that time obtained my tickets directly from them at "the scheme price." In my turn I established agents all through the country, and my profits were immense. I sold from five hundred to two thousand dollars' worth of tickets per day.

On one occasion I sold a package of tickets to my aunt Laura Nicholas and a neighbor of hers, for $25. Before the lottery was drawn the neighbor sickened of her bargain and begged me to take the tickets back and my aunt consented. When the mail brought the drawn numbers from Hartford I had the package of tickets on hand. Not desiring to risk that amount of money, I induced eight of my customers to join me in the purchase of the package. We then opened the letter containing the drawn numbers, and found that we had drawn a quarter of the highest prize of $15,000. This result gave myself and eight others a profit of $850 each.

The fact was duly announced and my aunt never ceased to blame her timid neighbor, nor to lament her own ill fortune. The great luck of drawing the highest prize spread like wild-fire, as news in such cases, and the country for miles around was lottery crazy. Our sales increased immensely.

Fully appreciating the power of the press (to which more than to any other one cause I am indebted for my success in life,) I did not fail to invoke the aid of "printers' ink." I issued handbills, circulars, etc., by tens of thousands, with striking prefixes, affixes, staring capitals, marks of wonder, pictures, etc. The newspapers throughout the region teemed with unique advertisements. Immense gold signs and placards in inks and papers of all colors, covered my lottery office. As the curious letters of "Joe Strickland" were highly popular at that time, I advertised my office as being under the special favor and protection of "Dr. Pete Strickland," own blood cousin to the renowned Joe Strickland, etc. In bills and advertisements I rung all possible changes upon the renowned name. "The ever lucky Dr. Strickland." "Five more capital prizes sold by Dr. Strickland!" "A fortune for a dollar—apply to fortune's favorite, Dr. Strickland. Another mammoth prize!—hurra for Dr. Strickland, etc., etc." Home-made poetry was also frequently brought into requisition to set forth the inducements for patronising my office. Customers who brought their tickets and found them blanks, were told that their only wise plan was to "look for their money where they lost it;" "it was a long lane that never turned;" "such bad luck could not continue long," etc., etc.

The lucky drawers of the high prize before mentioned gave an oyster supper at my mother's tavern to about sixty persons (whom I invited, knowing them to be good ticket customers) and after the supper was finished, I counted out the prize money to the elated holders of the fortunate ticket. This so exalted our guests, that a package of tickets, amounting to $1000, was forthwith sealed up and bought by fifty subscribers on the spot at $20 each.

Selling so many tickets as I did, a prize of $1000 or $2000, and numerous smaller ones, must occasionally turn up. These being duly trumpeted, rendered mine the "lucky office" in the estimation of many. I received orders from distant parts of the country by mail, and sent out tickets on commission by post-riders and others. Among my "private customers" were a number of clergymen and deacons; and occasionally some of the weak brothers of the "Shakers," who came to Bethel to sell garden-seeds, bought a few lottery tickets "on the sly."

Whenever I visited Brookfield I called on one man who was of a serious turn. His aunt his wife were professors of religion, and he was a frequent exhorter at prayer-meetings. He always managed to buy a ticket or two from me, under the strictest injunction never to divulge the fact to his wife. I usually dined with him, and when he was busy looking after my horse, or otherwise engaged out of doors, I never failed to sell a ticket to his wife, who begged me to be very careful not to let her husband have any suspicion of it, for he was opposed to such things, and would never forgive her if he should know there was a lottery ticket in the house.

A genuine "Down Easter" was lately essaying to appropriate a square of exceedingly "tough beef" at dinner, in a Wisconsin hotel. His convulsive efforts with a knife and fork attracted the attention and smiles of the rest of the company, who were in the same predicament as himself. At last "Jonathan's" patience vanished under ill-success, when laying down his "utensils," he burst out with, "Strangers, you needn't laff—if you hain't got no regard for the landlord's feelings, you orter have some respect for the old bull!" This sally "brought down the house."

AN UNGALLANT MAN.—An advocate having lately gained a suit for a poor young lady, she remarked, "I have nothing to pay you with but my heart." "Hand it over to the clerk, if you please, I wish no fee for myself," replied he.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9.

Getting Under Way.—The Nashville Advocate (30th ult.) says:

"The workmen are progressing rapidly in fitting up the Publishing House. We but recently got possession of the premises. No time will be lost in preparing the building for the reception of the machinery. All hands are doing their utmost."

So the wheels will soon be turning round. There is need of patience and reasons enough for exercising it. The world was not made in a day. Our Book Agents have embarrassments many and peculiar, and not of their own creating. To judge their operations by houses long established, would be unfair. Their available funds are not as great as is generally supposed. Besides, they stand in the anomalous and annoying condition of manufacturers whose business is built up before their factories. On the day of their appointment there was a large demand for what was to be supplied by them. Naturally enough, some crowding. Considering that they have to take a ground start, and arrange not temporarily but for the future, our Agents may be allowed to hasten slowly. We are confident they will do the very best under the circumstances in making us books.

Help for Corpus Christi.—A good lady, we will not say old, though she wears spectacles—called on Monday morning, a week ago. It was evident a kind thing was about to be done. Feeling for her purse—"Here, I want you to send this ($5) to the preacher that has such a hard time, and his dear good wife that shares it with him." She is in the habit of reading the Advocate all through, beginning Saturday when the carrier serves it, and sticking a pin or making a pencil mark where interrupted. Reading on in this style she came to the letter of our friend Lafferty, Sunday evening, and as doing good is worship she vowed five dollars, on the spot.

This week another good commission fell to our lot. J. W. B., of W. Miss., under date 29th ult., says:

"Below please find $10, for Mr. Lafferty. I should be glad to quadruple it, but that I am a good deal diffused similarly. I hope you will be able to send him some considerable amount of money."

Really, that is just what we should like to do. Corpus Christi is very suggestive of sacrifice to Christians and of doing good, even at the cost of self-denial.

Revival.—In an article on the Revival System, the Banner of the Cross (Episcopal) remarks:

"We have thus endeavored to show that, without distorting the doctrine of the Church, or making any innovations upon her well approved customs of administration, we have at our disposal all that is good in the revival system, provided we have faith enough and courage enough to use it. We do not pretend to say that we can, within a few years, supersede the popular system, or that we can attain to great numerical results. But we do affirm our conviction that by a wise expenditure of our energies at certain times and seasons, according to the Church calendar and to the urgency of circumstances; by cultivating a style of preaching, grave but earnest, solid but simple; by firing pocket-pistols as we pass about on week days, as well as big guns on Sundays; and by distinctly teaching men that they must believe and be baptised; by faithfully carrying out these principles, we shall steadily gain upon the system of man's device, and in due time outstrip it. We may make Canons, alter externals, overhaul our machinery and clip the Liturgy; but all will not suffice. To be more useful, we must be more abundant in labor, more evangelical in doctrine, more importunate in entreaty, and more sacramental in practice."

Franklin, La.—The Banner of the 30th ult. says of the opening of the Methodist Church, Rev. A. Cravens, pastor:—

"The regular services of the Church, which were suspended in consequence of the epidemic, were resumed on Sunday last, and will continue as usual. As some might attribute the suspension of divine worship to the absence of the pastor, we will state in this connection that such was not the case. He was here throughout the epidemic, administering, both spiritually and bodily, as circumstances permitted, to the sick and dying, and the Church was opened as long as there were persons to attend, which did not last long after the appearance of the disease. Those who remained here and were yet in health, deemed it a paramount duty to attend to the sick over every other consideration."

Morgan's Depot.—The advertisement of Mr. Morgan's Literary Depot will show our readers where they can find the new, rare, light and heavy, in shape of books and pamphlets.

A WORK ON CHURCH BUILDING.

Somebody that can do it ought to furnish a manual on Church architecture; a plain book, with plain type, cuts and directions. Looking about us, there is not one church (building) to be counted in ten, but what, on inquiring into its history, turns out a botch or a cheat. This especially is the case, where their cost or design was at all ambitious or liberal.

"What did the house cost we worshipped in to-day?" "Well," replies the deacon or steward or elder, "it was intended to cost $10,000, but first and last it has not cost less than $14,000." This is common and there is a dead debt of the extra thousands. Ask how it came about, and one is struck with the similarity of explanations every where. They began at a guess. They had the plan in their heads and when it came to be worked many things were discovered wanting—had to be supplied, and all cost something. Parts had to be altered or pulled down, or now stand a rebuke to the building committee as long as time lasts, and a blot upon the building.

The builder and architect are different persons, but often merged in church building. Contractors work to their own advantage. The Church works in debt to their disadvantage. The committees send here and there for models to go by, and specifications. Or, they put their own heads together and produce them.

In towns, villages and country are expensive churches that are frights in their way. No beauty, taste, design, outside. Badly arranged and comfortless inside. All sorts of sizes, styles and mixtures of styles.

The cost is an item all will appreciate. A book is needed with models and specifications annexed, from which to choose, and knowing the price of materials in the neighborhood, the expense may be pretty accurately estimated beforehand.

The comfort is something. A pulpit well made and modeled costs no more than one elaborately wrong. A pew or bench of right height from floor, back suitably elevated and inclined, costs no more than one on which pains are spent to make it painful. Aisles and windows well arranged for light and air and passage, are worth the forethought.

But each society goes about "our church" in "our way," and sees the mistakes afterwards. They literally rise up to build, without knowing exactly what. For want of better models their errors are copied by neighbors.

Appearances and taste in these matters may not be despised. On this point a contemporary expresses sound views:

"It may be proper for people who dwell in log-cabins in a new and uncultivated country, where they have just planted themselves, to erect a rude edifice of logs for a "House of Prayer." And God may consecrate and honor that structure by his presence, as he did the ground on which Jacob set up a pillar, and make it 'the House of God and the Gate of Heaven.' But when that people, by the blessing of God, have converted the howling wilderness into the fruitful garden, and erected spacious dwellings for their families, and filled them with many of the works of art, which gratify the eye, and contribute to the comforts of life—does it become them to assemble for the worship of God in the old rude edifice, whose unsightly walls and seats and pulpit stand out in strange contrast with their private residences? We think not. It appears to us that the style and taste and neatness of the 'House of God' should be such as to correspond with their dwellings, and that there should be nothing in the structure or appearance of the sanctuary to offend good taste or associate religion with rustiority and ignorance—and nothing, on the other hand, to attract the admiring gaze of fools by the display of mere ornamental finery."

Will not some publisher, enjoying the services of practical architects and artists, put forth a volume of a hundred pages, 8 vo, with patterns for towers and steeples, foundations, groundwork, roof and cornices, galleries and winding-stairs, and all the arrangements, furniture and finishings within. Let the plans be numerous—say a hundred—of various styles, materials, sizes and costs. We are sure such a volume would sell. It would be a benefit.

The following preamble and resolutions were prepared and, for some days before adjournment, ready to be offered to the General Conference at Columbus; but the pressure of business prevented. Introduced, we have no doubt they would have received favorable consideration. We here put them to the vote of the public:—

Whereas, The demand for Houses of Public Worship within our bounds is very great, and constantly growing; and whereas, the want of some suitable guide for planning and making estimates of costs, selecting materials and making contracts, is constantly exposing our members and friends to great losses, mismanagement, imposition, and inferior models of edifices: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Book Agents be and they are hereby authorized and required to obtain a number of plans of comfortable and commodious church edifices, suitable for cities, villages and rural districts, with all the estimates of cost for building, drawings of plans and other necessary parts of such a work; and publish the same at their earliest convenience.

Resolved, That upon the publication of said work on Church Architecture, our Brethren in charge of the Pastoral work and members of the Church generally, are earnestly requested to avail themselves of the use of said work whenever they design erecting a house for the purpose of Divine worship.

H. N. McTYEIRE,

Wreck on Lake Erie.—The steamer May Flower went ashore at Point au Pelee, on Friday night the 24th ult. The passengers were all saved by the steamer Ocean. On the night of the 26th a violent gale prevailed on the Lake, and it was reported that the May Flower had gone entirely to pieces.

PRESBYTERIAN CENTRALIZATION IN NEW ORLEANS.

The Old School Presbyterians of the South West are moving towards the establishment of an Executive Board of Missions for the Southwestern States, to be located at New Orleans. They have already, by interesting the surrounding States and country, and subscriptions at home, secured an eligible depository for the South West, at which is to be furnished their Catalogue of Church Publications, in connection with the Parent Board in Philadelphia. This house is situated on Camp st., and cost $33,000. A good point.

The Executive Committee of Missions, which our friends have in view here, is also in connection with the Parent Board in Philadelphia. Nine years since the General Assembly established such a Committee in Louisville, Ky., and in the partition of territory following this action, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana were assigned to the Western Committee. But it is found that this centre of operation is not the most suitable. The Synod of Mississippi, just held in Canton, Miss., has joined that of Alabama, in an overture to the General Assembly, favoring this object.

The Committee reported the following, which was adopted:

"The Committee have held under consideration the communication from the Synod of Alabama, respecting the appointment of an Executive Committee of the Board of Missions for the Southwestern States, which Committee is to be located at New Orleans, and recommend to the Synod the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, 1st. That we approve of the appointment of such a Committee, with powers similar to that exercised by the Committee at Louisville, Ky., and to embrace within its field of agency the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas.

"2d. That we humbly petition the General Assembly, which holds its next meeting at Nashville, in May, 1855, to take this subject under consideration, and if, in their wisdom, they judge it to be for the welfare of the Church and the glory of God, that such Committee be established, that the Assembly do then and there, in the fear of God and reliance on his help, appoint such Committee. All of which is respectfully submitted."

DAVY CROCKETT'S FAMILY.

The Hickman (Ky.) Argus says that the wife and daughter of the distinguished patriot and eccentric genius, David Crockett, passed through Hickman, last week, on their way to Texas, to get possession of a portion of the land donated by the State of Texas to the heirs of those who fell at the battle of the Alamo, during the struggle for independence.

The biographies of Davy Crockett—the almanacs with pictures of hunters and animals, wild cats and panthers—wore charming reading for our boyhood. Crockett, drinking water out of the Mississippi (he scorned any thing smaller), or poking his knife under a bear's ribs, or telling Congress-jokes at a house-raising was better than Arabian nights for Young American entertainment. We begun to take Davy Crockett for a myth—an impersonation of the broad, strong, honest, energetic, self-reliant, Western character, and Ben Hardin as his "poor Richard." We had never seen any body that had seen him—the identical man.

In this uncertainty came our appointment in January, 1849, by Bishop Paine, to New Orleans. On the way we learned that a son of Davy Crocket was one of the official members of the Church! At the railroad he met us in person to give welcome and conduct us to his house for a home, till the parsonage could be fitted up. And a home it was. But what a contrast in the actual man to the one we had pictured! Small of stature, but lithe and well knit; light thin, hair; pleasant features; a playful mouth. In material, fine grained. In manners, easy and genteel, without effort. The only wild-cat realization was the keen grey eyes, wide apart, that wept at all that was tender and pitcous and touching, laughed in joy, and flashed fiercely under indignant excitement. Such was our first acquaintance in New Orleans; such one of the stewards and class-leaders and superintendent of the Sabbath School, and ready for every other good work. A good name too—John Wesley Crockett. The veritable son of Davy.

In his parlor hung a portrait of his father, taken by a master hand. There were the strong features, the marked character. The attitude was not chosen as seen in Cook's gallery—dressed in hunting shirt, surrounded by hounds and horns, rifle in hand, bowie at the belt and a cap of coonskin. It was subdued into civilization, for it was painted after Davy had been to Congress. There is no portrait in the land we would rather be in possession of.

Finding that Davy Crocket was a fact, we inquired if those tales of his doings and sayings were also facts. Here we ran too eagerly upon a tender point. The son was sensitive about those caricatures that made his father the type of the Western frontiersman; they had been pamphletted and circulated to the old gentleman's annoyance in his life time. He had marked traits and in that direction; but they had been exaggerated in catering to public taste. As to panthers and wild-cats and camp hunts—that was in the main true, as he, a younger son, had had killed some himself. But Davy Crockett, though entering public life under the great and usual disadvantages resulting from a lack of early education in the West, was shrewd and observing and had a sense of propriety. Even before going to Congress he was the counsellor of his neighbors, wrote their wills and did such matters; and read his family Bible on Sundays.

But the ruling passion led him on to death. The country got too thick settled. The old man longed for the freshness of adventure, and at the Alamo he found more than he bargained for. Attached to the watch chain of the son, we often remarked a treasure. It was a seal cut from the flint of the old hero's Alamo musket. The love of bold adventure runs in the blood. In the first expedition of Lopez against Cuba, the Cardenas bullets fell fast and thick around the feet of a grand-son of Davy. He ran away from his father's in this city to join the fray. His heirs, some day, may be noticed in a newspaper, going over to the gem of the Antilles on a similar claim! May he be worthy of his sire, who loved peace and did good.

Col. Crockett's popular manners and capacity and personal worth opened to him many offices of honor and emolument. The prestige of the name too was favorable. Indeed he had too many offices. Anxious to oblige his friends and of extreme sanguineous temperament, he was led into involved engagements, that divided his attention, conflicted with his interests and, in the end, brought embarrassment upon himself and others. The phlegmatic business man's standard is not the one to estimate him by. Never was the darkness so deep but he saw light ahead and spoke encouragingly to his friends. The kindness of his heart, the purity of his purpose, the genial light of his mind are refreshing memories to us. A few years ago he left New Orleans for his native State, Tennessee, and shortly after leaving died. In the darkness of death's solitary path we doubt not he saw light ahead! A large and beloved family were bereaved. May the angel of mercy keep the door of their dwelling.

With these thoughts—suggested by a news paragraph clipped from a western paper—have we indulged our own feelings—we hope to the pleasure of our readers and in tribute to one whose last days were shadowed by adversities, but whose virtues rose above the regions of storm and cloud.

"Lay the sod lightly
Over his breast—
Calm be his slumbers,
Peaceful his rest."

BOOK NOTICES.

Through H. D. McGinnis, Bookseller and Stationor, 36 Camp street, we have received the following publications. Mr. McGinnis has a large and valuable stock. Those who call on us, will find him and his clerk below the office, ready to accommodate.

Constitutional History of the United States. By G. T. Curtis. Harper & Bros.

As this book is again before us, we will say what the types did not let us say last week; that the signers of the Declaration were great by accident; the framers of the Constitution were intrinsically so. Those were brave—these wise. Mr. Curtis draws largely upon the Journals of the Continental and Revolutionary Congresses, the lately published autobiography of John Adams, and Sparks' Life of Washington—books not within every one's reach. His style is elevated to the subject, but nevertheless pleasing. It is an exceedingly valuable book. The reader often passes a crisis that makes him shudder. God truly was in this history.

To achieve the independence of a country is but half the great undertaking of liberty. Victory must be followed by order, security, and those great institutions upon which society reposes. How these did follow is herein set forth. Great has been the growth of statesmanship since 1774. The Continental Congress met without precedents. The Confederation was timid and bungling. The Constitution, as it is, was a pure development. The Union was begun with vague and confined notions. While a perusal of this history promotes an insight into the value and appreciation of the blessings of our Government, it discourages the hope of constitutional liberty for the world. Such favorable circumstances never can transpire again.

Wood's Illustrated Natural History. Harper & Bro.

It begins with the skull of a man and ends with the skeleton of a flea. Mr. Wood's knowledge is as comprehensive in zoology as Solomon's in botany, which was from the cedars of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall.

Forrester's Magazine, for Boys and Girls. Published by F. & G. C. Rand. Boston.

Here is neatly bound, the 13th vol. of a periodical, without fault in morals and taste, as far as we have acquaintance ourselves, and nice for the reading youth. See publisher's advertisement.

Ross' Southern Reader.

The author, D. B. Ross, ex-superintendent of Public Schools in Louisiana, has furnished a Southern Series, of which this stands fifth. One of the very few school books that are Southern.

Tower's Elements of Grammar. N. York. D. Burgess & Co. 1854.

We have already noticed this series favorably. One thought vexes us in reading such books—that they were not found out sooner.

Harper's Monthly.

H. D. McGinnis lays the December number on our table with usual promptness.

Harper's Gazetteer.

No. 7 of this work is furnished us by McGinnis, 36 Camp st. and by Morgan, Exchange place. It will be completed in three more numbers: has reached New. Price 50 cents each.

METHODIST PRESS.

A Newspaper for the Angels: This is the heading of an editorial in the Chicago Christian Advocate. Its remonstrances against the tendency of the Church to exhaust itself in working out side issues are wholesome:—

"A remark of an exchange has suggested our heading. Speaking of the revival department of his paper, the editor says: "This is the department that the angels fly down to read." The remark is as orthodox in its theology as it is beautiful in its poetry. Heaven is always represented as in sympathy with earth. It teems with kindred population—an angelic brotherhood. But its sympathies are never so specifically enlisted—or, rather, their enlistment so specifically designated, as in the work of the soul's conversion.

"I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance."

The conversion of a soul is one of the greatest events that can occur. To secure, then, its occurrence, is the noblest work—the most exalted philantrophy in which man can be engaged. The duties of the ministry are very various. That the greatest of all works—the work of revival—of saving souls—should not occasionally suffer among us from partial attention and divided effort would be more than could be expected. If we are not mistaken, a continued and special resistance to the clamoring claims of efforts that do not bear directly upon the conversion of the soul, are, just at this time, especially required among us. The building and endowing of colleges; the devising and executing of plans for the extension of our ecclesiastical influence; the erection of churches and parsonages; the discussion and defence of our time-tested polity; the relation of the pulpit to civil matters; Christian obligation at the ballot-box, are all good works and appropriate themes of thought, but when we cannot engage in them in deed, word and thought, in subserviency to the supreme end of the Savior's mission—the Bible's creation and the church's existence, such a state of things, such secularization, is the leaven of weakness that enervates the whole church. Is there not among us much of this leaven to be purged out? The strength of the church consists not in the magnificence of her edifices of worship, the number and independence of her endowed institutions, or the harmonious workings of her ecclesiastical machinery. Or, we should rather say, a church may become strong in all these, as has the papal, but weaker than Sampson, when deserted by his God, in the power to secure the regeneration of the human heart; a power essential to the identity of the church of God, always and every where. In its outwardism, Methodism was never more prosperous. But in the frequency and extent of its revivals; in the number of its conversions, sanctifications and additions, it has often, in different periods of its history, all things taken into account, been much more prosperous."

Spiritualist.—Somebody asked us if we were a spiritualist. "Why do you ask that question? "Because you put that article in last week." The article referred to was the professed interview of Judge Edmonds with the lost of the Arctic. As well charge us with belonging to the Greek church, for giving an item of news about the Russian war. The Northern Advocate gives our real views of the case:

"We seldom dip into the literature of these new lights. Spirit rappings is either too profound a mystery or too great a humbug for our taste. It goes to extremes so quick that it nauseates; our curiosity has too much modesty to bolt through all mysteries in such hot haste. But we have lately had the patience to read a couple of articles from Judge Edmonds, and really we must conclude that the Judge is a lunatic or else a free commoner among the spirits. They gather about him by hundreds; he exhorts them to get religion, and then hows them out of his presence with all the dignity of a Pope. He is the most flippant, irreverent dealer with ghosts that we have ever known. They talk slang to him, and he repeats it after them like one of their been companions. The presumption is, that the once able and excellent Judge Edmonds is demented."

The Right Policy.—Rev. Abel Stevens, late editor of Zion's Herald, writes to that paper his views on the education policy of Methodism. We ask attention to them. They may be charged with extravagance, "but they are just to human nature and to the condition of the church. They are extravagant in the sense that all energetic and successful movements are, to the paltry calculations of croakers."

Mr. Stevens has, in his travels in behalf of the Tract Society, had large opportunity for observation and inference on the condition of the Church. He says:

"One thing has interested me greatly in my observations on Methodism through the country at large—its zeal for education. I hardly err in pronouncing its eagerness in this respect a denominational monomania—a most fortunate one, doubtless, in many respects, but not without its blunders; its waste of property, local interferences, and wasting failures. Academies, female colleges, ordinary colleges and universities, are attempted almost every where; Conferences under old pledges for the support of given institutions, wheel about in favor of new ones; complications and embarrassments and failures ensue, and I fear that a "want of confidence," a fearful sense of the incompetence of the church, in its present condition, to sustain substantial literary institutions, is becoming wide-spread among that class of our people upon which we must mostly depend for funds. The result is, that most of our collegiate, and a large proportion of our academic institutions, are hardly ever out of embarrassments. Agents must ever and anon, drive over the Conferences, and storm the church for funds to save them from wreck. I hesitate not to pronounce this one of the greatest grievances of Methodism. We need the guiding wisdom of the General Conference, or at least of our most influential minds, to extricate us from its perplexities. I was about to say disgraces. Where, after all our educational struggles, can we point to a college occupying financially first-rate rank, shoulder to shoulder and eye to eye, with Princeton, Union, Yale and Harvard; a rank proportionate to our first rate numerical position among the religious bodies of the land? Some few are out of serious embarrassments, such as the Indiana Asbury University, and the Ohio Wesleyan University. I know of none other that is not still in a struggle for life, unless it be Dickinson, whose last agents are, I believe, succeeding well. In the name of our common cause, and for our common honor, can we not come to our senses in this respect; can we not sacrifice our local and petty experiments for the sake of some grand and substantial educational provisions, such as shall concentrate our patronage and the strongest ability of our Faculties, and shall commandingly stand out before the eyes of the whole nation?

"The 'Great North West' is attempting such an experiment in the neighborhood of Chicago. It had the good sense not to begin till it should rear a financial defence about it, which shall be invincible to the usual embarrassments which have so much mortified the church and crippled its educational projects in other places. It is, I think, the only instance in which we have so begun; already its revenues amount, I am informed, to 300,000 dollars, and agents are abroad for a hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand more, though the first stone of its foundation is not yet laid. The Biblical School, in connection with it has a single pledge, as you lately stated, of 100,000 dollars, besides the above. This is the right way to attempt such enterprises among us. It is the only way in which they should ever again be undertaken in our church. We could not do so once; we should in no instance do otherwise now; for we have institutions and need be in no haste, and we have resources to do what we please, wherever new ones may really be needed. I wish I could proclaim this sentiment as with a trumpet through the whole church. I would say to every man having resources, and who is loyal to our common cause, help no new experiment, give not a cent except where you have a clear guarantee of financial success before the first spade touches the soil. Where the church is already committed, help her, "might and main," out of the difficulties and discredit: but for the sake of every consideration of usefulness and honor, let us cease this trifling with great interests, and combine our energies for something worthy our denominational standing.

Let it be understood that any collegiate scheme, hereafter to be attempted among us, will be practicable in proportion as it is grand in its dimensions. I know the sentiments of our leading men on this subject, and I know this opinion to be correct. There is a general disgust, a denominational chagrin at our past failures; there is a longing desire among our intelligent wealthy brethren, to see a commanding university rise somewhere in in these United States, in honor of Methodism. I repeat it, you can command more money, and command it with tenfold more ease, for a great design of the kind, than for a small and hobbling one. You have blundered with the Wesleyan University, just here. Instead of fifty thousand dollars in the East and fifty thousand in the West, enough to keep the College about in its old status or slightly advance it, you should have proposed a sum which, with its present endowments, would place it on a platform square with those of Yale and Harvard. The design of transferring it into a first class University, of putting it at once and forever above these harrassing contingencies, would have enlisted the enthusiasm of your people, and brought in five hundred dollars where you can now get one hundred."

DOCTRINAL SUGAR.

THE WAY IT IS GENERALLY GIVEN.

The Rev. John Newton being once asked if he was a Calvinist, replied,—"I am more of a Calvinist than any thing else; but I use my Calvinism in my writings and my preaching, as I use this sugar,"—taking a lump, and putting it into his tea-cup, and stirring it, and adding—"I do not give it alone, and whole, but mixed and diluted."

This is the way that Calvinism is generally given and taken. Propound the whole system distinctly and connectedly to the world, and very few would swallow it; but give it to them in broken doses and disguised, and many receive it without knowing what they take. Hence, many do not know their own creed, or that of their Church, and such are not unfrequently surprised and offended, when told by those who have stood by and watched the compounding and preparation of the dose, what they have taken.

Such a course on the part of those who prepare their nostrums, may be thought smart; but in the eye of thinking men, it brands the whole system with the suspicion of falsehood. God's truth have to be disguised! Ministers of Christ descend to this! When did Jesus or Paul take such a course? There is a species of double-dealing induced by teaching Calvinism, to which we have never been able to see how ingenuous minds could descend. But there is no accounting for perceptions, any more than for tastes.

MORALITY OF RICHES.

SOMETHING WRONG, COULD HE BE SAVED.

The death of Joseph Smith, of Rhode Island, was recently announced in the papers, and it was subsequently added that his estate was worth over $600,000! Mr. S. had long been an upright and apparently consistent member of the Methodist Church. No one, I believe, ever charged him during life with any lack of principle, or unsoundness of faith. But here comes out a fact which detracts greatly from his virtues, and throws suspicion over his whole character; he died worth $600,000! True, he left the Church of which he was a member, a legacy, viz.; $1,500 and a house; better than nothing; but think of six hundred thousand dollars, left to four children! There was the Wesleyan University, in the prosperity of which the Providence Conference is deeply interested, and towards the endowment of which the members of that body subscribed $6,000, struggling for an existence, in a languishing condition, yet this member of the church dies worth $600,000, without remembering it to the amount of a dollar! There too is the Conference Seminary, at Greenwich, which has had to appeal to the public again and again for aid, and still, there was the Christian man living within twenty miles of it, with more than half a million of Christ's money hoarded up, for his four children!

In the Conference within the bounds of which this Methodist lived, there are a dozen sick and worn out ministers of Christ, who spent the fire of youth and the vigor of manhood in the cause of God, and under whose ministry this man long and often sat, who are spending the evening of life upon the merest pittance, while a Christian brother has this vast fortune!

Here too is the world lying in the "wicked one," with its myriads for whom Christ died sitting in the shadow of death, the cry still pealing from the skies, "Preach the gospel to every creature," while this disciple kneels each day and prays, "Thy kingdom come," but holds on to the $600,000!

Mr. Editor, there must be something wrong, very wrong, in our teaching; in the holy which Methodism and religion have upon the minds and hearts of our people; and in the members themselves, when, in this age and condition of the world, men live and die in the Church, worth such an amount of money. Can a man, under such circumstances, be saved at all? If so, how much? Must he not, if admitted at all, dwell a kind of refugee in heaven—doomed to shine in nebulous obscurity for ever! I confess I do not envy such a man his lot. What, think you, Paul would have said to such a member? What would have been the character of the sermon at his funeral? Die worth $600,000, and the world in its present condition. O, God!

But it is not this high figure alone that will put a man's soul in jeopardy; I would not covet the man's condition who dies worth one hundred thousand, and does not properly remember the cause of humanity and Christ.

Oh, ye rich men! HAMILTON.

November 30th.

Death of Judge Clarke.—Our community and Church have lost another valuable citizen and member. Judge Clarke was a native of Port Gibson, Miss. He once informed us that, immediately upon his conversion—over twenty years ago—he had strong drawings to the itinerant ministry and regretted that he had not entered it then. As a local preacher he was useful. When his brethren urged upon him a recommendation to the Annual Conference for Elder's ordination, he declined, saying, he already had as much as he could be faithful to. Never shall we forget the words with which he prefaced his experience in the last love-feast we ever met with him—"My brethren, so great are the truths of our holy religion and so supernatural its experimental veritics, they must be witnessed to by those who have felt and know. Beyond human analogies and resemblings in themselves, we are called to give our repeated and joint testimony to them: this is our privilege and duty."

"Death of a Good Man.—

"The chamber where the good man meets his fate
Is privileged beyond the common walk
Of virtuous life, quite in the verge of heaven."

On Friday morning last, departed from our midst a good man, one whose life was good as a child's and unobtrusive. We refer to the Hon. J. C. Clarke, who died at his residence, on Nayades stroot, in the bosom of his family, of that insidious and treacherous disease, consumption. Though comparatively a young man—he was but 46—Judge Clarke was an old citizen, and has been identified with New Orleans for more than twenty years, occupying during that time several responsible positions in society. He was also at one time associated with Messrs. Beardsley & Ingraham in conducting the Commercial Bulletin, and was subsequently for some years Judge of the Third District Court of Jefferson Parish, which was abolished by the consolidated city charter. He was also a licensed preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, to build up and extend the influence of which, in this city, he contributed liberally of his means and time. One of the officiating clergymen at his funeral stated that he had been largely instrumental in originating and sustaining a church among the slaves of this city, that now numbers a thousand members! Here is practical philanthrophy for you!

Judge Clarke possessed many estimable qualities of the heart and head, which endeared him to his family and friends. He was retiring in his habits, seldom going into society, and one of the most taciturn men we ever knew.

He leaves a widow and several orphaned children, some of them of very tender age, to mourn in the bitterness of anguish for his departure. May he who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb hold them in the hollow of his hand. Alas! how vain and impotent is human condolence to assuage the the crushing pangs of the heart—pangs, the intensity of whose poignancy time and the great Healer only can extract."

North Carolina Conference.—The Richmond Advocate informs us this body held its 17th session in Pittsboro, N. C., beginning on 1st Nov. and ending on the 14th: Bishop Pierce presiding.

Preachers admitted on trial: Theophilus W. Moore, John W. Pearsen, Simeon D. Poster, Isaac F. Keesans, Benjamin F. Long, Norman A. H. Goddin, John N. Andrews, Carroll W. King, John S. Davis and Zion F. Medlin. Re-admitted, Solomon H. Helsabeck.

The good fruits of the gracious revival of religion during the year are seen in the gratifying increase in the membership of the church. The statistics exhibit a total of whites, 30,207; colored, 12,071; local preachers, 184. The net increase is: of whites, 1,080; colored, 426; of local preachers, a decrease of 6. Total increase, 1,500. This is an encouraging indication of the presence of God with his servants, and his blessing on their labors.

The Missionary contributions were reported by the treasurer, Rev. W. E. Pell, to have fallen a little below the amount raised the preceding year. The total reported was $3,346 81. A spirited anniversary was held during the session, at which the sum of $389 was contributed.

To meet the deficiencies of the ministers and for the superannuated, and the widows and orphans of deceased ministers, the sum of $2,482 18 was raised and placed in the hands of the Joint Board of Stewards. They paid the claimants at the rate of $72 75.

The Scripture Always Fresh.—Can this be said of any other Work?—The venerable Dr. Woods, in addressing the students at Andover, said that when he commenced his duties as Professor of Theology, he feared that the frequency with which he should have to pass over the same portions of scripture would abate the interest in his own mind in reading them; but after more than fifty years of study, it was his experience that with every class his interest increased

OBITUARY.

DIED, at his residence in Tensas, La., on the 6th instant, Mr. IRA BOWMAN, aged about 64 years, leaving a bereaved wife and five children; who, as he was the object of their devoted affection, feel his lose with unutterable sorrow.

Mr. Bowman was a native of S. Carolina; spent some two or three years of his boyhood in Tennessee; immigrated with his father's family to the Mississippi Territory, about the year 1813, and resided in Mississippi many years. He then removed to Louisinna, lived several years near Clinton, and, finally, settled himself in Tensas Parish, where he finished his mortal career. He was three times married. First, to Mre. Elizabeth Shackloford, by whom he had a son and daughter, twins, both of whom survive him. Seoondly, to Miss Margaret Reiley, mother of one son, still living; and, thirdly, to Mies Mary E. Richardson. Two daughters, fruits of this union, also survive him.

My acquaintance with Mr. Bowman commenced in 1814; was intimate and uninterrupted, and continued to the close of his life, a term of forty yeers. I hazard nothing, therefore, in affirming that I knew him well. Indeed, it required no great perspioacity and a much briefer acquaintance to warrant such an assumption; for he was among the most ieartificial exhibitions of human character I have ever known. Guileless and frank-hearted, he was known and read of all men who had intercourse with him. A braver man, perhaps, never lived; and this was evinced by the perfect naiveté with which he uttered his thoughts, on all sorts of subjects and in relation to all conditions of men. Thus it occurred, that often in the course of his life, he severely arraigned the conduct of passionate and proud men; but, so far as I know, he never made himself an enemy by so doing. I account for this by the fact that his integrity and philanthropy were so universally admitted, that it was impossible to charge his animadversions upon evil purpose, or even unkindness. Benevolence was his master passion, the substratum of his whole character.

The parents of Mr. Bowmen were pious. His father was a local preacher, of pure character, of ardent zeal and of considernble usefulness, though deficient in literary attainments. The impressions made by the early lessons of piety which he received from these parents, was never effaced from his heart. Not only did he ever entertain a profound respect for religion and its institutions, but all along through life, he gave frequent and unequivocal evidence of his desire to participate in its duties and its advantages. Still, such were the gaiety of his feelings and the exuberance of his social temper, that he long lacked the sobriety of mind and settled seriousness of thought, indispensable to the formation and maintenance of Christian character. At length, however, severe and protracted affliction came, in aid of his better purposes. He, himself, was aware of the advantage, in this respect, of which affliction had been to him. After months of intense and unremitting suffering, and after much earnest solicitude in regard to his eternal safety, he was, in the latter part of September last, brought to "The knowledge of salvation, by the remission of sins," and continued to enjoy "Peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." To him, death was no longer terrible. He welcomed its approach, as that of a messenger of good tidings. His end was, accordingly, trustful, calm, and peaceful. His friends, therefore, while they feel their own loss with intense anguish, "Sorrow not, as those without hope." They expect to see their departed Friend, whom they so much and so deservedly loved, "renowned in immortal youth," safe harbored in eternal life. WILLIAM WINANS.

CENTREVILLE, Amite, Miss., Nov. 24, 1854.

THOMAS HENRY, only son of Bro. E. A. Sadler, departed this life on the 12th instant, nged eight years, nine months and sixteen days.

He was a bright and interesting boy, of more than ordinary promise. He had early learned the simple truths of the gospel, and, for one so young, possessed a clear and ready comprehension of them. He was very conscientious, careful to abstain from all improper language, and, following the example of his pious parents, he never retired to bed, without committing himself, body and soul, to God in prayer.

His departure was sudden and unexpected. Taken ill on Saturday, he died on Sunday. On Saturday evening, while lying very low, but still conscious, he spoke of death with great cheerfulness, saying, he was not afraid to die, as he believed he would go to heaven.

Torn from his father's arms on earth, he has gone to his mother's arms in heaven. How painful this separation from the one, how joyful his meeting with the other! His father mourns him below, his mother rejoices over him above. But the father lives in joyful hope that father, mother and children shall all rejoice together, at last, in the New Jerusalem. THOS. H. FOSTER.

MACON, Miss.

DIED in Starkville, Mi., 17th ult., Mrs. ANN JONES MONTGOMERY, who was born in Nash county, N. C., August 17th, 1786.

Her maiden name was Drake. Her brother, Caswell Drake, was an eminent minister in that section of country. She embraced religion in the 19th year of her age, and joined the Methodist Church, in which she lived a devoted child of grace.

In disposition sister Montgomery was mild and affectionate. The religion she professed threw a hallowed influence all around her. Her earnest enquiries and anxious watchings were always welcomed in the sick room. Her seat at church never vacant, if she could possibly be in it, and while there, the solemnity of her presence was indeed impressive. She was attending a revival of religion, that had been going on in this place several weeks, where, it is supposed, she contracted the disease of which she died. She suffered intensely for about a week, frequently enquiring how the meeting was progressing; and in the morning that the meeting closed at night, she left this for the Glory Land.

BY A FRIEND.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN R. GRYMES.

We are under the painful necessity of adding another to the list of distinguished Louisianians who have been taken from us within a comparatively brief period. The Honorable John R. Grymes died, in this city, Sunday evening, after an illness of some considerable duration. His death was not wholly unexpected, and yet there will be many who will be startled at its announcement.

Mr. Grymes was born in Virginia in the year 1786, and was raised and educated in that State. In or about 1807-8 he emigrated to this city, where he has ever since resided; where he has created a professional reputation of the highest order, and where he has enjoyed numerous and responsible offices. He was a volunteer under Jackson at the battle of NewOrleans. He held the United States district attorneyship for a considerable period, represented the city in the State Legislature, and took a prominent part in each of our constitutional conventions. Growing up, as he did, with the jurisprudence of the State, personally conversant with the history of most of the changes and modifications that have affected it during the last half century, it is not wonderful that he held a commanding position at the bar. His mind was admirably adapted to the profession which he embraced and adorned—at once synthetic and analytic—taking in the broadest principles and carefully treasuring up the slightest particulars. He studied the law as a man is wont to read history, not so much for the immediate personal benefit that may accrue, as for an insight into the causes and abstruse reasons. He compared the civil law of our own State and time with that of other times and States, and both with the common law. He was as much at home in Blackstone as Pothier or Justinian, and comprehended just as clearly the law of New York as of Louisiana. This exact and comprehensive learning was made most brilliantly manifest when he appeared before the United States Supreme Court at Washington, in behalf of Mrs. Gen. Gaines, against the Hon. Daniel Webster. It is probable that no man can be found in the Southwest combining such an amount of exact and critical learning with so great forensic abilities. A proper biography of John R. Grymes would be one of the most interesting works that could be written. It would be a chapter of our State history, and would necessarily introduce all of our most prominent men and measures for the last thirty years.

Intense excitament prevailed at Rochester, New York, on the 27th, in consequence of a rumor that the dead body of a female had been found in the river at Hanford's Landing, two miles below here. It was supposed to be that of Miss Emma Moore, who so suddenly disappeared sometime previously. The Mayor and the police proceeded to investigate the matter.

DETAILS OF FOREIGN NEWS BY THE AFRICA.

The West India mail steamer Tamar had arrived at Southampton from San Juan da Nicaragua, etc., October 25, with $810,000 in specie, of which $163,000 was from California.

THE WAR—SIEGE OF SEBASTOPOL.

There is nothing that deserves the name of later news from the seat of war. A pause seems to have ensued in the field-fighting before Sebastopol.

Dispatches, both Russian and British, say "the siege progresses with regularity." Both parties are in want of reinforcements, the besiegers much more than the besieged. The Russians, however, begin to be short of ammunition.

The rapid reduction, by death and disease, of the allied forces—now reduced to fifty thousand—had caused great alarm in England and France, and strenuous efforts were being made to send instant reinforcements.

The winter was setting in severely, and the fleets had suffered some disasters by gales at sea

It was expected in the French camp that an assault would be made on the 5th inst, and it probably would have been, had not the Russians attacked the Allied positions.

NOVEMBER 4—The firing was slack on both sides. Preparations were being made for the assault, and scaling ladders had been ordered up.

Four Russian ships in the harbor had been sunk by the Allies' fire. One of these ships was the Twelve Apostles. Typhus has broken out in the city from the number of unburied dead. Conflagrations are continually occurring from red-hot shot.

Water is exceedingly scarce. The Russians are preparing for street-to-street fighting. They are posting cannon to sweep the streets, and fortifying houses.

HORRIBLE OCCURRENCE.

BURNING OF THE RUSSIAN HOSPITAL, WITH TWO THOUSAND SICK AND WOUNDED!

An occurrence of the most horrible nature has taken place. The great hospital, in Sebastopol, was set on fire by the shells of the allies, and was burned to the ground, with all its inmates, two thousand sick and wounded. This frightful circumstance is passed over as quietly as possible in the English and French papers, but it demands the most pointed attention. It may be remembered that we published an English story to the effect that Menschikoff hoisted the hospital flag over a magazine, which the English directed their fire upon and blew up. The building thus fired on was really the hospital.

NOVEMBER 6—Accounts per last steamer stated that the battle was resumed on the 0th. Probably the following dispatch, being the latest telegraph to hand, refers to that engagement:

VIENNA, NOV. 15—Dispatches from Bnkelava, of date the 11th, have been received this evening, according to which another great battle has been fought. The Russians are said to have lost nine thousand men. The loss of the allies was also great, but they remained masters of the field."

NOVEMBER 8.—Dispatches from Prince Menschikoff announce that the operations of the siege continued, and that the allies were intrenching themselves strongly on the left flank of their position.

Sickness is on the increase in the Allied camp. The cold is very severe at night. Severe weather had occurred at sea; a Turkish eighty gun ship and a frigate sunk in a gale.

NOVEMBER 9—Official Russian news, via Vienna, states that from the 5th to the 9th nothing of importance had occurred at Sebastopol. The Allies were fortifying their position on the left bank of the Chernaya as strongly as possible. The Russians occupied the right bank. The bombardment of the city continued, but the breaches were always repaired.

ASIA.

We are totally without news from Asia. Both armies are in winter quarters.

VARIOUS ITEMS.

The Emperor has bestowed a pension of 5,000 roubles, and a decoration on the widow of Gen. Kornilieff.

The Journal of St. Petersburg, of Nov. 7, contains an official editorial complaining of misstatements in the late Marshal St. Arnaud's account of the battle of Alma. The Journal states that the Russian force at Alma was only 33 000 men, with 84 pieces of cannon, none of which were captured by the allies, excepting two guns dismounted and spiked by the Russians themselves.

The following dispatch was circulated at the Paris Bourse on Tuesday, as having been sent by Prince Menschikoff to Prince Paskiewitch, under the date of Nov. 6, at ten in the morning:

"You will find inclosed a dispatch which the grand dukes have written to their august father. The arrival of their Imperial Highnesses excited in the army and in the town the greatest enthusiasm, and the princes were received with hurrahs and transports of delight. The troops would have been delighted had the princes witnessed our success of the day before; and the garrison of the town testified its impatience to welcome their highnesses by a new exploit. In the afternoon, a column consisting of sixteen battalions, marched resolutely on the right wing of the enemy, and seized a redoubt. After a furious contest, hand to hand, our battalions returned to the town without being disquieted. Almost at the same moment, three battalions executed a rapid movement against the siege works of the right flank of the enemy. They took 15 guns (spiked them) after killing the greater part of the men who were serving them. The French hastened up and pursued our men with a most impetuous fire, which had no effect on them, and a body of 8 000 to 10,000 men resolutely advanced to the walls of the place. They were there received by a well-directed fire, which killed a great number of them; and a sortie, executed with a rare vigor, forced them to return to their lines. During this last movement, and a little before three in the afternoon, General Liprandi, with a part of the forces under his command, attacked the English lines. A desperate engagement ensued. I ordered forward from Tchorgoum the troops that could be collected in haste to pursue them. Our dragoons executed two brilliant charges. The enemy defended themselves most stubbornly, and the approach of night alone put an end to the combat. In our share of the day's proceedings 22,000 men were engaged on both sides.

The losses have been great; ours has been about 4000 men, and that of the enemy at least as great. This sanguinary affair has been only one of those accidents which occur so frequently in war. Had our forces been concentrated, we should, without doubt, have reduced the enemy to the utmost extremities. We are now getting all our reserves up from Simpheropol, Baktchi Seral, and Sutchive. We are about to resolutely assume the offensive, and we shall not allow one day's repose to the enemy. Their forces are diminishing daily. The partial reinforcements which they successively have received, have not been sufficient to fill up the voids which war and maladies have made in their ranks. Their number can not at present be more than 50,000 men. This army can not escape us; we have for us the moral ascendency and a great superiority in numbers. We are on our own ground, and we are fighting at the same time for our soil and for the most holy of causes.

The Kreuz Zeitung, the organ of the Russian party at Berlin, has published the following letter, purporting to be written in Sebastopol during the bombardment, and dated October 24: "After being bombarded for eight days, the town has indeed suffered a good deal, but the fleet is unhurt; only the steamer Vladimir has got two holes in her. The sailors who man the works erected by Col. Todtleben suffer the most. The resistance seems to irritate the besiegers, for, within the last few days, they have been firing with red-hot balls. You cannot escape them any where in the town. If the bombardment lasts long, the streets of the southern part will be, so to say, paved with iron balls. The sailors under Todtleben are, as it were, the living bulwark of the Crimea. They are admirable! Nachimoff, who formerly had never been on horseback, is now continually riding along the lines of batteries. In his own concise manner he addresses his sailors, who adore him. The moral influence of such man makes them saviours in great crises. Menschikoff, too, does not spare himself. As he was lately riding along the fortifications, in the brisket of the fire, the artillerymen called out to him: "This is not the place for your Highness!" The commander of a nation said to him, "Have you come here because you do not trust us? I swear to you, we shall all of us, to the very last, do our duty." "Then, let me also do mine," said the prince calmly. "Dannenberg will arrive at Sebastopol on the 2d or 3d of November."

ENGLAND.

Lord Palmerston left London on the 16th for Paris. He was accompanied by his wife. Although numerous rumors are afloat as to the object of his mission, there is little probability of the true one having transpired. Some say to arrange the re-establishment of the Kingdom of Poland. Others assert that his main business is to prevent the United States from absorbing Cuba, Hayti, the Sandwich and other Islands.

Both Houses of Parliament are further prorogued till December 14.

The Patriotic Fund now amounts to £90,000 sterling, and subscriptions keep pouring in.

The public and the committee of the fund subscribed for the relief of soldiers' widows and orphans are squabbling, tooth and nail, over its distribution. Hon. Major Pnwis, the Secretary, is charged with arbitrary conduct in excluding applicants.

Pilkington, Wilson & Co., Liverpool, owners of the clipper Red Jacket, have been applied to to convey the mails to Australia, in consequence of the Government having taken the small steamers as transport ships. P. & W. offered to land the mails at Melbourne within sixty-five days, but the Government insisted that the ship should call off the Isle of Wight, which they declined.

One hundred is about the average number of names on the army list soliciting commissions; since the war began the number has constantly increased, and there are now 1200.

The Duke of Argyle has been elected by the students, Rector of Glasgow University, over B. d'Israeli, the third candidate, Thomas Carlyle, having been withdrawn. The office of rector is nominal merely. He is expected to deliver a lecture, and no more is heard of him till he goes out of office at the year's end.

The United Service Gazette has a notice strongly in recommendation of Colt's revolver.

A severe gale was experienced on the coast of England on Wednesday, the 15th; some damage done, chiefly to coasters.

Reverend Joseph Owen Parr, Vicar of Preston, could not collect his "lister duesh" amounting to sixpence-half-penny, from certain Quakers of Preston. He seized their goods and sold them at auction—two hems, a copper kettle, a warming-pan, three brass pots, a canister of tea, and two loaves of sugar, to satisfy his claims and expenses of the auction. Diogenes, (Punch's rival,) commented on the subject, and the Rev. Joseph Owen Parr, Vicar, has sited the proprietors of Diogenes for libel before the Court of Queen's Bench.

FRANCE.

Two French divisions will sail from Toulon and Marseilles before the end of the present month of November. We have a repetition of the statement that France will send 50 000 additional men to the Crimea, of whose expense England shall pay one half.

It is now openly talked of that a loan is impending to the extent of 500 or 600 millions of francs. A new levy of 200,000 men will also be made. The Legislative corps will be speedily convoked to give the requisite authority.

Letters from the French prisoners in the Russian hands speak well of their treatment.

Count de St. Aulaire is dead. He was a member of the Institute of France, and, under Louis Philippe, was Embassador at London and elsewhere.

A Paris correspondent of the Observateur Belge states that he has good grounds for knowing that part of the British Cabinet, especially the Earl of Aberdeen, is opposed to Lord Palmerston's mission—what ever it may be—to France.

HOW THE ALLIES FARE THERE.

The correspondent of the London Times, entrenched before Sebastopol, says: "Salt is a luxury which is rarely to be had unless in conjunction with porky fibre, and as to milk and butter, the very taste of them is forgotten. Lord Raglan was very glad to get a little cold pig (pork) and a ration of rum and water one night on our march here. However, the hardest bit of all is reserved for our poor horses. All hay rations for haggagers are rightly refused, they only receive a few pounds of indifferent barley. There is not a blade of grass to be had—the whole of these plateaux and hills are covered with thistles only and where the other covering of the earth goes I know not.

A SHARP AFFAIR OF THE ALLIED SHARP-SHOOTERS.

A well-managed, though slight affair, which occurred yesterday, deserves mention. Lieut. Edward H. Welsh 88th regiment, who was in command of a small party of thirty sharp-shooters, had occasion, while pointing out a certain position to an officer of engineers, to expose himself and some of his men to the enemy's observation. Not long afterwards a body of the enemy, about one hundred and fifty strong, were observed to be advancing in a direction towards the sharp-shooters. Lieut. Welsh detached at once a part of his little force, and ordered them to conceal themselves among the brushwood to the left of the ravine, so that, should the Russians make the attack they might thus be exposed to a flanking fire. The Russians came forward, and appeared certain of securing the English officer and the few sharp-shooters who were with him; but as soon as they were within convenient range the party toward whom they were advancing fired into them. The fire they returned, but almost immediately afterwards the remainder of Lieut. Welsh's party, who had been concealed, discharged their Minies among them with well-aimed effect. The Russians were seized with a panic, many of them threw down their arms, and fled in disorder. Their leader alone showed courage. When his men commenced to waver, he seized one of their muskets and, waving it in the air, tried to rally them. While holding it in this position he received a ball in the elbow, and at once took the weapon in the other hand. He was thus vainly trying to restore courage to his men and urge them forward, when two of the sharp-shooters took aim at him. One of the balls wounded him severely in the neck and face, breaking his lower jaw. He then tried to retreat, but was made prisoner, and brought, together with one of his men, into camp. He was a powerful man and scarcely distinguished from the soldiers he was leading. Five of the Russians who had been killed were buried on the ground by the sharp-shooters. Several wounded escaped back to their lines. One man of the 77th regiment killed, was the only casualty in Lieut. Welsh's party.

INDIVIDUAL BRAVERY OF A BRITISH PRIVATE.

A private of the 33d regiment (Duke of Wellington's) by name Maguire, has attracted the attention of the commander-in-chief by an act of daring. He was in advance as a sharp shooter, and was made prisoner. He was being marched away, between two Russian soldiers, a third being in rear, when, seeing his guard for a moment careless, he seized a loaded musket from one of the two men at his side and discharged it at him. No sooner had he done this than he swung round the butt end, and with it struck the second man on his other side a blow on the head which felled him to the ground. The third Russian decamped, and Maguire effected his escape. He was at the time within a hundred yards of the Russian lines. His own Minie, which had been taken from him, was being carried by one of the two men by his side, but he knew this had been discharged, and therefore seized a musket from the other soldier, which fortunately turned out to be loaded. The affair was witnessed by a sergeant of the rifle brigade, and in consequence of his report Lord Raglan rewarded Maguire with a gratuity of £5.

EXPLOSION OF THE REDAN (RUSSIAN) BATTERY.

Until twenty minutes after 2 o'clock, (Oct. 18,) the French batteries directed their fire on this work, when, unfortunately, the Russians projected a shell so truly into their battery, that, falling into one of their tumbrils situated in the middle of their reserve ammunition, it exploded, causing, of course, a fearful loss of artillerymen. A few minutes afterwards—that is, about half-past two—another shell was directed towards the same spot, with similar unfortunate results. The Russian batteries having it now all their own way, hammered unremittingly upon us with the greatest vivacity. They had sent forth from their remparts loud shouts of defiance or of victory when the explosion of the French and English magazines acquainted them with our misfortune; but it was now our turn to crow, for about half past 3—there suddenly shot upwards from the works, or rather the Redan on our front, a white livid flame, which ascended high into the air, and while we all paused to gaze on the spectacle a sound which rent the very earth trembla beneath us, followed by a most awful report, told us that the Redan had ceased to exist; for in the next minute its garrison of hundreds, blown to atoms, dismembered, and mutilated by the action of the explosion, were discovered hundreds of yards above the parent earth. So fearful and terrifying a spectacle I never here, nor do I hope ever again to witness. In the midst of a dense volume of smoke and sparks, which resembled a water-spout ascending to the clouds, were visible to the naked eye—arms, legs, trunks and heads of the Russian warriors, mingled with cannons, wheels, and every object of military warfare, and I may say with every living thing it contained. The explosions in the French and English batteries were like flashes in the pan of a musket compared with this.

Commercial Intelligence.

LIVERPOOL, November 17, 1854—[From Richardson, Sepnce & Co.'s Circular]—During the week the Corn trade has been very quiet, and with more liberal supplies of English Wheat and Flour, prices are rather lower. Indian Corn continues in moderate consumptive demand for Ireland.

To-day's market was without animation, and Tuesday's prices could not be obtained. In Wheat or Flour very little was done, and only a limited business in Indian Corn. The quotations are: Philadelphia and Baltimore Flour 43s 6d@44s ₱ bbl. White Wheat nominally 12s 6d @13s ₱ 70 lb. Indian Corn, mixed, 45s; Yellow, 46s; and White 47s for 480 lb.

Beef is in improved demand, and several parcels of Ordinary qualities have been taken for exportation.

Pork is more inquired after, and higher prices are asked.

Lard is now freely offered and less difficult to buy; the sales reach about 500 tons at 53s@54s ₱ cwt on the spot, and 52s for delivery in the first three months next year.

Tallow early in the week was in good demand at 1s ₱ cwt advance, but has since become flat.

COTTON—The desire to sell has increased since Tuesday, and the demand having slackened, prices of Good Ordinary and Middling qualities have declined nearly ¼d ₱ lb. Business in Manchester continues very dull.

LIVERPOOL, November 17—[From A. Rennieloun & Co.'s Circular]—Cotton continues to be freely offered, and prices, though not quotably lower, are in favor of buyers.

The sales of the week are 30.130 bales, of which 8200 are on speculation and for export, leaving 22,930 bales to the trade.

The sales to-day are 6000 bales. Market dull. We quote:

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The message is a tame and uninteresting document. It commences with allusions to the past year as a marked one; to the failure of the crops to some extent; to the prevalence of disease, which has been unusually severe, and to the great sacrifice of human life by casualties. The state of the country is described as peaceful and prosperous; and the President, in this connection, alludes to the policy of our Government in avoiding entangling alliances, which we are enabled to do successfully, being at so great a distance from Europe.

The message then goes on to attribute attempts which have been made by European powers to control the direction of our foreign policy. Some have attempted it proceeds to state, to enforce arbitrary regulations; but the United States would not admit the claim of the sovereigns of one continent to legislate for all others. Our Government leaves trans-atlantic nations to adjust their political systems in their own way. Our military, in time of peace, is adapted only to maintain our exterior defenses, while the duty of our navy is to protect our citizens abroad, and the free exercise of our commerce. Our Government, being pacific in its policy, shows that it is not disposed to encroach upon the rights, or in any other way to endangor the security of other powers.

The growth of the United States, the President remarks, is the necessary result of the exercise of the sovereign rights belonging to and exercised by all nations.

The doctrine that free ships make free goods, is laid down and reiterated, the sole exception acknowledged being that of the case of goods contraband of war. The President says that he believes this doctrine to be sound and salutary, and he then proceeds to state that a proposition embracing this rule having been submitted to the other Governments of America and those of Europe, the Russian Government has already acknowledged it. None of the other powers have taken any action in the matter, but it is understood that the King of Prussia and the King of the Two Siollies are willing to adopt it should the leading powers of Europe also agree to do so.

The message then states that it has been proposed that it should be acknowledged as a rule of international law, that private property should be exempt from seizure by public armed cruisers, and that the practice of privateering be surrendered. To this, it is observed that we could not agree, because our regular navy is so disproportionate to the extent of the commerce to be protected. The proposal to surrender the right to employ privateers, is professedly founded on the principle that private property of unoffending non-combatants, even though enemies, should be exempt from the ravages of war. But the proposed surrender goes but a little way towards carrying out that principle, which equally requires that such property should not be seized or molested by national ships of war. Should the leading powers of Europe concur in proposing as a rule of international law, to exempt private property on the ocean from seizure by public armed cruisers as well as by privateers, the United States will readily meet them upon that broad ground.

The message next alludes commendingly to the reciprocity treaty, and recommends the refunding certain duties.

The next point in the message is the recommendation of the appointment of a joint American and British Commission, for the purpose of arranging for the sale of British possessions, adjoining ours, to the United States, with particular reference to the Territory of Washington, in which difficulties have already occurred between our citizens and the local authorities.

Certain stipulations of the third and fourth articles of the treaty concluded by the United States and Great Britain in 1846, regarding the possessory rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, and the property of the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company have given rise, it is stated, to serious disputes; and it is important to all concerned that a summary means of settling them should be devised. The President says he believes that arrangements can be made for the extinguishment of the rights in question, as also of those of the Hudson's Bay Company to navigate the Columbia.

The late difficulty, with respect to the arrest of M. Dillon, the French Consul at San Francisco, is next referred to, and its satisfactory settlement announced.

With respect to the right of Mr. Soule to pass through France, the message states that France withdrew the order for his expulsion, and unequivocally disavow having denied him the right of transit, and the President expresses the hope that no unpleasantness will occur between the two countries, in reference to the subject. The correspondence which has taken place, in reference to the matter is laid before Congress.

Affairs, with regard to Spain, the message states, remain unchanged. No proper opportunity had occurred to press negotiations, in reference to our claims on the Spanish Government, in consequence of the difficulties which have been transpiring in that country. The President says, however, that he believes that the present Government is favorably inclined towards a compliance with our just demands. The late Ministry were violently expelled from power, and the present incumbents are men of very different views from them, in relation to the administration of internal affairs. There are serious questions in relation to difficulties between the Spanish Government and the United States, still pending; but there seems good ground for expecting that our Minister will find fewer obstacles in the way of an adjustment, and making suitable arrangements for restoring harmony and preserving peace between the two countries, than he would under the former Government.

The message then announces that there are negotiations with Denmark pending, in reference to the proposition that that country shall discontinue the levying of the sound dues at Elsinore, and suggests a modification of the treaty of 1826.

The prosecution of the Japan expedition to a successful issue is next noticed, and the negotiation of a treaty, by which the inhabitants agree to open their ports to us, is announced.

The difficulties for some time existing between this country and Mexico, the message states, still remain unadjusted, owing, as in the case of Spain, to the disturbed condition of the country. The undertaking of filibustering expeditions against the country is denounced, and it is declared that participators in them must be punished. Finally, the commencement of the establishment of a new boundary line between the two countries is announced.

The efforts of our ministers and officers to open the Amazon to our commerce, it is announced, have not been successful.

The message then recommends it as the duty of Government to secure the avenues of the transit across the Central American Isthmus.

The question at issue with Great Britain in reference to Central America, it is stated, still remained unsettled, a serious misunderstanding having arisen, it is said, as to the import of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The message here incidentally narrates the circumstance of the Greytown difficulty. It fully sustains Mr. Borland and the bombardment of the place, on the ground that Greytown was only a piratical resort, and that the failure thus to have punished the place, would have left the offenders impressed with the idea that they might persevere with impunity in their career of insolence. This transaction has, however, the President announces, been made the subject of complaint on the part of some foreign powers.

The subject of the ransom is then referred to. It amounted from all sources, to $78,649,705. The expenditure of this year, exclusive of the amount of the public debt paid, is reported to have amounted to $51,018,240. There is in the Treasury $20,537,000. It is estimated that the receipts this year will exceed the expenditures by at least $15,000,000. A reduction of the tariff is therefore again recommended.

The granting of additional military forces for the protection of our frontiers is urged upon Congress, as also is the granting of increased pay to army officers. It is proposed that there shall be four new regiments established—two infantry regiments and two mounted regiments. A reform in the organization of the army retired list is also recommended; and it is proposed that promotion shall be made according to merit, instead of according to seniority.

The apprentice system is then recommended to adoption for the navy, and an increase of our naval force is urged.

Additional legislation, for the purpose of promoting the security of passengers at sea is recommended.

The expenditures of the Post-offices Department is reported to exceed the receipts of last year by $1,753,000.

The President renews the expression of the views he laid before Congress last year, on the subject of grants of land for railroad purposes; but the message rather discourages all such projects.

The views of the President on the river and harbor improvements question, and the grounds on which he vetoed the bill on the subject, are promised to be given soon in another message.

Judicial reform is then urged, and in conclusion the President recommends the maintenance of the inherent rights of self-government, the accordance of the largest liberty to all citizens, obedience to the laws, and the cultivation of peace with foreign powers.

The message closes with the invocation of the divine blessing on the nation.

Louisiana Interior.

The Baton Rouge Comet of Saturday last has the following items:

We are pained indeed to learn that the wife of Mr. Fredrick Benker of this parish was burnt to death a few days ago by accidentally falling into the fire. She was stooping over a kettle of boiling lard, when her clothes took fire, and she was so badly burnt before assistance could be rendered that she died a few hours afterwards. It has not been long since that a lady on Church street met with a similar accident, and was so seriously burned that her life was despaired of. It should prove a warning to others.

Mr. Johnson, a wealthy planter of Wilkinson county, Miss., and a brother of Henry Johnson, late Governor of this State, fell overboard from the Magnolia and was drowned, on Wednesday morning about 2 o'clock.

The Donaldsonville Vigilant says:

The Bayou Lafourche is very low, with little prospect of a rise soon. The boats employed in freighting sugar and molasses to our port for shipment to NewOrleans, have been compelled to lay in the mud, not to say in the dust, all along the bayou. This is, we understand, quite unpleasant to the planters of Lafourche, as well as to the masters of the flatboats and steamboats employed in that trade. We tender them our sincere sympathy, under existing melancholy prospects, and hope that this late change in the weather will soon open that important trading channel. We would suggest to the planters of the bayou that a branch to the N. O. & G. W. Railroad, connecting with Donaldsonville, would certainly, if tried, relieve their sufferings.

The Alexandria Democrat states that a man named Joseph White, who assumed the name of Josiah Williams was arrested in that town on the 26th ult., on a charge of having murdered Levi Barron, in Liberty county, Texas, in February last. A letter was found on his person containing minute directions of his route through to Missouri, and when this was taken from him he confessed his identity. A reward of $2300 had been offered for his apprehension.

We learn also from the Democrat, that a young man named John Hawthorne, who confessed himself the murderer of Mr. John G. Young, had been killed by a man named Witsel, who lived about fifteen miles below Trinity. The story goes that Witsel attempted to obtain a warrant for the arrest of Hawthorne, stating that he believed the murderer of Mr. Young was staying at his house, but failed. Witsel returned home, and on the next day ordered the supposed murderer to leave his house, which the latter refused to do, saying that no man could make him leave. An altercation ensued, pending which, Witsel states, his unbidden guest avowed himself the murderer of Mr. Young—that he killed him for his money, and offered to divide with Witsel, on the condition that the latter would not attempt to arrest him, or drive him off from his house until the close of the pursuit slackened. On this proposition being refused, he snatched up his gun and fired two shots at Witsel, who then rushed upon him and snatched a knife from his own belt, with which he stabbed him twice, and killed him. On his body were found eight $100 bills on the Louisiana State Bank—a description of money in which Mr. Young was known to have received fifteen hundred dollars a few days before leaving Alexandria—besides some smaller bills and gold.

Numerous other circumstances came to light, connecting him with the murder, and leaving no doubt that he was the person who committed it. Hawthorne, it is said, was a native of Catahoula parish, belonged to an affluent and respectable family, and had previously borne an unblemished character. Witsel was arrested, and committed to the Catahoula jail, to await an examination.

MEETING OF THE BAR.—After the reading of the decisions in the Supreme Court, Monday, Col. Christy moved an adjournment, as a mark of respect to the memory of the Hon. John R. Grymes and J. Calvitt Clark, lately deceased.

The Court adjourned and then a meeting of the Bar was called, in order to give a fitting expression of the respect of the profession to the many virtues of the deceased. Alfred Hennen, Esq. was called to the chair, and Christ

The Northern Sea.... By William Ross Wallace.

I.

Roll on, roll on, thou Northern Sea,
Under the cold, eternal stars
That gaze upon thy mystery
Between the melancholy bars
Of ice to east and west—while evermore
The shadowy waves in darkness hurled
Seem chanting by a homeless shore
The dirges of a dying world!

II.

Roll on, roll on thine icebergs tall
And awful in their grim array,
Where Winter's demons spread the pall
Of raven wings on faded Day—
Where Night and Death have built their shrines
On that bleak flood and barren soil,
And even the sun no longer shines
The proud Ambassador of God.

III.

Oh, hadst thou not, stern Northern Sea,
From southern mother darkling there,
Enough of awful majesty
In walling wave and icy air!
Must man, the restless and the proud,
All ready crowned with orient might,
Go sounding through thy spectred cloud
To give new grandeur to the night?

IV.

"The world! the world is mine!" he cries—
Itself dust, half gold, with fire and steel,
He sighs adieu to Southern skies
And stamps defiant on the keel;
The Borealis lights his way,
Or glimmers o'er the ice-bound fleet,
Where rythmic wind and freezing spray
Are cold, pale prophets of the wreck.

V.

But on, and on!—upon his brow,
A shadow like some mystic word—
And, sweeping round the crushing prow,
The moan of tempests in his beard:
A little longer—what remains!—
A band of corpses stark and white—
A wilderness of icy plains—
A blood red sun—a spectral night!

VI.

Wail, wail a requiem, Northern Sea!
In steady rhythm wed and, low rhyme,
Befitting well the mystery
That broods o'er all the Arctic clime:
But never bid thy cruel blast,
Like triumph's tramp, cancerous sweep
Where solemnly by the maddening mast,
At last the glorious Vi-Kings sleep.

VII.

Their very failure is sublime—
For their's the unconquerable will
That in the Spirit's mountain clime
Binds Godhood on the firmament still;
This and this alone that makes
The mariner's forehead bright and grand—
The effort that as danger shakes,
Gives glory also in the hand.

VIII.

But wild North Sea! if, cruel yet,
Thou bid'st the Tempest clap his palms,
And where the soul of Death is set,
Roll out the stern, triumphant psalms,
Tell on bid on—a prophet light
Looms up the far-off waiting years,
That give shine into a calmer night,
And softer airs and happier spheres.

IX.

The world is Manly!—Awhile the King
May wait for many a glorious gem,
And the world still time shall bring
All jewels to his diadem!
The fire-crowned Monarch yet shall stand
With every element his own—
Cloud, Thunder, Ocean, Air, and Land,—
All tamed and crouching by his Throne.

X.

Then roll, roll on, O Northern Sea!
Defiant unto me, if thou
Canst not see yet the conquered be
Beneath a Vi-King's pressing prow.
But see the partner of the Brave,
Who stitch to her widowed woe,
For whom, beside the Eastern wave,
Even Hope herself has ceased to glow.

XI.

And for awhile thy tempest still,
Nor loudly draw thine icy breath,
Where on the Northland's snowy hill
The Ocean-Rider lies in death.
No iceberg thundering down the Deep
Could make thee so sublime, as when
Such stillness crooked o'er the sleep
Of last, but still unconquered Men!

The Fate of Sir John Franklin.

To the Editor of the London Times:

SIR—The question has frequently been asked of me, How can I account for so few of the unfortunate party having, in the expedition under Sir John Franklin being sent by the Esquimaux and few all those being found dead at or near the same spot?"

It is my duty, as well as my desire, to give very information on this distressing subject, not only to the relatives and friends of the lost men, but also to the public at large, and the vast medium of doing so is through the columns of your "far and wide" spread journal, should you consider the following remarks worthy of a place therein:

As I have sent the blue books on the subject of Arctic discovery by me, I may make some error in my statements; but, so far as my memory serves me, the last news we had of Sir John Franklin, in 1845, was that he had provisions for three or somewhat more than three years, which he could make last for four. Again, the captain of a whaler, whose name I forget, says that "the crews of the Erebus and Terror, when in Baffin's Bay, on their passage westward, were hilling and cutting down great numbers of waterfowl, as a resource in case of necessity."

The information obtained by me from the Esquimaux (by a mode of questioning which they understood, and in which they were induced to explain the different places where they had passed the winter seasons since the year 1846) was, I consider, perfectly conclusive as to the spring of 1850 being the period of the melancholy catastrophe to which I refer. This will make the time elapsed since Sir John Franklin was last seen in Baffin's Bay until the spring of 1850, very nearly five years.

Supposing that the provisions carried from England by the expedition did last four years, (by the end of which I have no doubt the crews of the vessels would be much reduced in numbers, and those that survived greatly debilitated,) the party would be wholly thrown on the snowy, rugged, rented wasteland, which I believe most persons will agree with me in thinking would increase the fatality of scurvy, if it already existed, or cause that dread disease, if it had not previously made its appearance.

This may account rationally for so few white men having been seen by the natives.

Again, "as to all the dead being found at or near the same place."

Nothing is more natural or more easily accounted for by persons of experience in the Arctic Seas, and whose mind is properly constituted.

Let us for a moment picture to ourselves a party of gallant men reduced by want, and perhaps disease to great extremity, pushing their way to the mouth of a large river, such as the Back, the ice on which they supposed would break up in a short time and permit them to embark in their boat. Having arrived near such river the strength of some had failed, so that they could not travel even when nourished to the pledge, and the others were unable to drag them. What step would brave men take in such a difficulty? My reply would be—cling together—stop, and let the stronger endeavor to kill game for the support of themselves and the weaker until the ice broke up, then embark them by turn, in the boat, and thus travel with much greater ease and speed than when on foot.

To show that this opinion is not a mere fancy or fiction on my part, I may mention that my first feeling on hearing the mournful tidings was one of regret that I had not been with the suffering party—a feeling difficult to analyze, but which must have arisen instantaneously and without reflection, from an idea that my greater experience of Arctic traveling and hunting might have been of assistance in security and danger.

I state this not as any thing praiseworthy or commendable on my part, but to explain what I think would be the sentiments of any man having the ordinary amount of courage and love for his fellow-man.

Another point to which I would for a moment advert is the tragic event connected with the last days of our countryman.

The Esquimaux whom I saw at Felly Bay preceded me to Repulse Bay, and, when I returned, were living in the most friendly terms with the Three men left in charge of our property there. None of these men understood a word of the Esquimaux language, yet I was informed by them, before I had communicated any of my news, that they believed a party of white men had died of starvation far to the westward, and that they had been reduced to a very dreadful alternative before death. On my asking my informants how they had discovered this, they replied by the signs made them by the natives.

It may be demanded why I did not give all these instances in corroboration of my statements in the report to the Admiralty. The answer is simple; I kept such for my more detailed report to the Honorable Hudson's Bay Company, which circumstances to which I have alluded in a previous communication that appeared in your paper, have prevented me from completing.

I may add, in support of what I stated a few days ago regarding men carrying with them useless articles on having to abandon their ships in the Arctic Seas, that I have since learnt from the best authority—Sir John Ross himself—that in effecting his wonderful escape, after a three years' detention in Prince Regent's Inlet, he distributed his silver plate among the men, rather than leave it behind, and thus brought most of it to England with him.

Should you think these remarks worthy of your notice, you would oblige me much by giving them insertion.

I have the honor to be, Sir, your very obedient servant,
Tavistock Hotel, Nov. 6. JOHN RAE.

Escape from the "Sisterhood" at Emmitsburg, Md.—We find the following statement in the Frederick Examiner:

Miss Josephine Buckley, novice, who had not completed her probation, escaped from the sisterhood at Emmitsburg, about 3 o'clock on the morning of the 10th instant. She is the daughter of Joseph Buckley, Esq., of Norfolk, Va., a Protestant, who took her under his protection through this city, on Wednesday last, on their way home. The circumstances of Miss Buckley's unlawful detention and escape therefrom, as detailed to several of our citizens by her father, were as follows: Since becoming a novice, she has been doing duty at St. Joseph's Seminary as a teacher of music, etc., for the last ten months. Some months since, however, she repented of her connection with the sisterhood, expressed a desire to return to her home and wrote to her father to that effect. That letter was torn up before her eyes, and she was compelled to write to a different strain, declaring her satisfaction and contentment with her situation.

This letter, mentioned letter received her father; while the deception was maintained by having all his letters to the daughter returned unopened. Aware at length that she was a prisoner, Miss Buckley determined to escape, and on the morning above named succeeded in effecting her liberty by climbing through a sash over a door, and thence into the yard. Her movements were overheard by the watchman, whose vigilance she eluded by concealing herself behind a tree. As soon as the watchman turned away she fled, alone, a stranger, in the night, and dressed in her novice's habit and black cap, this poor terrified girl escaped over the rough country, ten weary miles to the village of Creagerstown; where, on inquiring for the stage house, she was directed to Stevens's Hotel. Her immediately made known the circumstances of her case to Mr. Charles Stevens, the landlord and demanded his protection, which was promptly accorded, and in Miss Grimes, a relative of Mr Stevens, she found a faithful and gentle confidant and friend. Her next step was to write to her father, who, upon receipt of her letter, came without a moment's delay to her rescue. Miss B is about 18 years of age a very accomplished and beautiful young lady, speaking several languages, and a superior musician.

Affairs in China—Executions—The Americans and the Rebels.

CANTON Tuesday, July 18, 1854.

Last evening Rev Mr. Bonney and I passed by the execution-ground a narrow lane, one hundred feet long, occupied on one side by pottery-shops, on the other by a blank wall. It was quite accidental that we stepped aside a few yards from our way to see it, for I had passed over it yesterday when it was cleared of dead bodies, and was only revolting by the sight of a bin of decayed human heads, which would measure as much as a cord of wood, and the bloody, blood-soaked ground admitting a sickening effluvium.

But this afternoon we happened to pass by there not long after 5 o'clock, the execution hour, before the headless bodies were removed from the ground on the heads thrown into the heap. There lay fifty or sixty victims, which is not greatly above the average of daily executions for a week or two past, the heads near the body from which it was just severed, the hands tied behind the back, the legs sprawled, the victim fallen forward on the belly. The poor creatures are placed in a line, one before the other, in a kneeling posture, the head bent forward; one of the two executioners holds him, while the other strikes off the head at a single stroke, usually with the sword.

Mr. Bonney could understand the talk of the bystanders, and it revealed indignant feelings at this slaughter; for the victims are often poor and innocent, seized while at their lawful avocation, "on groundless suspicions, and executed without trial." I speak advisedly. Leong Ah used these words. One was taken while being shaved in a barber's shop. When one of the bystanders expressed himself freely to Mr. Bonney against the Government, his comrade hushed him, lest his words should be overheard and reported to the mandarins.

Yesterday the American Consul, Mr Spooner, wishing to ascertain the true state of matters at Pusheu, a town up the river, fifteen miles southwest from here, of 600,000 inhabitants, the possession of which is disputed with the rebels by the imperialists, causing a serious interruption of trade, went up with Capt. Rodgers, of the United States steamer John Hancock, two or three other American officers, Mr. Bonney and a foreigner, a party of nine than twenty-seven—in all thirty souls in two boats. They left at 9 o'clock A. M., and returned at 3 P. M.

Mr Bonney tells me the boats proceeded unmolested, and passed at 10 o'clock by the Imperialist transport boats, and a little above, through the fleet of twenty-seven Imperialist junks, containing the heavy guns, and the soldiers returned from a morning fight with the rebels at Fushan. The American was communicated in a friendly way with the junks and passed on. When within half a mile of burning buildings on the opposite side of the river from the town, they were challenged by straggling rebels, about sixty in number, who brandished their swords, looking fiend-like, and defying them. Mr. Bonney called loudly, and made very distinctly the Chinese signs of their friendly intentions, but in vain.

One of the rebels, several rods in advance of the rest, stooped, and resting his matchlock on an embankment, within fifty feet of the boat, aimed deliberately at the stern of the zig, where sat Mr. Bonney, Mr. Spooner, and Captain Rodgers. The boats had been previously put about, and were going down the river. Captain Rodgers noticed the rebel's movements, and remarked it aloud, so that Mr. Bonney had time to stoop his head below the gunwale, when the matchlock was fired, and a ball shot grazed Mr. Spooner's cheek and whisker. Instantly two guns were leveled and fired by the two marines in the other boat—the launch—and also Capt. Rodgers fired both charges of his double barreled gun, and the assailant fell deathless dead.

It is a time of constant excitement and alarm here among the Chinese, hundreds and thousands of whom are moving with their families and effects to Macao, Hong-Kong, etc., paying roundly for steamer conveyance. Nothing is done here promptly as with us, and disturbances may continue for weeks or months before a decisive result is obtained; but it seems increasingly probable that ultimately the rebels will succeed, and the Chinese imperial dynasty be changed.

From the London Times of November 15.

After the Battle.

We crowned the herd-won heights at length,
Baptised in flame and fire;
We saw the foemen's sullen strength,
That grimly made retire;

Saw close at hand, then saw more far
Beneath the battle smoke,
The ridges of his shattered war,
That broke and ever broke.

But one, an English household's pride,
Dear many ways to me,
Who climbed that death-path by my side,
I sought but could not see.

Last seen, what time our foremost rank
That iron tempest tore;
His touched, he scaled the rampart's bank,
Seen then, and seen no more.

One friend to aid, I measured back
With him that pathway dread;
Nor ear to wander from our track,
Its landmark English dead.

Light thickened; but our search was crowned,
As we too well divined;
And after fruitless quest we found
What we most feared to find.

His bosom with one death-shot riven,
The warrior lay laid low;
His face was turned unto the heaven,
His feet unto the foe.

As he had fallen upon the plain,
Invisible to ley;
No ruffian spoiler's hand profane
Has touched that noble clay.

And precious things he still retained,
Which by one distant hearth,
Loved tokens of the loved, had gained
A worth beyond all worth.

I treasured these for them, who yet
Knew not their mighty woe;
I softly sealed his eyes, and set
One kiss upon his brow.

A decent grave we scooped him, where
Less thickly lay the dead,
And decently composed him there,
Within that narrow bed.

Oh, theme for manhood's bitter tears,
The beauty and the bloom
Of scarcely twenty summer years
Shut in that darksome tomb!

Of soldier sire the soldier son—
Life's honored scantide
One live to close in England, one
In maiden battle died:

And they that should have been the mourned
The mourners' parts obtain:
Such thoughts were ours, as we returned
To earth its earth again.

Brief words we read of faith and prayer
Beside that hasty grave;
Then turned adieu, and left him there,
The gentle and the brave;

I calling back with thankful heart,
With thoughts to peace allied,
Hours when we two had knelt apart
Upon the lone hill-side:

And, comforted, I praised the grace,
Which him had led to be
An early seeker of that face
Which he should early see.

REMORSE AND SUICIDE.—In the Baltimore Gazette of the 27th ult. we find the following account of the suicide of a murderer:

"It will be recollected that about two months since a German woman named Noble was found brutally murdered at her residence about six miles from the city on the Philadelphia road. Her body was found awfully mutilated, in a large tub, upon which had been placed a large stone and on the top a plank. The murder caused great excitement in the neighborhood, and, as the general impression was that her husband, Frederick Noble was the murderer, great efforts were made for his arrest. That he was the murderer, became the more apparent, on account of his absence from the farm, where every thing was left in confusion. The Governor of the State was induced to offer a reward of $300 for his apprehension, and a particular description was given of his person, etc. So matters remained until yesterday morning, when another horrible scene was presented. Early in the morning Justice Lewis Frantzberger was informed that a man was hanging dead in a barn on the farm of Noble. Upon examination it was found that it was the refugee murderer Noble himself. It appeared that he had climbed up on the outside of the barn or fodder-house, reaching the second story, where he stood upon a layer of sheaf wheat there, with a razor, which had been tightly bound around the handle so as to keep the blade from slipping, he had cut his throat, completely severing the windpipe. From the spot where his throat was cut, he appeared to have gone about six feet, where he hung himself with somewise about the thickness of a rye straw, the same with which the razor was bound. When found he was dressed in an entire new suit of clothes, inside and out, and in his pocket was a new razor and a new pen-knife. He was also cleanly shaved. There were appearances that previous to committing the deed, he had gone to his wife's grave, who had been buried on the place, and walked around it a number of times. This belief arises from the fact of seeing a number of tracks about the grave, which corresponds with the footsteps of the boots he had on. On his person was found a letter, written in German, in which he fully confesses his agency in his wife's death and attributes the cause to jealousy. He says in the letter that a dispute arose between him and his wife, when she said: 'You had better kill me and then kill yourself.' He then went out into the yard and got an axe and struck her on the back of the neck killing her. He let her lay for two hours, when he got a barrel, into which he thrust the body, and sunk it in the ground and covered it with another barrel, to prevent discovery. The letter further states that he came to the city on the next morning after the murder at 5 o'clock, and left the city in the 9 o'clock train for the west. His western visit extended as far as Cleveland, and during the time he went to work on a railroad, where there was some three or four hundred hands employed. Among them was a man who knew him, and he made sundry inquiries, which was the harder, time he had. He states that he came here to go to the gallows. The unfortunate man arrived in the city on the western train, on Saturday morning, and immediately proceeded to his recent residence, where he consummated the act of suicide. He leaves three children, a boy aged fourteen years, a boy aged three years, and a baby."

The Baton Rouge Comet of Thursday last says:

The U S steamship Fashion arrived at this port on Tuesday night last, and gave notice to the sleeping Red Gauchos of the last by firing off one of her largest guns. The Fashion is here on order of the War Department, to take troops to Key West. Fuss of which the arsenal here has a very plentiful supply.

MR. JONES IN PARIS.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

Dear Jane: Having obtained leave of absence from my worthy employer, Mr John Hoxton, of Drury Lane, I packed up my valise and whisked over to Paris; the city which I had pined after from early boyhood. After procuring lodgings, I walked out to take my first lesson in sight-seeing. My steps brought me to Place Vendome, where I paused to admire the column erected in its center, the shaft of which is adorned with plates representing the various battles of the great Napoleon. I turned over in my mind each event in its order, when suddenly some one touched me on the shoulder.

"Monsieur admires ze colmnn," said a voice.

I turned and found a very elegantly dressed Frenchman close at hand. He was about thirty, thin, slight, pale, rather sallow, with polished beard, moustache, short hair, little sharp eyes, and a hooked nose. He wore patent leather boots, a black suit, and an eye-glass, and altogether looked quite the gentleman. He laid his hand upon his beard and bowed.

"Monsieur is English?" he said, with an insinuating smile.

"I have the pleasure," I replied, with some surprise.

"Monsieur, your hond," he cried; "ze union of mloe country and of zours is zo finest ting in histoire. Let me zo yoa mine oity."

"You are very kind," I replied, bowing, heonuco ha kept doing so all the time.

I oen not repeat all the fine things he said, because he really did speak English very hodly; but I understood him to say that the spectacle presented by the present alliance of Gaul and Albion was a grande speotacle; thet it was a fine thing to behold the two nations, once at war, now at peace; the Czzzarrr (that's the way he pronounced it) was an insane fool; what could he do against the ermine of Nap-ol-e-yon and the fleets of Veoktoria? In a word, we were brothers, and must fraternize. He ended by volnnteering to show me Parie.

My prejndices against the French fell before his polished manner. He had anch a delioate way of paying compliments. He linked his arm in mine, and took me to the Louvre, where he showed me an array of plotures quite wonderful. Then he took me round to the Palais Royale, treated me to some English hottled beor, and wonnd up by an invitation to dinner. I hesitated, not liking to take advantage of his kindness; bnt he insisted. Were we not nllies, brothers; must we not fraternize? He would dine with me to-morrow. At last he became so pressing that I yielded.

We entered a first-rate looking place, not a bit like our eating-houses. All mirrors, marble and gilding, silver-spoons and forks, snow-white table-olothe, a perfect Hebe behind the counter, dressed as for a ball, to whom every body bowed on entering and leaving, and waiters who moved about with a celerity quite amneing. I thought we were going to sit dawn here. Bnt no; Monsieur Julse (this was his name) after touchlag his hat to the lady at the bar, asked, as he explained to me after, for a private room. A waiter, with an apron under his arm, bowing and scraping, showed us the way. We were ushered uato an elegant apartment, and in five minutes more we were provided with two glasses of absinthe—so it was spelt.

M. Jules placed his little liqueur glass of yallow liquid inside the tumbler, and alowly, deliberately, with remarkable precision, poured the water on it drop by drop. The small glass overflowed, and tha tumbler in a few minutes was full of a milky looking fluid. He then did the same for me. Then he bowed and drank. So did I. It was the most disgusting effort at euotion I ever made. Dr. Bird never ordered me such a dose of physio. The Frenchman saw I did not approve it. He explained to me that perhaps it was an nequired taste, so was porter. At the very name of this beverage he made a wry face (what would I have given for a glass of half-and half!) but added thnt it was universally drank hnfore diuner to promote appetite. I gulped mine down and felt very sick. Tha Mephistopheles opposite smiled, and at that moment the soup was placed npon the table.

My Dear Jane, I never did eat such a dinaer. I copy a few items from tha carte, with explanations by C——. There was creet soup, a mixture of carrote, onions, turnips, hum, parsley, bay-leaves, butter, flour, etc; there was bœuf en vinaigrette, cold beef with a regular salad dressing; thera were vol-au-vents, rabbits; beignets à la crême, kidney beans; three wea salmon-au-bleu, soine smothered in sauce; piles of fruit, cake, and wine of a variety and flavor which I never indulged in before. The champagne acetued to come in at the nick of time, the Chatean Margaux was prodigions, the dessert wines were immenso.

We set, one opposite the other, sipping our nectar. A cnp of ooffee and a olgar were before me I must say that I had unbuttoned my coat. M. Jules told me to be at my ease. I accordingly took off coat and waistcoat. This made me feel so comfortable that I ventured another glase. It was delicious. I gently pushed aside the coffee, and told Mr. Jules that I liked the English cuetom of wiue after dinner. He replied that he himself in England had learned it; indeed, if I liked, the cloth should be oleared. But would I join a party of excellent fellows up stairs, where I heard a number of volces? There I could associate with some good soule, and drink wine ad libitum. I asked who they were. Well, they were membere of a clnb, who admitted nons but the initiated. I, however, as a brother, and a member of the great allied nation, should be admitted without difficulty He rose and went out. In three minutes he returned. If I would submit to be blindfolded while five questions were pnt to me, the thing was done. I must confese that I had takeu more wine than was right, so I consented to this very foolish thing.

I wee in darknese. A silence dead as that of midnight reigned in the room. M. Jules had left the room cautlously and closed the door behind him. I waited five, ten, fifteen minutes and then heard a tap at the door. I epoke not, but waited. All I had read of the initiations of nsophytes, of the mysteries of Eleusis, the last days of Pompeii, the drinkere in Vivain Grey, rnshed aoross my anxious brain. I knew that silence was the first duty. The door opened gently and I haard a slight cry. Then it closed again; only for a minute, however, for the next instant I heard a rnsh and roer of voices. My arm was rndely oelzed, the serviette which bandaged my eyes torn off, and I found myself in tha presence of the landlord and two waitars, all jahbering and talking in a wild and incoherent manner.

I looked ebont mechanicelly for my coat, waistcoat and hat; they were no where to be seen. Straage, too, but every spoon off the table, and every fork, had equally disappeered. What was the meaning of all this? Was it one of the trials aliudsd to by M Jules? Where, too, was that gaserouelndividual? The screams and gesticulatione of the avidently lrate landlord compelled me to look to my own condition. Bot I could not make any sense of what he eaid He handed me a long bill with a gross totel my eyes wera unable to see. A waiter, with a few worde of Eoglieh, endeavored to explain to me that I was to pay. I replied that my money, watch, etc., were in my coat and waistcoat. The landlord, on thie being interpreted, grew crimson with rage, and muttered somethlag in Franch One of tha waitera left the room. I sat down and drank my ooffee quite satisfied, for, of oonrse, he had sent for Jules.

In about ten minutes, in walked four soldiers! with guns, ferocious beards, tall fur caps, and a look of etolidity quite enough to put a saint in a passion. They dragged me to my feet and pushed me before them I protested; I swore, I said I was a respectable Englishman. In vain; thera was no fraternity about them. They were four as uomaunsred ruffians as ever I saw. In this state—without coat, hat or waistcoat—I was taken into the open street, and marched like a malefactor, with a guard of four men—where, I knaw not. It was nearly dark, and very few noticed me. Some boys laughed when I stumbled over their horrid stones; but what they said I knew not, neither did I care. I was desperate. I hated France, the alliance, the war. I wished I could have turned Russian. One moment I sven wished myself a Greek patriot; but of that I repented when I recollected S——'s description of the Greek patriots of London—half Russian earls, half Jew peddlers. I could have planted a dagger in the heart of France.

I saw nothing of the road by which they took me; I knaw of nothing but a glare of light, a tourmur of voices, until I was ignominiously thrust into a cell—into a cell, June—Mrs. Jones. For this I went to Paris—I, who never saw the inside of a police office in London And such a cell! Underground, damp, dark; with five comradee, all Frenchmen, doubtless all thieves. There was not a seat left; I sat down upon the floor; it was of stone! In vain can I task my pen to tell of the abominations of that night.

* * * * *

An hour later I was free. The police had captnred M. Jules, a noted thief, liberated convict, and swindler. They found my property on his person. It was all returned to me intact. Hut I had four pounds twolve shillings to pay for the dinner. I never saw a man so obsequious as was the landlord. I out him dead, and mark me, I make no moro stray acquaintances in the streets.

EIGHTEEN YEARS A CAPTIVE AMONG THE INDIANS.

We were visited, a few days ago, by a man by the name of Joseph Barney, who says that he is in search of a son, whom he supposes to live somewhere near Alton. He made his escape on the 5th of last May from the Flat Head Indians, near the head of the Flat Head river, in Oregon. He stated that he has been with this tribe of Indians eighteen years. We listened for some length of time to his history, many portions of which are truly thrilling. He was taken prisoner in 1836 on the upper Missouri river, while in the employment of a fur company. He is a native of France, and speaks English but poorly; but we give what he communicated to us as nearly as possible. He was in company with a man by the name of John Robertson, both of whom were captured. They attempted to defend themselves, and killed two Indians, but they were overpowered—there being twenty-five Indians to contend with. They were secured hand and foot, and placed on ponies, and started to the northwestward, and traveled five weeks, when they came to the hunting ground of the tribe, where they were given up to the chief, who manifested much joy at their capture. They were unbound and confined in a hut, where they were fed, but not allowed to escape. The chief offered them his two daughters if they would marry and remain with the tribe. Finding escape utterly impossible for the time being, the terms were accepted, and the marriage took piece. The fruits of this marriage were two children, both of which are still living, a daughter, sixteen, and a son, fourteen, both of which he left with the tribe. Two years ago Robertson attempted to escape, but was retaken, scalped and burned alive, leaving three children with the tribe. Seven years ago Barney attempted to escape, but was recaptured and would have been put to death but for the interposition of his wife, who was the daughter of the chief During the time of his captivity, Barney states that he was engaged with his tribe in three battles, two with the Blackfeet, and one with a tribe the names of which we do not know—in one of which he says over seventy Blackfeet were killed.

The most of the time of his captivity, he lived on the head of the Columbia river, and at times as far up as the head of the Flat Head river. During this eighteen years, he saw neither salt, bread, potatoes, coffee, tea or anything of the kind; living upon meet or moose, deer, skunk, rattle-snake, turkey, prairie hens, etc. At the time he made his escape he was near Lake Superior, about sixty miles from a trading post of the American Fur Company. The chief (his father-in-law) was a doctor, and on the 15th of May left, and while he was gone, Barney succeeded in making all the Indians dead drunk with the whisky which had just been received, giving one and a half pint to each Indian. After they were asleep, he took his bow and arrow, tomahawk, pipe, tore and packed forty pounds tobacco, flint and steel, and two pounds of meat, being all there was in the hut. He started and travelled all night, having his dog along; the next morning he killed his dog to prevent his returning to give colue to his trace.

About 11 o'clock the same day, when about thirty-five miles, he was overhauled by his father-in-law's (the chief's) dog, which he killed with his bow and arrow, and carried the carcass away from the path, and then concealed himself in the brush; while he was there concealed the chief passed by him; as he passed, the chief muttered to himself, in his language—"I will pass this mountain, and at the foot of it I will take the left hand." Overhearing this, Barney availed himself of this information. Following the chief to the foot of the mountain, he found, sure enough, that he had taken the left hand road, which he ascertained by the tracks of his ponies. He continued his journey to the east until about two hours before daybreak on the next morning, when he sat down, fatigued and hungry; after daylight he killed a rattlesnake eight feet four inches in length, which he roasted and ate for breakfast. He kept on in the same direction, when about 5 o'clock he was overhauled by his brother-in-law's dog, which he killed immediately and passed on. On the next day, about 5 o'clock, he was overhauled by another dog belonging to the tribe, which he disposed of in the same manner as the others; after which he proceeded without any molestation, traveling four days without daring to build a fire, only in the day time. He was seven weeks traveling before he came to any tribe of Indians, during which time he had spent one week in despair, not traveling or expecting ever to reach a habitation of whites.

The tribe the above time he came to a tribe which he calls the Tomahawks. Here he was kindly treated by them. For fear of being taken again, he assured them that he belonged to the Flat Heads, and was in search of two crasy Indians who had made their escape. After asking some questions in English concerning the crasy Indians, he departed, and after nine miles travel, came to the Missouri river. He made a raft of logs and crossed over, traveling due east, he continued his journey nine weeks before he arrived at White's Lake, in Minnesota, during all of which time he had subsisted upon game, which he killed with his bow and arrow. He remained there three days, and sold his accoutrements for clothing, and then made his way for this State. He arrived here in the cars.

Barney is a man of considerable intelligence, and seems to have a vivid recollection of nearly all that passed during his captivity. He seems familiar with Indian life, and gives many of their signs for determining courses, course, distance, &c. He would like to see his children again, but would forego the pleasure than to go back and remain with the tribe. He was married soon after he came to this country, and lived in Otsego county, New York, where his wife died, after which he was employed by the Fur Company. He is 63 years old, but still seems active and hardy. He describes the country where he has been as being the handsomest he ever saw. Truly he has "seen the elephant," and if his story is correct he can tell of more trials, tribulations and adventuras than any one now living. [Missouplu (Ill.) Statesman.

FLAT-FOOTED.—However much of truth there may be in the charge of hebitual intrigue and dissimulation on the part of the Czar, the Russians come out "flat-footed" for the war. A British journal says: "Natives of Black Russia are nearly all flat-footed, which makes them incapable of long and rapid marches. A man with this defect is not admitted into the English army; and the fact of so large a part of the Russian army being thus naturally constructed, explains in some degree the great losses which attend its march.

OF all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints, nothing has ever been found which could compare in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions. We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.

The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1847; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Art in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the Cherry Pectoral, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.

ST. JOHNS, May 8, 1851.

Dr J. C. AYER: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.

I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how a better remedy can be made for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.

SUMNER, Jan. 24, 1851.

DR. AYER: In the month of July last, I was attacked by a violent diarrhœa, in the mines of California. I returned to San Francisco, in hope of receiving benefit from a change of air and diet. My diarrhœa ceased, but was followed by a severe cough, and much soreness. I finally started for home, but received no benefit from the voyage. My cough continued to grow worse, and when I arrived in New York, I was at once marked by my friends as a victim of consumption. I must confess that I saw no sufficient reason to doubt what my friends all believed. At this time I commenced taking your truly invaluable medicine, with little expectation of deriving any benefit from its use. You would not receive these lines did I not regard it my duty to state to the afflicted, through you, that my health, in the space of eight months, is fully restored. I attribute it to the use of your CHERRY PECTORAL. Yours truly, WM. W. SMITH.

"THAT ODIOUS PRACTICE OF SHOUTING."

METHODIST PREACHERS' MEETING IN PHILADELPHIA.

The question proposed to be discussed was in substance this: "Does the existence of sects in the church of Christ impede the progress of genuine Christianity?" It was very handsomely discussed, though the general sentiment was in favor of the negative. There seemed to be little, if any difference between the several speakers, and there was certainly a very commendable spirit of charity toward other denominations manifested by them all. The strangers present were formally invited to participate in the debate, but there was no occasion for them to say any thing where so much had been so well said. One of the speakers having referred to the watchfulness of the different religious denominations over each other, Dr. Hodgson, with a pleasant twinkle in his small black eyes, arose, and with meek gravity said he would furnish them an illustration of this godly jealousy, in an article contributed to a late Presbyterian paper published in that vicinity, which he held in his hand. He read from the Philadelphia Presbyterian Banner, an article descriptive of a Maryland camp meeting. The description beggars description truly; it presents in grotesque deformity what is frequently seen at camp meetings with some regret; but what, despite the irregularities that do occur, could never be properly tortured into such a scene as the writer gives. On the reading of the paper some of the preachers expressed indignation at the shameful outrage of such a publication—others thought there were mitigating circumstances, in the occasional departures from propriety which such meetings present, and Dr. Durbin mentioned things which he had seen, which to an outside observer, one not participating in the sympathies of the meeting—would appear highly indecorous and irreverent. He did not justify the publication; he thought it an outrage itself on Christian propriety; but he was prepared to make some excuse for the writer, because of the position from which he contemplated the scene he described. Gradually the main question was lost sight of, and the subject of shouting came up in its place, as a sort of side issue. The interest of the meeting and of the discussion was manifestly increasing. The president allowed and seemed with the rest to enjoy the latitude taken, when the venerable James Sewell, formerly of the Baltimore Conference, arose, and in one of the most impressive, humorous and yet dignified and pointed speeches we have ever heard—in his own peculiar manner, and those who know him, know what his manner is—set the whole company, one moment in a perfect roar of laughter, and the next started the vigorous and hearty amen from every part of the little assembly. He sat down, leaving us to understand that he was not alarmed at the existence of sects, while Christian love was permitted to hear a good old-fashioned Methodist shout! He said he believed in shouting, he wished we had more of it; he had read in an old book of a certain old saint of God, who once felt shouting happy, and he cried out in his joy, "Bless the Lord, O my soul!" and then as though he supposed there might be something inside of him beside his soul, he exclaimed in addition, "All that is within me, bless His Holy Name!" The sensation just hers was quite lively. When he said, I must tell you a little of my experience about this shouting. I was once stationed in Virginia over a very lively set of Methodists, the most lively congregation I think I ever had. They were not ashamed nor afraid to shout if they felt like it, and many a happy time did we have together. On one occasion I saw Rev. D. ——, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a very excellent man, sitting before me while I was preaching. It would have amused you to see his surprise, as indicated by his shifting and turning himself about, after the work had fairly commenced. He looked alarmed, as though he thought the people had lost their senses for certain; but the meeting closed in good order, and many went to their homes happy in God.

A few days afterward, I met him in one of the streets.

"Good morning, Bro. Sewell," said he, with very marked politeness.

"Good morning," said I, as pleasantly, in return.

"I was at your Church on last Sabbath night," said he.

"Yes, sir; I was glad to see you, and hope you will be found frequently in our midst."

"Permit me to say to you, sir," rejoined he, "that you have prospered much as a people, but if you would discountenance that odious practice of shouting in your public assemblies, you would prosper a great deal more."

"Ah!" said I, "you think so, do you? You yourself discountenance it, I presume."

"Yes, sir," said he, emphatically, "we do."

"Why, then, do you not prosper? You have been preaching here for years. Let me ask you, kindly, has one soul been converted under your ministry since you have been here? Have you a member of your church who prays audibly and regularly at the family altar?"

"In truth, sir," said he, looking a little serious and confused, "I dare not answer either of your questions in the affirmative."

"Well, then, allow me to ask again, why do you not prosper, since you are so much opposed to shouting?"

"We have so few who minister in holy things among us," said he.

"Then you should pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers in his vineyard."

Recovering himself a little, he said, with some emphasis, "But let me inform you, my dear sir, that the worshippers of Juggernaut shout!"

"And do they not pray, too?" I inquired.

"I believe they do," said he, with a pleasant smile.

"Then," said I, "I suppose we must stop praying, for the same reason that you would urge why we should quit shouting."

"But," said he, with an air of some triumph, as though he now had me, "I knew a man that professed religion and was a great shouter, who was very irregular in his life!"

"Indeed!" replied I. "Well, I knew another man, who professed religion and never shouted at all, and he was just like him."

A short and significant silence ensued, in which Rev. Dr. —— appeared as though he would not be sorry if he could conveniently sound a retreat. I followed him up, however, by saying:

"Since you are so much opposed to shouting, I wish you would preach against it, taking this for your text: 'Cry out and shout thou inhabitant of Zion, for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee,' and I will come and hear you."

"No, sir," said he, I would not take that text, I would select this: 'Shout, O earth!' and I would prove that earth is dumb; and then where would you be?"

Mr. Sewell said he really thought at the time there was such a passage; but on examination afterward he found it was mis-quoted, that it ought to be, "Shout ye lower parts of the earth!" He said that his observation justified him in concluding that the upper ten, i. e., the higher parts of the earth, cannot shout; they are afraid of it. But assuming the text to have been correctly quoted, he said he should cite "O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord!" "I would prove," said he, "that the word earth in that place, meant the people upon the earth: then it would be, "Shout, O earth,' that is, the people of earth, the whole world, and then where would you be?"

"At this state," continued the speaker, "my friend, the Doctor, became rather pensive. Looking down he said:"

"I really am frequently very much discouraged. I try to do my very best to serve the people. I prepare my discourses with considerable care and labor; but it seems very little good is done."

"Suppose," I said to him, "suppose a farmer, after he had broken up his ground, were to entertain an idea that his seed was not quite fine enough, and were to grind it in his mill, and sow the meal instead of the seed, when do you think he would have a crop?"

"My dear sir," said the Rev. Dr. ——, parting with me good humoredly, "Do you really think I sow meal?" We parted in love, determined to keep the "unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace."

Mr. Sewell said he would mention one other incident connected with shouting. He was preaching in B— Chapel, on Sunday, the 8th of the present month, and during the discourse felt his own soul elevated, and saw pretty clear intimations that the banks of Jordan would be overflowed; and sure enough, presently the power came, and a lady in the midst of the congregation shouted aloud, and the effect was startling. "After service I came down," said he, "and approached toward the lady, who was still greatly excited. As I advanced a sister said:

"She's a Jewess! she's a Jewess! How, in the world did she happen to come into a Methodist meeting?"

Another said, "She's a Jewess, Bro. Sewell, and has been converted while you were preaching."

I approached her. She was all excitement. As I drew nigh she exclaimed, with electrical effect: "He has come! Yes, he has come into my heart! He is the Messiah! He is the Christ! Glory be to His holy name!"

We cannot hope to give the reader more than a faint idea of the impression made by this speech of the Rev. Mr. Sewell. There were moist eyes all over the room. A few additional remarks closed the exercises of the meeting. Among them were some pointed observations of Dr. Durbin, who asked what an outside party, not knowing the subject of discussion, not participating in the sympathies of the meeting, but simply hearing the expressions of pleasure that had been given in the way of laughter and responses, would have thought, had he been told that this was a Methodist preacher's meeting. He would have taken up a very incorrect notion. Yet not more so than those who, not entering into the sympathies of revival meetings, look upon them from a stand-point which reveals only the irregularities of the occasion.

We left the brethren at the conclusion of the exercises, feeling that no where else in that city could Monday morning have been more pleasantly or more profitably spent.

PROTESTANTISM IN GERMANY.

THE KIRCHENTAG.

A correspondent of the Christian Observer, visiting from Europe, Nov. 10, says:

In Germany, there are some signs of revived spirituality which may be gratefully pondered. These have been made more visible by the meeting, about a month ago, of the German Kirchentag at Frankfort. This was one of the largest Ecclesiastical Conferences ever held, numbering 1515 enrolled members, besides 700 more, who were not enrolled. The first meeting of the Kirchentag was held in 1848, and was the fruit of a desire for union and reformation cherished by the Reformed and Lutheran Churches. The very existense of these Churches was imperilled by the unsults of Popery and Rationalism; and the Protestant Pastors of that country have met year from year for the last seven years, to devise, if possible, some common ground on which they might co-operate in repelling these assaults. The great event of session of last year was the resolution, "that the Augsburg confession of faith should be the common foundation of the German Churches." This was a symptom of returning spiritual life and closer union. This, in some respects, the noblest confession of the Reformation, so long laid aside, is an ancient banner unfurled once more on the plains of Germany. And the proceedings of the Kirchentag this year indicate farther progress. The opening service was a sermon by M. Deichler of Frankfort, in the great Church of St. Catherine, on Luke x. 41, 42. From this text the preacher proved that for the reform of the Evangelical Church, of which she stood in great need, her union with Christ her Lord should become more and more intimate. After this, M. Hoffman, preacher of the Cathedral at Berlin, discussed the first subject in the order of the day, by reading an elaborate paper on "The proper uses of the Bible in the Church, the School and the Family." He would have the old custom of reading the Bible in public worship revived, and week evening services instituted for reading the Bible, with a short exposition of the portion read. As to the School. M. Hoffman argued for the teaching not of extracts, but the whole Bible. He also advocated the reading of the whole Bible in regular order in the family; and in this way he would restore new Bible life in Germany. A discussion followed, conducted by Professor Schenkel, Dr. Barth, Prof. Stern, Pastor Mallett and Dr. Krummacher, author of "Elijah the Tishbite." There were some slight differences of opinion as to the propriety of reading the whole Bible, but none as to the authoritative and exclusive place the Bible ought to hold in the faith and practice of the Church. When it is considered that 2,000 ministers, from all parts of Germany, who were present, concurred in these sentiments, may we not believe the day of rationalism is past in Germany?

Dr. Muller, the well-known author of a work on Sin, introduced the first subject allotted to the second day. "The relation of the Church to the civil legislature relative to the question of divorce." The low and lax condition of legislation on this matter in Germany has led to many practical evils. In Prussia the law has gradually degenerated, so that at the present time there are no fewer than fourteen cases for which one party can insist upon a divorce, the most of which have no warrant from Scripture. Dr. Muller had the unanimous support of the assembled Pastors in the practical measures which he proposed to counteract the legislative enactments of the State.

On the same day another subject was discussed—"The grounds on which Infant Baptism can be vindicated." Prof. Steinmeyer led the way by reading a long paper on Infant Baptism. The Prof. opposed baptismal regeneration and viewed the operation of the rite as wholly negative, uprooting from the Old Adam but not engrafting into the New Adam; destroying the old man but not implanting the new man. The Kirchentag took up this topic in consequence of the efforts of the Baptist missionaries to spread their peculiar views, which are opposed to those of well-nigh the whole German nation. The only practical result of the discussion was a resolution to publish a popular work on Infant Baptism.

On the third day the principal subject discussed was the "Inner Mission," answering to Home Missions in England and your country. This "Mission has so far been crowned with signal success.

The subject of games of chance, gambling-houses and lotteries, was taken up on the fourth day. Much was well said of the immorality of these practices, and the social demoralization of which they are the fruitful source; and it was resolved to petition all the governments of Germany to exterminate them by the strong arm of the law.

On the last day, Prof. Schaff, of Mercersburgh, Pa., addressed the meeting on "the relation of the German Evangelical Church to her daughter-church in North America." He dwelt chiefly on the prospective importance of America for the inward and outward development of the kingdom of God on earth—the position and mission of the German Church in America—and the duties of the German Church towards the immense mass of emigrants who, year by year, sought a new home in the United States. A long discussion followed, and most of Dr. Schaff's motions were adopted.

PHYSICIANS.

"LUKE, THE BELOVED PHYSICIAN."—Col. 4: 14.

We believe more was designed to be implied by this expression than is ordinarily understood; for who, out of the pale of our immediate family circle, bears so intimate a relation as does the long endeared family physician?—Yes, endeared to us often by association with some of the holiest, the most soul absorbing moments of our lives. Sometimes, indeed, associated with our most afflictive moments, also, which for a time will render his re-appearance painful; but when time has effected his healing process, we greet him again with a new and subdued tenderness, from the fact that he has been witness of, and, to a degree, sharer in our sorrow. It will be well remembered how many families beside those directly concerned, were plunged in grief at the Norwalk tragedy. Long, long will it be ere Salem's poor and suffering forget her noble, her "beloved" Pierson!

We know of none in the community, who more demand our consideration and sympathy. Faithful to their posts; but for them how sad the condition of those who are compelled to remain during the unhealthy season in the city. Rarely indulging in the gayety of watering places; seldom, indeed, recognized elsewhere amid the gay; they who encountered the severity of winter, day and night, patiently attending at our couch of suffering, may now be found mounting, unwearingly, staircase after staircase, to the close, unattractive, and often infectious chambers of the sick and dying.

THE APOSTLES:

THEIR LIVES, WIVES AND CHILDREN.

Good deal is said in the Ecclesiastical History about the Apostles themselves, but very little about their families. In this view a French writer asks the following questions: Were the Apostles married? Did they have children? What became of these children? Where did these Apostles live? Where did they write? What became of them? Did they have a district? Did they exercise a civil ministry? Did they have jurisdiction over the faithful? Were they bishops? Did they have a hierarchy, rites and ceremonies? These questions are curious, and the reply involves a great deal of obscure antiquarian learning.

1. Were the Apostles married?

There exists a letter, attributed to St. Ignatius, the martyr, in which are these decisive words: "I remember your sanctity, like that of Elijah, of Jeremiah, of John the Baptist, of the chosen disciples Timothy, Titus, Erodious Clement, who lived in chastity; but I do not blame those others, happy in the bonds of marriage, and I hope to be found worthy of God in following the traces in His reign, after the example of Isaac, Jacob, Isaiah, and of the other prophets, such as Peter and Paul, and of their Apostles who were married?"

Some scholars have pretended that the name of St. Paul is interpolated in this famous letter. Turien, and all those who have seen the letters of St. Ignatius in Latin, in the library of the Vatican, acknowledge that the name of St. Paul is found in them. And Baronius does not deny that this passage exists in some Greek manuscripts; but he pretends that these were added by some modern Greek.

There was in the ancient library of Oxford, a manuscript in Greek of these letters of St. Ignatius, in which these words are found. I do not know whether it was burned with many other books, at the taking of Oxford by Cromwell. There is still one in Latin in the same library, in which the words "Pauli et Apostolorum" is effaced, but in such manner that the ancient characters may be easily read. It is certain that this passage is contained in many editions of the letters.

The dispute concerning the marriage of St. Paul may be very frivolous. What matters it whether he was married or not, if the other Apostles were so? We have only to read his first Epistle to the Corinthians, to prove that he might have been married, like the others: "Have we not the right to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other Apostles, and of the brethren of the Lord and Cephas? Or I only and Barnabas, have not we the right to forbear working? Who goeth a warfaring any time at his own charges?" It is clear from this passage, that all the Apostles were married as well as St. Peter.

And St. Clement, of Alexandria, declares positively that St. Paul had a wife. The Romish discipline has changed, but that does not prevent there having been other customs in the primitive times.

2. Of the children of the Apostles?

We know very little concerning their families. St. Clement, of Alexandria, says that Peter had children; that Philip had daughters whom he married; the Acts of the Apostles speak of the four daughters of St. Philip, who prophesied. It is believed that there was one married, and that she was St. Hermione.

Eusebius reports that Nicholas, chosen by the Apostles to co-operate with St. Stephen in the holy ministry, had a very beautiful wife, of whom he was jealous. The Apostles having reproached him for his fault, he corrected himself, and bringing his wife before them, said, "I am willing to relinquish her; let him who will take her to wife." The Apostles did not accept his proposition. He had by his wife one son and several daughters.

Cleophas, according to Eusebius and St. Epiphus, was brother of St. Joseph and father of St. James the lesser and of St. Jude, whom he had by Mary, sister of the Holy Virgin. Thus, St. Jude, the Apostle, was cousin-german to Jesus Christ.

Heggesippus, quoted by Eusebius, says that two grandchildren of St. Jude were shown to the Emperor Domitian as descendants of David, and as having an incontestible right to the throne of Jerusalem. Domitian, fearing that they might make use of this right, questioned them himself: they exposed their genealogy; the Emperor asked them what was their fortune; they answered that they possessed thirty-nine acres of land which paid tribute, and they were laboring men. The Emperor then asked them when the kingdom of Jesus Christ would come; they said that it would be at the end of the world. After which Domitian let them go in peace, which proves he was not a persecutor.

PULPIT RHETORIC.

The Puritan Recorder publishes reminiscences of a theological professor. Writers and sermon-makers will find volumes to their advantage in the following:

"But Dr. Griffin especially excelled as a Rhetorical teacher. The exercises of the class in criticising each others' compositions, under his guidance, were the most interesting and profitable of any. He required each student to take notes, while one was reading his essay, and then each in turn was called upon for his criticism. Then he would criticise both the essayist and the critic. By such an exercise he would impress on the minds of the students, the leading principles of rhetoric, so that they could be easily apprehended and not easily forgotten. Nothing was more remarkable than the exhaustless patience with which he inculcated a single rule, till he saw it well fixed in the practice. For instance, one of the most common errors of young writers is that perpetrated in the form of mixed metaphors. Whenever one of these occurred in a composition, he would stop the reader and say, "Paint it!" that is, complete the image represented in the metaphor, and see if all its parts correspond with each other. To use one of Blair's examples quoted from Shakspeare: "Take up arms against a sea of troubles;" he would have them picture in the mind the sea, and then the armed host, that they might perceive that the two were incongruous, and therefore that the metaphor was not fit. After he had made his meaning well understood, he was wont to correct the recurrence of this fault with a single stroke, by the single expression, "Paint it!" So of every other common fault in composition; he had it as distinctly labelled, and could as quickly correct it and pass on. His mode of taking the wind out of the sails of a turgid writer, was extremely happy. The student would read off with great confidence, a long and what he conceived to be a splendid sentence, full of high sounding words and pompous imagery. The Doctor would say, "Stop, let us see." He would then take the evident sense of the sentence, if it had any, and put it in line simple words, and say, "You mean so, do you not?" "Yes, sir." "Then say so." The student would, perhaps, stare, and find out with difficulty at last, that he meant that he should write down those five words, in place of his great sentence, made with learned length and thundering sound. He would then, for a while, be stumbled at the discovery, that those few simple terms, embracing all the sense which he had to convey, were better than his many portly words employed before. Here, before he thought of it, a new principle of writing had gained possession of his mind; viz: That the true force of writing consists in the maximum of sense with the minimum of words; and not, as young writers usually have it, in the maximum of words with the minimum of sense. If the student was reluctant to suffer such a collapse, through loss of words and wind, the Doctor would follow him through his composition, making the like change on every sentence that needed it, and then direct him to copy it off, and see how much better it would read. Though the reduction in bulk would be striking, and the labor of copying small, most were compelled to confess the improvement.

"Indeed, his main labor, as a Rhetorical teacher, was in a war against words—an effort to drill the student into the condensation of his forms of expression. His theory was, that force in the utterance of a thought was in inverse proportion to the number of words and syllables required. And therefore, that the short Saxon words, the monosyllables, if we have them, are better than the longer words of Latin derivation. It was a position of his, that the hearer's or reader's thought travels faster than our language can travel; and if the expression lags behind, by reason of the lumber of the words, the mind of the hearer becomes tired of waiting for it, and an impression of fatigue or dullness is produced. Herein, he said, he accounted for the fact, that among preachers there were many of extensive scholarship, sound sense and ardent piety, who in their sermons were incurably dull. The hearer might listen and see that there are important thoughts and new and striking views of truth in the sermon. But, in spite of this, his attention flags, and can be sustained only with an effort. If you attentively examine the structure of this class of sermons, it will be seen that the thought is smothered in the words. There is an amount of verbiage, which so much taxes the patience of the hearer, in the effort of picking out the thought from the redundant words, that the interest in hearing is destroyed.

"Having this view of style, he laid a heavy hand on all redundancies, till the student was astonished to find how many of his cus-tomary words could be spared, and what a new force and quickening his discourse had acquired by the loss of them. This idea could not be received and comprehended by the student until the Doctor sat down with him and I went over every sentence, striking out every useless word and showing him how much the force of thought was improved by taking it away; thus demonstrating that words with writers are but necessary evils. While doing this, the thought expressed in every paragraph was, of course, thoroughly scanned; and if there was no thought in it, which often happened, the student was enabled to see it. A very common matter of surprise with students was, to find how little of sense was left in their labored essays, after the redundant words were cut away."

In Demerara, every one is "Esq." that wears shoes and stockings.

DISCOVERY AT JERUSALEM.

The following account of an interesting discovery, recently made at Jerusalem by Dr. Barolay, an American physician, is given in a recent letter from Rev. H. D. Kitchell, of Detroit, to the Chicago Herald, dated at Jerusalem, August 12th:

"Not long since, as Dr. Barolay was walking outside the wall of Jerusalem, his dog pursued some small animal into a hole under the wall, and was gone so long as to awaken his curiosity. With some difficulty he opened the hole, and pressing in he found it opening into a spacious cavern. He closed the opening then, but went out with his son soon afterward, and suffered himself to be shut out of the gate over night: as the gates are all closed at sunset. They then entered the cave, prepared with lights, and spent the night in exploring and accurately measuring the vast cavern which they found within. We formed a party, and very early one morning visited this cave, before any people were stirring beyond the walls. It is on the north side of the city, a few rods eastward from the Damascus gate. For about ten feet the passage is barely large enough to admit the body, and you crowd yourself in feet foremost. Then climbing down some eight feet you find yourself in a passage vaulted over by a smooth rock, which opens out into a long succession of immense chambers. They spread far and wide under the hill, which forms the north-eastern portion of the city. It seems to have been, originally, a natural cave in the rock, which has been quarried out in every direction, till it now appears as a series of chambers, vast and deep, hewn in the solid unstratified lime stone. Stone was, perhaps, quarried here in ancient times, for building in the city. The full length of the excavation is said to be near 1,000, directly toward the site of the temple. Immense galleries lead off on the sides; and the roof, in many parts, 40 to 80 feet above, almost beyond the reach of your torch-light, is supported on huge piers of the rock, left for the purpose. At the end is a fountain and small pool, the water quite saline and strongly impregnated with lime. In one deep pit was found, when the cave was first entered, the skeleton of a man, whose bones still lie piled on a rock near where they were discovered. Some poor fellow, long ago, found here a dark chamber and death, and a sepulchre surpassing that of the Kings. We spent many hours in following out the many apartments of this cave."

VERY UNGALLANT.—The last Knickerbocker has the following upon a pooless with red hair:

Unfortunate woman, how sad 'tis your lot—
Your ringlets are red, and your pocket's not.

AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

The Picayune of Monday evening contains an elaborate article concerning "American Interests in the War," which we deem so just and timely as to induce us to copy it. It speaks of the indifference felt by Americans concerning the success or discomfiture of the English troops in the Crimea, and goes on to say that this feeling

"springs out of a prevailing conviction with Americans that England is profoundly jealous of the growth of the United States, interferes directly to defeat our aims, and has herself originated and prompted schemes of hostility which endanger our quiet, if not our safety at vital points.

"They know that Cuba belongs to Spain, and that the Sandwich Islands do not belong to England or France; that Central America and Mexico are our neighbors, not hers, and that we have an interest in them infinitely more near than the English have in Turkey, where they are expending so much blood and treasure to keep up an influence; they are fighting us from our station on the Atlantic to our States on the Pacific, more exclusively than the Isthmus and Egypt, through the Sultan's dominions, are the highway to India, for which the British are fighting. Now, when it is notorious that British diplomacy has been engaged every where in opposition to our desires, and when they read the angry tone in which we were threatened with future punishment if we do not cease pursuing our new objects with England in a better condition to defeat them, it is impossible that, on any question of feeling or calculation, they can be expected to show any zeal for the success of the British armies. If there is any regret that this should be so, the cause is to be sought in that line of public conduct towards us by which the British Government has taught us, that it is not our friend itself, and is the prompter of others, continually to our injury. When the British cease to be enemies, and in accord with our enemies, they may have a right to expect a more cordial feeling for them in their quarrels. The absence of which in the present war strikes them as selfish and unnatural. They do not choose to be friends with us; they have no right to complain that we do not make their enemies ours. We may think quite as kindly of the Emperor of Russia, who never did us any thing but kindness as we do of them, who keep us in a state of perpetual watchfulness for acts of unfriendliness.

"After all, it is our national sympathy with their cause that they crave, and are offended at not receiving. The American Government has done many acts of preference to Russia, and what disturbs the British is the sort of popular indifference that prevails here to the high sounding pretences upon which the Allies vindicate the war, and the popular indications of a wish that the Russians may make a successful defence of their soil against the invaders. Assuming that we are bound to admit that the Allies are waging war against a despotic power, the most absolute in the world, and that the ground of the war is the defence of the weak against the tyranny of the strong, and of freedom, order and civilization against a grasping and barbaric despotism, they pronounce us faithless to our own principles, because we do not join in with a shout for the downfall of Russia.

"It is highly creditable to the good sense of our people that they have not been hurried away by catch words into a false position. As lovers of freedom, and as republicans in principle, they have little interest in the European quarrel as it stands, its pretexts or its results. If they inclines to the side of Russia, as a matter of feeling, it is from an preference to her form of Government, or sympathy with the original cause of her quarrel with Turkey. The war has become a struggle for the balancing of power and territory in Europe, among the contending powers, the adjustment of the proportions of influence which monarchs and emperors shall respectively bear towards each other, in which the masses of the people, their advancement in happiness and privileges, are matters not at all investigated or cared for. It is a strife for mastery among ambitious Governments, and we never heard the first plea advanced that either side broke to the elevation of the people in the scale of political rights, or dreame of conceding self-governing or constitutional privileges.

"How could England claim the particular sympathy of free Governments against Russia, as the arch enemy of European liberties, when up to within a less than month England and Russia were the closest of allies in the maintenance of what was called conservatism and order in Europe, and Nicholas the chief bulwark against the perils of revolution? How could it be, when England is the ally of the French Emperor, who holds in his hands an absolute power, extorted from a bewildered people, by the bloodiest treachery, and exercised with an iron rule, which crushed out every vestige of opposition to his personal will? How is it, when the taunting champion of civilization and liberty is eagerly courting the alliance of Austria—of Austria, the meanest, most cruel, and most treacherous of despotisms, whose alliance cannot be had without consenting to protect her against all internal movements, which might be made by the oppressed multitudes, to wrest some rights from their masters? The Northern Powers cannot maintain their alliance with each other, or obtain any co-operation among the German powers, except by renouncing all purpose to meliorate the condition of their subjects, perpetuating their governments. Were England alone in a struggle to maintain herself with her advanced institutions, against continental absolutism, or in preserving what is free, or in struggling to be free, among European nations from the hordes of the Czar, or his brother despots in Austria or Prussia, and showed herself willing to accept the cordial sympathy and material support of America, she would have it in a substantial form—and the time may come when she will regret that she did not merit our friendship by simply doing justice, and letting us alone. But it is idle for her to look for our sympathy in a contest which we know is conducted on her own account, and for her own material interests. Through which, if freedom and the nations derive any advantage whatever, it will be from other combinations hereafter, in which England will here no part, and against which her present alliances bind her to be hostile."

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.—The Star of the West, which arrived at New York on the 24 inst., brought eight days later news from California, but nothing of special interest. We extract the following items:

The rear guard of the grand overland army of the present season are near the western terminus of their long and arduous journey. Within the last few days a number of immigrant trains have arrived, from whom we have derived information of great interest to the public.

Mr Otis Sullivan, an old resident of this city, left the Missouri River on the 20th of May with a party from Iowa and Missouri, and having also a number of head of horses in the train. They came along with no difficulty until their arrival at the Loup Forks, eighty-five miles this side of the Missouri, where the Indians commenced hostile demonstrations by driving off ten of their horses.

On the ensuing day, which was the third of June, the party, nine in number, sallied out in pursuit. They came up with the Indians, whom they found to be well armed with English muskets, and better equipped for service than they themselves. On the first attack nine were killed, and shortly after the emigrants were joined by ten rescuers from another train, when the pursuit was renewed as far as Beart Creek, and this time with better success, as they succeeded in capturing the chief of the red men, whose name was Omshaw. Their prisoner informed his captors that there were nine hundred with the savages. The Indians numbered between sixty and seventy. The encounter occurred on the south side of the Platte. [Saturday's Union.

A duel was fought on the 8th of November between Col. J. D. Woodlief and Achilles Kewen, about ten miles from Oakland. About one hundred and fifty persons were assembled as spectators of the encounter. The parties fought with Mississippi rifles, at forty paces—placed back to back and to wheel and fire. At the first discharge, Col. Woodlief fell, shot through the heart, and died instantaneously. He was shot through and through, and was dead almost as soon as he had touched the earth. Mr Kewan was unhurt.

Captain Spence, of the brig Henry Williams, at San Francisco, from the Sandwich Islands, reported that on November 3, in latitude 38 degrees N., longitude 130 degrees 26 seconds W., he was in the vicinity of a naval engagement between some unknown ships at sea. The weather being very foggy, he could not see the vessels. He says:

I should fancy by the three first shocks that they were broadsides, for it caused our vessel to shake similar to a volcanic eruption. They were then followed by some twenty or thirty single guns, as near as we could judge from the distance, and lastly there were two others fired similar to minute guns.

RUSSIAN STOICISM.—At the attack on Petropolowska, the Russians are said to have fought with unflinching courage. An example is given of a Russian sentinel, against whom upwards of sixty rifle shots were aimed, but nothing could overcome his stoicism, and he continued to pace up and down the ramparts of the fort in which he was stationed, without leaning his head either to the left or right. He escaped.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16.

Pen and Scissors.—The pen editorial is at this time enjoying a sabbath. The scissors have worked unusually free, and we hope with usual discretion. Pro-tem finds that the Editor, on leaving for the Alabama Conference, pocketed the pen and left only the scissors behind. We shall, next week, present our readers another interesting letter from John Bunyan.

Godey's for January, 1855, is early at hand. This number is unequalled in the splendor and finish of its engravings, and in the variety and readableness of its matter. The plates alone are worth the price of the volume. This number contains 100 pages, 68 engravings and 60 contributions.

Blackwood's for November, offers an attractive table of contents.

SOUTH-WESTERN BIBLE SOCIETY.

New Orleans, Nov. 8th, 1854.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire,

Editor of the N. O. Christian Advocate,

Dear Sir:

It may be interesting to yourself, as well as to a majority of your readers, to know that the Fifth Anniversary of the Society will be celebrated, together with the opening of their new Bible House, on Sabbath Evening, the 17th inst., at Odd Fellows Hall. Addresses will be delivered by Dr. Leycock, Rev. J. B. Walker, and probably another minister, together with the reading of the Annual Report.

It is expected that all the Churches will be closed and both pastors and people attend in mass on so interesting an occasion.

Should any Minister or Church have been omitted in distributing special invitations, they will please consider this as a general one to all. Very truly yours,

THO. K. PRICE,
R. G. LATTING,
Committee of Arrangements.

Virginia Conference.—The proceedings of this body, sitting in Norfolk, Bishop Pierce presiding, have been received up to the fourth day. No important statistics are yet available. Our accounts, taken from the Richmond Advocate, do not furnish us with the date on which the session began. The following notice of the fourth day is from the Southern Argus:

The proceedings of this day were very attractive and full of interest. The body met in the upper part of the Church, which was entirely filled with visitors. We venture the remark that no body of men who meet in deliberate session is possessed of more and varied talent than the Virginia Conference There are present men of the most acute, logical and analytical minds, whose thoughts burn with facts which bury opposition deep below the surface of human opinion; there are men of high discriminative, discursive minds; men whose words are eloquent syllables of truth that thrill and please auditors; men of age and of youth. In this place we would say something of the presiding officer. He is a fine looking man of the medium height, with a keen black eye, and a massive forehead that indicates great strength of intellect and character. He has a full round voice, and has the reputation of an eloquent, and logical, and discursive preacher; his energy of character is proverbial in the South, and every one speaks of his presiding talents in the highest regard.

There were many able speeches made on this occasion, abounding in passages of eloquence, and even humor, that we have never heard surpassed. The citizens of this place will find it very pleasant to while away an hour in the midst of the session.

On Friday evening, Rev. Mr. Dibrel delivered a most able, lucid and interesting discourse to a crowded house, before the Young Men's Aid Society; and yet he did not do himself that justice which former discourses would warrant. Dr. Smith also addressed the meeting in an eloquent manner; after which a collection was taken up, amounting to $850. The congregations that attend on the ministry of the different gentlemen appointed to hold divine service are overflowing, and among them many members of the different denominations of this city. There is an unusually large number of visitors present in this city, especially of the fair sex.

Our brother of the Texas Christian Advocate is on his way to the East Texas Conference. He leaves Houston and meets with these delectable baps:

On the Way.—Next morning, bidding adieu to friends, we set out on a lovely journey of over two hundred miles, alone, and over some of the worst roads in the world. Bro. Shearn had supplied us with another horse, and also with the "tug" to which the "trace" is fastened. We soon came up with an old gentleman and lady, in a kind of barouche, driving two horses and going our route all day. We resolved to make a guide of him, as he appeared to be an "old Texan." We soon came to some frightful road. The old man got into many a mud hole that we were enabled to miss. But just as we were crossing the last bog in the timber, and about to enter the flat, barren, dreary prairie that stretches about thirty miles beyond Houston, the newly supplied "tug" broke. There we were, in the middle of a wide bog, and the harness broken! With our mud-boots covering our clothes nearly to the knee, and rope in hand, we plunged in, the mud reaching half way to boot tops, and soon tied it up. Then, going before the horse, we encouraged him to come out, which he soon did, to our great delight. After thanking the Lord heartily, we started; but our fellow-traveler had paid no attention to our distress and was out of sight.

"Ten Thousand a Year" is decidedly slow; it is starvation wages, in comparison with some people's income, as William B. Astor's, for instance, which is said to amount to twelve hundred thousand dollars per annum, or, deducting more than half for expenses, about ten thousand per week.

A COUNTRY SERMON.

BY A LAYMAN,

My Friend: Having discovered from the general tenor of your conversation to-day that you are all farmers, (for instead of inquiring about the welfare of your souls your only inquiry appears to be about the state of your crops,) I have determined to preach from a text that cannot but interest you exceedingly, as it contains a plain and never-failing rule for obtaining the full consummation of those desires which appear to be so near to your hearts.

The text is this: "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase, so shall thy barns be filled with plenty." These words are found in Proverbs, 3 c. vv. 9 and 10. They are the words of Solomon, and for our present purpose we shall consider them as only the advice of the wisest man the world ever saw, without referring to the spirit of inspiration by which they were doubtless penned. Taken even in this sense, they form a rule of worldly wisdom, not to be neglected: one based on experience, as all proverbs are, and one calculated to operate through all time as an unchangeable rule of God's dealing with the cultivators of the soil. The rule is a very plain and simple one, easy to be complied with—nothing burdensome in it, and one which insures a blessing on those who comply with it. Honor the Lord with thy substance and with the first fruits of thine increase. Oh, say some, that was a rule peculiarly adapted to the Jews, who were under an obligation by their law, to pay tithes and give offerings of first fruits to the Lord, but it is in no wise required of Christians who are not under the law, but under grace. Here's scripture quoted to save a barrel of corn or a bale of cotton! But on your own supposition, God gave a rule to the Jews which contained a promise of temporal rewards. This rule was given to them because they were God's favored people; but since the glorious light of the gospel has shed its hallowed rays over the Gentile world, have we not also become partakers of the promises, made to the fathers; and are not we equally interested in appropriating to ourselves every promise and every blessing contained in the Scripture? 'Tis true, my friends, that sacrifices and offerings are no more required as propitiations for sin, but does it thence follow that we are to neglect and despise the means which God himself has pointed out for our future and temporal welfare, and reject his wisdom on the ground that it was only intended for the Jews, and had no application to God's people the world over?

But your supposition is not true. The book of Proverbs was written by Solomon, or is at least a selection from the many thousand wise sayings of this wisest of men. It is a book that was written for the purpose of giving subtility to the simple, to the young man, knowledge and discretion. And it is further said "that a wise man will hear and increase learning, and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels, to understand a proverb and the interpretation, the words of the wise and their dark sayings." And it strikes me that this book was written for instruction of all men, in all ages of the world. What was wisdom in Jerusalem in the days of Solomon, is wisdom there to-day, and equally so in any other part of the globe. Doubtless in this book are found many allusions to the manners and customs of the Jews to illustrate and explain the peculiar duty treated of, just as a writer of the present day would allude to the laws and customs of his country to illustrate any subject about which he was writing. The book of Proverbs is like the mint of the United States, which was created for the purpose of coining gold and silver for the use and convenience of our own people, but we know that American gold and silver coin is just as valuable in any part of the civilized world as it is here; and is not wisdom preferable to either?

But, says one, I have only made half a crop of cotton, and scarcely corn enough to bread my family, and you know what the Scriptures say, (for such an one can quote Scripture almost as well as the devil) that we must take care of our families first and charity begins at home, &c. And how did it happen, my dear friend, that your crop was so short. Why, there was a drought, or a flood, or no rain, or too much rain, or a horse died, or something else happened which caused all the mischief. Not so, my friend; you had no confidence in the promise of God; you despised all his warnings and chastenings; you worked with your worldly wisdom late and early without the least intention of honoring God with your substance or of dedicating a small portion of your increase to Him who might justly claim the whole; you scarcely thanked him for the dew of his heaven, or the light of his sun, or his refreshing showers which he sent you, so seasonably, and which enabled you, ungrateful that you are, to make the little that you have made. Look at the poor Indian! without the wisdom of Solomon or the light of Revelation, he honors his God with the first fruits of his increase, nor does he dare to use the produce of his field until he has, in his way, made an offering to his God of green corn, thus acknowledging that there is a deity who demands at least a free-will offering of his creatures for mercies and benefits conferred. I once knew a man, and would that I knew more, who conscientipusly set apart a tenth of the increase of his fields for religious purposes. I never knew that man to complain of bad crops. He always made plenty and to spare, and many of his poorer neighbors could have testified to his liberality.

Now, let me earnestly exhort you all, and counsel you what to do, in order that your barns may be filled. When you plant your crops resolve that a certain portion of your increase shall be dedicated to the God that made you and to whose sun and rain you are indebted for all you have. The result may surprise you but it will not surprise me, for I know that God is faithful, who has promised it. You can scarcely be at a loss to dispose of the portion thus dedicated. Look around you. Would not the price of a few barrels of corn or pounds of cotton be instrumental, in your hands, in promoting the great cause of religion and truth. It is true that God might in a moment convert the world if he saw proper; but he works by means. The history of the world shows this, and man has appointed work to perform in this great reformation. Oh, that you would be willing in the great work, the spread of the Gospel! Even the taking of a religious paper into your family would be of great aid. The good influence of such periodicals has been felt by thousands. Assisting in the education of the rising generation will contribute materially in dissipating the gloom that seems gathering around us. Are there no Sunday schools in your neighborhood that would thankfully receive a donation of your money to aid them in the purchase of books? And think you that God will not bless your labors for those purposes? Assuredly he will, if you will confidently rely on his aid in all your labors; your barns will be filled, for God has said it.

Look at the poor overworn minister of the Gospel, who labors for the good of souls: have you nothing to spare to him from the increase of your fields, which God has given you? Have you no poor, distressed neighbors, that a little of your bounty would relieve from the pressure of penury? In fine, there are hundreds of ways in which you can honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase—only plant in faith, relying simply on God's promises, and my word, or rather God's word, for it, and you will no longer complain of short crops. But be faithful to the end—God is not mocked. When he has performed his promise, by giving you good crops, perform yours, by using a portion of your increase in such ways as will be acceptable to him. Be industrious, be diligent in your business, and leave the result to Him, who never has promised without performing.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF DR. ADAM CLARKE.

Bacokfield, Mi., Nov. 30th, 1854.

Ma. Editor—

I have in my possession the original letter, or what I believe to be the original letter, of Dr. Adam Clarke, being his reply to the Committee (I think) of the M. E. Church to an invitation to visit this country. It was presented to my husband, A. W. C. (now no more) while a student in Augusta College, Ky., in the year 1834, by the late Bascom, as a "literary curiosity." Deeming it a peculiarly valuable and interesting document, I have concluded (with the advice of some) to forward a copy of it to you. The original can be seen, if desired. Respectfully,

M. A. C.

TO,

Messrs. T. Emory, B. Waugh, N. Bangs, F. Hall & Geo. Lackley.

Gentlemen and Rev'd Brethren.

Having been absent in the west of England, for a considerable time, your letter did not reach my hand till some weeks after its arrival. Your kind invitation to visit the United States, was gratifying to me and had I been apprised of your intention a few months earlier, I should most certainly have endeavored to meet your wishes; and by doing so I have no doubt I should have been both gratified and profited. But the warning is too short, and I am engaged so far both to England and Ireland in behalf of our Missionary cause, that I cannot by any substitute redeem those pledges. I had proposed also to have visited the Zetland Isles, if possible, but as I had not pledged myself to the voyage, I could have waived my purpose in favor of America, to visit which I have been long waiting for an opening of Providence.—I might add, that I should have had the appointment of our Conference for the voyage.

Now, altho' I feel a measure of regret that I am disappointed in this wished for visit to the American Continent, yet I am far from supposing that there may not be a providential interference in the way.—I am, no doubt you have already learned, an old man, having gone beyond threescore years and ten; and consequently not able to perform the labor of youth.—You would naturally expect me to preach much: and this I could not do.—One sermon in the day, generally exhausts me, and I have been obliged for several years, to give up all evening preaching, as I found the night air to be peculiarly injurious to my health. My help, therefore must have been very limited, and in many cases, this would be very unsatisfactory to the good people of the United States. This deficiency, I grant, might be supplied by an able assistant, who might be inclined to accompany me, but even this, would not satisfy the eye or ear of curiosity. But, as the journey is now impracticable, these reflections are useless. I respect and wish well to your State; and I love your Church. As far as I can discern you are close imitators of the original Methodists (than whom a greater blessing has not been given to the British nation, since the Reformation), holding the same doctrines, and acting under the same discipline; therefore have you prospered, as we have prospered. There is no danger so imminent both to you and us, as departing from our original simplicity, in spirit, in manners, and in our mode of worship. As the world is continually changing around us, we are liable to be affected by those changes, in our movement, and in our mode of worship. We think, in many cases, that we may please well intentioned men better, and be more useful to them, by permitting some of the more innocent forms of the world to enter into the Church. Whenever we have done so, we have infallibly lost ground in the depth of our Religion and in its spirituality and unction. I would say to all, keep your doctrines and your discipline; not only in your Church books and in your Society rules—preach the former without refining on them: observe the latter without bending it to circumstances, or impairing its vigor by frivolous exceptions and partialities.

As I believe your nation to be destined to be the mightiest and happiest on the globe; so I believe that your Church is likely to become the most extensive and pure in the universe. As a Church, abide in the Apostolic doctrine and fellowship. As a nation, be firmly united, entertain no petty differences, totally abolish the Slave trade (if it be not yet done), abhor all offensive wars, never provoke even the puniest State, and never strike the first blow.—Encourage Agriculture and friendly traffic, cultivate the sciences and arts; let learning have its proper place, space and adequate show of esteem and honor—if possible, live in peace with all nations.—Rethink your holy zeal for God's cause and your country's weal; and that you may ever maintain your liberty, avoid as its bane and ruin, a national debt. I say to you as it was said to Rome, of old—

Hæ tibi erunt artes; pacisque imponere morem,
Parcere subjectis et debellare superbos."
Virgil.

But, whither am I running? Will it be a sufficient excuse to allege "the zeal of your house hath eaten me up." Truly, truly, do I wish you good luck, in the name of the Lord, and therefore, with my best prayers for your civil and religious prosperity, and hearty thanks to each of you individually, for the handsome and honorable manner in which you have formed your invitation, I have the honor to be, Gentlemen and Reverend Brethren, your obliged humble servant and most cordial well wisher, ADAM CLARKE.

ARMAGEDDON:

OR, THE OVERTHROW OF ROMANISM AND MONARCHY.

The existence of the United States foretold in the Bible, its future greatness; invasion by allied Europe; annihilation of Monarchy; expansion into the Millennial Republic, and its Dominion over the whole world. By S. D. Baldwin, A. M. President of Soule Female College. [Tenn.] Cincinnati: Applegate & Co., Nashville: Methodist Publishing House, Stephenson & Owen." 1854.

Title page enough one would suppose for any book. But not too much for this wild-fanatical do you call the man, that would endeavor to verify its announciation? Stop my friend, be not too hasty, neither be too rigidly wedded to old opinions. It may be, you have not been ligitimately "tied on" to those opinions, and if so, a divorce will be perfectfully legal and scriptural.

The title page as above given is explicit, and announces a work that now lies before me, and which I have read through with a great deal of satisfaction, and edification. And this notice is to call the attention of the public to it. I say the public—the people, for it is verily a work for the people, especially Americans. For if the theory of our author be correct, we have the greatest work to do, that has ever been wrought in the world. That is, to spread our Republicanism over the entire globe. For this, prophecy was given, and blood will be shed, and to which facts, events and fulfilments of prophecy all bear witness.

Here it is contended that the United States is "Israel restored," and of course the commonly received notion of Israel's carnal restoration to Palestine is contested, and shown to be both absurd and anti-scriptural. For his own theory, our author gives fifteen different items from prophecy which find coincidences in the United States, and in no other country in the world.

In chapter the fifth, he shows that "all the great forces of Europe, Asia and Africa—allied with Russia," are to invade the United States, or Isral restored, but that we will triumph in the contest, and that this is to be the great battle and destruction of monarchy.

In the sixth chapter he gives "Nebuchadnezar's panoramic vision of the six kingdoms of the world." He concure with the commonly received opinion that the first four kingdoms were the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Macedonian and Roman Empires, but that the fifth kingdom was the United States of America, which he identifies by the following points: 1. The time of its rise. 2. The character and mode of its origin. 3. Its character and its work of demolition, and the manner of it. 4. Its change of character. 5. Its perpetuity. 6. Its character as a theocratic republic and royalty."

But we have not time nor space just now to follow him in all his chapters; suffice it to say that he identifies the United States of America with Daniel's fifth kingdom, or Ancient of Days; with Israel's restoration, spoken by Daniel, chap. viii., 13, 14 vs., with Michael, chap. 12: with the events of the sixth seal in the revelation—the woman with twelve stars, and her man child: the seventh trumpet, or the man with many crowns, on a white horse.

This, as every one knows, is a new and untried field of prophetic interpretation. This, we think, is original with the author before us. At least we have not met with any thing of a similar character in the course of our readings. And we would here say, let no one condemn the theory unheard; it was not the result of merely fugitive thoughts, but the result of more than twenty years of severe and prayerful study. He gives us the discovery, as he terms it, of the method by which he arrived at the conclusion above given. He shows from prophecy facts and figures, the time of Israel's restoration to nationality, which was the 4th of July, 1776. He by the same process gives us the present war between Russia and Turkey with the allied powers of England and France. But he says that in this war Russia is to prove victorious!! He then states that Russia will endeavor to extend her conquest in our country, by invasion, and that she will be led on until she arrives somewhere in the Ohio or Mississippi valley, when and where the battle of Armageddon, or the battle of the Great Day of God Almighty will be enacted. This will be emphatically, he thinks, war of wars, and the termination of blood and carnage in our world. This will be at farthest by 1878. Then will come the Millenium Kingdom, which is the universal sway of Republicanism throughout the world, when the Gospel will be preached, without let or hindrance to every nation and people.

Now, reader, but a feeble idea have we given of this book, but if you will purchase it, and read it, we will venture to say that if you set to, to read it with any prejudice, that such prejudice must give way to a great extent, if not wholly, by the time you have read "The Conclusion."

The key to unlock the prophecies adverted to in the book, is every way rational and agreeable to common sense, events and figures. So far as the key refers to figures, in one case only Mr. Baldwin made over fifty thousand calculations. Here was patience untiring! And through more than three score pages he explains to his readers fully his entire method in coming to his conclusions. Get the book for yourself, read his data, the evidences of that data, his method of calculation, and behold yourself a resident of the greatest country that ever has been or ever will be known to the world, and upon the very eve of the greatest Revolution that is to be known in the history of our earth.

INQUISITION IN LOUISIANA.

Ah! In Louisiana. Not to-day yo Creoles and Protestant Christians. But hear how near it came to being domesticated, as one of the institutions. The Presbyterian has gathered the facts from Gayarre's History of Louisiana:

"The lack of ability, and not the want of inclination, has been the only reason why Popery has not displayed the same enormities in America which have characterized it in the old world. Freedom of opinion and the light of the gospel render it necessary for Rome to restrain herself, and modify her policy, if she would succeed here. From the third volume of Gayarre's History of Louisiana, just published, it appears that arrangements were actually made for introducing the inquisition into Louisiana, when that territory was under Spanish control. On the cession of the country to France, all the documents and archives were carried off to old Spain, and there carefully locked up; but through certain facilities recently enjoyed by Mr. Gayarre, he found access to these documents, and amongst other things has brought to light the benevolent intentions of his holiness for making good Roman Catholics on American soil, through the tortures of the inquisition. It will be seen that it was not his fault that the plan failed to be carried into execution.

"It appears," says Gayarre "that soon after the death of Charles III., who was far, from being a bigoted king, an attempt was made to introduce the much-dreaded tribunal of the Inquisition into the colony. The reverend Capuchin, Antonio de Sedella, who had lately arrived in the province, wrote to the Governor to inform him that he, the holy father, had been appointed Commissary of the Inquisition; that in a letter of the 5th of December last, from the proper authority, this intelligence has been communicated to him, and that he had been requested to discharge his functions with the most exact fidelity and zeal, and in conformity with the royal will. Wherefore, after having made his investigations with the utmost secrecy and precaution, he noticed Miro that, in order to carry, as he was commanded, his instructions into perfect execution in all their parts, he might soon, at some late hour of the night, deem it necessary to require some guards to assist him in his operations.

"Not many hours had elapsed since the reception of this communication by the Governor, when night came, and the representative of the holy inquisition was quietly reposing in bed, when he was roused from his sleep by a heavy knocking. He started up, and, opening his door, saw standing before him an officer and a file of grenadiers. Thinking that they had come to obey his commands, in consequence of his letter to the Governor, he said, 'My friends, I thank you and his Excellency for the readiness of this compliance with my request. But I have now no use for your services, and you shall be warned in time when you are wanted. Retire, then, with the blessing of God.' Great was the stupefaction of the friar when he was told that he was under arrest. 'What!' exclaimed he, 'will you dare lay your hands on a Commissary of the holy Inquisition?' 'I dare obey orders,' replied the undaunted officer, and the reverend Father Antonio de Sedella was instantly carried on board of a vessel, which sailed the next day for Cadiz.

"Rendering an account of this incident to one of the members of the Cabinet of Madrid, Governor Miro said, in a despatch, 'the mere name of the Inquisition uttered in New Orleans would be sufficient, not only to check emigration, which is successfully progressing, but would also be capable of driving away those who have recently come, and I even fear that in spite of my having sent out of the country Father Sedella, the most fatal consequences may ensue from the mere suspicion of the cause of his dismissal.'"

TASTES DIFFER.

In a Lecture on what he had seen abroad, Wendell Philips observes:

"In Italy you will see a man breaking up his land with two cows, and the root of a tree for a plough, while he is dressed in skins with the hair on. In Rome, Vienna and Dresden, if you hire a man to saw wood, he does not bring a horse along. He never had one, nor his father before him. He puts one end of the saw on the ground, and the other on his breast, and taking the wood in his hands, rubs against the saw. It is a solemn fact, that in Florence, a city filled with the triumph of art, there is not a single auger, and if a carpenter would bore a hole, he does it with a red hot poker! This results not from the want of industry, but of sagacity of thought. The people are by no means idle. They toil early and late, men, women and children, with an industry that shames labor-saving Yankees. Thus he makes labor, that the poor must live. In Rome charcoal is principally used for fuel, and you will see a string of twenty mules bringing little sacks of it upon their backs, when one mule could draw all of it in a cart, and so he keeps his mules and feeds them. This is from no want of industry, but there is no competition.

A Yankee always looks haggard and nervous, as though he were chasing a dollar. With us, money is every thing; and when we go abroad, we are surprised to find that the dollar has ceased to be almighty. If a Yankee refuses to do a job for fifty cents, he will probably do it for a dollar, and will certainly do it for five. But one of the lazzaroni of Naples, when he has earned two cents, and eaten them, will work no more that day, if you offer him ever so large a sum. He has earned enough for the day, and wants no more. So there is no eagerness for making money, no motive for it, and everybody moves slowly.

METHODIST PRESS.

The time has come, more than ever before, when the question of novel reading should be met. Religious fictions, if it be not a misnomer, are teeming from the press daily—ficticius literature has come into the field professedly as an adjunct and help-meet of religion. Does religion stand in need of help from this quarter? Is it safe, expedient or right to accept of the alliance? The editor of the Memphis Advocate, on a subject german to this, if not the very subject itself, says—

Reading.—We desire to put a few pertinent questions to christian parents. It has been suggested to us from observing the almost universal vitiated tastes acquired among the youth of both sexes, and those, too, of Christian parents, for the perusal of works of fiction. It is, to remark the least of it, a criminal waste of time that could be devoted to far nobler purposes. We would ask then, are the vagaries of a mind—cultivated though it may be, and of a highly intellectual order, moved too by the inspirations of, an immaculate genius, yet not chastened by the hallowed influence of a purer and more sacred inspiration, whose origin is divine—we ask, are the vagaries of such an intellect to be given to your children, in preference to these beautiful lessons of instruction which have been left to us by those whose lives themselves have been as an bright, directing light, discovering to us the only true source of virtue and happiness? We put the question, and how very many parents, and christian teachers, too, stand convicted, of not only permitting, but of recommending the works of fiction. And some even endeavor to pallinte and defend this palpable desecration of the youthful mind.

Say they, "fine moral lessons are frequently deduced from the writings of some of our standard novelists." Moral lessons, forsooth! Give them their full name, and we will accede to it: lessons of moral depravity. And again, they repeat, "what a graphic and truthful portrayal of human nature we often see limned by these magic displayers of the secret workings of the human heart." Indeed! any more so than we may discover by a careful perusal of that chef d'œuvre of its kind, the Proverbs of Solomon? But even were that granted, we ask whether the knowledge of human nature thus derived be a sufficient antidote for the moral poison imbibed also? No. And we earnestly caution parents, and, too, the readers themselves, against this newborn development of our age of progress. Are we now to ignore the teachings of those who were considered as spiritual guides in an age of spirituality? Must we have a "higher law" too, in religion as well as in politics? You answer, assuredly not. But the tendency of your teachings—you who recommend to your youth fictions—is as real and tangible towards these results as if you would seek to ignore the great source of truth and light itself. And the results, which the history of almost all readers of fiction present, instead of illustrating the advantages derived from this source of reading, unmistakeably point to that "pride which goes before destruction, and that haughty spirit which presages a fall."

Sunday School Visitor and Dr. Summers. We take the following communication from the Southern Christian Advocate:

As the last number of the fourth volume of the Visitor has been issued, all communications to this journal will be henceforth addressed to the editor, the Rev. L. D. Huston, Nashville, Tenn. Those subscribers whose subscriptions extend into the fifth volume will be supplied in due course of time from that city. All communications to the Book Editor may be addressed to him for the present, at Tuscaloosa, Ala.—which place, by the way, he and his family, through a gracious Providence, reached in safety this day, having taken leave of Charleston with sorrowful feelings three days ago.

THOS. O. SUMMERS.

Tuscaloosa, Ala., Nov. 25, 1854.

The Home Circle vice The Southern Ladies' Companion.—The prospectus of this periodical remained sometime in the columns of certain contemporaries before our attention was called to it. From the name "Home Circle," we put it down at the first glance as the style of some new organ of "the Rappers." It turns out that the Companion, like many of its fair patrons, perhaps, is about to change its name. We take it that this periodical is now unsexed, and that its literature is henceforth to be of the common gender.

The Home Circle, devoted to religion and literature, will be published monthly, at $2 per annum, strictly in advance. Each number will contain 48 pages, super-royal octavo, printed on fine calendar paper, in superb style, and embellished with one or more engravings. The articles shall be mainly original, and furnished by the best writers of the land together with choice selections from the most approved magazines, foreign and domestic.

France.—We have received a long and interesting communication from Rev. Charles Cook, D. D., President of the Methodist French Conference, giving an account of the present state of the work in France. We hope to lay the whole letter before the church shortly. In the meantime we give below some extracts, as brief indications of the state of matters there. We regret to learn that the local authorities continue to use their power, not their rights, to oppress; but it is a matter of rejoicing that the people bear it patiently, and seem even to grow; they worship God privately and by moonlight, when they may not do it publicly, and in sunshine. The work is divided into two principal districts—the North and the South. The nucleus of a third, or central district, is forming, it is hoped. The districts have their superintendents, or presiding elders, and are divided into circuits, with their appointments, and in many cases Sunday schools, and some few day schools. Dr. Cook says:

Notwithstanding some hindrances as to the extension of our work, many more souls have been converted to God this year than in any year of our labors in France. Our increase at last conference was 258, besides 167 on trial. The little one has become a thousand, as we now reckon 1,099 members; we have 130 preaching places, 20 preachers, 5 paid evangelists, 29 unpaid local preachers, 31 Sunday schools, 1562 scholars, taught by 145 teachers.

Speaking of the Southern district, the superintendent says: "We have 7 circuits, 10 regular ministers, 4 evangelists, 8 teachers or Scripture readers, 22 local preachers, and 93 Sabbath school teachers. We preach in 80 towns and villages, to several thousand stated hearers."

It is incidentally mentioned that the country house of M. Guizot, the great French Protestant statesman, who was a member of the cabinet of Louis Phillippe, is in the vicinity of one of the circuits in the South district; and to testify his approbation of the work the Methodists are doing in his vicinity he sent them an hundred francs.

Speaking of the aid we have rendered them, and also of the island of Corsica, he says: "We owe these hopeful beginnings, dear brethren, to your generosity; and to you we must look, under God, for the support of this work and its extension. Rimatelli, the converted Corsican assistant, speaks of the whole family brought under the power of operation of God's Holy Spirit. We have family prayer every evening; and when we have visited them unexpectedly, I have found them either at prayer or reading their Italian Bible."

The California Christian Advocate comes to us with more name. To its present style is added "and Temperance Journal." The editor makes these revelations of home and conjugal morals:

We have been drifting rapidly toward social ruin for several years. Who is to blame? This question different persons will answer variously. We have our views and will sketch them. First, the men are mostly to blame, for they laid the foundation. They came out here and reveled in wickedness. Husbands and fathers acted like devils incarnate—as though the everlasting laws of God were abrogated. Their sins took hold of them. It marked their faces, poisoned the fountains of sentiment, discolored their moral perceptions, and when their wives and children arrived here, "murder would out." Transgression a man can never effectually hide. The motions of his eye, the intonations of his voice, the terms of his speech, aye, a thousand things will proclaim his past life. This known, the wife would feel the spirit of alienation and become careless. Carelessness would be augmented by the conduct of the husband, after her arrival. Things the way been paved for the wife's ruin. We are not inclined to justify the wife's conduct. Sin is sin everywhere.

The large proportion of males in the community has contributed in the same direction. The conduct of many of the men and women who claim to lead in society, has been destructive. We refer to the wife and husband being so little in each other's company, so much in the company of others of the opposite sex. When a man gets married, companion for the future is his wife. Formerly when he goes out on excursions of pleasure, if any lady goes with him it should be his wife; and he should spend his leisure hours at home in her society. A man who is sauntering about town with his family at home, is a fit subject for the whipping post or the penitentiary. The law should take hold of him and punish him severely.

Flattery has led not a few females astray. Suddenly surrounded with wealth and decorated with elegant apparel, they have become exalted beyond measure. In this condition they are lit subjects for the heartless flatterer, and by such are ruined. The world never saw so much mushroom aristocracy as we have here. Every day the story of the once turning queen, is brought to mind. She was always queenly until the rats came into the room, and then she would go at her old business. This aristocracy of an hour originates dangers; it has helped to produce the evil we are referring to.

Men tell us the times are improving, the number of divorces is diminishing; that society will soon rectify its wrongs, and in after a few years, a new state of things will come. We doubt it. Society will not regenerate itself. That dogma of French philosophy is false, in the light of history and sound reason. Improvement is the result of effort, earnest, manly, self-sacrificing. Shall we have it, or sink to a lower depth?

The Christian Advocate and Journal has picked up the following readable and suggestive morceau, in the memoirs of the late Rev. Dr. Alexander. It is extracted from a letter addressed by the Dr. to another minister. Children are not enough remembered in the pulpit.

Our common preaching does the children no manner of good. But pass this: sermons suited to children can be preached. I have tried it over and over, and I never had an audience more attentive, or who better understood my meaning. I often go now and deliver addresses to them at Sunday School Anniversaries; and to keep up and enliven attention, I commonly stop and ask them questions, which I expect them to answer. They seldom refuse to speak, and their answers give opportunity for further explanation. I delight in such discourses, and if I had health and leisure would have one every week. Perhaps I shall, as it is. But I am constrained to remark, that the talent for preaching to children is, of all other preaching talents, the most rare.

A brother, who has better preaching talents than myself, and more piety, when he speaks to children reads them a discourse from a paper, so composed as to be fit for the press; but while it is in the course of delivery, almost every one is vacant or wandering.

I. J. K. has a great love for children, and has devoted himself to the Sunday School cause, and thinks he has the talent of addressing them. I went to hear him once, and of all the affected, vulgar, quaint, ill-edged discourses, this exceeded. The more sensible children laughed in his face.

L. M., once a student here, often undertook to address children. His method was to entertain them with figurative and exaggerated stories. Sometimes he terrified the little urchins almost into fits. One of my children was present at his meeting, when a thunder storm of some violence arose. To increase the terror, he blew out the candles and intimated that perhaps the day of judgment had come.

Another dear old brother screams at the top of an astounding voice, and they gaze in stupid wonder. Too much noise drives away thought. No man can have any variety of ideas, nor any connected train, beneath the deafening roar of a cataract.

ROBERT HALL.

"He was at the Tabernacle the first time I ever preached in Bristol, and when I was little more than seventeen. When I came down from the pulpit, as I passed him, he said, 'Sir, I liked your sermon much better than your quotations.' I never knew him severe upon a preacher, however moderate his abilities, if, free from affectation, he spoke with simplicity nor tried to rise above his level. But as to others, nothing could be occasionally more witty and crushing than his remarks. One evening, in a rather crowded place (I was sitting by him), a minister was preaching very finely and flourishing to little purpose, from the 'white horse,' and 'red horse,' and the 'black horse,' and the 'pale horse,' in the Revelations. He sat very impatiently and when the sermon closed he pushed out towards the door, saying, 'Let me out of this horse-fair.'

"I was once in the library at the Academy conversing with one of the students, who was speaking of his experience, and lamented the hardness of his heart. Mr. Hall, as he was taking down a book from the shelf, hearing this turned towards him and said: 'Well, thy head is soft enough, that's a comfort.' I could not laugh at this, it grieved me, for the young man was modest and humble and diffident. He must have felt it severely, and I have no doubt but Mr. Hall's indelicious smote him afterward for his apparent harshness and offence. There is no just excuse for such things. We must not fling about arrows, and if nay of them pierce, say it was in sport. Should not only ill-nature but wit or humor expose us to this evil, we know the prayer, 'Set a watch, O Lord, upon my mouth: keep the door of my lips.'

"A minister, popular too, one day said to me, 'I wonder you think so highly of Mr. Hall's talents. I was some time ago travelling with him in Wales, and we had several disputes, and I more than once seen silenced by him.' I concluded now the truth was, and some weeks after, when his name was mentioned, Mr. Hall asked me if I knew him. 'I lately travelled with him, said he,' and it is wonderful, sir, how such a haggage of ignorance and confidence could have been squeezed into the vehicle. He disgusted and wearied me with his dogmatism and perverseness, till God was good enough to enable me to go to sleep.'"

DAUGHTER, SISTER, WIFE AND MOTHER.

Woman, in the nobler acceptation of the word is indeed a bright and beautiful creation. Whether as a daughter, sister, wife or mother, she invites admiration. As a daughter she refines the atmosphere of a household, checking the impetuosity of brothers, and forming an invisible but chastening link between husband and wife. Look at a home in which there are no daughters! Where is the music, the ringing laughter, and the sweet confidences, and the softening influences of a virgin toilette, neatly arranged hair and the modest seclusion which even the roughest boys during the holiday time rigidly respect! Depend upon it, daughters are a powerful element in civilization. They tame the rough asperities of fathers, impose a restraint on the volubility of angry wives, and in a matter-of-course, instinctively-understood kind of way, enforce the maintenance of a pure discipline and regularity, and a decorum which keeps some of the angel light always shining by the domestic fireside. As a sister, how supreme is her lightest word, how potent her authority over the most unruly, unlicked cub of a brother! And then look at a brother in after-life, who has enjoyed the blessing of having had a sister! How polished his demeanor—how gentle his courtesies to the opposite sex! Habitual respect for his sister has drilled him into a legitimate appreciation of all women; he neither disparages, nor does he suffer disparagement of women in his presence. As a lover he is manly—for, having had a sister to guard and cherish, his courtship is tinged with a chivalrous respect for the honor of the lady to whose hand he aspires. Indeed, we might almost indefinitely multiply instances of the power a sister exercises over the future life of a brother; but will content ourselves with the observation, that we have always found greater contentments, more genial temper, a larger amount of urbanity, polish and talent in families graced by daughters than in those which had none.

But the influence of daughter and sister in life—teeming though they be with all sweetness and gentleness—must yield in value to that of wife. Man is a wreck without a wife—a mere peripatetic, feeding on thistles and treading on thorns. His daily existence is a walking shadow of humanity; he scarcely is conscious of the dignity of his nature—his soul is fallow; and the few scattered daisies on its surface only make him the more conscious of his self-desolation. When held down in the polypus embrace of his many passions, his only consolation is a fierce self-idolatry, which in time consumes all that is good and noble in his disposition. Man owes an infinite deal to marriage, and language is too feeble for the eulogy of a wife. She is the corner-stone of society, the guardian angel of every earthly bliss, every earthly virtue and happiness. She it is who makes the strong man docile, the savage one tame, and the great one human. Where she is, there is a paradise; where she is not, there is a howling desert. Her smile, like the glow of early summer's morn, gilds every thing around her with radiance that quickens all the ennobling impulses, and lifts human nature nearer to the immortal source of its being. Nothing beneath the stars is more lovely than marriage; and, as the purity and dignity of marriage rests chiefly with the wife, to her he all the honor and the glory. As the oldest living English poet has finely expressed it, "She is a light shining within, when all without is dark." And if we travel from the wife to the mother, how glorious, yet how touching, is the transition from the devotion of the one to the self-denying, worshipping fervor of the other. The mother is the next step in the ladder by which we climb from earth to heaven. Her unselfishness, watchfulness and hope in her offspring, are as beautiful as solemn.

TOO BIG TO PRAY.

I tarried for a night with an old friend, who had always seemed indifferent on the subject of religion. His wife was pious, and endeavored to impress the minds of her children with proper views of God and eternity. Her little boy, of two or three years, when about to retire to rest, knelt down by his mother and reverently repeated the child's prayer. When he arose from his knees, he turned to his father with a seeming consciousness that he had performed a duty, and addressed him, 'Father, I have said my prayers, have you said your's; or are you too big to pray? I thought it was a question that would reach that father's heart, and it might yet be said of him, "Behold, he prayeth."

I have since noticed many, very many, who were too big pray. I knew a young man a college student, of brilliant talents and fascinating manners. Yet he would sneer at piety and pious men. He was considered a model by a certain class around him. In a revival meeting the Spirit of God reached his heart. He saw his danger and resolved to reform. Then he thought of his companions, who had witnessed his past life. They would say he was weak minded and fickle. He would lose their respect. He could not come down from his high position. He could not take up the cross through good and evil report, and his serious intentions passed away, perhaps for ever. He was too big to pray.

I knew a man who had passed the middle age of life. His children had grown up around him, while he had been careless and unconcerned about their eternal welfare. A change came over him, and he felt that duty called him to pray in his family. But how could he assume such a task before his household, which would be astonished at such a strange event. He shrank from the effort and finally relaxed into his former coldness and indifference. He was too big to pray.

I knew a physician who held a high rank in his profession. The urbanity of his department, joined with an intelligent mind, made him a pleasant companion. But he was sceptical in the doctrines of the Bible. He witnessed the happy death of one who triumphed in the last trying hour, and his infidel opinions were shaken. "Almost he was persuaded to become a Christian." But the pride of his heart was not subdued. He could not humble himself at the feet of the cross. He was too big to pray.

I knew a man of great learning and great worldly wisdom. He became a disciple of Christ, but he mistook the nature of prayer, in the "simplest form of speech," he often used "great swelling words," and lofty rounded periods. His prayers were not edifying. He was too big to pray.

How many thousands there are around us, who have been elevated to high places in our land, who would not dare to be seen upon their knees, supplicating the Majesty of heaven! They are too big to pray.

WHAT FAMILY GOVERNMENT IS.

It is not to watch children with a suspicious eye; to frown at the merry outbursts of innocent hilarity; to suppress their joyous laughter, and to mould them into melancholy little models of octogenarian gravity.

And when they have been in fault it is not to punish them simply on account of the personal injury that you may have chanced to suffer in consequence of their fault; while disobedience, unattended by inconvenience to yourself, passes without a rebuke.

Nor is it to overwhelm the little culprit with a flood of angry words; to stun him with a a deafening noise; to call him by hard names, which do not express his misdeeds; to load him with epithets which would be extravagant, if applied a fault of tenfold enormity; or to declare with passionate vehemence, that he is the worst child in the world, and destined to the gallows.

But it is to watch anxiously for the first risings of sin, and to repress them; to counteract the earliest workings of selfishness; to suppress the first beginnings of rebellion against rightful authority; to teach an implicit and unquestioning and cheerful obedience to the will of the parent, as the best preparation for a future allegiance to the requirements of the civil magistrate, and to the laws of the great Ruler and Father in Heaven.

It is to punish a fault because it is a fault; because it is sinful and contrary to the commands of God, without reference to whether it may or not have been productive of immediate injury to the parent or others.

It is to reprove with calmness and composure, and not with angry irritation; in a few words, fitly chosen, and not with a torrent of abuse; to punish as often as you threaten, and threaten only when you intend and can remember to perform; to say what you mean, and infallibly to do as you say.

It is to govern your family as in the sight of Him who gave your authority, who will reward your strict fidelity with such blessings as He bestowed on Abraham, or punish your criminal neglect with such curses as He visited on Eli.—[Religious Herald.

OBITUARY:

DEPARTED this life, Aug. 3d, 1854, in Ittawamba county, Miss., Mrs. Mary Gilmore, aged 75 years and 5 months. Sister Gilmore emigrated in very early life from N. Carolina to Georgia, where she professed religion, and joined the M. E. Church, at the age of 18. In her life and conversation, sister Gilmore illustrated most impressively the excellency of the gospel; amid the pressing cares of life she always maintained the consistency of an humble, devoted disciple of her much loved Lord. She was a great lover of prayer, and never sufferred temporal business to intrude upon her hours of devotion, and when her companion was absent and her health would admit, she always officinted at the family altar morning and evening, and as long as she was rational, she had the utmost confidence in God, her redeemer. During her last affliction she lost her reason entirely, and remained in that condition until her spirit took its flight to a brighter and happier clime, where

Sickness and sorrow, pain and death,
Are felt and feared no more.

The Nashville C. Advocate will please copy.

DIED, near Gurlnudville, Nov. 15th, 1854, Flora Amanda, daughter of Rev. James M. and Parmelin Turnor, aged 15 years, 8 months and 26 days.

She was to her parents affectingly devoted, confiding and obedient. Much of their earthly joy flowed from the touching sweetness of her spirit. At times, near its termination, she seemed disquieted in conforming to the requisitions of her attendants; but these occurred under extreme nervous excitement, therefore are not to be regarded as an index of the state of her heart. For infinite goodness may permit such to occur that He may display the wonders of his grace, as was fully done in the triumphant composure enjoyed and written upon each illumined feature, down to the last sigh that marked the flight of her plumed spirit for fairer, holier climes.

A little more than one year ago, at the Paulding camp meeting, she professed, and, in her own favored simplicity, enjoyed that greatest gift of Redeeming Love, the witness of God's Holy Spirit, that she was His child. That transforming change, the full conversion of her soul to God, was radiant and gleaming, so full, so precious, that the scene of her dying moments was one of calm triumph, environed with immortal might; though she spoke not a word for many hours previous to her death.

It has been my happy, yet mournful, fortune to witness the last hours of long tried pious men and women; yet I am constrained to say that hers, in the clear and beaming joyfulness of "Love, that casts out all fear," "of a hope full of immortality," in all that pictures the heart's peace upon the features, in all that says "upon his breast I lean my head," in all that was beautiful and sublime, it had never been given me to witness.

It now remains for me to say to her associates, beneath whose eyes these lines may fall: Be pious, be Christians; holy, living Christians! and where Jesus is, there shall you be also.

To her parents a word: Remember, He who wore the plaited crown of thorns promises to strengthen you; therefore you can do "all things;" say now the most difficult of things, "Blessed be the name of the Lord."

"That star went down in beauty,
But it shineth sweetly now;
In the bright and dazzling coronet
That decks the Savior's brow."

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

MRS. LUCY ANN MCNEILL, the subject of this notice, was born 29th Sept. 1829. Joined the M. E. Church in 1849, married to Mr. J. D. McNeill Dec. 21st, 1853, and died at her father's residence, Mr. John Davies, in Wilcox county, Ala., Nov. 6th, 1854. Sister McNeill was raised up to "fear God and keep his commandments," taught the principles of Christianity in early life, from which she did not depart when arrived at mature age. She was a woman of great energy; and her habits of industry and economy, in the domestic circle, were almost unparalled among her sex, and it may be well said of her, that her character in this respect is beautifully described in Prov. 31 ch. 27 v. "She looketh well to the ways of her household and eateth not the bread of idleness." She was pious, and a devoted lover of the doctrines and usages of the Methodist Church. She died of consumption; suffered much, but bore it calmly; manifested patience and resignation to the will of God. Said to her mother-in-law and to the writer of this, the last time they saw her, in bidding her friends farewell, "I hope, if we never meet again, we shall meet in heaven." Her friends sorrow, "but not as those who have no hope."

ALLENTON, Ala., Dec. 1st, 1854.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

DIED, in Wilcox county, Alahama, 21st October, 1854, Mrs. L. E. Robbins, wife of Rev. J. P. Robbins, formerly of Conecuh county, Ala., in the 34th year of her age. She was raised up piously; joined the M. E. Church when quite young; lived a consistent Christian; died in peace, and no doubt." rests from her labors and her works follow her." In all the relations which she sustained to her family, the Church and to society, she maintained an upright, dignified and exemplary character. She died of dropsy, suffered much, but was patient and resigned. In frequent conversation with her husband and others gave satisfactory evidences that for her "to live was Christ, but to die was gain." Said to the writer of this, the morning before her death, "Oh! this beautiful morning, the sun shines so clear, I thought my time had come; what a pretty time to die; I thought my sufferings were about to close; I am ready to go, but must wait patiently the Lord's will." In this frame of mind she died, leaving an affectionate husband and seven children, and many friends, to mourn for her. Since her death the Lord has taken her infant son Ahiezer Clark, also; the child has gone to embrace its mother, "where sickness and sorrow, pain and death are felt and feared no more." A. C. RAMSEY.

ALLENTON, Ala., Dec. 1st, 1854.

DIED, in this place, on the 14th November last, Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Moore, consort of Joseph G. Moore, Esq., in the 32d year of her age.

Sister M. was a native of Georgia, and was married in 1839, and joined the M. E. Church with her husband, in 1846. She was often called to mourn bereavements of the little loved ones of her household, and repeated afflictions threw an air of sadness over her Christian experience. But she was true, faithful and steadfast in her discipleship; regular in her attendance upon all the means of grace and the discharge of duties. As she lived, so she died—firm, tranquil and confident. During a protracted illness (Typhoid fever) of more than two months duration, she was never heard to murmur or complain, but indeed her skies seemed to brighten and her joyousness to become more and more full, as she slowly descended into "the dark valley." She often broke forth in ejaculations of praise to God, for his goodness in surrounding her with so many mercies and blessings. A short time before her death, she told her sorrowing husband she would gladly go and be with her Savior. And to her minister she said, that though she had been an undutiful child of God, yet she felt she was still a child, and never lost the spirit of her adoption. Firmly relying on the merits of her Savior, this meek and retiring Christian fell asleep in Jesus. A husband and two little daughters, with numerous relatives and friends, mourn the temporary absence of wife and mother, relative and friend, for she was true-hearted in all these relations. H.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PERSEVERANCE.

The steamship Perseverance, Capt. Place, arrived yesterday morning from Galveston with dates to the 8th, and our files of exchange from the interior. The La Grange Monument makes the following announcement:

The Rev. Dr. Wm. P. Smith has commenced writing a History of Texas. The Dr is an old Texan and is very familiar with all the incidents of Texas in early times.

Dr. Smith was Surgeon General of the Army of Texas, under command of General Stephen F. Austin, at the beginning of the Texas revolution, and distinguished himself, by his extraordinary coolness and intrepidity, on an important occasion, during the memorable "Siege of San Antonio," in December, 1835.

The Seguin Mercury, of the 25th ult. says that, on the night of the 23d, a young man of that place, named Joseph Nance, was so severely wounded by a quantity of gun powder exploding, that he died on the following evening. It appears that the powder which exploded had been placed in a hole, bored for its reception in a live-oak tree, and that a fragment of the tree was directed by the force of the explosion between his arm and side, breaking his arm and so injuring his side as to cause his death.

The same paper says:

Millions of locusts now infest this section of the country. We may expect them again next spring, and it is anticipated that the crops will be injured by their presence.

The Houston Star of Wednesday last says:

Several cases of fever occurred in this city last week, two of which resulted fatally—one of them in the family of the editor of this paper. The impression so common that a severe frost puts an end to yellow fever, proves erroneous, for we had not only experienced several severe frosts, but had had considerable cold weather. The weather again turned cold on Sunday last, and on Monday night there was some sleet.

The Victoria Advocate, of the 24 inst., publishes a call, from a number of the most prominent citizens of that town, and the surrounding country, for a public meeting, with a view to taking steps towards the navigation of the Guadalupe River. The Advocate says:

Various circumstances have occurred, unfortunately, for several years, to retard this important object—but most conspicuous, however, was the project of the San Antonio and Mexican Gulf Railroad. Since that project has exploded, or at least is postponed for an indefinite length of time, good reliable navigation from the coast here is highly important to the interests of this town.

We find in the Seguin Mercury Extra, of the 25th ult., an interesting letter, from Maj. Erasmus Johnson at Seguin, dated "Below Santa Cruz, twenty-three miles down the Santa Cruz River, Sept. 20, 1854." We extract the following:

"All my men are in excellent health. I have not been sick an hour. We have had the finest kind of grass ever since we left the Rio Grande. In this valley it is like a meadow."

About fifty-five miles back, in the valley of the San Pedro we had a stampede; a rainy, dark night, and but three men on guard. The hands at camp did not know of it until some of them got away. By 10 o'clock next day, we had collected all but one hundred and seven head; during the day we collected all but forty-seven. We stayed two days, and then left eight hands to hunt for them, and went on with the train. After going five or six miles we came upon a grave, where Dunlap's brother-in-law, Houston, had been killed a few days previous by the Indians. They got twenty of Dunlap's horses and 160 head of cattle belonging to Beck & Bryant, which have never been discovered. When we got near Santa Cruz, we learned that on the mountains, two or twelve miles east of Santa Cruz, Cadenilds was attacked. His men all run, and one of the Fabin's was killed. The entire herd of cattle was driven off. The oxen were left untouched. This happened on the 21st of August. Houston was killed on the 23th. We passed Houston's grave on the 30th of August.

When we arrived at Santa Cruz, we found Dunlap's train and twelve families; Beck & Bryant with the balance of their cattle; Franklin with 250 head. They were good as we saw. We had to stop to rest our stock. Gallaghan took forty-two of our men, twenty-three of the other trains, and twenty-five Mexicans, and started to try and find where the Indians were with the stock. They started at night; next morning they came suddenly upon forty Indians—had a fight; killed all but nine; got one Mexican killed and three or four wounded slightly. One of our men, Sheppard, was wounded in the shoulder with an arrow. It has not prevented him from doing service.

From a Brownsville letter to the Galveston News, we extract the following:

From the interior of Mexico by way of Matamoros, we have nothing of interest, except the late admission by the Dictator's organ, that His Serene Highness cannot subdue or hold in check the revolution in Michoacan. I have seen a private letter from General Alvarez to a distinguished Mexican exile, residing here, in which, among other things, he says that he will, by the 1st of December next, be thundering in person at the gates of Morelia, the capital of the revolted department, unless the place before then surrenders to one of his Lieutenants, who carry on military operations in that section of the country. Alvarez's object is to occupy a seaport on the Pacific, and thus cripple the tyrant already exhausted resources. The indomitable Chief of the Pintos will be as good as his word.

We learn from the Austin State Times that Capt. Travis had returned from his scout without having discovered any Indians. The Times has the following:

Capt. Travis had returned from his scout without having discovered any Indians.

David Dean, a member of Capt. Travis's company, killed Mr. Kirk, a messmate of his, in Fredericksburg. The murder was dastard and cold-blooded. He managed to disarm Kirk and then blew his brains out. The exertion of Capt. Travis alone saved him from the infliction of summary vengeance by the men. The excitement was intense, but was happily restrained. Dean was in custody, strictly guarded by fifteen men.

Capt. Walker, after returning from the San Saba, made a reconnoissance on the head of the Guadalupe. He encountered a party of Indians—killed several and recaptured nineteen American horses. The particulars of the engagement were not given to Mr. Pratt.

Capt Henry is still out. He is reported to have drawn supplies for a month, and purposes finding Indians if possible.

Col. White was in the vicinity, and the companies of Walker, Travis, Henry and Rogers were to have been mustered into the United States service on the 30th. Two of the companies are to be sent to Fort Clarke and two to Fort Chadbourne.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ORIZABA.

The steamship Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived yesterday evening from Vera Cruz, bringing dates from that city to the 8th, and from the City of Mexico to the 2d inst.

The Mexican Economist states that the Mexican Industrial Exhibition was held in the University Edifice, in the City of Mexico. His Serene Highness, the Consorti plebiscite distributed the prizes himself, and the Minister of Fomento, Don J. Velasquez de Leon, delivered a speech upon the occasion. The proprietors of the Economist announce in a card that the publication of their paper would terminate with the number issued on the 25th ult.

The Mexican papers give us accounts of the elections of Plebiscite in favor of Gen. Santa Anna at Vera Cruz, and the City of Mexico, the accounts from the other places not having come in. In the former city we do not find a single negative vote recorded in the City of Mexico, on the first day of voting, 12,452 affirmative votes were thrown and one vote in the negative, which private letters to the editors of the Economist of Vera Cruz state, was thrown by a carpenter named Mendoza. The voting was to continue for the two succeeding days.

His Highness, the President, has issued an order that every officer, employee or agent of any kind of, the government, both civil and military, who under any pretext abstained from voting on the question of continuing the extraordinary powers of the President, shall be immediately dismissed from his place, unless he presents ample proof that he was prevented from so doing by physical or moral reasons.

The news in relation to revolutionary movements is very scanty. A rumor is reported to the papers of the city of Mexico that the city of Acapulco has pronounced against Alvarez, commanding as Governor Don Telesforo Moreno. This statement is not made officially, and wants confirmation.

The town of Tejupilco, in the District of Sultepec, was attacked on the 14th by a body of about fifteen hundred insurgents, under the command of Pionon. The attack continued during the 14th, 15th and 16th of November, but was unsuccessful. The Government account states that the insurgents were put to flight with great loss and had taken up a position on some neighboring hills.

We find no notice whatever in the Mexican papers of Gen. Alvarez, or of the operations in the State of Guerrero.

On the morning of the 27th the Supreme Government of Mexico received an express from the Michoacan, stating that the insurgents had attacked the city of Morelia with twenty-five hundred men and one piece of artillery; that after six hours fighting the Government was reinforced by the arrival of Gen. Tavera with his brigade, and the enemy were driven from the city, leaving in the streets and suburbs three hundred killed, a large number of wounded and prisoners, and their piece of artillery. The loss of the Government troops is not stated, the death of Gen. Echagaray being the only one spoken of. Gen. E. was the Commandant General of the State and was succeeded in the command by Gen Torrejon.

The official dispatches state that all the bands of the insurgents under the command of Huerta, Pueblita, Arias, Pinzon and others, united for the purpose of attacking the city, and that the number of disaffected people that joined them in the town increased their numbers to more than 3,500. The arrival of Gen. Tavera was most opportune, and undoubtedly saved the city. The official account does not state that the insurgents lost their artillery, and although several days had elapsed, the Government had received no further advices.

The Mexican papers state that the amnesty published by the Government has had the most happy effect, and that in the town of Coyuca alone, Gen. Zuloaga had received the adhesion of more than one thousand men under it.

It is also stated that the insurgent chiefs, Ribbe and Salinas, had accepted it with their bands, and that several small towns had sent in their resolutions of acceptance.

The papers state that the one hundred and sixty-two French prisoners, sent from Guaymas to Perote, had been brought down to Vera Cruz and placed at the orders of the French Minister, in order that they may be embarked on board a French vessel of war. This was done in proof of the distinguished consideration in which His Serene Highness holds the Emperor of the French.

Don Romulo Diaz de la Vega, the present Governor of Yucatan, passed through Vera Cruz on the 5th inst. for the City of Mexico, where it is said he has been called by the President for the purpose of being honored with an important mission.

Later from New Mexico.

The Independence Messenger of the 25th has letters and papers from Santa Fe to the end of October. The Messenger condenses the news, from which we extract the following items of interest:

The Indians are still at their old game—murdering the whites and stealing stock. The present policy of our Government towards these Indians is certainly very defective. At the last session of Congress $50,000 was appropriated for holding treaties with the Apache, Navajo and Utah Indians, and making them presents. This has not done much good, as a statement of a gentleman from Albuquerque will show. Some time during last summer a trader's train was stopped by the Indians on the Arkansas, and threatened and insulted—the Indian agent being present distributing presents among them at the time, but was afraid to interfere.

Last month the Indians came down in Judge Digge's twenty miles south of Albuquerque, and run off fifty of his mules, and then passed by our old friend's house, Dr. Connelly, and no doubt would have taken all of stock but he had them on an island in the river, and they were thus missed—but ran off twenty head of animals belonging to the Pueblos, and got off safely. There was a military party past in three or four miles, but the soldiers were on on a campaign. On the 26th ult., information was received at Albuquerque, from the Prefect of Valencia county, that a party of Indians had come into the neighborhood of Tome—took a woman and some children prisoners, whom, with as many stock as they could drive, they carried off. There were no troops to pursue and chastise them and rescue the prisoners. The truth is simply this: there are not troops enough in that country to make a campaign against the Indians, and protect the stores on the posts; and nothing can be done until more soldiers are sent out.

From the Santa Fe Gazette, we learn that Intimidarde pio Sisalla Valley had acknowledged the jurisdiction of the United States and surrendered two or three fugitives who had escaped from justice.

Captain Sykes and lady, and Miss McKee, had arrived in Santa Fe.

A company of Dragoons, under command of Captain Ewell, arrived in Santa Fe on the 9th, and afterwards marched to Las Lunas. Assistant Surgeon Leavenworth arrived there on the 7th, from Fort Defiance, on his way to the United States.

A soldier belonging to Fort Defiance was killed in the early part of October, by a Navajo Indian. The soldier was met a little distance from the fort and shot without any provocation.

Lieut. Jno W. Davidson, U. S. Dragoons, arrived in Santa Fe on the 23d October with his command. He had been out on a three weeks' scout, in search of Indians along the eastern frontier of the territory. He traveled several hundred miles, but saw nothing of the enemy. He secured the country watered by the Rio de Pecos and Rio de las Gallinas.

The troops under command of Major Grier arrived at Santa Fe on the 23d of October.

Gen. Morrow then held a talk at Rio Arriba, early in October, with Chico Velasquez band of Indians, after which presents were distributed to them. The Capote band was not present. The Indians made many protestations of friendship and a desire for peace, to be broken the first convenient opportunity.

LATER FROM SAN FRANCISCO.

ARRIVAL OF THE PROMETHEUS.

The steamship Prometheus, Capt. Harry Churchill, left New Orleans for San Juan, and arrived there on the morning of the 5th, making the run in five days and nineteen hours. Northern Light, Capt. Tinklepaugh, left New York on the 27th, and arrived at San Juan on the evening of the same day. Both ships left at the same time, the Northern Light with 300 passengers and over a million treasure.

We regret to announce the death of Mrs. Means at San Juan, wife of Major C. H. Means of Memphis. She died of Epilipsy, to attacks of which she had been subject. She was buried at Punta de Arenas, Tuesday, October 6. Country is healthy and the transit was easily and quickly made by the passengers. The revolution in Nicaragua is still active, Chomoro is in possession of the Plaza at Granada, where he entrenched himself and forces at an early period, occasionally making sallies upon his opponents, sometimes with effect and again meeting with a reverse, yet managing to sustain himself in his position and occasionally we learn adding additional force to his command.

Soon after the capture of the schooners upon the lake, belonging to the Castilon interest, by Chomoro, the force in possession of San Carlos, at the junction of the river on the lake, fearing an attack, returned from that position to Castilo Viejo, or Castillo Rapids, about forty miles below, on river San Juan, where they now are under the command of Telaya, the commandants of that place.

A short time after the evacuation, Chomoro sent a force under the command of Canal, one of his Generals, to take possession of San Carlos, which he did, and we believe has threatened to go down and attack those in possession of Castillo Viejo; at all events they are in the latter place in hourly anticipation of his (Canal) appearance, and are making preparations to defend it.

Thus matters stand at present, neither party obtaining any material advantage of late, Chomoro's (the great leader-President) prospects being considered the best. Nothing of importance from San Juan or Greytown. The town is building up again, and trade is reviving a little. The British sloop-of-war Vestal, Capt. Thompson, and the steam-frigate Termagant, Commodore Handerson, are lying in the harbor, the former having relieved the Arab.

Officers and crew all well. The English mail steamer sailed on the 7th for St. Thomas.

By the steamship Prometheus, we have San Francisco papers to the 24th of November. Every thing appears quiet in the Pacific. The San Francisco papers are barren of news. The Herald of the 17th says:

The English and French men-of-war were gally decorated with flags and streamers yesterday, in honor of the late victories of the Allied forces in the East. At noon a salute was fired and the afternoon, on board the Forte, spent in dancing, feasting and other festivities. The men were allowed a holiday. It would be amusing if the next mail should bring news that Sebastopol is not taken.

The U. S. steam frigate Mississippi, Capt. S. S. Lee, arrived on the 21st from the Sandwich Islands, bringing dates up to 14th November.

The Mississippi has a splendid band on board. Of this the Polynesian says:

"On Thursday evening last the band of the U. S. steamer Mississippi gave an instrumental concert at the Court House, where were performed many choice pieces, by the most celebrated composers. This band is composed of persons of great professional experience, and is said to be as fine as almost any other afloat, and on the evening in question, they fully justified their reputation before the public."

Our citizens will no doubt have an opportunity of hearing this band during the stay of the steamer in our port.

Official Courtesies.—On the 31st of October Hon. King gave audiences to the Commissioners of France, acting for the British Consul General, who was indisposed, to present the officers of H. B. M.'s ship Tribomalee, and H. I. M.'s ship L'Artemise. The usual complimentary passed, and the King was invited by both the commanders to visit their respective ships. The Polynesian understands that both the L'Artemise and Tribomalee will re-anchor at Honolulu with the arrival of the combined squadron, which is expected at the Islands some time in November.

Sale of Real Estate in Honolulu.—At a sale of real estate in Honolulu, at auction, Nov. 1st, the store premises of R. C. Janion, Esq., on Merchant street, brought $4,850, and the wife property in Nuuanu Valley, about a mile and a half from town, brought $4,650. L. H. Austin, Esq., was the purchaser of the former, and R. C. Wyllie, Esq., of the latter property.

Inter-Island Steam Navigation.—The Argus speaks encouragingly of the prospects of the Hawaiian Steam Navigation Company. Of the steamers it says:

"The Sea Bird made last week a trip to the windward and proved herself in every respect a sea-worthy, roomy and pleasant boat, and we rejoice to see that she was met patronized by passengers and freight both ways. The West Point left last Tuesday for Kauai with a crowd of passengers and a heavy freight bill. This is truly encouraging."

Disaster at Sea.—We are sorry, says the Polynesian, to report the wreck, on the 4th of September, of the Chilian whaling bark Rivello, Capt. Ray, on a shifting sand-bar, in Bechon Gull, near Marie, in the Ochotsa Sea. The Rivello was seventeen months out from Valparaiso, and had on board twelve hundred barrels of oil, and twenty-five thousand pounds of bone. The ship and cargo were a total loss; the captain and crew were saved, and taken on board the ship Corevan, of Fall-River, and afterwards distributed among the different ships in the fleet.

Capt. Ray also informs us that he saw the ship City of New Bedford, strike a sand bar within a mile of the reef on which the Rivello was lost, about 6 o'clock on the evening of September 6th. She immediately hoisted signals of distress in the mizen rigging, and fired guns throughout the night, but in the morning had entirely disappeared. He thinks she must have gone to pieces, but the crew could save themselves in their boats as they were not far from a Russian settlement, where they would be hospitably received but would probably bar as to winter there, as no more ships went in.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

REPORTS OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, OF THE ARMY, AND OF THE POST MASTER GENERAL.

We present below a brief synopsis of these important public documents:

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

WASHINGTON, Tuesday, Dec. 5

The Annual Report of the Secretary of the Navy recommends an additional but gradual increase of the Navy; its reorganization and the enactment of new resolutions for the discipline and improvement of seamen.

On the increase of the Navy the Secretary says he "is far from the opinion that the enlargement of our navy should stop with the action of last Congress. The protection of our commerce; the guarding our extended coast; the preservation of our rank as a nation, demand that we should not be entirely stationary, and with inactive indifference behold the progress of other powers in our strength. Even with the additional unfinished steam frigates, our naval force will not exceed fifty vessels in condition for service.

The Secretary renews his recommendations of last year for the reorganization of the Navy; the creation of a retired list for inferior officers; the discharge of the inefficient, and to have promotions regulated by capacity and merit in some degree, instead of, seniority of examination and pay, in some extent controlled by active service.

The bombardment of Greytown by the sloop of war Cyane is narrated, and the Secretary remarks that "he could not approve Commander Hollins for his conduct. Humanity often lends her sympathy to the suffering, however just the punishment; but particularly rarely condemns the brave officer who administers that punishment, from a sense of justice to his countrymen, whose property has been destroyed, and whose national flag has been insulted."

Lieut. Strain and party are complimented for enterprise and exhibition of powers of endurance and generous devotion to duty in the exploration of the Darien Ship Canal Route.

The result of the expedition is, according to Lieutenant Strain's report, that the proposed canal is totally impracticable; and this, the Secretary apprehends settles the question forever.

Professor Maury's achievements in developing his theory of winds and currents, and his preparation of charts are noticed most flatteringly. It is estimated that the saving to our commerce by the use of his charts would amount to several millions per annum.

Robert L. Stevens's iron war steamer, shot and shell proof, for harbor defense, is rapidly progressing. The boilers will be ready to put on board in about three weeks.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The actual strength of the Army is only ten thousand seven hundred and forty-five. The whole authorized strength is fourteen thousand two hundred and sixteen. The deficiency is fast decreasing by more rapid enlistments. A statement of the changes made in the distribution of the Army during the past year is made.

The removal from Florida of the remnant of the Seminoles has received the attention of the Department, but its efforts have not been very successful. Better fortune is expected next year, through the instrumentality of the new plan of operations. The Indian difficulties elsewhere are alluded to. The massacre of Lieut. Grattan and men by the Sioux is narrated, and the fact stated, that the Army forces is quite inadequate to the protection of our frontier and to punish Indian aggressions. Our entire loss in Indian actions during the year is four officers and sixty-three men killed, and four officers and forty-two men wounded. The occurrences on the frontier furnish deplorable proofs of the insufficiency of our military force, and of the absolute necessity for its increase, which was urged by the Secretary last year. Our effective force does not exceed seven thousand men, which is entirely inadequate for the purpose for which we maintain a standing army. Its immediate increase is urged, at least sufficient to give some degree of security to the Indian frontiers, for which purpose the regular force is the most efficient, cheap, proper and constitutional means. The increased pay to enlisted men, induced the enlistment of one thousand and five men in September and October last, against three hundred and nineteen during the corresponding months last year. The number of recruits required for the service of the ensuing year will probably not be less than six thousand.

He recommends the use of camels and dromederies for military purposes again, and asks an appropriation to test their usefulness. An increased pay for officers is urged as an act of justice and necessity. Additional legislation is asked to place the widows and orphans of the officers and soldiers of the army on an equality with the widows and orphans of the officers and soldiers of the navy. The necessity of a revision of our military legislation in some important particulars is pointed out, in order to prevent conflicting claims in regard to rank and command, which now give rise in much inconvenience and trouble. One great source of difficulty is the double rank recognised by our laws; to remedy this it is proposed to give effect in brevet rank only when the President may see fit, and forbid the exercise of brevet commissions in the regiment, troop or company where officers are mustered. Elaborate suggestions for reorganization of the staff corps are presented, and compared with European systems. It is supposed that there be nine Brigadier-Generals; one for each Department; one for Quartermaster-General, one for Adjutant-General, and two for Inspectors-General; being an addition of three to those who now, by brevet or otherwise, have rank and commend as Brigadier-Generals. Other marked changes to staff appointments, rank and duty, are proposed.

Reforms in the organization of regiments are also suggested. The expediency of general promotions by seniority instead of merit is doubted by the Secretary; and the establishment of a retired list again urged. Professorships of Ethics and of English studies at the Military Academy are recommended.

Many other subjects are treated of at considerable length.

THE POST-MASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

The Post-master General, in his report, recommends the passage of a law authorizing the establishment of a system of registration of all valuable letters, at the option of the correspondents—five cents additional postage being charged for registration, and all registered letters to be made up under a special mail bill, and sent under a special envelope to the Post-masters. A system of checks and accounts is also suggested, in order the more readily to ascertain when valuable letters are missing, and to give an easier clue to mail robberies.

The Post-master compliments the Collins line of steamers highly, and thinks the original allowance made to it by the Government was too low, but that the present pay is too high. He does not, however, recommend any decided course with reference thereto. He thinks the California mail steamers' service costs too much, and suggests that unless contractors will give weekly service for the present contract price, the Government had better exercise their right and abrogate the contract by a purchase of the Company's ships.

LOSS OF LIFE IN THE BURNING OF THE OCEAN.

If the following from the Hallowell Gazette is correct, there were two more lives lost in the disaster which resulted in the burning of the steamer Ocean than has heretofore been supposed:

"Mr T. Moores, of this city, who was on board the Ocean at the time of the collision, gives us some particulars which we have not seen published in the newspaper accounts. He states that he was standing in the upper saloon when the crash came, and that a gentleman and lady were sitting at a table near the stove, who were immediately buried up beneath the rubbish and splintered fragments of the upper deck and side beam of the boat. He heard their cries for assistance, and endeavored to remove the timbers that confined them; but to lose them a minute the smoke and fire rushed up through his apertures, and he was compelled to leave them to their fate, and no doubt they were burned with the boat. Mr. Moores had barely time to make his escape before the boat was entirely enveloped in flames."

MORE EFFECTS OF THE RECENT GALE IN NEW YORK.

DEMETRIUS THE DIVER.

There [illegible] greater need to be by [illegible] that [illegible] the leaves to [illegible] time [illegible] to me no choice but t[illegible] turn to the old, dark [illegible] dark, grim skeleton [illegible] respective glance toward [illegible] that are gone.

[illegible] Demetrius Comneros. None knew exactly what he was a Scio[illegible], and had escaped after the massacre; that he was quite alone, and very poor. He was fortunate enough, to possess a somewhat rare [illegible] instrument, which made his earnings, although precarious, considerably more remunerative than those of his fellow-countrymen [illegible] the station to which he appeared to belong. Demetrius Comneros was a most expert swimmer and diver. Had Demetrius Comneros lived in our days, he would have been a professor to a society; the walls would have been covered with posting-bills and woodcuts portraying his achievements; and he would have had a convenient exhibition room, and a sliding-scale of prices for his entertainment. In eighteen hundred and twenty-[illegible] he contented himself with the exercise of his talents in the open port of Marseilles, which was satisfied with the stray francs, [illegible] sous, copper coins and liards, flung to him when he emerged from the water, all spatted, like a Newfoundland dog. He [illegible] to lead a sufficiently easy loung[illegible]ing, [illegible], gambling, swimming and diving, sometimes for sheer amusement; at others, banking [illegible] the genial sun with such profound indolence that had you not known him to be a Greek, you would have taken him for a genuine lazzarone of the Quai Santa Lucia. Demetrius was some thirty years old, tall, magnificently proportioned, with a frank countenance, wavy black hair and sparkling black eyes. His attire was exceedingly simple, being ordinarily limited to a shirt, [illegible] and white striped drawers, secured round the waist by a [illegible] sash, and a small Greek fez-touch on his [illegible] ornamented with a tarnished gold tassel. Shoes and stockings he despised as effeminate luxuries. He was perfectly contented with his modest fare of grapes, melons, [illegible] bread, garlic and [illegible] wine. Hence [illegible] cost him nothing, as [illegible] the Greek merchants, settled at Marseilles, allowed him to sleep in his warehouse, like a species of watch-dog. When the weather was fine he swam and dived, and dried himself in the sun; when it was foul he coiled himself up into a ball, and went to sleep.

In the year eighteen hundred and twenty-four, it occurred to the Turkish Government considerably to strengthen their navy. There was an arsenal and a dock-yard at Constantinople then, as there is now; but the Ottomans did not know much about ship-building, and in the absence of [illegible] guarantee for the safety of their [illegible] artists were rather chary of entering in the service of the Padishah, for, as the shipwrights wouldn't go to Sultan Mahmoud, Sultan Mahmoud condescended to go to the shipwrights; that is to say, he sent an Effendi, attached to the Department of Marine, to Marseilles, with full powers to have constructed four frigates by the ship-builders of that port. As the French Government had not failed to interest itself one way or another in the Eastern question, and the ship-builders of Marseilles did not care one copper centime whether the Turks beat the Greeks, or the Greeks the Turks, sold more than all this, as the Effendi from Stamboul had carte blanche in the money department, and paid for each frigate in advance, they set about building the four frigates with a hearty good will, and by the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty-five two of them were ready for launching.

It was observed by the French workmen that Demetrius the Diver appeared to take very great interest in the process of ship-building. Day after day he would come into the slip where the frigates were being constructed, and sitting upon a pile of planks, would remain there for hours. Other Greeks would come occasionally, and launch forth into fierce invective against the Turks, and against the French, too, for lending their hands for the construction of ships which were to be employed against Christians. In these tirades Demetrius the Diver seldom, if ever, joined. He was a man of few words, and he sat upon the planks and looked at the workmen, their tools and their work. Nobody took much notice of him, except to throw him a few sous occasionally, or to say what a lazy, skulking fellow he was.

At length the day arrived which was fixed for the launch of the first frigate, the Sultani Bahri. Half Marseilles was present. The sub-prefect was there, not officially, but officiously, (whatever that subtle distinction may be) crowds of beautiful ladies, as beautifully dressed, were in the tribunes round the sides of the slip; the Sultani Bahri was dressed out with flags and aboard her was the great Effendi himself, with his secretary, his interpreter, his pipe-bearer, and the armateur, or ship-builder.

The sight of a ship-launch is to the full as exciting as any race. The heart beats time to the clicking of the hammers that are knocking the last impediments away, and when the mighty mass begins to move, the spectator is in a tremor of doubt, and hope, and fear. When the ship rights herself, and indeed walks the water like a thing of life, the excitement is tremendous; he must shout, he must congratulate himself, his next neighbor, every body, upon the successful completion of the work.

Now, every thing had been looked to, thought of, prepared for, the triumphal launch of the Sultani Bahri. The only obstacles between her and the waters were certain pieces of wood, technically called (I know not what their French name may be) dogshores, and these were being knocked away by the master shipwrights. This operation, I may remark, was formerly considered so dangerous that in the royal dock-yards it was undertaken by convicts, who obtained their liberty if they accomplished the task without accident. Just as the first stroke of the hammer became audible, Demetrius the Diver, who had hitherto been concealed among the crowd, plunged into the water, and swam right across the track that the frigate would take on its release from the slip. A cry of horror burst from the crowd, as he swam directly toward the ship's stem, for the vessel had begun to move, and every one expected the rash diver to be crushed or drowned. But, when he was within a few feet of the frigate, Demetrius the Diver threw up his arms, held them aloft for a moment, in a menacing manner, then quietly subsided on his back, and floated away with the tide. The Sultani Bahri slid down her ways to a considerable extent; she was even partially in the water, but she walked it by no means like a thing of life, for her stern began to settle down, and, if the truth must be told, the new frigate of His Imperial Highness the Sultan stuck in the mud.

They tried to screw her off, to weigh her off to float her off; but in vain. When a ship sticks in launching, there is frequently no resource but to pull her to pieces where she sticks, and this seemed to be the most probable fate in store for the Sultani Bahri. The Effendi was in a fury. The ship-builder was disconsolate; but the Frenchmen only ascribed the misadventure to the clumsiness of his shipwright, whereas the Moslem, superstitious like the majority of his co-religionists, vowed that the failure was solely owing to the evil eye of the Giaour diver, Demetrius Comneros. Had the Effendi been in his own land, a very short and summary process would have preserved all future ship-launches from the troublesome presence of Demetrius Comneros and his evil eye; but at Marseilles, in the department of the Bouches du Rhone, the decapitation, bowstringing, or drowning, of even a rayah was not to be thought of. So the Effendi was obliged to be satisfied with giving the strictest orders for Demetrius's exclusion from the ship-builder's yard in future; and, after a delay of some months, the second frigate (the first rotting in the mud) was ready for launching.

Anxiety was depicted on the Effendi's face as he broke a bottle of sherbet over the bows of the frigate, and named her the Achmedie. Immediately afterward a cry burst from the crowd of "Demetri! Demetri the Diver!" and, rushing along the platform which ran round the vessel, the Effendi could descry the accursed diver holding up his hands as before, and doubtless blighting the onward progress of the Achmedie with his evil eye.

Evil or not, a precisely similar disaster overtook the second frigate, and the launch was a lamentable failure. The ship-builder was in despair. The Effendi went home to his hotel cursing, and was about administering the bastinado to the whole household as a relief to his feelings, when his interpreter, a shrewd Greek, one Yanni, ventured to pour the balm of advice into the ear of indignation.

"Effendi," he said, "this rayah that dives is doubtless a cunning man, a magician, and by his spells and incantations has arrested the ships of my lord, the Padishah, whom Allah preserve, in their progress. But he is a rayah and a Greek, and a rogue of course. Let my lord, the Effendi, bribe him, and he will remove his spells."

"You are all dogs and sons of dogs," answered the Effendi, graciously, "but ont of your mouth, devoured to the slipper, Oh Yanni, comes much wisdom. Send for this issue of a mangy pig, this diver with the evil eye."

Demetri was sent for, and in due time made his appearance, not so much as salaming to the Effendi, or even removing his hat. The savoy of the Sultan was sorely tempted to begin the interview by addressing himself through the intermediations of a bamboo to the soles of the diver's feet, but fear of the sub-prefect and his gendarmes, and indeed, of the magical powers of the diver himself, prevented him.

"Dog and slave!" he said, politely, "dog that would eat garbage out of the shop of a Jew butcher, wherefore hast thou bewitched the ships of our lord and Caliph, the Sultan Mahmoud?"

"I am not come here to swallow dirt," answered the diver, coolly; "and if your words are for dogs, open the window and throw them out. If you want any thing with a man who, in Frangistan, is as good as Effendi, state your wishes."

"The ships, slave! the ships!"

"The first two stuck in the mud," said the Greek, "and the third, with the blessings of Heaven, and St. George of Cappadocia, will no more float than a cannon-ball."

"You lie, dog! you lie!" said the Effendi.

"'Tis you who lie, Effendi!" answered Demetrius the Diver; "and moreover, if you give me the lie again, by St. Luke, I will break your unbelieving jaw."

As the Effendi happened to be alone with Demetrius (for he had dismissed his interpreter) and, as there was something exceedingly menacing in the stalwart frame and clenched teeth of the Greek, his interlocutor judged it expedient to lower his tone.

"Can you remove the spells you have laid on the ships?" he asked.

"Those that are launched are past praying for."

"Will the next float?"

"If I choose."

"And the next?"

"If I choose."

"Name your own reward, then," said the Effendi, immensely relieved. "How many piastres do you require? Will ten thousand do?"

"I want much more than that," answered Demetrius the Diver, with a grim smile.

"More! What rogues you Greeks are! How much more?"

"I want," pursued the diver, "my wife Katinka back from Stamboul. She was torn away from Scio, and is in the harem of the Captain Pacha. I want my three children; my boy Andon, my boy Yorgki and my girl Endocia. When I have all these here, at Marseilles (Marseilles) and twenty thousand piastres to boot, your frigates shall be launched in safety."

"All well and good," said the Effendi. I will write to Stamboul to-night, and you shall have all your brood, and the piastres as well, within two months. But what security have I that you will perform your part of the contract? The word of a Greek is not worth a para."

"You shall have a bond for double the amount, which I will hand over to you, from two merchants of Marseilles. You can not give me all I should like," concluded the diver, with a vengeful frown. "You can not give me back my aged father's life, my sister's, my youngest child's; you can not give me the heart's blood of the Albanian wolf who slew them."

Within a quarter of a year Demetrius the Diver was restored to his family. He insisted upon receiving the stipulated reward in advance, probably holding as poor an opinion of the word of a Turk as the Effendi did of the word of a Greek.

The momentous day arrived when the third frigate was to be launched; a larger crowd than ever was collected; every body was on the tiptoe of expectation. Demetrius the Diver, who, during the past three months, had had free access to the ship-builder's yard, was on board. The dog-shores were knock away, the frigate slid down her ways, and took the water in splendid style. The launch was completely successful. The Effendi was in rapturos, and believed more firmly in the power of the evil eye than ever. A few days afterward the fourth frigate was launched with equal success.

"Marvelous man!" cried the envoy of the Sublime Porte; "by what potent spell wert thou enabled to bewitch the first two frigates?"

"Simply by these," answered Demetrius the Diver, in presence of a large company assembled at a banquet held in honor of the two successful launches. "Five years ago my father was one of the most extensive ship builders at Scio, and I was bred to the business from my youth. We were rich, we were prosperous, until we were were ruined by the Turkish atrocities at Scio. I arrived in Marseilles alone, beggared, my father murdered, my wife and children in captivity. How I lived, you all know. While the first two frigates were being built, I watched every stage of their construction. I detected several points of detail which I was certain would prevent their being successfully launched. When, however, I had entered into my contract with this noble Effendi, I conferred with the shipwrights; I pointed out to them what was wrong; I convinced them, by argument and illustration, what was necessary to be done. They did it. They altered, they improved. Behold, the ships are launched! and the evil eye had no more to do with the matter than the amber mouthpiece of his excellency the Effendi's chibouque! I have done."

The Effendi, it is said, looked rather foolish at the conclusion of this explanation, and waddled away, muttering that all Greeks were thieves. Demetrius, however, kept his piastres, gave up diving for a livelihood, and commenced business on his own account as a boat-builder, prospered exceedingly with Katinku, his wife, and Andon, Yorghi and Endocia, his children. As to the two frigates, they were equipped for sea in good time, and were, I believe, knocked to pieces by the allied fleets at the battle of Navarino.

A Slight Mistake on Both Sides.

The other day a person who is somewhat of a linguist, speaking French fluently and Spanish tolerably well, found himself in company with two other travelers in a stage that was conveying them from Pearhill to Carmel. The strangers were conversing in German, and one of them alighted at a farm-house mid-way between the two villages. Our friend was left with the other traveler as his companion for the journey. The conversation between the two friends had been lively, and the silence that ensued when the aforementioned traveler left was painful. At last our hero thought he would endeavor to get up some sort of conversation in order to beguile the time.

"Parles vous Français, monsieur?" said he, addressing the supposed German.

"Non, na entendes," replied the other, "canst sie Deutche sprachen?"

"Nicht," replied our hero, with a shake of the head; but he added: "Habla V. Espagol?"

"Si, senor, poco," replied the traveler, and a sort of mongrel conversation in tolerably indifferent Spanish was maintained between the two until the stage stopped at the destination, when both travelers prepared to alight.

"Take care of my baggage, Jim!" shouted the supposed German in unmistakable vernacular, to the driver, as he stepped on the stoop of the hotel."

"What, sir, do you speak English?" asked our hero, in a tone of surprise, "I thought you were a German!"

"To be sure, I do. I ought to. I'm a Dutchman, but I thought you were a Frenchman!"

TREMENDOUS STORM AT THE NORTH.—The following dispatches in the New York papers of the 5th will give some idea of the effects of the recent great storm in the North and East:

BOSCOUT, North River, Dec. 4.—We were visited yesterday and last night by a very severe snow storm. Early in the evening especially, it snowed very fast and blew a perfect gale.

We have learned of the following disasters on the river near this place, viz: The steamers Adrian and Homely are sunk, and the Troy is broken in two, and is a total loss. There are also several other boats lost, the names of which we have not been able to learn. The barges Ohio and Monroe, and four or five others, are ashore near Point Ewen. The barges, also, were part of the South American tow from Albany. The deck loads of pump of the boats and barges were driven ashore. We have not learned of the loss of any lives.

Snow fell here to the depth of nine inches. The wind is N. N. W., and is quite cold.

BOSTON, Dec 4.—A tremendous northeast storm of wind and rain raged in this locality last night, but the weather is pleasant to-day.

The train from New York last night has not yet arrived. The damage in the city by the gale was trifling, being mainly confined to awnings, signs, etc. One or more chimneys were blown down. Some injury was sustained by the shipping in the harbor. The ship Westward Ho was badly chased, and the brig Matanzas was driven ashore at South Boston. The brig Arabella lost her jibboom, and several ballast lighters were sunk.

We have heard nothing from the Capes yet.

SECOND DISPATCH.—The brig T. P. Perkins, from Philadelphia for Boston, loaded with coal, went ashore last night near Fourth Cliff, at Scituate. Crew saved.

The brig Whitaker, of Goldsboro, from Calais for New York, with lumber, is ashore at North River, Marshfield. Crew saved.

The schooner Boston, of and from Bangor to Nantucket, lumber laden, went ashore at the entrance of North River Marshfield, and the vessel has gone to pieces. The crew were all saved with the exception of a boy named Henry Armstrong, twelve years of age.

An unknown brig is also ashore near Scituate Light.

THIRD DISPATCH.—Ten or twelve vessels of small size were sunk by the gale last night, but no loss of life has been reported.

No storm of equal violence has occurred in this vicinity for many years.

We learn that the House telegraph wires were completely stripped from the poles east of Springfield for a distance of ten miles.

LONG BRANCH, Dec. 4.—The brigantine Elisa Ann, of Blue Hill Me., is ashore at this place. She is light, and high upon the beach. The schooner Enoch French, of Fall River, is also in the same situation. Both vessels were bound out, in ballast.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 4.—The schooner Omar, with a cargo of salt, went on the west pier this morning and will prove, probably, a total loss. Efforts are making to save the crew, but, thus far, without success. The Government's life boat was wrecked alongside.

The schooner Pearl is ashore west of the pier, but will probably be got off.

CLEVELAND, 9 o'clock, P. M.—The schooner Omar is now breaking up. One of her crew, in attempting to get to the west pier, was drowned. Another was saved by a rope flung to him from the pier. Capt. Keeob and five others are still on board of her, and the storm continues to rage with unabated violence.

The brig Roseine and the schooner Monsoon have just come in safely, driving in before the gale.

The propeller Pangeant has started out to try and save those remaining on board the Omar. On reaching her, two of her crew, in attempting to jump aboard of the propeller, fell into the water and were drowned.

Capt. Watts, of the steamer Ohio, who had volunteered to go in the propeller, then jumped on board of the Omar with a rope, when the propeller was driven off by the violence of the storm, and Capt. Watts left on board the schooner.

The propeller subsequently made a second attempt, and succeeded in rescuing Capt. Watts and the remainder of the crew of the Omar.

The schooner Charles Crooks from Oswego, loaded with salt, has just gone ashore at the breakwater. The crew are saved, but the vessel and cargo are a total loss.

CLEVELAND, 9 o'clock, P. M.—The gale is now somewhat abating, but it is still terrific.

The schooners Stargis and Virginia, and the brig Maryland are lost. Their crews were saved.

The schooner J. J. Johns is ashore at Grand River, and all that were on board of her are lost.

The propeller Pangeant sunk in the slip from injuries received in saving the crew of the schooner Omar.

The propeller International, lying at the dock at Buffalo, took fire on the 4th inst., and burnt to the water's edge. She was owned by the Buffalo and Brantford Railroad Company, and was valued at $40,000, and insured for $20,000.

THE THING SETTLED.—Milkmen, from time immemorial, have existed under a stigma, based upon the blueishness and insipidity of their milk, and a very natural supposition that the fault was owing to hydropathic infusions, made in the secrecy of dairy walls or the darkness of night. Still, as none of them were ever detected in the operation, the charitably disposed gave them the benefit of their doubts, and tried to attribute the weakness of their milk to the debility of their cows, or the inferior quality of their pasturage—any thing, in fact, rather than to the hydrants and cisterns so unfeelingly spoken of by a portion of the community. It is with no little sorrow and sympathy for the future reputation of our milkmen, that we now record the entire dissipation of the doubt in their favor, and that the most charitable of our city milk-drinkers are at length compelled to look the damning fact of their turpitude straight in the face. To come to the point, then, on Saturday forenoon at 11½ o'clock, at the corner of Poydras and Philippe streets, officer Peterson seized the horses and milk-cart No 4421, belonging to Samuel Thompson, for three offences which are set forth in the affidavit, to wit: First, for running without brands; second, for blocking up the street; and thirdly, for "filling his cans at the hydrant, all against the city ordinances." If Mr. Thompson had been detected in private in the act of diluting his milk, it would not have looked so bad; but to attempt such a thing at mid-day, in the open street, seems to betray a callousness that nothing but a long practice in that business, or a universality of the custom among his fellow-milkmen, could justify. Recorder Bright yesterday ordered him to pay a fine of only $10—rather small, one would suppose, but large enough, perhaps, when we recollect how much the public is at the mercy of the milk-venders. We are

THE WORLD TO COME.—The following were the meditations of the celebrated John Foster, on the death of his wife. They will seem to many as a transcript of their own thoughts under similar bereavements:

Can it be—how is it—what is it—that we are not indebtents of the same world—that each has to think of the other as in a perfectly different economy of existence? Whither is she gone—in what manner does she consciously realize to herself the astonishing change—how does she look at herself as no longer inhabiting a mortal tabernacle—in what manner does she recognize her state as only a few weeks since—in what manner does she think, and feel and act, and communicate with other spiritual beings—what manner of vision has she of God and the Savior of the world—how does she review and estimate the course of principle through which she had been prepared for the happy state where she finds herself—in what manner does she look back on the death, which she has so recently passed through—and does she plainly understand the nature of a phenomenon so awfully mysterious to the view of mortals? How does she remember and feel respecting us, respecting me? Is she associated with the spirits of her departed son and our two children who died in infancy? Does she indulge with delight a confident anticipation that we shall, after a while, be added to her society? If she should think of it as (with respect to some of us, many years, possibly before each an event, does that appear a long time in prospect, or has she begun to account of duration according to the great laws of eternity? Earnest imaginings and questionings like these arise without end; and still, still there is no answer, no revelation. The mind comes again and again up close to the thick black veil; but there is no perforation, no glimpse. She that loved me, and I trust loves me still, will not, can not, must not answer me. I can only imagine her to say, "Come and see; serve our God so that you shall come and share at no distant time."

HOW ABERNETHY GOT MARRIED.—Have I mentioned the recent death of the widow of the late John Abernethy, the great surgeon? She was on for eighty. There is a story of the way in which Abernethy got this woman to marry him. Once upon a time, he went to oburnh, and was shown into a pew where there were two ladies. He had no prayer book, and the young lady handed him one. They walked out of the pew together, and found at the porch that it was raining heavily. Abernethy offered to take them home in his carriage which was waiting. They had some chat, in the course of which it came out that they were mother and daughter, not very well off, and widow and daughter of an officer in the army. Abernethy set them down at their humble dwelling.

As he stood at their table he handed his card to the daughter and said—"Young lady, I am Mr. Abernethy, the surgeon. I have never married, for I never could spare time to court. I should like to marry you. If you will have the goodness to write me a line on Tuesday, saying whether you will bare me, I shall call the next day and take you to church." Mamma asked him to walk in. He said he could only spare fifteen minutes, and he came out within that time the accepted of a very pretty woman. They were married on the Tuesday, and he drove home with her to the stately mansion of which she thus became the mistress. "My dear," said he, after he had introduced her to some of his friends assembled to receive her, "you must excuse me until 3 o'clock, for I have to give my lecture at Bartholomew's Hospital, which I cannot omit on any account." They were a very happy couple, and when Abernethy died in 1831 his widow came in for all his wealth, estimated at something like one hundred thousand pounds. [London Sunday Times.

AN EXEMPLARY HUSBAND.—There is only one species of fish known, which builds a nest with as much precision and regularity as a bird. It is called the Stickleback, and inhabits pebble streams of fresh water. The male fish has all the work to do of building the nest and taking care of the eggs and young ones. He first selects a proper spot in which to build his nest. Then he goes abroad and collects in his mouth all the straws and bits of grass or leaves, which are floating down the stream, and brings and heaps them up where he has decided to build; but as the materials are light and liable to drift down stream, he takes the precaution to bring sand also, to deposit on the first layer of his nest, and thus hold it in its place. In order to make his building materials adhere together, he presses his body against them in a slow vibratory manner, in order to see if it is strong enough to resist the action of the stream, agitates the water with his fins, making small waves best against it; and if he observes that any of the straws are moved he plasters them down again, and heaps on more sand. In this manner he continues until his house is finished. The door is then made by repeatedly thrusting his body through the walls until a hole is made.

HORRIBLE DEATH.—On Tuesday morning last, says the Tlaquemine Gazette of the 9th inst., a negro woman belonging to Mr. Norbert Marionneaux, was overtaken during the feeding of the mill, when her dress accidentally caught in one of the cogs, and she was literally ground to atoms. The circumstances which she was in at the time of the accident made it a double death.

OF all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints, nothing has ever been found which could compare in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions. We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.

The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1847; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Art in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the CHERRY PECTORAL, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.

Read the following opinion, founded on the long experience of the eminent Physician of the Port and City of

ST. JOHNS, May 8, 1851.

DR. J. C. AYER: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.

I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how a better remedy can be made for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.

J. J. BURTON, M. D., F. R. S.

SUDBURY, Feb. 24, 1851.

DR. AYER: In the month of July last, I was attacked by a violent diarrhœa, in the mines of California. I returned to San Francisco, in hope of receiving benefit from a change of air and diet. My diarrhœa ceased, but was followed by a severe cough, and much soreness. I finally started for home, but received no benefit from the voyage. My cough continued to grow worse, and when I arrived in New York, I was at once marked by my acquaintances as a victim of consumption. I must confess that I saw no sufficient reason to doubt what my friends all believed. At this time I commenced taking your truly invaluable medicine, with little expectation of deriving any benefit from its use. You would not receive these lines did I not regard it my duty to state to the afflicted, through you, that my health, in the space of eight months, is fully restored. I attribute it to the use of your CHERRY PECTORAL.

Yours truly,

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the coming session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug6—6m26

CORRESPONDENCE AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

AN ARMENIAN WEDDING.

As the description of an Armenian wedding would doubtless prove interesting to your numerous readers, I may be permitted to lay before them the facts connected with one of which I have been a witness, and to which I had been invited, on the 8th of October last.

But, previous to entering on the details of the ceremony, let me take a glance over the preliminary steps, generally taken, and which pave the way to the final union of two happy beings. As the present relation embraces only the custom of that part of the Armenian sect, at present under the religious dynasty of Catholicism, we will find in many points a close resemblance to the same rites in our own country.

When a young man has taken a penchant for a damsel with whom he has been acquainted, or whom he has merely seen and conversed with in the mute but expressive language of the eyes, and if dutiful, he flies to his mother or other female relatives, and begs her to go and see the young lady and judge of her suitability. Soon the mother knows what is going on among the young people, and if she approves of her son's choice, she will not wait to be consulted, but goes on the mission of her own accord.

The visit thus made by the mother is, to all appearance, an ordinary one, and she is accompanied by two or three of her female friends. Nothing is immediately said about the object in view, and the conversation is sustained the same as usual, but the relatives of the young lady have learnt the purpose of the visit and act accordingly. Consequently, the young damsel is brought out, as it were, and is selected to hand to the company sweetmeats and water. With regard to the use of this last beverage, it is the only one permitted on such occasions, and, strange to say, no wine is ever allowed.

After this visit, and if the mother of the young man is pleased, a lapse of two or three weeks, sometimes more, takes place, and during this space of time the parents of both parties come to an arrangement about the match. The dowry is set aside and the necessary preparations are made concerning the betrothal and afterwards the marriage. These are the two great points of the whole rite, and one is not to be neglected any more than the other.

A sufficient time having elapsed, the betrothal takes place at the house of the patriarch, or in the council-chamber of the nation, and not in person, but by proxy. On the day appointed, the male relatives of both parties proceed to either of the afore-mentioned places, and two plain gold rings are exchanged. These rings have been bought by the intended bridegroom, one of which has been sent to the family of his love. After the simple service of betrothal, the rings are conveyed each unto its respective destination, and until the marriage, they are worn either on the first or third finger.

The betrothal rite is generally performed by a priest, deputed by the Patriarch, though among great and wealthy families it is done by the latter personage himself, for which he always receives a handsome present.

From the time this ceremony takes place, the youth is allowed to visit his betrothed as often as he pleases, but on his first visit he must bring a piece of jewelry or other handsome gift, as a mark of respect and delight at seeing the young lady. This custom of the sight-offering is never neglected. But there is one drawback attached to this; for the young man, though allowed the pleasure of social intercourse with his beloved, is under the restraint imposed by the presence of others. The youth can never converse or walk with the lady alone. Whenever they meet, either in house or street, some members of the family must be present, and should they break through this rule every one in the nation has a right to comment on it, to the great annoyance of both families.

Ten or fifteen years ago the Armenians were much more strict than they are at present, and filial obedience was always inculcated with regard to the choice of a partner for life. None of the young men or maidens ever consulted their own will, but left the whole management of this important rite to the judgment of their parents, and naturally these latter looked only to the worldly and politic view of the question, and asked not to unite two loving hearts, but only to turn the riches of both houses into one common channel. Even at the present day, the custom is still retained among the most distinguished of the Catholic Armenians, and thus many unhappy marriages take place, though by contact with Europeans, this sect, as a body, has dropped many of its old fashioned observances, this among the number.

Immediately after the betrothal, the girl begins to make her wedding dresses and take other preparatory steps for her coming nuptials. Six months is the general lapse of time between the two events, though it may be contracted into two or three months.

The wedding day gradually approaches: but before entering on it we must not forget that most important personage at the ceremony—the god-father. No couple can ever be married without a god-father, and he is always a necessary appendage and one of the most honorable persons at the time. It is the duty of the bridegroom, sometime before his marriage, to procure the services of one of his friends for this office. And though it is considered an honorable position for any one, yet, as it is attended with an outlay of expense, many would shrink from the proposition, were it not from the fear of not being able to procure one themselves.

At the nuptial ceremony the god-father is obliged to bring all the wax candles necessary for the purpose; and the larger they are the better. These candles will oftentimes cost the sum of five or six hundred piastres. Besides these, he also procures two handsome garlands of flowers, which he presents to the newly-married couple. In return, and out of respect, the bride kisses his hand, and also those of his wife or sister, who may be present. And on the wedding day, the god-father, in behalf of his wife or sister, presents the bride with a handsome present, suitable to her new position.

The marriage most commonly takes place on a Sunday, and on the Saturday evening before, all the extra dresses, shawls, etc., are packed in a trunk and sent to the house of the bridegroom. These things are called, in Turkish, Jehes. On the same evening the bride's family and their immediate friends assemble in the house of the former, and hold a feast to celebrate the joyous morrow. The father gives a toast at the commencement, and as it is in favor of his daughter, it is universally responded to; and when the damsel rises to drink in acknowledgment, every one cries, Anoush, which translated, means, "Let it be agreeable."

At this feast the young lady, for the first time, wears the veil which is to decorate her brow on the morrow. It is also the gift of the god-father, and is very expensive, being made of gold and silver wire. In the first place, a golden circlet is bound around her head, and from this are suspended wires, small and delicate, of either gold or silver, which, hanging down to the waist, envelops her whole features. The veil is worn all the time of the feast, and presents a glittering and beautiful appearance.

The Sunday morning of my visitation opened bright and clear, and accompanied by one of my Armenian friends, I set out, about midday, for the house of the bridegroom. Many of his friends had already assembled, and were waiting the arrival of the damsel, to whose house carriages had been sent to convey her and her relatives. In this case, it is customary for the female relatives of the young man to accompany the carriages, and receive the bride from the hands of her parents, who from that moment give up all right and title to her; and in fact they never accompany their daughter to her marriage, but remain at home waiting patiently for some weeks, until the daughter, then a wife, makes them a visit under the character of a new position.

Whilst waiting the appearance of the young lady, whom I had a great curiosity to see, I glanced around the room, with the hope of finding some familiar faces. In doing so I speedily perceived that there were no women present, and, wonderingly, I turned to my companion and asked the cause. I was then told that the invited ladies were received by the young man's mother in another part of the house, and they were entertained there in a similar manner to the men, who, every now and then, were drinking boiling hot coffee and eating sweetmeats. And connected with this refreshment there is a very curious observance, which I must not pass over unnoticed.

Whenever, in an assembly like this, you receive a spoonful of Turkish preserves, or a glass of sherbet, you must render thanks to each individual in the room, one after another, by raising your hand to the chin and then to the head with a quick motion, as if making a salute, and at the same time uttering the words: Afiahler olsoun! "Let it be good health!" Thus, it is quite amusing to see twenty or thirty persons all making those motions at each other for two or three minutes, and with the greatest solemnity imaginable.

Of course the young bridegroom was present, and, judging from his appearance, he seemed very happy. He was like most of his nation, olive complexioned, with a profusion of black hair which hung long from beneath a bright new fez. He was richly and handsomely dressed, and on his fingers sparkled a couple of brilliant diamonds. I knew Tanarsen Ogion to be a young man of good principles, and the promising scion of a wealthy family.

But the long expected cortege has come, and as the clock strikes eight, à la Turk (2, P. M.), the cynosure of all eyes enters, the youthful Seraphina N——, and attended by her companions, her god-father among them, she takes a seat prepared for her on the raised end of a divan. When she entered, every one, and I among the number, arose and remained standing, till she had seated herself. Before doing this, however she kissed her god-father's and god-mother's hands. I could not get a good glimpse of the bride, for she wore the envious gold veil before mentioned, and my curiosity remained but partly satisfied. I could see that her eyes were fine, but as a bride is not allowed to converse except when necessary, during the ceremony, I was unable to judge whether her voice was silvery or otherwise.

After waiting a short time, the priest, or rather the priests, for there were two of them, whose fees were paid by the god-father, entered the room and commenced the ceremony. A temporary altar had been erected, and before it was placed a divan for the accommodation of the couple. Previous to taking her seat there, the young bride had a white silk covering thrown over her whole person, resting on her shoulders. The pair were then placed in such a position on the divan that their foreheads almost touched each other. At this moment the priests took their places and recited several prayers, and one of them delivered a short lecture to the interested parties, which, I afterwards learnt, treated of their rights and duties to each other in the state on which they were entering.

Then each was asked whether he or she took the other "for good or for evil, in prosperity and adversity, whether ugly or handsome, for time and eternity." They of course answering in the affirmative, the priest takes the hand of the girl and puts it in the right hand of the young man, and repeats over them the following consecrated words: "I, taking the hand of Eve, and giving it to the right hand of Adam, repeat what God hath said: 'I gave to man a companion, part and parcel of his own rib, and what I have joined let not man put asunder.'" The happy pair being now man and wife, the priests repeated two or three more prayers, asking for the blessings of heaven on the ceremony just performed, and thus concluded the important rite.

The priests then departed, and the wife returns to her seat, while music is brought in, and with that and dancing our time is spent for another hour, when a large bell gave the signal for dinner. But not having time to indulge in this best part of the ceremony, I made my excuses to the husband, congratulated him on his happiness, and took my leave of the company in toto. And I have no doubt that the guests had a jolly good time of it, for they did not "go home till morning," and when I called the next day, the last few had just taken their departure.

The parties who are thus married remain quietly at home for three or four weeks, after which the husband and wife make a ceremonial visit to the house of his father-in-law, for the purpose of thanking him for the gift of his daughter. Then a series of visits is made among each other's friends, until, finally, every thing settles down in order again, and the lately married pair go on their way through life, subject to the same rules and regulations as other mortals.

A woman condemned to death, in the reign of Richard III., lived forty days without food or drink. A young lady, 16 years of age, is mentioned in the Edinburg Medical Essays, who was thrown into such violent tetanus, or rigidity of the muscles, by the death of her father, that she was unable to swallow for fifty-four days. A still more extraordinary account is related of a man who, on recovering from a fever, had such a dislike to food of all kinds, that for eighteen years he never tasted any thing but water.

INSTINCT OF A HORSE.—Mr. A. had, for a considerable time, a span of sprightly little horses that he had never separated. In the field and the harness, they have always been together. This had caused a strong attachment to grow up between them. A few days ago, he went out with them to Lake Minetoska, on a fishing excursion. Taking them out of the carriage, he led them to the lake and tied them several rods apart, on a strip of grass that grow upon the shore, and left them to feed. Returning to the shantee he threw himself upon the floor, to await the return of the party who had repaired to the lake to fish.

Not much time had elapsed before the sound of approaching horse's feet attracted his attention, and a moment after, one of his horses appeared at the door. The animal put his head in, and giving one neigh, returned at a slow gallop, yet under excitement, to the spot where, but a few minutes before, he and his companion had apparently been safely tastened. Surprised to find his horse loose, and struck with his singular conduct, Mr. A. immediately followed, and found the other lying in the water, entangled in the rope, and struggling to keep his head from being submerged.

While Mr. A. proceeded to disengage his unfortunate horse, his noble benefactor stood by, manifesting the utmost solicitude and sympathy, and when his mate was extricated from this situation, and again upon his feet, on terra firma, the generous creature exhibited the most unquestionable signs of satisfaction and joy.

That this intelligent animal should have noticed the unfortunate situation of his mate that he should know where to apply for rescue, and in his efforts should sunder a three-fourth inch rope, and finally, that he should exhibit so high an appreciation of the event, are curious circumstances to us, and commend themselves to the thoughtful consideration of those who would limit the power of reasoning to the "genus homo." [St. Anthony's Ex.

A RICE FLUM PUDDING.—Take three gills of whole rice, wash it and boil it in a pint of milk; when it is soft mix in a quarter of a pound of butter and set it aside to cool, and when it is cold stir in another pint of milk. Prepare a pound and a half of raisins or currants—if currants, wash and dry them, if raisins, seed them and cut them in halves. Dredge them well with flour, to prevent their sinking, and prepare also a powdered nutmeg, a tablespoonful of mixed mace and cinnamon powdered, a wine glass of rose water and a wine glass of brandy or white wine. Beat six eggs very light and stir them into the mixture alternately with a quarter of a pound of sugar; then add by degrees the spice and the liquor, and lastly, stir in, few at a time, the raisins or currants. Put the pudding into a buttered dish and bake it an hour and a half. Send it to table cool.

You may make this pudding of ground rice, using but half a pint instead of three gills.

MINCE PIES.—Boil three pounds of lean beef till tender, and when cold chop it fine. Chop three pounds of clear beef suet, and mix the meat, sprinkling in a tablespoonful of salt. Pare, core and chop fine six pounds of good apples; stone four pounds of raisins and chop them; wash and dry two pounds of currants, and mix them all with the meat. Season with a spoonful of powdered cinnamon, a powdered nutmeg, a little mace and a few cloves, pounded, and one pound of brown sugar; add a quart of Madeira wine and a half a pound of citron cut into small bits. This mixture, put down in a jar closely covered, will keep several weeks. It makes a rich pie for Thanksgiving and Christmas.

PECULIARITIES OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

Racine composed his verses while walking about, reciting them in a loud voice all day, when thus working at his play of Mithridates, in the Tuileries garden, a crowd of workmen gathered around him, attracted by his gestures; they took him to be a madman, about to throw himself into the basin. On his return home from such walks, he would write down scene by scene, at first in prose, and when he had thus written it out, he would exclaim, "My tragedy is done!" considering the dressing of the acts up in verse as a very small affair.

Magliabecchia, the learned librarian to the Duke of Tuscany, on the contrary, never stirred abroad, but lived amidst books, and upon books. They were his bed, board and washing. He passed eight and forty years in their midst, only twice in the course of his life venturing beyond the walls of Florence; once to go two leagues off, and the other time three and a half leagues, by order of the Grand Duke. He was an extremely frugal man, living upon eggs, bread and water, in great moderation.

Luther, when studying, always had his dog lying at his feet; a dog he had brought from Wutburg, and of which he was very fond. An ivory crucifix stood on the table before him, and the walls of his study were stuck round with caricatures of the Pope. He worked at his desk for days together, without going out; but when fatigued, and the ideas began to stagnate in his brain, he would take his flute or guitar with him to the porch, and there execute some musical fantasy (for he was a skillful musician), when the ideas would flow upon him as fresh as flowers after summer's rain. Music was his invariable solace at such times. Indeed Luther did not hesitate to say that, after theology, music was the first of the arts. "Music," said he, "is the art of the prophets; it is the only art which, like theology, can calm the agitation of the soul, and put the devil to flight." Next to music, if not before it, Luther loved children and flowers. The great gnarled man had a heart as tender as a woman's.

Calvin studied in his bed. Every morning at five or six o'clock, he had books, manuscripts and papers carried to him there, and he worked on for hours together. If he had occasion to go out, on his return he undressed and went to bed again, to continue his studies. In his later years he dictated his writings to secretaries. He rarely corrected anything. The sentence issued complete from his mouth. If he felt his facility of composition leaving him, he forthwith quitted his bed, gave up writing and composing, and went about his out-door duties for days, weeks and months together. But as soon as he felt the inspiration fall upon him again, he went back to his bed, and his secretary set to work forthwith.

Rousseau wrote his works early in the morning; Le Sage at mid day; Byron at midnight. Hardoin rose at four in the morning, and wrote till late at night.

Aristotle was a tremendous workor; he took little sleep, and was constantly retrenching it. He had a contrivance by which he awoke early, and to awake was with him to commence work. Demosthenes passed three months in a cavern by the seaside, in boring to overcome the defects of his voice. There he read, studied and declaimed.

Rabelias composed his life of Gargantua at Bellay, in the company of Roman Cardinals, and under the eyes of the Bishop of Paris. La Fontaine wrote his fables chiefly under the shade of a tree, and sometimes by the side of Racine and Bornau. Pascal wrote most of his Thoughts on little scraps of paper, at his by moments. Feaelon wrote his Telemachus in the palace of Versailles, at the court of the Grand Monarque, when discharging the duties of tutor to the Dauphin. That a book so thoroughly democratic should have issued from such a source, and be written by a priest, may seem surprising. De Quincy first promulgated his notion of freedom of person and trade, and throwing all taxes on the land—the germ, perhaps, of the French Revolution—in the boudoir of Madame de Pompadour!

Bacon knelt down, before composing his great work, and prayed for light from heaven. Pope never could compose well without first declaiming for some time at the top of his voice, and thus rousing his nervous system to its fullest activity.

The life of Liebnitz was one of reading, writing and meditation. That was the secret of his prodigious knowledge. After an attack of gout, he confined himself to a diet of bread and milk. Often he slept in a chair, and rarely went to bed till after midnight. Sometimes he was months without quitting his seat; where he slept by night and wrote by day. He had an ulcer in his right leg, which prevented his walking about, even had he wished to do so. [Eliza Cook's Journal.

WHAT IS A SPIKE?—Most people are impressed with the belief that a spiked gun is for some time rendered useless, but it is not every one who knows what a spike is. A correspondent in the Morning Herald makes this clear. He says: "They are about four inches long, and of the dimensions of a tobacco pipe, the head flat; a barb at the point acts as a spring, which is naturally pressed to the shaft upon being forced into the touch-hole. Upon reaching the chamber of the gun it resumes its position, and it is impossible to withdraw it. It can only be got out by drilling—no easy task, as they are made of the hardest steel, and being also loose in the touch-hole, there is much difficulty in making a drill bite as effectually as it should do. Its application is the work of a moment, a single tap on the flat head with the palm of the hand sufficing. This can be easily done, even if it is ever so dark."]

THANKSGIVING SERMONS.

OUR THANKSGIVING DAY IN NEW CHURCHES.

The pulpit is too much turned into a political platform on such occasions as this. I am not disposed to throw any blame on our talented ministry—but I cannot help feeling the force of the old proverb, "Ne sutor ultra crepidam." Let the cobbler stick to his stool. The Christian minister is called to preach the gospel, not to preach politics. The gospel of Christ is the only true message that should leave the pulpit. It is adapted to all classes, be they native born, or foreign. Besides, the gospel ministry should not join in the general tone of "political denunciation." Christ's kingdom is not of this world. Paul the Apostle, was a foreigner in Jerusalem, in Damascus, in Ephesus, in Philippi, in Athens, in Rome, in Corinth, in Spain, in Britain; yet Paul founded churches in all these places. Columba was a foreigner in Scotland, yet he shed his gospel light from the sea-girt rock of Iona upon the bleak hills of stern Caledonia. Mackenzie, and the Tennents, and President Finley were all Irishmen, and, of course, foreigners; yet the one founded our Presbyterian Zion, and the others were no mean luminaries in reflecting the rays of gospel light upon our country. It is not my apprehension that any evil can come to our churches from foreign lands. As long as the Bible lies unclasped and untrammeled on our pulpits, there need be no fear about foreign influence. Presbyterians from Scotland and Ireland are too well acquainted with their Bibles and the Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechisms, to bring any innovations into our churches. That influence must be guarded against from another quarter.

REV. JOEL PARKER, D. D.

His text was chosen out of Daniel ii. 44, 45; and Luke xiii. 20, 21. Dr. Parker manfully battled against mingling up the pulpit with politics. He said the Church had acquired an unhallowed connection with the state in the establishment of the Papacy. In the Reformation it was not delivered from this alliance. The idea of advancing religion through the magistracy clung to our Puritan ancestors. It clings to us. There was something bold and captivating—something that almost bordered upon chivalry, in assailing political movements that seemed palpably wrong, and in exposing the wickedness of great men. Here we had hundreds of sermons, so called, on the "Higher Law," the "Mexican War," the "the Nebraska Bill," the "Prohibitory Law," &c. In nearly every pulpit in this city, the Sabbath preceding the election, circulars were placed, requesting the pastor to preach on Temperance. This was all wrong. The Church has solemn duties; the mission of the ministers was most sacred—it was his to work for the salvation of souls—it was through him

"The violated law
Speaks out its thunders, and in tones as sweet
As angels use, the gospel whispers peace."

REV. DR. BETHUNE.

This gentleman preached, as usual, a powerful discourse. Its pervading theme was thankfulness, interwoven with politics. The following extract is so strikingly truthful, that it may be interesting to my readers:

"First, then, let us consider that excellent as our institutions are, and great our advantages, they do not secure us from adversity, unless we be faithful to ourselves. Forgetting the difficulty with which they were obtained and brought to their eminent excellence—may, forgetting the imperfections which as was said before, appertain to every thing human; while some unmanfully cherish visionary fears, others seem to think that nothing can break the spirit, or limit the enterprise they inspire. We have laughed at danger and defied misfortune, and now read a sad lesson in the reverses which we suffer. No venture has been so rash, no scheme so disproportioned to the means for its execution, no doctrine so repugnant to all the laws of trade and currency, but has been coveted and glorified under the name of Yankee enterprise. Nay, we have turned fatalists, and though all the warnings of the past stare us in the face, we claim that manifest destiny will carry us through. Aye, spurning the experience of fifty centuries, reviling established truths as old women's fables, laughing the gray head to scorn, and heedless of beacon or landmark, the popular cry is Progress! Progress! against conservatism, Progress! against prudence, Progress! against all that men's toil, and study, and suffering, and blood have wrung out of time. Progress! for which science is too slow, laws too slow, Christianity too slow. Progress! though the rail be laid of splintering iron and green wood. Progress! though the driver knows not a valve of his machine. Progress! though the steam strain the boiler beyond its strength. Progress! though the landslide be on the track, or the quicksand beneath it. Progress! though an equal force be hastening to meet us. Progress! though uncounted lives, and treasures yet more precious, be in the train. Progress! increasing, accelerating, wilder, until with earthquake crash, amidst shrieks, groans and agony, it is stopped in shame and horror, and death. No system, no position is proof against such senseless impetuosity. The grand excellence of our political Constitution is, that it leaves us free to act for ourselves; there is no power on earth or in heaven to help us."

MESMERISM AND ITS EVILS.

This delusion has not wholly disappeared. Though it is not so much heard of, it is still practised by a few ignorant, puerile minds, to the frequent hazard of health and life. No right minded man should countenance such an evil. Last week two professors of the Mesmeric art tried their influence upon a young girl, whom they threw into a sleep but whom they were unable to awake. The police were notified, and Captain Carpenter of the Fifth Ward police, makes the following statement respecting the affair:

George Farland, of No. 125 Forty-first st and Dr. Hoffman, of No. 70 Suffolk street, professors of the science of Mesmerism, called at the house of Mrs. Miller, No. 130 Church st to make some experiment in their line of business. A girl named Amanda, who boarded with Mrs. M., and had been put to sleep by this operation of Farland's and as easily awakened, on this occasion, however, Farland had rather to sleep, and then requested his friend, Dr. Hoffman, to add his mesmeric influence, which he did, by passing his left hand up and down her face and blowing his breath in her ears. This occurred about 4 o'clock, P. M. After conversing they found her in a slumber, and in a short time they proceeded to awaken her by their usual method, but lo, and behold! their power had left them. They continued their efforts for two hours or more, but in vain. Becoming alarmed, Farland hastened to procure the assistance of Dr. Hollock, a more professional doctor in the art. Meanwhile Mrs. Miller sent for Dr Enger, a regular physician. Information was received at the station-house of the serious affair, and forthwith went to the house, accompanied by Lieut. Martin, and also sent for Alderman Hoffmire to witness the grand finale and to arrest the professors, in case the girl failed to awake. Dr. Hollock attended the girl for some three hours, but with little success, and the sufferer had frequent convulsions. Finally, Dr. Enger administered some medicine to the poor girl, and in a short time she was convulsions, much to the joy of Farland and Dr. Hoffman, whom I had sent to the police station, by the advice of the Alderman. Subsequently the individuals were released from custody by Alderman Hoffmire, on the assurance of Dr. Enger that she was sufficiently recovered to be out of danger. The girl continued her mesmeric slumber from 4 o'clock, P. M., till midnight.

WILBER FISK.—This distinguished scholar and divine knew what it was to pursue knowledge under difficulties. A writer in the Ladies Repository, in speaking of his early struggles, says: "When he was a young man, without property, or parents, or other friends to help him, he walked four miles one stormy night, to borrow a Latin grammar, and the next, after having closed a school he was teaching, walked five miles to obtain from a young lady who, more fortunate than he, had been to the academy, some instructions how to study Latin. That homeless youth, who took his first lessons in Latin at the age of twenty, from a girl much younger than himself, occupied for twenty years or more, an important position in the literary institutions of the country, having educated thousands.

Paris Correspondence of the National Intelligencer.

PARIS Nov 20, 1854

Strange as it may seem, the exact spot where reposed the remains of Jacques Benigne Bossuet, the great and good Catholic divine and pulpit orator, one of the brightest illustrations of the French church, was not known. A popular writer, M. Poujoulet, in a work recently published, entitled "Letters on Bossuet," mentioned the fact, and suggested that search, in order to identify his tomb, should be instituted by the proper authorities. The actual Bishop of Meaux determined to act upon the hint, and to this end ordered excavations to be made in the vaults of the Cathedral of Meaux.

Success has promptly crowned these efforts. The excavations commenced about noon on the 8th inst., under the direction of the Bishop, who was guided by the instructions contained in the will of Bossuet, and by imperfect indications contained in some documents relating to the tombs of the cathedral belonging to its archives; discovered the tomb of Bossuet after two hours' labor. The workmen first struck, at a depth of about two feet beneath the pavement, a small stone vault. It was opened and a leaden coffin was disclosed. It was that of M. de Ligny, the immediate predecessor of Bossuet, and was situated just below the episcopal throne. Bossuet, it is known, had requested to be buried at the foot of his predecessors.

The excavation was continued in that direction and soon brought to light a small vault similar to the last, about six feet in length, three feet broad, and three feet deep. It was formed of mason's work, its walls being five or six inches thick and covered by a vaulted arch. The vault contained a leaden coffin, about one and three-quarter yards long. Upon the cover of the coffin, above the breast, was fixed a copper plate, on which was engraved in capital letters, beneath the well-known arms of the illustrious prelate, (three wheels,) the following inscription:

Hic quiescit resurrectionem expectans
Jacobus Benignus Bossuet, episcopus Meldensis comes consiliarius, eccusiastes Delphini
præceptor primus, eccusiastes Paris
Perpendiculi eloquentiarius, Universitatis
Parisiensis privilegiorum apostolicorum conservator, et collegii Navarræ superior, obiit anno Domini MDCCIV die XII aprilis, annos natus LXXVI
menses VI et dies XVI.
Requiescat in pace!

The coffin lay horizontally upon a thick oaken plank, which itself was placed across three bars of iron, raising it slightly from the ground.

By orders of the Bishop of Meaux the leaden coffin containing the mortal remains of Bossuet was opened on the 14th instant. The head was found covered with four folds of linen, which were cut away with a pair of scissors, and the features were then seen. They were much less changed than might have been expected, considering that the body had been buried a century and a half. An artist who was present took a sketch of the face as it appeared when the coffin was opened. When it was known that the features of the deceased could be seen, a great number of persons hastened to the Cathedral.

Several ecclesiastics also arrived from Paris. In the night of the 14th a glass was fixed over the face so as to preserve it from the contact of the external air, and the next day, at ten in the morning, a funeral service was performed, at which the Bishop officiated. Pontifical ornaments covered the coffin; a crosier was placed close to it; and Bossuet once more appeared as Bishop in his own Cathedral. All the functionaries of the town were present on the occasion, as well as a large number of other persons. After the mass had finished, the crowd walked round in order to see the features of the deceased. The coffin was replaced in the evening in the vault.

ANECDOTE OF MR. TRAFTON.—The Manchester Democrat gives the following:

Among the members of Congress elect in Massachusetts is Rev. Mr. Trafton, whom many in this city will remember as a lecturer in several of our churches two years ago. He is six feet two inches in his stockings. Mr. Trafton is a prompt, self-reliant speaker, and an incident he told us of him, while in London several years ago, which indicated that he will not be afraid even of Senator Douglas. Wishing to enter the House of Lords—a favor never granted to ordinary travelers—he walked up to the porter—

"Is Lord Brougham in his seat?"

"He is."

"Ask him to come to the door—a gentleman wishes to see him."

In a few moments the porter returned with his lordship.

"I am Rev. Mr. Trafton, of Massachusetts, and ask of your lordship the favor of looking upon the House of Lords in session."

It is hardly necessary to add that he was very cordially ushered in.

Capt. Smith, who has recently been convicted at New York of having been engaged in the slave trade states, that New York is the great headquarters from which the trade is carried on. He says:

Neither in Cuba nor in the Brasils is it carried on so extensively. Ships that convey slaves to the West Indies and South America are fitted out from the United States. Now and then one sails from Philadelphia, more from Baltimore, but most from New York. This is our headquarters.

GEORGE THE THIRD AND THE DYING GIPSY.

George III being out one day hunting, the chase lay through the skirts of the forest. The stag had been hard run, and, to escape the dogs, had crossed the river in a deep part. The dogs could not be brought to follow; and it became necessary in order to come up with it to make a circuitous route along the banks of the river, through some thick and troublesome underwood. The roughness of the ground, the long grass and frequent thickets, obliged the sportsmen to separate from each other, each one endeavoring to make the best and speediest route he could. Before they had reached the end of the forest, the King's horse manifested signs of fatigue and uneasiness; so much so, that his majesty resolved upon yielding the pleasures of the chase to those of compassion for his horse. With this view, he turned down the first avenue of the forest, and determined on riding quietly to the oaks, there to wait for some of his attendants. The King had proceeded only a few yards, when, instead of thegery of the hounds, he fancied he heard the cry of distress. As he rode forward, he heard it more distinctly—

"Oh! my mother! my mother! God pity and bless my poor mother!"

The curiosity and kindness of the sovereign led him hastenly to the spot. It was a little green plot on one side of the forest, where was spread on the grass, under a branching oak, a little pallet, half covered with a kind of tent; and a basket or two with some packs lay on the ground at a few paces distant from the tent. Near to the root of the tree, he observed a little, swarthy girl, about eight years of age, on her knees praying, while her little black eyes ran down with tears. Distress of any kind was always relieved by his majesty, for he had a heart which melted at human woe.

"What, my child, is the cause of your weeping?" he asked. "For what do you pray?"

The little creature at first startled, then rose from her knees, and, pointing to the tent, said—

"Oh! sir, my dying mother!"

"What!" said his majesty, dismounting and fastening his horse up to the branches of the oak, "what, my child? tell me all about it."

The little creature now led the king to the tent, where lay, partly covered, a middle aged female gipsy, in the last stages of a decline, and in the last moments of life. She turned her dying eyes expressively to the royal visitor, then looked up to heaven, but not a word did she utter; "the silver cord was loosed, and the wheel broken at the cistern." The little girl then wept aloud, and stooping down, wiped the dying sweat from her mother's face. The king, much affected, asked the child her name, and of her family, and how long her mother had been ill. Just at that moment, another gipsy girl, much older, came out of breath to the spot. She had been to the town of W——, and brought some medicine for her dying mother. Observing a stranger, she courtesied modestly, and hastening to her mother, kissed her pallid lips, and burst into tears.

"What, my dear child," said his majesty, "can be done for you?"

"Oh, sir," she replied, "my dying mother wanted a religious person to teach her, and to pray with her before she died. I ran all the way, before it was light, this morning, to W——, and asked for a minister; but no one could I get to come with me to pray with my dear mother."

The dying woman seemed sensible of what her daughter was saying, and her countenance was much agitated. The air was again rent with the cries of the distressed daughters. The king, full of kindness, instantly endeavored to comfort them. He said—

"I am a minister, and God has sent me to instruct and comfort your mother."

He then sat down on a puck by the side of the pallet, and, taking the hand of the dying gipsy, discoursed on the demerit of sin and the nature of redemption. He then pointed her to Christ, the all-sufficient Savior. While doing this, the poor creature seemed to gather consolation and hope; her eyes sparkled with brightness, and her countenance became animated. She looked up—she smiled; but it was the last smile; it was the glimmering of expiring nature. As the expression of peace, however, remained strong in her countenance, it was not till some time had elapsed that they perceived the struggling spirit had left mortality.

It was at this moment that some of his majesty's attendants, who had missed him at the chase, and had been riding through the forest in search of him, rode up, and found him comforting the afflicted gipsies. It was an affecting sight, and worthy of everlasting record in the annals of kings.

He now rose up, put some gold into the hands of the afflicted girls, promised them his protection, and bade them look to Heaven. He then wiped the tears from his eyes, and mounted his horse. His attendants, greatly affected, stood in silent admiration. Lord L—— was going to speak, but his majesty, turning to the gipsies, and pointing to the breathless corpse, and to the weeping girls, said with strong emotion—

"Who, my lord, who, thinkest thou, was neighbor unto these?"

Happy Effects of Humanity.

The following facts of a young chief of the Pawnee nation, and son of Old Knife, one of the Indians who visited the city of Washington, a few years ago, from the foot of the Rocky Mountains, are highly creditable to his generosity and his benevolence. This young warrior, when those events occurred, was about twenty-five years old. At this age of twenty-one his heroic deeds had acquired for him, among his people, the rank of "Bravest of the Brave."

The savage practices of torturing and burning to death their prisoners existed in this nation. An unfortunate female, taken in war with the Paducah nation, was destined to this horrible death. The fatal hour had arrived; the trembling victim, far from home and her friends, was fastened to the stake; the whole tribe was assembled on the surrounding plain, to witness the awful scene. Just as the wood was about to be kindled, and the spectators were on the tiptoe of expectation, this young warrior, who sat composedly among the others, having before prepared two fleet horses, with the necessary provisions, sprang from his seat, rushed through the crowd, loosed the victim, seized her in his arms, placed her on one of the horses, mounted the other himself, and made the quickest speed toward the nation and friends of the captive.

The multitude, dumb and nerveless with amazement at the daring deed, made no more effort to rescue their victim from her deliverer. They viewed it as the act of their deity, submitted to it without a murmur, and quietly retired to their village. The released was accompanied through the wilderness towards her home till she was out of danger. He then gave her the horse on which she rode, with the necessary provisions for the remainder of the journey, and parted from her. On his return to the village, such was the respect entertained for him that no inquiry was made into his conduct, no censure was passed on it, and, since the transaction, no human sacrifice has been offered in this or any of the Pawnee tribes. Of what influence is one bold act in a good cause!

On the publication of this anecdote at Washington, the young ladies of a female seminary in that city presented the brave and humane Indian with a handsome silver medal, on which was engraved an appropriate inscription, accompanied by an address of which the following is the close: "Brother, accept this token of our esteem, and when you have again the power to save a poor woman from death and torture, think of this and of us, and fly to her rescue!"

The Reciprocity bill passed the Nova Scotia Legislature on the 11th inst., by a vote of 32 to 10.

SOUTHWESTERN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The Fifth Anniversary of this Society was celebrated at Odd Fellows' Hall, Sunday evening last, J. A. Maybin, Esq., President, in the chair. The meeting was opened by reading of the Scriptures by the Rev. Mr. Hays. The spacious Hall was filled to overflowing by an intelligent audience, who appeared to be deeply interested in all the exercises.

The Annual Report was read by the Corresponding Secretary, Dr. T. S. Copes; eloquent and effective addresses were delivered by Rev. Dr. Van Arsdale and Rev. J. B. Walker. The statistics presented by this report were of the most interesting character, showing that the Society have labored to meet the wants of the people who came within the sphere of its operations.

The collection was a small one, for such an audience; 470 dollars.

THE FIRST SABBATH SCHOOL IN NEW ENGLAND.—We were much interested, lately, in learning from a friend the circumstances under which the first Sabbath School in New England was established. It was some forty years ago. These schools had just begun to attract considerable attention in England, and a very few were just starting in New York city. Mrs. Sharp, wife of the late Rev. Dr. Sharp, when on a visit to New York, about this time, had occasion to notice the schools there in operation, and was so much pleased with the idea, that immediately on her return, she, in connection with her husband, started a project for such a school in the Charles street Church in Boston.

One day, as Brother Rose, now of Cleaveland, then a member of Dr. Sharp's Church, relates, a pleasant little party, composed of Dr. Sharp and his wife, with a few friends, members of their church and congregation, were on an excursion to one of the islands in the vicinity of Boston. One of their number, now the Rev. Henry Stanwood, who lives near Rochester, N. Y., approached Mr. Rouse, and naming to him the Sunday School project which the pastor's wife had originated, solicited a small subscription in aid of it. This was the first time that Mr. R. had heard of a Sunday School. The result was, the opening of such a school in the Charles Street Church. Here was the beginning of Sabbath schools in New England. Friend, how small a seed has since grown how great a tree!

SPIRIT OF MISSIONS.

The lowest ideal of what this spirit is must place it above that zeal and consecration which now obtain in the Church. Only a few comparatively are possessed of its highest fervor. The embodiments of this ideal, at the present time, are limited to so many as admit of an easy and individual designation: some leading and eminent ones; some obscure ones, in whose hearts this spirit is and in whose lives it is illustrated. They are here and there, sporadic and isolated. This spirit does not embue the whole. It is intensified in individuals, but the mass is not all and equably aglow.

A few localities come nearer its possession than others: some may possibly claim it in its full power; but the Church in its length and breadth is far below it. What of this spirit we have runs too much in veins; it wants diffusion, it needs universalizing.

These instances of eminent devotion aside, the Church, as a body, is actually without the spirit of missions. The results attained hitherto, and for which the Church in general is credited, are the fruits of zeal and liberality in the few. So far as these results are particular they do not overrun the standard of consecration. If regarded as the index of general interest in the cause of missions, they represent a spirit which exists in the last degree of feebleness; a spirit that is unworthy of the missionary name.

To bring this truth before us, we have only to consider what we are actually doing. The amount of money given for foreign and domestic missions in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, during the year ending May, 1854, was one hundred and sixty-eight thousand and thirty-one dollars and thirty-three cents; less fourteen thousand, six hundred and thirty-four dollars and sixty-seven cents, contributed by the United States government for the Indian missions. That this statement may show what we are actually giving as a Church, a very considerable amount, contributed by those who are not communicants, must be deducted. What proportion of the whole this amount is, cannot well be determined. We suppose that it is somewhere between a fourth and a tenth. The grand total, thus reduced, is contributed by a Church whose membership is nearly half a million, and whose moneyed resources are proportionately large. We need not divide this amount by the number of our membership in order to show its insignificance. The conclusion is reached at once, that the spirit of missions does not possess the Church.

The revelation becomes more patent when we consider the means used, and the efforts made to obtain this scanty pittance. So far from its being a spontaneous offering, pressed upon the acceptance of the missionary treasury, it has, rather, been extorted by any length of importunity, by pulpit zeal, by platform appeals, by anniversary occasions and declamations, by life membership proposals, and other godly seductions. These means and efforts prove that the amount given by the Church is much more than a fair representative of its liberality. It is not given readily and cheerfully. It is wrung out—almost forced from the hands to which it is credited.

There can be little doubt that the money gauge is the true one, by which to ascertain the breadth and depth of the missionary spirit. Its application shows that this spirit is almost wholly wanting: a spirit that reaches the whole, from centre to circumference, and leavens to the last extremity of social and individual responsibility. Whilst money may be the gauge of admeasuring the zeal of the Church, it is not of the highest end of missionary appeal. The spirit of missions, subjectively in the heart of the Church, is the true and high issue. This lofty type of evangelical life is our first want. It lies between the effort and the result; and the greatest result, in dollars and cents, can be reached only through it. Under the pressure of immediate demand our anniversary and stated collections are too often urged by motives and secured by means which, to say the least, are of equivocal propriety. Passion and prejudice, local interest and carnal sympathies are enlisted. Almost any thing to reach the pocket. The amount realised on these occasions depends upon the humor and declamation of those who advocate the cause. Comic, tragic and farcical ad captandums are sent out to explore the varied whims of an audience, and to untie the purse strings of a miscellaneous assembly. These abuses, if they be such, grow out of the painful conviction that the people are dead to better appeals. To say nothing of the morality of this course, its policy is detrimental. The spirit of missions must be cultivated. The means we shall hereafter point out.

MRS. ALEXANDER HAMILTON, who died at Washington, recently, at a very advanced age, was a daughter of General Philip Schuyler, and was born in Schuylerville, Saratoga County, N. Y. In 1780 she was married to General (then Colonel) Hamilton, who at that time was attached to the military family of Washington. In July, 1804, General Hamilton fell in a duel with Colonel Aaron Burr. Mrs. Hamilton has, therefore, survived the loss of her distinguished husband upwards of half a century. The body lay in state for two hours prior to the obsequies, where the friends and acquaintances of the deceased took a farewell look. The coffin was made of plain mahogany, and on the silver plate was inscribed the following words:

ELIZABETH HAMILTON,
BORN
9th August, 1757,
DIED

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

REV. DR. THWEATT.—We learn from the Caddo Gazette, of the 9th inst., that Bro. Thweatt has accepted the presidency of the Mansfield Female College, located at Mansfield, De Soto Parish, La. This institution is to be placed entirely under the control of the Louisiana Conference. This point we regard as eligible, and there is no one in our knowledge, more eminently qualified for the charge of such an institution than Bro. Thweatt. We bespeak for it the patronage of North Louisiana—an abundant and encouraging patronage.

We extract the following from a notice published by the Committee of Arrangements:

The services of Dr. H. C. Thweatt (well known throughout the State as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South) have been engaged as President of the Institution. The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thweatt is a member; a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield have subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars; a very spacious building, adapted to all the wants of the Institution, will very soon be put in process of erection. In the mean time, the Female Academy, already completed, will be used for the purposes of the School. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages of what constitutes a polished education, may rest assured that no school can be found for the Southwest better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweatt to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of learning as may be found necessary. To those living at a distance we would say, that no village in any section of Western Louisiana offers more advantages, as far as health, society, etc., are concerned.

The rates of tuition will be the same as those charged in the higher schools of the country—the particulars of which will be published hereafter. The first session of the School to commence on the 8th day of January, 1855.

Parents will please send on their daughters, as there are always advantages to be derived from an early commencement.

Board can be obtained for the present in respectable private families, at moderate terms.

We feel something of a sectional pride in calling attention to the advertisement of the Mansfield Femal College. The spirit of education is abroad in the land. Our people have awakened from the condition of torpor which has, for so long a time neutralized their action in behalf of Home Education, and are setting about a practical solution of the hitherto intricate problem which involved the expediency of establishing schools and colleges at home. The citizens of Mansfield have shown themselves equal to the emergency. They have displayed a generosity which invites attention. Show us a community alive to the benefits of education, and who hang not back from the adoption of the means and appliances for its acquisition, and we will show you a community of high-toned, upright citizens.

From the high reputation acquired by Dr. Thweatt, we doubt if a better selection could have been made. His qualificatione for the post cannot be questioned.

The healthy location and pleasant society of Mansfield render it a suitable place for the establishment of an institution of learning of a high order. We wish it abundant success.

METHODIST CHURCH, LAKE PROVIDENCE.—The Herald says: "This substantial edifice has recently undergone thorough renovation and repairs, and is at this time one of the finest churches in this section of country. The new spire is ninety feet in height, and is remarkably well constructed for strength and beauty. Mr. Harp, the pastor, deserves great credit for the accomplishment of a work in which the community are so deeply interested. May great spiritual happiness attend our Methodist friends in this place."

ARROGANCE OF ATHEISM.—The following extract from "Foster's Essay," exposes the intolerable arrogance and presumption of atheism, in pretending to an extraordinary degree of heroism in rejecting the general belief of the existence of a Deity:

"But it is heroism no longer, if the atheist knows that there is no God. The wonder then turns on the great process by which a man could grow to the immense intelligence that can know that there is no God. What age and what lights are requisite for this attainment! This intelligence involves the very attributes of divinity, while a God is denied. For unless this man is omnipresent—unless he is at this moment in every place in the universe—he cannot know, but there may be, in some place, manifestations of a Deity by which he would be overpowered. If he does not know, absolutely, every agent in the universe, the one that he does not know may be God. If he is not himself the chief agent in the universe, and does not know what is so, that which is so may be God. If he is not in absolute possession of all the propositions that constitute universal truth, the one which he wants may be, that there is a God. If he cannot, with certainty, assign the cause of all that exists, that cause may be God. If he does not know everything that has been done in the immeasurable ages that are past, some things may have been done by a God. Thus, unless he knows all things—that is, precludes another deity, by being one himself—he cannot know that the Being whose existence he rejects, does not exist. But he must know that he does not exist, else he deserves equal contempt and compassion for the temerity with which he firmly avows his rejection, and acts accordingly."

Mr. De Bow, the late Superintendent of Census, states that there are in the United States, 38,184 buildings, used for religious worship of all denominations, having accommodations for 14,000,000 persons, and a total value, including other property, of $87,466,331. There are about 30,000 clergymen. The Methodists have more than half of all the churches. There are about five churches to every 3,000 of the total population. The churches of Charleston accommodate a larger portion of the population than do those of Boston.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.

At the Monthly meeting at the Tract House, the Rev. Mr. Wood, secretary of the American Board, communicated recent intelligence from the missions. The following are some of the items:

INDIA.—Letters have been received from Dr. Anderson and Mr. Thompson, the deputation to India, which were sent from the Red Sea, they were well, and expected to reach Bombay in the usual time from that point.

The death of Mrs. W. W. Scudder, Sept. 14, at Madras, is announced. The mission is greatly afflicted by this bereavement.

Several Mahomedans have recently been baptized by Scotch and other missionaries in India.

CHINA.—Mr. Baring (August 4 and 22) reports business altogether stopped at Canton. The city was invested by the rebels, and from the appearance of things, would soon fall into their hands. They have no head and are mere banditti. They have no connection, as yet, with Tai-ping-wan. Great distress prevailed, and fearful apprehension as to the future.

A letter from Capt. Fishbourne, of the Royal Navy, to the Dublin Express, pronounces the recently published proclamation of Taou-suc-Tsing (the Eastern Prince) against foreigners, a forgery. It may, however, be genuine, and proof of new influences predominant among the insurgents.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—Mr. Coan (Sept. 20) gives an interesting account of a tour made by him along the Eastern coast of Hawaii. His church (Hilo) contains 5,500 members. Of these, he says 1,000 are generally absent; 1,000 are aged, decrepid, invalid and children; 1,000 are drones, &c., so that the available force is only about 1,000. These are scattered along a coast of one hundred miles, without harbors, without a market, or facilities for reaching a market. The people are, therefore, extremely poor; yet they have built and kept up twenty-five houses of worship, support their pastor, and raise $1,000 a year for foreign objects. Men whose whole property is not $500, give $200 and $300 to a meeting house. One who cannot raise $50 as his total fortune, gives $20 to the support of the pastor. Many who have not $5 in money in the year, give it all, or nearly all, in the monthly concert collections. "These are living facts." Such facts have meaning, for the offerings are purely free will ones.

AFRICA.—Mr. Walker (Sept. 11), reports all well in the Gaboon mission. Mr. Preston and Mr. W. had made a tour of interest fifty miles along the coast to the river Nazareth, and one hundred miles up that river. The river is large, but the population on the lower part is small. Mr. Bushnell is at the new station of Nengenenge, seventy-five miles from the sea. Several conversions are reported at Baraka. Appearances in the mission are hopeful.

THE NESTORIAN MISSION.—Mr. Crane died in Gawar in August. His end was peace. Additional laborers are earnestly called for in a field white to harvest.

THE ARMENIAN MISSION.—Two new stations, Sivas and Marash, are to be occupied. Interesting incidents are reported from various parts of the field.

CHOCTAWS.—Sept. 10th, nine were admitted to the Church at Red River, on examination. [N. Y. Spectator.

THE WINE AND SPIRIT TRADE.—A valuable article on this subject is given in Hunt's Merchants' Magazine for September. That portion relating to the manufacture of the spurious article, is absolutely appalling. It appears that a dealer in Massachusetts imported poisonous drugs, by which he made eight hundred hogsheads of brandy, selling at the rate of two dollars and a half, which just cost him thirty cents per gallon. He pocketed one hundred thousand dollars as the result of his villainous deception, and judging from the present rate of consumption of liquors of all kinds, he was probably only one of quite a considerable class.

And yet some men complain most bitterly, says the Weekly Telegraph, against a prohibitory law, and call it oppressive. The liquor business outstrips all others in deception. Men engaged in it deliberately adulterate with poisons, which are annually destroying, in our country, from 30,000 to 50,000 persons, and then complain of a law enacted to prohibit their murderous business! If a class of men should open shops for the sale of any other article which should kill an eighth part of the number now destroyed by alcoholic liquors, the dealers in spirit would be the first to imprison them. If it is not right to prohibit, by enactments, the sale of an article which builds three-quarters of our jails, prisons, houses of correction and pauper houses, supports almost entirely our courts of justice, and actually destroys, not indirectly, but directly, more than thirty thousand human lives—then all other laws for the prohibition of crime are wrong. The law now considers the rumseller a criminal. This is right. There are no greater offenders against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth, than rumsellers.

The Bishop of Oxford was rebuking one of his clergy for following the hounds. "My lord," replied the clergyman, "every man must have some relaxation, and I assure your lordship I never go to balls." "Ah," said the bishop, "I perceive you refer to my having been at the Duchess of Sutherland's party; but I give you my word I never was in the same room with the dancers." "My lord," responded the clergyman, "my mare and I are getting old, and we are never in the same field with the hounds."

POLITICAL PREACHING.—An anecdote is related of the celebrated Mather Pyles, a clergyman of Boston at the time of the Revolution. On being asked why he did not preach on politics sometimes, he replied that he had thrown up four breast works, behind which he had entrenched himself, neither of which could be forced, and continued, "In the first place, I do not understand politics; in the second place, you all do, every man and mother's son of you; in the third place, you have politics all the week—pray let one day in the seven be devoted to religion; in the fourth place, I am engaged in a work of infinitely greater importance; give to me any subject to preach, of more consequence than the truths I bring to you, and I will preach on it the next Sabbath."

We find that the number of travelling preachers, in the several Conferences, is 5,483, of which 4,814 are effective; the remainder being either superannuated or supernumerary. There were forty-two deaths among the travelling preachers during the year. The number of local preachers reported is 6,149.

The total amount of Missionary contributions reported from the Conferences is $229,049. The largest amount is from the Baltimore Conference, which raised $29,234. The largest contributions, in proportion to the membership, are from the New England Conference, which gave an average of, nearly, 58 cents a member; Cincinnati, 43 cents; and New York East, 42 cents.

OUR GERMAN DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

The Rev. J. Rothevillier gives, in the last number of the Western Christian Advocate, a summary of the statistics of our German Missions in the several Conferences, from which we take the following list of the numbers in society (including both members and probationers), and their contributions to the Missionary, Bible and Tract Societies, and the Sunday School Union of our Church:

CONFERENCE.	Nos. in Society.	Miss. Col.	Tract Society.	S. S. Union.	Bible Soc.
New York	1,291	$1,592	$ 73	$ 43	$ 44
Cincinnati	3,434	1,044	138	44	55

Total	12,145	6,617	433	185	296
Last year	10,777	5,158	342	129	247
Increase	1,368	$1,459	$91	$56	$49

It will be seen that there has been a gratifying increase, both in the number of members and in the contributions to the several religious societies. The aggregate of these contributions from the German societies in the New York Conference makes an average of 122 cents for each member. In the Cincinnati Conference, 65 cents; Southeast Indiana, 36 cents; Rock River, 67 cents; and Illinois, 48 cents.

On the first day of the session a motion was made by C. P. Turrentine, that we write the name of our Conference "Washita," which was lost. It was then resolved that "we use the original orthography, which is 'Ouachita.'"

Resolved, That our beloved brother Bishop Kavanaugh is entitled to and we hereby tender him our sincere thanks for the able, dignified and impartial manner in which he has presided over our Conference.

Resolved, That his presence among us will ever be greeted with pleasure, and that he will ever have our best wishes and prayers.

AN ECCENTRIC PREACHER.—Rev. John Hersey, an old and well-known Methodist Preacher in Virginia, is thus described by the Richmond Examiner:

Mr. Hersey makes a deep impression wherever he goes. He is proverbially straight forward, disinterested and guileless. He will wear no clothes except such as are indispensable to his comfort, and eat nothing except what is necessary to keep the wheels of life in motion. He would fast and pray until literally starved to death, rather than touch a morsel of any article of food cooked on Sunday. He would rather walk fifty miles than indulge in the luxury of a ride six hundred yards. He would sooner penetrate the mud knee-deep than set his foot on a Brussels carpet. He would sit on a porcupine saddle as comfortably as he would on a cushioned chair. In example as well as in precept, he loudly condemns the fashions, the follies and vanities of this sinful world. He strikes at them with ten-fold force when found in the Church, or in persons professing the name of Christ. He does not believe in the popular potion, that "a saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn."

At the conclusion of his discourses in our mountains, he can adopt as his own, with very slight variations, the language used by the eccentric Lorenzo Dow, in a sermon delivered at Georgetown, not long before his death: "My humble hearers," said Lorenzo, "I have preached in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, and in America. I have preached to George III., I have preached to George Canning, but believe me, I never preached a better sermon to them than I have this day preached to you. I would not flatter Neptune for his trident. I would not compromise the cause of my Heavenly King for all the smiles that earthly royalty could confer. I told them precisely what I tell you—unless you repent of your sins, your eternal damnation is sure." Mr. Hersey can apply to himself a portion, at least, of the historical part of this passage. He has preached in three quarters of the globe, and perhaps in the fourth also.

MISSIONS IN CHINA.—There are now one hundred evangelical missionaries in China. Five ports, with which there is connected a population of 10,000,000, are accessible to them, and where, but a few years ago, the attempt to proselyte was a capital offence. The Chinese language has been mastered (Dr. Morrison having completed a compendious dictionary of the language) and portions of the Bible are now sent from Nankin all through the empire, bearing the imperial imprimatur, as well as printed forms of prayer, which might be used with propriety and edification in any community. Numbers are already converted.

A CHILD'S THANKSGIVING.—A few days since, in a neighboring town, a little boy of two summers was seen standing in the middle of the road, and, bestowing a very low bow upon a great, sober faced cow; while he lisped forth, in sweetest infantile accents, "Thank ou, pretty moolly oow, for making pleasant milk for me."

It seemed that the little fellow had a song book at home, wherein a verse ran:

"Thank you pretty oow, who made Pleasant milk to soak my bread;"

and the couplet returning to his mind at the moment, he made it a point to stop and thank Mistress "Moolly" on the spot.

LARGE PRICES FOR COPYRIGHT.—It is stated in the Boston Traveler that Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, have paid the family of the late Judge Story $150,000 for copyrights of the various works written by the Judge. His copyrights have sometimes yielded his family $8000 per annum. Of Daniel Webster's writings the same house has sold 50,000 volumes, and of Bancroft's History of the United States 30,000 copies have already been sold. For one series of works (the Cambridge Mathematics) they paid $30,000 for the copyright.

WORSHIP.

BY ALICE CAREY.

I have no seasons and no times
To think of heaven—often at night
I go up on a stair of rhymes,
And find the way exceeding bright;
And for some accidental good
Wrought by me, saints have near me stood.

I do not think my heart is hard
Beyond the common heart of man,
And yet sometimes the best award
Smites on it like a stone, and then
A sunbeam that may brightly stray
In at my window, makes me pray.

The flower I've found in some chance nook,
Giving its wild heart to the bee,
Has taught me meekness, like a book
Of written preaching, and to see
The corn-fields ripe, an orchard red,
Has made me bow in shame my head.

When mostly in God's works I see
And feel his love, I make my prayers,
And without form or formulæ
My heart keeps Sabbath unawares,
And by the peace that comes, I know
My worship is accepted so.

EARLY MISSISSIPPI METHODISTS.

Rev. Dr. Drake—Washington, Thirty Years ago—Social Life—The Pestilence—The Christian Minister by the Death-bed—Rivals—Old-fashioned Methodism—A Word to the Reader.

In the proceedings of the late Conference, at Jackson, I noticed, very prominently, the name of Benjamin Drake. The indefatigable presiding Elder, the learned theologist, the distinguished acting head of Centenary College is better known to you, and your readers, than to me. It is twenty years since I last saw him, and longer, much longer, since I first heard him preach in the old Meeting House, in Washington. He was then a very young man, remarkable for his fine personal appearance and the grace and blandness of his manners. Washington was not then a straggling, crumbling, melancholy village, but a well-built, populous and fashionable town, with two superior institutions of learning, and a society distinguished for refined manners and elegant hospitality. It was surrounded by highly cultivated plantations; and it was not unusual to see collected there in the Meeting House, or at evening re-unions, more than a hundred young ladies, all intelligent, many of them radiant with beauty and wit. The young men were equally numerous, well-educated, gay, gallant, courteous, many of them prodigal, but few intemperate. It had been the seat of the territorial government (when Mississippi and Alabama constituted one territory), and many of the dignitaries of that epoch, with a few representatives of the more ancient Spanish régime, with their peculiar costumes and stately manners, still lingered there. Two ex-governors, two ex-senators, several ex-judges, and a number of Federal functionaries, residing in the village, infused enough of the spice of politics into the general circle to make conversation piquant, without being partisan. Others, gentlemen of fortune, repaired there to educate their children, and thus a society sprung up which has rarely been surpassed. Beautiful mansions, embowered in shade-lawns embrodered with flowers and shrubbery, equipages dashing from house to house, tables spread in the most exquisite style, music floating on every breeze, every household joyous with youth and beauty—such was Washington, thirty years ago! Alas, that it is not so now. In the bloom of its loveliness it was stricken and perished. The blow came, as sorrow and death often come, when least expected, and when the pulse beats highest and strongest. Ever since its first settlement by the Gibson family, it had been proverbial for its health; but at the period of its greatest prosperity two epidemics came, and it wilted like a leaf in the grasp of winter. Of the young and beautiful, few were spared. They sleep—Oh, how silent and lone—in the old deserted grave-yard, and the winds over moan there, wailing and low!

Mr. Drake just came to Washington in its period of sunshine. It was likewise the palmy days of Methodism. The old Meeting House, under the powerful preaching of Winans, the seductive eloquence of Burrus, the persuasive accents of Lane, the fervid exhortations of Harper, and the labors of other itinerants, had been the scene of several glorious revivals. Mourners crowded to the altar; those holding the highest social position leading the way; and they were not ashamed to weep—not afraid to shout—and to announce to the whole world what God had done for their souls. Well do I remember, among these bowed and contrite spirits the venerable Magruder, the learned Alexander Covington, the stately B. R. Grayson, the courtly Wm. L. Chew, the generous-hearted John W. Bryan, and many others—all now numbered with the dead. The wealthy, the gifted, the lovely, the fashionable, spurning the sneers of the world, tore off their jewels and rushed, penitent and wailing, to the altar, and there proclaimed the validity of their salvation; and there exhorted friends and companions to seek the Lord.

This, sir, was the kind of Methodism I was accustomed to in my boyhood—for I was confifteen at the time I am describing—and there was a little more of it now, you would record more conversions and more revivals. A regular old-fashioned shout—a spontaneous altar-spoken exhortation—a confession de grande delicto—bursting right from the heart, is as much part and parcel of genuine Methodism as John Wesley himself, and so Wesley believed and taught.

In the revivals of those days, Mr. Drake took an active part. He had become, from the outset, a general favorite with the Church and in society. He was everywhere a welcome guest. But popularity and pleasure never seduced him from his duties. With an exterior and a temperament to shine in worldly pursuits, he nevertheless devoted himself to study, and to those higher functions that devolve on the minister of God. He was blessed with the light and example, the counsel and assistance of a truly great man—a man severe in his exactions of duty—inflexible, even to harshness, in the pursuit of truth, and right, and justice, and yet one of the humblest of Christians and gentlest of men—WILLIAM WINANS—for so many years the champion and illustration of Methodism in the South. Clarum et venerabile nomen. Treading diligently in his footsteps, from year to year, and from grade to grade, the young Itinerant has attained the eminence which he now deservedly enjoys.

Not in seasons of prosperity only, have I known Mr. Drake. I have seen him when the black wing of pestilence swept athwart the sky; when weeping and wailing took the place of revelry and mirth; when heart-strings were breaking; when death was chambered in our dwellings, and manhood and beauty withered where he walked. Ah, what pangs those dreadful scenes recall! Long, long years have passed. Seasons and flowers have bloomed and died. Cares and vicissitudes have oppressed my memory; yet I never can forget the young minister, calm and undaunted, facing every peril to strengthen the timid, to pray with the stricken, to comfort the bereaved. Oh, how many gems of beauty and of price were swept away by the wild wave, while I, a worthless weed upon the shore, have been suffered to remain!

In early life I saw much of Mr. Drake, and closely studied his characteristics; and though I have not seen him for twenty years, I venture to say that he is now, what his youth promised he would be, a man of kind and ardent affections, and warm and zealous in the cause—uniting a comprehensive and enlightened mind with a gentle and conciliating address—neither cold nor indifferent, nor yet a fanatic—and richly endowed with qualities to attract those who, from generous prejudice or habitual disregard, are indisposed to religious instruction.

But enough for to-day. Those sketches are from memory. They are the impressions of youth. I have neither memoranda, diary nor cotemporaries to consult. It is of the past chiefly, and of the dead, that I shall speak. Even when I refer to the few that survive, it is more with reference to what they were, than what they are. My only motive is to say a few kind words of early friends, and cast a cypress leaf on the graves of the loved and lost—once the charm and ornament of society—new, "to dumb forgetfulness a prey." If I fall into errors as to names and dates, facts, or in my estimate of men, there are those who can correct me, and thus we shall get the materials of history.

HYMENEAL:

MARRIED, on the 5th Dec., 1854, by the Rev. Walter Mc. Daniel, the Rev. JOHN W BRONSON, of the Alabama Conference, to Miss SUSAN E. NICHOLSON, youngest daughter of Martha and Alexander Nicholson, Esqr., of Coosa county, Ala.

OBITUARY:

DIED, in Summerfield Ala., on Friday morning, Dec. 8th, 1854, after a short illness, CHARLES EDWARD BELLINGER, son of Dr. C. Bellinger, of Robinson springs.

This writer has seldom had the happiness to know a youth more gifted and excellent than was his deceased friend and pupil. He possessed a high order of intellect, a quick, strong and comprehensive mind: so that it was ever a pleasure to instruct him, and each to-day exhibited the fruits of yesterday's labors. His candid truthfulness, his uncompromising honesty and cheerful vivacity, rendered him a lovely companion and a faithful friend. But, alas! he has gone—and while we lament the fall of one so buoyant with hope, so full of promise, we find solace in the reflection that he "is taken away from the evil to come."

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

At a called meeting of the students of the Centenary Institute, Summerfield, Ala., the following proceedings took place. Mr. N. M. Skipper was called to the chair and Wm G. Hill requested to act as secretary. The object of the meeting being to show a proper tribute of respect to the memory of C. E. Bellinger.

After an eloquent and appropriate eulogy by a fellow-student, Samuel Briggs, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted.

Whereas, It hath pleased Almighty God, in the dispensation of his providences, to demonstrate our mortality, by taking from our midst our school-mate and companion, Charles Edward Bellinger; and feeling that by the afflictive stroke we have lost a high-souled and honorable associate, the Institute a shining and intellectual member, and his parents a noble and hopeful son, it is, as a tribute to his memory, hereby heartily

Resolved, That we deeply deplore the sudden and untimely death of our fellow student and friend.

Resolved, That we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days, in evidence of our esteem for his virtues and our sorrow for his loss.

Resolved, That these resolutions be printed and a copy of them sent to his parents, in token of our sincere condolence in the hour of their sad bereavement.

Destructive Fire in NewYork—Several Lives Lost and Many Persons Severely Injured.

NEWYORK, Dec. 20.—The block of buildings on the easterly side of Broadway, between Howard and Grand streets, was destroyed by fire at an early hour this morning. Among the buildings destroyed was the City Assembly Room, in which a ball was in progress at the time. One man was killed and several ladies injured.

By the falling of the walls of the various buildings burnt five firemen were killed, and fourteen others seriously injured. The loss is variously estimated, some placing it as high as a million of dollars. It is believed, however, that it will not exceed one hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

Departure of Lord Elgin from Canada.

QUEBEC, Dec. 20.—Lord Elgin, the late Governor-General of Canada, leaves here for NewYork on Friday, and will embark thence for England, in the Collins steamship Pacific, on the 27th inst.

Sir Edmund W. Head, the new Governor-General, was sworn into office yesterday. All officials who were deprived of rank in joining in the annexation movement have been restored to their former positions.

Non-Arrival of the America and Sarah Sands.

HALIFAX, Dec. 20.—We have as yet no tidings of the steamship America, which is supposed to have left Liverpool for this port and Boston on the 6th inst.

PORTLAND, Dec. 20.—The screw steamer Sarah Sands, which was to have left Liverpool on the 5th inst. for this port, has not yet made her appearance.

NewYork Markets.

NEWYORK, Dec. 20.—Our Cotton market presents no change worthy of note. The sales to-day were 400 bales. Ohio Flour sold to-day at $8 50 to $9 25. Of Western mixed Corn sales were made at 90 to 97½ cents. Pork firm. Lard 10¾ to 10¾ cents. Sales were made to-day of 1800 bags Rio Coffee at 9¾ to 10¼ cents.

The Cincinnati Infernal Machine.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 20.—In the case of Arrison, the author of the late infernal machine in this city, a verdict of manslaughter in the first degree was returned by the jury to-day.

SAFETY OF THE ALBANY.—The Crescent City arrived at NewYork on the 14th with the very gratifying news of the safety of the U. S. sloop-of-war Albany, about whose safety there were serious apprehensions from the general belief that she had been lost with probably all those on board.

The captain of an English brig named Esplegie, at Havana, received a letter while at Jamaica, from the British Consul at Carthagena, announcing that the U. S. sloop-of-war Albany was at Carthagena on the 10th of October, and that all on board were well. This account leaves therefore, no doubt of the safety of that vessel. The intelligence will be hailed with delight.

THE GREAT REPUBLIC.—The hull of the leviathan ship Great Republic, says the NewYork Times of the 11th instant, was towed to her dock, at the foot of Dover street, East River, yesterday afternoon, preparatory to her being put in the United States Dry Dock for repairs. The mammoth specimen of naval architecture loomed up like a great fortification; the big smoke-pipes of the large tugs by which she was propelled scarcely reached to her upper deck.

SINGULAR EFFECT OF LIGHTNING.—The Louisville (Ky.) Democrat relates the following: A small telegraph wire, about seven hundred yards long, is stretched across the Ohio River, about three miles above Evansville, Ind., from pole to pole, and after running about fifty feet from the pole on each side, connects with the large wires on the banks. This line wire was struck by lightning, and the entire length of it melted! Not an unbroken piece over two inches in length was found! That which dropped on the bar was in a fused state, as though it had melted in the air. We never before heard of more than a yard or two of wire being thus melted by a stroke of lightning. In this case over seven hundred yards were melted.

MANUFACTURE OF PAPER.—It is stated that a company is shortly to be formed in NewYork city for the manufacture of paper from saw dust and shavings. Experiments have been gone into, and some of the most beautiful paper made from these materials. It is estimated that saw dust can be purchased for $5 per ton, and that the process through which it will go in the production of paper will bring the price of the latter down at least 20 per cent.

THE SLAVE EXCITEMENT IN CHICAGO.—The Chicago Journal of a recent date makes out the great slave excitement case in the city to have been a quiet affair. It appears that the military companies were ordered out, and while they were marching up and down in one part of the city, the Marshal and his posse were in another part securing the fugitives, four of whom were sent back to St. Louis.

QUICK PUNISHMENT.—We learn from the Athens (Ga.) Watchman, of the 14th inst., that two negroes who placed a fence rail, or something of the kind, across the Georgia Railroad track, not far from Madison, on Friday night last, seated themselves, one at each end of the rail, with the intention of jumping off on the approach of the cars, whose out of harm's way, they might see the fun! In accordance with the usual habit of the race, however, as soon as they became still, they fell asleep—the train came thundering along in the mean time, cutting off the arm of one of the fiends, and breaking the head of the other.

CURIOUS CIRCUMSTANCE.—The Sussex (N. J.) Herald states that a cow was slaughtered on Saturday, December 2, on the farm of Andrew McMurry, in Byram, and imbedded in her heart was found a cut nail, over two inches long. The heart appeared to be considerably decayed in consequence. The animal, to all appearances, had always been healthy.

THE INDIAN MURDER NEAR FORT LARAMIE.—We have been permitted, says the St. Louis Republican of the 12th inst., to examine letters from Mr. C. A. Kinkead and Mr. C. A. Jamison, from which we learn some particulars of the recent massacre and mail robbery by the Sioux Indians, near Fort Laramie.

It appears that Mr. Kinkead left Fort Laramie on the 13th of November, in company with Mr. Jamison, the conductor of the Salt Lake mail, and his two assistants, one of whom was named Wheeler—the other man's name is not stated. When the party had reached a point about twenty-two miles from Laramie and six miles from Major Dripps's station, they were attacked by fifteen Sioux Indians, and at the first fire two of the party were killed and a third mortally wounded. When Mr. Jamison, who was about 100 yards in advance, was shot, his mule ran back to the wagon in which Mr. Kinkead was sealed, as yet unhurt. Mr. K. concluded to mount him and rescue, but as he emerged from the wagon, a ball grazed his neck, and he had hardly mounted the mule, when he received two arrows in his breast, two in his hips and two in his back. He fell senseless to the earth, but recovering soon, he saw two Indians making off with his mule. They made signs for him to go back from where he came, and hesitated for Dripps's station. Fortunately Major Dripps was out, engaged in scattering arsenic to poison wolves, which abound in that region. He met Mr. Kinkead, and assisted him to the house. Arrived there, Mr. Kinkead dispatched a messenger to Fort Laramie, and an escort was sent forthwith, to bring him to the Fort.

He is now staying at Fort Laramie, and is rapidly recovering. At the time the attack was made, he had with him about $20,000, one half in coin, and the rest in drafts. The coin was carried off by the Indians, but he succeeded in saving the drafts. The mail bags were cut open and ransacked, but according to Mr. Barnes's statement, the letters were recovered, and will be forwarded as soon as possible.

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—The following is the report of this institution for the week ending on Saturday evening at 5 o'clock, 16th instant:

Admissions	317
Discharges	230
Deaths	58

The number of deaths given in our last report was seventy-one.

DEATH IN A BUGGY.—Two gentlemen yesterday came to the city in a buggy, with the corpse of a man whose name was supposed to be John Kelly, from a prayer-book found on his person with that name in it. The gentlemen stated that they took the deceased, who was very sick, in their buggy, at 11 o'clock, at Soulat's plantation, five mile above Carrollton, with the intention of bringing him to the house of a friend on Poryfaire street, but that he died before reaching Carrollton, and that they were unable to find the house designated. The Coroner held an inquest on the body, and returned a verdict of death by cholera.

TUESDAY, Dec 19

SINGULAR SUICIDE.—Mr. Jacob Helfer, a respectable citizen of the Fourth District, about 25 years of age, committed suicide by drowning, on Sunday, near the head of First street. He was well-circumstanced in life, but for several years past has been subject to aberrations of intellect, and it was doubtless under one of those afflictions that he committed the fatal act. He generally dressed carelessly; but on Sunday morning he dressed himself up in unusual style, and went to a barber shop near the river to get shaved. After being shaved, he left the shop without taking his hat, went down to the river's brink, and waded out till the water reached his middle. He then ducked his head under, as if to try how it would feel to drown; after which he got upon an old pile, where he projected from the water in a standing position. He seemed to change his mind for an instant, and called awhile for help; when help approached, however, he finally made up his mind, and plunged into the current. All efforts to save him were unavailing, and notwithstanding the magnanimous offer of ten whole dollars for the recovery of the body, made on the spot by a rich relative, it has not yet been found.

The Battle of Inkermann.

The following thrilling account of the battle is given by the correspondent of the London Morning Herald:

A little after 3 on the morning of Sunday the 5th, when a heavy fog shrouded every thing from view, the various garrisons of the redoubts at Balaklava were roused out by the noise of large masses of troops approaching. At about 4 o'clock a cloud of skirmishers advanced to the brow of the hills on which the rear of our camp lines rests. This whole attack upon the rear of our lines was a mere feint to draw off attention, while a serious and desperate attempt was made to force our camp, and turn the whole of our position on the right, near Tchernaya.

Suddenly, and near 5 o'clock, to the surprise, and I think also a little to the consternation of all in camp, a most tremendous cannonade was opened from the heights near Inkermann, full upon the right of our position. The two-gun battery on the hill over the Tchernaya was held by a strong party of the 50th.

No one suspected or believed it possible that the enemy could get guns up this by a single night, so the place had been but little regarded. Yet it was from this spot that the Russians opened the fire from about ten guns full on the two gun battery and the light and second division, which lay about half a mile in the rear. The instant the cannonade began, and the first emotions of utter astonishment and surprise were passed, the 50th picket kept close under the earthwork of the battery, and the shot flew over them, doing but little injury. The cannonade in the rear recommenced. All forts, redoubts and batteries round Sebastopol opened with a tremendous roar which seemed to shake the earth. The scene at the moment was awful. The whole camp except to the rear, seemed encircled by fire, as flash after flash lit up the foggy air in all directions. This uproar was perfectly deafening, for our batteries began to reply, and both sides firing shell increased the din tenfold. The shower of these terrible explosives, which rained into the camp like hail, baffles description. No place was safe from them. They killed men and tore the tents to pieces on places which we had hitherto considered as utterly out of range.

The horror of the scene was increased by the obscurity of the morning. It was not 5 o'clock, the darkness and fog were still thick and through the heavy air the broad red flashes of the guns, and their tremendous reports seemed ten times louder then ever. For all that could be seen or told to the contrary, the Russian batteries seemed within fifty yards of you on all sides. In course the troops remained under arms, but did not attempt to move; every one knew that before the real attack commenced, the artillery would cease, and the sharp cracking fire of musketry begin.

The picket of the 55th had been all this time lying under cover of the walls of the two-gun battery on the right. The fire of the Russian artillery, though much directed on the battery, had done little or no damage, and the men still lay under cover, when the guns ceased. The noise of an immense body of men advancing was heard close upon the batteries.

The fog prevented our fellows seeing far, but the noise told plainly that some 5000 or 6,000 Russians were already close at hand. The instant the Russians caught sight of our battery through the fog, although they seemed utterly upset by their reception in climbing the hill, they rushed forward with a dash we hardly gave them credit for. Nothing daunted by the immense disparity of numbers, the 55th nailed till they closed within ten feet, and then gave one tremendous volley, which stretched the of the enemy in the dust; and then each man loading and firing as fast as he could, kept up an incessant discharge of musketry upon each Russian as he approached. The Russians halted for a moment, and then, with wonderful courage, rallied up and returned a close and telling fire. In less than five minutes they again attempted to storm the battery. In an instant they rushed on and poured over its banks and through its embrasures in overpowering numbers. There was a moment of desperate struggle, during which our gallant 55th fought hand to hand and foot to feet with their numerous assailants. It was but a moment, and in the next they had repulsed the attack and preserved the battery. But it was by coln our fellows displayed all this courage—the enemy already outnumbered them at the rate of 40 to 1, and fresh masses were coming up every minute. Our men tell by dozens.

Their numbers diminished every instant, while those of the enemy increased. Suddenly the Russians made another charge, and this time with more effect. Firepower by point they swarmed into the battery like bees, in truly irresistible numbers, and the 55th, after more than two-thirds of the picket lay dead around, retired from the battery just in the nick of time. By the 11th division of Russian infantry had crossed the Tchernaya at another point, and were trying to take our men in rear and flank. The 55th fell back among the bushes fighting to the last, till they came to another picket, under the wall, on the old post road, which, like itself, had lost half its men, and were fighting desperately to repel an attack from a column of the enemy's infantry. The two pickets joined and for a time held the road against all their assailants, who fell in heaps under the cool murderous fire of our men. But the check to the Russians was only momentary, fury had now got between 8000 and 10000 men up their heights on our right, and their battery on the hill threw shot and shell among our men with terrible effect. The pickets were preparing to retire from the wall, when, fortunately, two regiments of the 2d division, the 41st and 49th, came into action, and, passing the wall, opened a destructive fire on the Russians on our right, near the two-gun battery. The enemy returned it quite as vigorously; but their small, inefficient weapons stood no chance against our Minie rifle.

The 41st and 49th then deployed into line, and prepared to charge; and the instant they did so the enemy fell back in disorder. The 41st and 49th charged up the hill to the right, and in the course of five minutes recaptured the two-gun battery. This advantage, however, was only temporary, for the instant our men were in the battery, the Russian artillery, on the hill above it threw shot and shell into the very center of our troops, cutting them down by dozen. The enemy's infantry at the same time rallied and swarming up the hill poured in such a terrific fire of musketry that our regiments were again compelled to retire down the hill, and defend the wall along the post road.

It was now nearly 7 o'clock. Most of the troops in the English camp were moving up to the scene of action and most of the troops for the fire was still so hot in the rear end on the left, towards Sebastopol, that it was thought necessary to keep strong reserves to meet any emergency that might arise. By the time I have mentioned, all our chiefs were assembled near the camps of the second and light divisions. Lord Raglan was there, looking unusually anxious with Sir George Brown, Sir George Catheart, General Bentinck, Sir Richard Airey, Evans, Major General Strangways, (of the artillery,) other artillerists, Buller, Adams, Torrens, Colville, Bentinck, Pennefather, and several other officers of high rank from the English and French armies.

All this time the 41st, 47th, 49th, 55th, 24th, and 88th Regiments (into the second, fourth, and light divisions, were ranged inside the wall on the old post road, firing over it into the bodies of Russian infantry, with the most terrific effect. The rattle of musketry was deafening. The incessant volley and effect of the rifle ball dispersed the fog, but replaced it with the thick, white smoke of gunpowder, which hid every thing equally well. At this time the enemy, who were losing ten men to our one, showed no signs of giving way. On the contrary they advanced towards the wall, firing volleys with as much coolness and regularity as if on parade. I am bound to say no troops could have behaved more splendidly than the Russians—they appeared utterly insensible to the fear of anything like a charge.

About this time our batteries of artillery came boldly into the fight against the enemy's battery on the hill, which was doing us a considerable amount of mischief. Under the splendid management of Gen Strangways, they soon so far turned the fortune of the day as to leave their infantry, attacking ours beyond the wall, entirely without support. Advantage was instantly taken of the change to advance the 20th and 47th Regiments to the right for the purpose of re-taking the two-gun battery. In spite of a tremendous cross fire, they advanced at the point of the bayonet, and as they neared the battery, poured in one tremendous volley and charged. In less than a minute the Russians were driven out, with fearful loss. Yet hardly were they clear of the battery, when the Russians rallied again, and returning round the spot poured in volley after volley into the columns of the gallant 20th and 47th, and at the same time the Russian artillery redoubled their fire on the battalions in such a manner that neither friend nor foe could hold it. Under these circumstances the 20th and 47th were compelled to fall back, and the enemy again occupied the two-gun battery for a moment. This turn of possession was, however, but brief; our fellows again dashed up at it, and again they literally massacred all in the place. The battery itself, and all its approaches, were now covered with English and Russian corpses, most wounded. The latter were few in the extreme, as whenever the enemy occupied the contested post, they bayonetted all our fellows who gave the least sign of life.

When the 20th and 47th regained the battery, the Russian artillery re-commenced to such a manner as to make it quite untenable. Accordingly our artillery was advanced for the purpose of endeavoring to silence the enemy's guns. The 20th and 47th again retreated from the two-gun battery, and our field guns were advanced to the wall near the post road. Both parties then commenced a tremendous cannonade. From this time until eight o'clock it was a mere artillery battle.

The Russian skirmishers and strong supporting bodies of infantry were again thrown on our right, and under cover of the tremendous fire of artillery, crawled up the hill to the two-gun battery. As their men breasted the hill they were encountered with showers of grape from our field batteries, which mowed them down by hundreds. Yet still they came on with perfect coolness, and apparently with perfect courage. To favor their advance, the enemy's artillery was turned full upon ours, and, from their commanding position and advantage in the weight of metal, did much execution. It was at this moment, as the Two-Gun Battery was again taken by the enemy, that a cannon shot struck Major General Strangways, and carried away his thigh, while he was giving some orders relative to a fresh position which our batteries were to take up. Poor Strangways was carried to the rear, when the mangled limb was immediately amputated, but the brave old general only survived the operation a few minutes. Hardly had we sustained this loss when several other leading officers of our artillery were cut down, either killed or mortally wounded, while superintending the working of their guns. The 20th and 47th had in the mean time re-captured and lost the two-gun battery once more.

As the enemy's reinforcements came up, our Guards also came into action. The Guards—which are all that now remain of the Duke's division, for the Highlanders, etc., are at Balaklava—had been skirmishing for some time, but now they came conspicuously into the hottest of the fight and by their actions, if possible, increased their splendid reputation. Upon this occasion, the whole three battalions were but a little over 1200 men. Constant sickness, and the victory at Alma, to which they so largely contributed, have done much to diminish this fine corps. On the morning of the 5th also, between hour and five companies of the Coldstreams were cut on picket in the rear. Yet it was the Coldstreams which bore the thick of it. While the Fusiliers and Grenadiers defended the wall, the Coldstreams, turning to the right, again recaptured the two-gun battery as it was of the most vital importance that the enemy should not establish themselves in this position. And now a tremendous struggle ensued for this position.

The number of the enemy in and around the battery was at least 2000, yet the Coldstreams charged and broke their way through all opposition, and got to the work. The instant they had done so, the enemy seemed to redouble their efforts to take and keep the place. Fresh regiments came up the hill and thrust themselves into the battery from all points; but the Coldstreams held their ground. Quitting with perfect desperation. The battery was now completely encircled, in front, flank and rear, and, as the Coldstreams say, every man gave himself up for lost and determined to sell his life dearly. Three times did the Russians throw themselves upon the battery, and by the sheer weight of their masses surmount and cross the walls, yet each time they were driven back again. The melee was frightful. So close were the antagonists, that after once firing the musket there was no time to load. The men then stood up and charged with the bayonet, or beat each other down with the butts of their muskets. Each time the Russians were repulsed they left heaps of dead behind, and it was over the corpses of the comrades that they advanced each time in a fresh attack.

After the last repulse the Russians for some time did not renew the contest, observing that the height of the walls presented our men from firing over, they collected in masses close under them and began throwing the musket and bayonets of their dead comrades over like the footballs, with huge stones. For this species of attack our men also were quite prepared, and in turn hurled the rough fragments of rock upon their assailants. For nearly two minutes this game on the ring continued as before, the Russians making desperate dash to enter by the embrasures, but were bayonetted in the attempts till the embrasures were choked with corpses. All this time the Coldstream Guards alone, almost, unaided—and only 600 strong—had been keeping at bay nearly 7000 of the enemy's troops, that at last they were compelled to retire. They then charged out in a body on the enemy in their rear, leaving eight officers and nearly 200 men, killed and wounded in the battery behind them.

All the wounded were instantly bayoneted by the Russians. Some of the officers' bodies were found with as many as twenty bayonet wounds, and their skulls completely smashed with the butt-ends of muskets. Less of the battery, the Coldstreams fought their way to where the Fusiliers and Grenadiers were coming up to their assistance. The three battalions, which then did not muster 1,000 men tried to charge up to where the two-gun battery was firing, but it was a useless attempt, as the officer had then nearly 3500 men upon our right flank. They were compelled to retire, and with differently coiled existence themselves. All this time the regiments under the wall had been keeping the numbers of the enemy at bay. Five or six different times the Russian battalions advanced so close to the wall that others literally losing themselves under, could touch the fire-belt back in disorder. Behind them the wall the guards rallied and formed self on parade, to meet the enemy, who was coming down from the two-gun battery on our right flank, and in rear of the wall. The 20th kept always at the head of the Guards; when they were to go behind them, and his escape seems almost miraculous. The Russians now altered the plan of attack. They no longer pressed upon the wall in front but, swarming up by the two-gun battery, poured down upon the right flank in tremendous force.

At this moment there were not less than 40,000 of the enemy, to oppose whom the reserve only about 12,000 English. Aides-de-camp were instantly dispatched for reinforcements from the French, and the English fell back upon their line of fire. The wall was abandoned, and as our men retired the enemy clustered in force for a general attack. The 30th and 41st remained to engage the enemy, and most nobly they behaved, fighting it ground inch by inch, and retiring the field with Russian corpses. The enemy advanced by the old post road from Sebastopol; on an eminence in the centre of this a battery of six field-pieces was placed. Unfortunately, it was so placed, with thick brushwood at each side, that the enemy's skirmishers were enabled to approach unseen and pick off both men and horses. Our fellows of the 30th and 41st made many attempts to dislodge them, but the place was so crowded with them in all directions that it was useless. While this fighting was going on, a body of Russian infantry dashed up the road towards our guns. The danger was seen, and such horses as still survived the fire were hastily harnessed to the guns, which were withdrawn. The remaining two guns, with their ammunition, were dragged by the hands of the enemy. Some of the artillerymen clung round the guns and fought the Russians for them hand to hand. One sergeant in particular was seen defending himself with the sacred alone, amid a hundred enemies for full five minutes. When the battle was over, his body was found with 17 bayonet and bullet wounds on it, and two Russians killed with his sword lay on the ground beside him.

Our guns were now pouring falling back, blasting and dispuling every inch of ground until the reinforcement came up. It was at this time that poor Sir George Catheart was shot through the heart and fell dead from his horse. Within five minutes afterwards Brigadiers General Torrens and Goldie, also of the fourth division, were mortally wounded, the former through the chest, the latter through the stomach. Here also Brigadier General Bentinck was wounded through the arm. Sir Geo. Brown through the arm, and Col. Buller, brother of the hero of Silistria, who was on the duke's staff, and standing near him at the time, was shot through the brain. Numbers had fallen back so far that the two-gun bases for battery, which was erected to command the harbor and shipping to Sebastopol, fell into the enemy's hands. They spiked and dismounted both the guns, and pushing forward on our left tried to cut off the whole body of our men from the advancing French success. The fighting was now quite among the tents of the second and light divisions. All the camps of the first and second and light divisions were cut and broken to pieces by the storm of shot and shell. But at this spot the tide of fortune turned.

The enemy were now completely cut of the bush which had screened and sheltered them on their advance and upon fair ground they stood no chance with our men. Our regiments halted, extended their line to the left and commenced a tremendous fire. The enemy in their order, hardly returned it, but stood their ground and fell by hundreds and hundreds. Thrice they in vain rushed stubbly in break our line on the left, and were met each time by terrible volleys of musketry, until they closed in, when our fellows charged and massacred them at the point of the bayonet. The fortune of the day still hung doubtful. The enemy were getting up all their strength for a final effort, when Canrobert came up with three regiments of Zouaves, five regiments of French infantry, and a strong force of artillery, and commenced a terrible attack on the enemy's right flank. This occurred at about 11 o'clock, and from that moment the Russian chance was hopeless. Yet, though under the French fire they were literally falling by battalions, they never showed the least signs of trepidation or disorder. On the contrary, they formed up in the most beautiful order, altered their front across to meet the attack of the French, and, extending their line to the left, prepared to resume their attack upon the English. At that time, however, our men were well prepared, and, without any order or arrangement, firing themselves headlong upon the enemy, charging with the bayonet.

The Russians boldly charged with the bayonet also, and for the space of five minutes, the 50th, 41st, 49th, 88th, and six or seven Russian regiments were stabbing, beating and firing at each other in the most fearful manner. At last the enemy gave way, and began retiring to great order across the Inkerman heights. Until I saw it, I never in my life could have believed that any troops in the world could have retired under such a murderous fire in such perfect order. The French and English with a whole mass of artillery, followed close upon the retreating battalion, pouring in volley after volley of grapeshot, shell and musketry. In fact it was a perfect carnage. Yet, in spite of this, the enemy kept their order, retreating at almost slow pace, and every five or ten minutes halting and charging desperately up the hill at our men and the French. In these charges the Russians lost fearfully. We received them with volleys of musketry, and then dashed at them with the bayonet. In one of these charges, the 50th French regiment of the line recaptured the two guns which in the commencement of the day we had lost. By half-past two o'clock, the great mass of the enemy had completely fallen back, leaving between 7,000 and 8,000 dead on the field behind.

About ten o'clock, while the Russians were gaining on our right, the garrison, to the number of about 12,000, made a desperate sortie upon the French trenches upon the left. A most obstinate and bloody battle ensued, which ended in the enemy being completely repulsed in all points. They, however, succeeded in entering one battery and spiking and dismounting seven guns. I was not present on this part of the field, but I have been informed that the battle lasted about an hour. It was principally a musketry fight. The French lay in their trenches and fired on the enemy as they advanced. The French had only four or two hundred killed and wounded. The Russians left about 2,500 upon the plain.

Tonight evening I walked over the battle field; but I can never describe to your readers what it was like. Its horrors beggar all description—12,000 dead and wounded Englishmen and Russians, lay upon the heights, and groans and screams of agony were rising up from all parts. Alma was a mere skirmish to it. What made the scene worse was that the Russians from the ships in the harbor and the fortifications to the north were throwing a perfect storm of shell all over the field, killing their own and our wounded.

DESERTION FROM THE ALLIES, AND RUSSIAN SPIES.

Special Correspondence of the London Times.

BALAKLAVA, Nov. 8 1-51.

After the dispatch of my letter I was informed that the statement of a deserter from the 19th Regiment having gone over to the enemy was true, and further, that two men had deserted from the Royal Artillery on the same night. It must be added, assigning some colorable pretext for such baseness that all these men had been dogged the day before for various offenses. Their subsequent conduct shows they deserved the punishment. Indeed, there is a good deal of punishment inflicted, but it is principally for the grave offence of being asleep when on duty.

A strange incident is said to have taken place to-day in our lines, which if true, shows the astuteness of the enemy, and the want of presence of mind on the part of some of our officers. A man in the uniform of a French officer sauntered coolly through our lines to-day, was civil and polite to all he met, entered into conversation with those who were walking about, smoked, and chatted, and laughed, and at last got into a sort of discussion respecting the strength and weakness of our position in the rear toward Balaklava. Nothing doubting, our officers expressed their opinions freely, pointed out our weak points, and spoke plainly of the difficulties of our position. At length one of the officers of the 79th, who had a more practiced ear than his comrades, was struck by the strange accent and curious idiom of the assistant Frenchman, which to any one but a Frenchman would have excited no suspicion; but still he was afraid of making a mistake, and had no device ready at hand to test the truth. However, he sent off to Sir Colin Campbell, to say that he suspected there was a Russian spy among them. The supposed Frenchman was not to be caught so easily. His quick eye detected the dispatch of the messenger, and so he gradually drew off from our line toward the valley, left it in another equatural acts perplex those to whom the officer had communicated his misgivings, and when he had gained a good offing, he quickened his pace into a run, and got right away into the Russian lines, leaving his late comrades gazing open-mouthed after him. It argued no common coolness and audacity to undertake such a mission; for had the gentleman in question been captured he would inevitably have been hanged as a spy.

The French executed speedily justice the other day on a spy, with on them found a number of Turkish dollars within the lines, and shot him as soon as they had found out all they could from him. But these Russians are very nice. The sentinel before the house of the provost-marshal in Balaklava was astonished to see a boor, with a sack of corn on its back, deliberately walking past him in the moonlight one night. However ever to seize the animal, when the sack of corn suddenly became changed into a bulky man. Cossack, who drove the spurs into his steed, and had vanished ere the sentry had recovered his speech.

THE PROSPECTS—RUSSIAN TREATMENT OF THE WOUNDED.

It has been decided that the place is not to be stormed for the present. We are sold to be waiting for strong reinforcements. To-day a flag of truce was sent into Sebastopol. The bearer of it carried a letter from the allied commanders to the Commander-in-Chief of the Russian forces. It stated that General Canrobert and Lord Raglan had seen with detestation and disgust the merciless cruelty with which the enemy bayoneted our wounded lying on the field, and requested to know whether the war was to be carried on in this barbarous and exterminating manner, as then the allies would know how to act. The letter also contained a hint that in case of our prisoners being ill-treated, the Russian would do well to remember that we had many of their countrymen in our hands, whose treatment would be regulated by that which our men received from them. A Russian major was captured at the close of the battle. He had been observed on many occasions stabbing and hacking our unfortunate wounded with his sword, and directions were given to a party of the Guards to take him alive, if possible. This they effected after a slight resistance on his part, and after his having offered in vain a bribe of some gold pieces to our men to allow him to escape. He is to be tried by court-martial to-morrow, and the depositions and sentence for warded to whoever of the many generals now in Sebastopol is the Commander-in-Chief. If they consent to punish him he will be given up to them. If they decline to interfere, he will be shot as the laws of civilized warfare denounce the killing of defenseless wounded as murder. If he is found guilty, there is not the least hope of his escape, as the allied Generals are determined to make an example of all who disgrace themselves by such inhumanity. The Russian prisoners say they had four Generals killed and three wounded and that all their officers, as soon as they fell were carried to the rear.

NARROW ESCAPES.

Some of the narrow escapes of individuals seem almost miraculous. The correspondent of the Illustrated London News had a most narrow one. Two round shot passed through his tent, and before he could leave it they were followed by a large shell, which burst inside the tent within two feet of where he was standing. The tent was literally torn to ribbons by the explosion. Yet the representative of your pictorial contemporary was unhurt. But the destructive fleet of shell are very uncertain. I have seen twenty shells fired at a regiment and burst close over them and not a man been hurt; and two minutes after three shells leapt at the same distance killed and wounded almost an entire company. During the battle of Inkermann I was standing near some French artillery when a shell pitched in a tent within two feet of where I was standing with two or three French officers. Not hearing its fuse we took it for a round shot, and had turned our backs when suddenly it exploded with a concussion which almost knocked us down. Except the momentary shock of the report we suffered nothing though a piece of the same shell killed a horse and a French artillery man who were fifty yards at the other side of me. Many instances of the same kind occurred to me.

HORRIBLE APPEARANCE OF THE BATTLE-FIELD.

On the morning of the battle I went over the field at 11 30 a. m. I have said over and over again that it was a sight which cannot be described. A terrible rabble number about 5000 to 6000, Russians killed and wounded were living among our tents, and here also were many corpses of Zouaves and French infantry of the line. All our wounded have been removed and the wounded of the enemy were being gathered in. The kindness and attention of our fellows to their helpless comrades was beyond all praise. Brought them water, got kamsacks to put under their heads, and borrowed blankets in which to cover them from the raw night air. Here and there small groups of them stood silent and sullen by their wounded comrades, and sometimes a Russian, over three or four of our men passed away with a smile on their faces, and seemed as if asleep; others were horribly contorted, and with distended eyes and swollen features appeared to leave died in agony, but defying to the last. Some gave up it prepared for burial, and as though the hands of relatives had arranged their mangled limbs; while others again were in almost startling positions, half standing or kneeling emptying their weapons or drawing a cartridge. Many lay with both their hands extended towards the sky, as if in the act of invoking mercy by an their faces in the same attitude, with their muskets tightly grasped in both hands, and all had the same grim, painful frown upon their features like men who were struck down in the act of closing with their foes. Beyond this the Russians, Guardsmen, and line regiments lay thick on the ground, intermixed with dead and wounded horses. The latter with fractured limbs, were their rising, and after staggering a few steps, rolling over among the corpses, snorting and plunging fearfully. Right in the sight of the wall was the way to the two-gun battery. The path lay through thick brushwood but the path was slippery with blood and the brushwood was broken down and ensanguined with the dead.

The scene from the battery was awful—awful beyond description. I stood upon its parapet at about 2 at night, and left my heart sink as I gazed upon the scene of carnage around. The sun on was at its full, and showed every object as if by the light of day. Away up was the valley of Inkermann, with the Tchernaya like a band of silver flowing gracefully between the hills, which, for varied and picturesque beauty, might vie with any part of the world. Yet I shall never recall the memory of Inkermann Valley with any but feelings of loathing and horror; for round the spot from which I surveyed the scene lay upwards of 5

THIRTY-THIRD CONGRESS—SECOND SESSION.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11, 1854

SENATE.—Mr. Badger presented the credentials of David S. Reid, Senator elect from North Carolina for six years from March 4, 1855. He appeared and was sworn.

Various petitions were received.

Mr. Adams, of Mississippi, introduced a bill to establish a uniform rate of naturalization throughout the United States. The bill extends the time of naturalization from five to twenty-one years, and sets prospectively upon those foreigners only who may enter the United States before the passage of the act. He addressed the Senate at some length, reading his remarks in terms of voice which were understood almost unintelligible in the galleries. He rendered them almost unintelligible in the galleries. He was understood as arguing that in one hundred years from this time every inch of the American continent would be required for the support of the American people. Immigration, then, required that no inducements should be held out in immigration. He denied any connection with the Know-Nothing society or any political secret society. He disclaimed all hostility to foreigners and read from some former speech of his showing that he had not an unkind feeling against them. But he did think immigration was dangerous to such as foreigners bound to the country with the abolitionists.

When he heard that a band of Germans had burned an American flag in effigy, he determined to introduce this bill. So far as he understood the principles of the Know-Nothings he agreed with them—so far as they proposed to extend the term of naturalization, and in that preference of American Protestants for offices to foreigners or Roman Catholics.

When he had concluded, the bill was read and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Weller offered a resolution calling for all the correspondence relative to the arrest of the French Consul at San Francisco. Adopted.

Mr. Shields gave notice of bills for the improvement of the Illinois River, and for the improvement of the harbors of Chicago and Waukegan.

Mr. Foote introduced a bill to extend the statute of limitations in certain criminal cases. Referred.

Mr. Chandler gave notice of a bill to abolish the franking privilege.

Mr. Shields reported back the bill to establish a board of commissioners.

The appropriation bill of the last session for support of the Ocean Mail steamers was taken up. The bill stands in the following position: The House at the last session passed the bill containing a clause requiring the Postmaster General to give notice of an intention of discontinuing the contract. The Senate amended the bill by striking out this clause. The two Houses failed to agree upon the amendment.

Mr. Brodhead moved now that the bill be referred to the Committee on Post Roads. He thought the allowance too high, but was unwilling to give the notice and take the steamers at their appraised value. He regarded the steamers as valuable for war vessels.

Mr. Hamlin urged that the matter be laid over till after Mr. Rusk should arrive.

Mr. Hunter said he was willing to wait till that time. He denied that the bill could, at this stage, be referred.

The Chair decided that the bill did not come up as unfinished business.

Mr. Weller moved to postpone the matter one week.

Mr. Seward moved that it lie on the table. Agreed to. The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE.—Mr. Clingman asked leave to offer a resolution requesting the President to tender the mediation of the United States in such manner as, in his judgment, may be most likely to lead to the pacification of the conflict now raging between the allied arms of England and France, and the Czar of Russia.

Mr. Bocock, from a sense of duty, objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. Seiders asked whether it would be in order to move to lay it on the table.

The Speaker said it was not yet before the House.

Mr. Clingman then moved a suspension of the rules, which was disagreed to—yeas 67, nays not counted.

Mr. Florence offered a resolve to offer a joint resolution authorizing the President to cause the Niagara steamer and transport vessel to be chartered and fitted out, equipped and provisioned, for the purpose of carrying relief to Capt. Kane's expedition to the Arctic Seas in search of Sir John Franklin; and to detail such officers and men from the navy and accept the services of such volunteers at his discretion as may be required for the control and manning thereof; the expenses to be paid out of the treasury.

Mr. Florence said he merely wished the resolution referred to the committee on naval affairs. Objection was made and the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. Stanton, of Tennessee, offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the President to communicate information relative to the re-establishment of the Memphis navy yard.

On motion of Mr. Sapp, the special committee appointed last session on the subject of the military superintendence over civil works was continued in force.

Three days of next week were set apart for the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. Houston, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the Military Academy, and for the support of the army. Referred.

On motion of Mr. McDougal, the further consideration of the Pacific Railroad bill was further postponed till the second Tuesday of January, in order to receive all the reports of engineers, who surveyed the routes.

Mr. Pendick introduced a bill providing for more efficient discipline in the navy. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union on the President's message.

Mr. Houston offered a series of resolutions distributing the various branches of it to the appropriate standing committees.

Mr. Giddings hoped they would not be passed without a proper discussion. As to Greytown, he agreed with the President in all his apologies for the destruction of the place, and would be glad to wipe out that transaction from the page of history. He conceived that the President had been guilty of important omissions, and had preceded entirely from the great positions laid down in his inaugural. For the first time in twenty-five years the President is altogether silent in his message about slavery. Where was the reference to his former principles, so publicly avowed, to obtain Cuba by war or purchase?

The reason for the omission is that the voice of the people, as announced in the late elections, has made him hesitate before he attempts further to overthrow the policy of the Government pursued for the last fifty years. Why does he not speak further of his sentiments and avow his policy? The President has sent a female Minister to San Domingo, and through her we learn that our Government has entered into negotiations for obtaining a foothold there; but the President is silent on the subject. Mr. Giddings alluded to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and to the result of the late election, to show that the peculiar friends of the President on that issue were swept overboard.

Mr. Ingersoll inquired whether the gentleman just elected to Congress in Massachusetts were peculiar friends of the President.

Mr. Giddings replied, that he alluded to those who voted for the Nebraska-Kansas bill, and particularly to the gentleman who was about to retire to the shades of private life.

Mr. Ingersoll said that no nominations for Congress have yet been made in Connecticut, and the gentleman from Ohio did not know that he (Mr. Ingersoll) desired to be a candidate.

Mr. Giddings. You never will, probably. (Laughter.)

Mr. Ingersoll. The gentleman may know more about my district than I do. But I can inform the gentleman on the question of popular sovereignty, as avowed in the Nebraska bill, I can go safely before my constituents and feel confident they will approve my course.

Mr. Giddings. I cannot say as the obituary notice, the gentleman's loss will be my gain, but will assert that the going down of every man who voted for the repeal of the Missouri Compromise is a gain to freedom. In the course of his remarks in opposition to slavery, he asked why the President does not come up to the support of his slavery friends, or recede from his policy as heretofore avowed. The recent elections have shown this administration that the principles of freedom are no longer to be trifled with, and that they must be maintained.

Mr. Wheeler offered as amendment to the pending resolutions, professed by declaring in effect that in the destruction of Greytown the President has exercised a power violative of the Constitution, and providing for the appointment of a select committee of thirteen to report the facts relating thereto, with power to send for persons and papers.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 64, noes not counted.

The Committee rose, and the resolutions referring the message were adopted.

The mail steamer bill of last session was referred to the Post-office Committee. Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, December 12, 1854.

SENATE.—Numerous petitions, etc., were presented.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, gave notice of a bill extending, for three years, the time for the collection of duties on railroad iron, imported by railroad companies.

Mr. Shields introduced bills for the improvement of the Illinois River, and for the improvement of the harbors of Waukegan and Chicago. Referred.

Mr. Butler moved that the bill reorganizing the judicial system of the United States be made the special order for January 2. Agreed to.

Mr. Seward's joint resolution providing for the election of Chaplains of different denominations by the two Houses was taken up.

Mr. Bodge, of Iowa, moved to strike out the words "of different denominations." He looked upon those words as a libel on the present Chaplain of the Senate, and a reflection upon him because of his sentiments on that question which has divided the Methodist Church into North and South denominations. The House had elected a Methodist, and to require the Senate to elect a man of a different denomination would displace the present Chaplain.

Mr. Mason said if the Senate from New York had any object in this matter he should decline it.

Mr. Seward explained.

After further debate Mr. Stuart moved to amend the resolution by providing simply for the election of Chaplain to the Senate for the present session.

Mr. Bodge, of Iowa, said that when he fought a man he did so openly and fairly, with hand to hand and eye to eye. He disdained a hidden warfare. He knew the motives dictating the warfare on the Chaplain. Mr. Slicer had been denounced by the abolition press all over the North as a paid tool, minion and hireling of the South. He had been denounced because he had offered up prayers for the preservation of the Union. It had been insidiously circulated throughout the North that he had prayed for the passage of the Compromise Acts of 1850. It was hoped that the warfare which had originated on the floor of the Senate against Mr. Slicer would, while carried on here, be an open one.

Mr. Stuart's amendment was adopted.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot, when the vote resulted as follows: Rev. Mr. Slicer 24; Rev. Mr. Staunton 20; Rev. Dr. Pyne 1; Rev. Mr. Hodges 2; Rev. Mr. Sunderland 1; Rev. Mr. Boocher 3. Mr. Slicer was then declared elected, and after an executive session the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE.—Mr. Packham moved to reconsider the vote by which on yesterday the House adopted resolutions referring the various parts of the President's message to appropriate standing committees. He confessed that he was much surprised at the very easy disposition of the message, when but one person had been heard regarding it. He wished to make remarks on one part of it.

The reconsideration was opposed by several gentlemen, when the motion was laid on the table.

Mr. Fuller, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the Senate bill for the better preservation of life and property on the Long Island and New Jersey coasts. If this bill, he said, had passed last session hundreds, if not thousands, would have been saved.

Mr. Smith, of Virginia, moved the reference of this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. Fuller and Mr. Shelton pressed for action on the ground of economy and humanity.

Mr. Campbell said he should like to know whether the bill came within that class of expenditures of which the Executive has already notified the House he intends the veto. There was a class of politicians on this floor who seemed to forget that thousands of precious lives are annually destroyed on the northern lakes and western rivers. He wished a consistent and uniform action.

Mr. Shelton replied that he should vote for the protection of life and property on the northern lakes and western rivers as cheerfully as on the New Jersey coast. If the one case should meet his support the other would. He would bill for that purpose should meet his support vote. He would bill for that purpose should meet his support vote. He would not asking whether the people to be benefitted are foreigners or native-born citizens.

Mr. Campbell said he and the gentleman would not differ about that. He would go as far as Mr. Shelton would. He wished to know whether the gentleman had last week voted for the River and Harbor Bill Independent of the President's veto.

Mr. Shelton replied he performed his duty here without reference to the President's views.

Mr. Campbell asked: Did you vote for that bill last week?

Mr. Shelton responded that he did not, not esteeming it a constitutional measure.

Mr. Campbell said that was the point he now made, the answer did not satisfy men living on the mighty Mississippi.

Mr. Shelton remarked that he last session voted for life-boats on the lakes.

Mr. Campbell said where the power in the Constitution is found for life-boats is found the power for the improvement of the northern lakes and great rivers. The time is coming when those principles will be embraced here independently of the executive power and control.

Mr. Smith, of Virginia, remarked he had not especially when he moved in refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, that the question would arise as to the constitutional power to improve rivers and harbors, and least of all did he expect the gentleman from Ohio would advert to the importance of commerciency. He thought the gentleman had voted consistently as an "old fogy," and that it was driven out of the circle of political action now-a-days. He proceeded to show that by the bill extraordinary powers were proposed to be conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury, and therefore it should be considered in committee.

Mr. Shelton, in reply to a remark by Mr. Smith, warmly denied that New Jersey people ever plundered the victims of marine disasters. They were not pirates.

Mr. Smith, of Virginia, hoped the reporters would tell the gentleman's constituents know that that remark was for "Buncombe."

Mr. Shelton: I make no speeches for "Buncombe," but in behalf of humanity.

Mr. Smith, of Virginia: I made no charge of robbery or piracy, but stated what is generally true as a proposition, that those folks who live on the sand beaches where wrecks and ruins come from the sea, have an extensive celebrity for taking care of themselves. I spoke of the people of New Jersey as not being better than other people.

Mr. Chandler agreed with Mr. what was said by Mr. Campbell relative to the protection of life and property on the northern lakes and western rivers, but he could not present protection on the Atlantic coast, which of late has become a footcloth, and demands legislation in behalf of humanity.

Under the operation of the previous question the bill was passed—yeas 126, nays 45. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to establish additional stations along the coast of Long Island and New Jersey, and change the old stations, with the view of giving effect to this act. It likewise provides for the appointment of keepers and a general superintendent.

Mr. Greenwood offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill at an early day providing punishment for the crime of forgery and depredation on the mails of the United States in the Indian Territory.

The House then went into Committee on the Invalid Pension bill.

Mr. Walbridge, (Dem.) of New York, addressed the committee at considerable length, in favor of abolishing the duty on coal. He remarked that the advance in the mechanic arts, in motive power, by the universal application of steam on railways and ocean and inland navigation, has entirely changed our relations to this important article; in fact, has revolutionized the age in regard to it. Yet it stands on the statute-book of 1846, in schedule C of the tariff of that year, as subject to an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent—equivalent to 45 per cent, (taking into account the cost of freight and charges) on its value in the country—and is then in company with the luxuries of life, "ale porter, wines, and articles embroidered with gold, silver or other metal."

The enactment continues, notwithstanding the annual consumption of coal in the United States has reached, at this period, about 10,000,000 of tons, the present cost of which may be fairly estimated at from $6 to $8 a ton at the place of consumption—showing that the people of the United States are paying for this, one of the great necessaries of life, between sixty and eighty millions of dollars per annum, under a tariff levied upon them which, as hereinbefore stated, is full 45 per cent protection.

During the years 1851, '52, '53 and '54 we have imported an aggregate of 882,102 tons, valued, according to a Treasury statement certified November 21, 1853, at $1,970,157 or, at a general average of four years, $8 23 per ton, and the aggregate duty paid on the same is $591,653 50.

The scarcity of fuel, and the demand for coals, had undoubtedly their full share in influencing the amount of importations at the several periods mentioned. This demand for coal is still rapidly augmenting, having risen in the last fifty years from fifteen thousand tons per annum to an annual consumption of 10,000,000, and yet being continually on the increase.

With almost illimitable resources at home, he could see no good reason for continuing the present exorbitant duty on coal, which, in his opinion, should be a free article. Some idea may be formed of the increasing demand for coal, by even a glance at the multiplied uses to which it is applied. We have now in active operation 20,000 miles of railway communication, at a cost of $600,000,000, and the system is extending, stretching its arms, Briareus-like, to the east and wide over the Union, in the ratio of the expansion of population and the growth of the country.

The steam marine of the United States in 1852 was 317 vessels, with an aggregate of 417,226 tons, of which 166 were ocean steamers, 529 engaged in the coast trade, and 765 employed on inland navigation. Such has been the increase of our steam commercial marine within the last two years, that it would not be extravagant to estimate our steam marine for 1854 at 1800 vessels, with an aggregate steam tunnage of 540,000 tons.

In conclusion he said every principle of justice demands that the shackles of this trade, which the existing tariff imposes, should be stricken off, and that the trade of this important article should be opened to the free competition. The days of this session were rapidly diminishing, and the business of the country required its labor demanded, brevity in discussion, and promptitude of action.

Mr. Ritchie, of Pennsylvania, rose for the purpose of making a few remarks in reply to the appeal of the gentleman from New York. An erroneous report had been extensively published in the newspapers in relation to the conduct of those gentlemen engaged in the anthracite coal business in Pennsylvania. They were charged with withholding coal from market in order to raise prices the article might be raised. So far from this, the supply by the Reading Railroad was over twenty-five per cent more than it was last year. The cost of mining has nearly doubled, and that of transportation by railroad largely increased; and to this may be attributed the rise in the price of coal. He controverted points in the speech of Mr. Walbridge, and took occasion to express his views against free trade.

Mr. White said he thought the miners of Philadelphia had been unjustly charged with a combination to keep up the price of coal. This was a subject of conversation and the staple of remark for some time. But since it has been alluded to he would now make a remark as a sort offset, which he thought would be quite as close a monopoly. The charge of keeping up the price of coal should more properly be fixed on gentlemen of New York and the Eastern States, who have sought to bring down the price of coal so low as to prevent the producer from bringing it to market.

Mr. Straub remarked, his friend from New York (Mr. Walbridge) had told the truth in relation to the cost of the price of coal; but while he spoke of the price going up, the gentleman seemed to forget that every article and necessary of life has risen correspondingly. [Laughter.]

Mr. Walbridge. Every thing except pay of Members of Congress. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. White concluded his remarks, saying that there is no abolition of the duty on coal would not now affect the price of the article.

The committee rose, when the bill for the payment of invalid and other pensions was passed, and the House adjourned.

IRON WALLS FOR PURPOSES OF DEFENSE.

To the Editors.—In your paper of two or three days since there was a communication over the signature of M., which a comparison is drawn between stone and wooden walls, as a defense against shot and shells and projectiles very conclusively (from effects produced at Sebastopol) the superiority of stone. Will you allow me to suggest another material, in my estimation very far superior as a defense to either one or the other, viz: wrought iron?

Some five and twenty years ago experiments were made by Robt. L. Stevens, Esq., which proved conclusively that shot could be effectually arrested by a thickness of wrought iron proportioned to the diameter of the ball. Same time in the year 1840 or '42, Mr. Stevens proposed to the Government to build a floating steam battery of iron as a protection, in the event of a war, to the harbor of New York. By order of the Government, experiments were made to test the correctness of this theory under the supervision of a Board of Navy and Army officers. Com. Stewart was at the head of one, and Colonel Totten of the other. The result proved four and a half inches in thickness of wrought iron to be a perfect defense against a sixty-four pound solid shot, fired at ten yards distance from the target.

Upon their report of these facts, Congress directed the Secretary of the Navy to enter a contract with Robert L. Stevens for building a steam battery upon his plan, for the defense of the harbor of New York. After the experiment of this agreement, Mr. Stevens consented at his own expense, a dry dock capable of containing a vessel of the size required by the contract, together with the steam engine, furnaces, tools, etc., necessary to the construction of such a vessel. Owing (as I presume) to some new influences, and the opposition of those opposed to the introduction of iron shot-proof vessels, her completion has been delayed. The costly works necessary to its completion rendered useless for years, and the interest of a large amount invested in property purchased for the purpose lost to him. About two years ago, at the earnest solicitation of Commodore Stockton, then a member of the U. S. Senate, backed by the efforts of many of the old and the friends of the measure, Congress again directed the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the vessel under contract. Some delay was occasioned by the necessity of enlarging the dry dock for the reception of the vessel of so much larger dimensions as to enable her to carry the additional thickness of iron required to resist shot of a greater weight than that required by the contract. The battery, as now constructing, is over four hundred feet in length on the water line.

Since her completion, the dry-dock, she has rapidly and steadily progressed, and now, with the exception of a few ribs, completely in frame, and about one-third planked up with heavy iron plates. From the difficulty of procuring funds during the severe pressure in the money market, he was reluctantly compelled, three days ago, to discharge, out of the four hundred and seventy-men employed in her construction, one hundred and forty of those working by the day in the yard at Brooklyn.

The first and only appropriation by us as iron steam-battery, whose sides are to be six or more inches in thickness, and whose length on the water-line is four hundred feet, and whose speed is intended to exceed that of any other war steamer at present afloat, was two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Now a part of this sum has been paid or appropriated to the construction of the immense dry-dock, twenty-two feet deep, (which of itself has required a steam-engine to keep free from water for the last two years,) or for the shops, tools, furnaces, etc., etc., indispensable to her completion. This appropriation was exhausted three months ago since which Mr. Stevens has been informed that no more money would be paid until a second appropriation should be made by Congress. This was unexpected, and he rest to him the payment of over one hundred thousand dollars for work done, and contracts entered into, on account of the steam-battery. Had the land defense of the Russians consisted of iron walls, with apertures no larger than necessary to change the angle of the gun, and had their floating steam-batteries been of iron, instead of wood, they would have had no splinters or red hot shot to fear, or breaches to repair.

Later from Texas.

A meeting is to take place in Galveston for the purpose of appointing delegates to the southwestern Convention which is to assemble in New Orleans in January next.

Two passengers on the steamer from Houston to Galveston were robbed a few nights since, by some thief who entered their state-room and took the money out one from under his pillow, and from the pockets of the other. Their names are Messrs. Western and Holmes, from Mississippi, we believe, and the amount they lost was $434.

The tide upon Matagorda Bay, it is stated, has been lower for the past few weeks than was ever before known. The lighter at Saluria is not able to account for it, and is surprised that the General Government has not placed it at Matagorda to watch it!

The Crockett Printer learns by telegraph that Jesse White, the murderer of Barrow, on Double Bayou in Liberty county, some time since, was arrest d in Alexandria, and lodged in jail a few days ago. A large reward had been offered for his arrest.

The Texan says a large amount of sugar cane had been raised around San Antonio. The grasshoppers have become scarce since the northers commenced.

N. Morris was tried in the District Court of Brazoria county, on the 11th inst., for killing the negro man Miles, belonging to Capt. Black, on the Brazos, a few weeks since, and acquitted. The verdict was considered a righteous.

Peter Mullen, of Bexar county, is imprisoned at Las Cruces, in Mexico, for killing a Mexican.

Improved lands in Brazoria county sold at public sale, a few days since, for fifteen dollars per acre. At this sale but few were present, owing to the bad weather.

Mr. Hudson, of the firm of Kirkland & Co., died in Port Lavaca on Saturday night or Sunday last, of black vomit.

The Texan of the 7th says there are several companies of Rangers camped near San Antonio, who will be mustered into the service of the United States in a few days.

Mrs. Ingraham has presented the Methodist Church of Victoria with a new bell.

Hurgarius, says the Advocate, are becoming quite common in Victoria. The store of Mr Oliver was broken into and robbed on the night of the 5th inst.

An Austin letter, in the Seguin Mercury, under date of the 20th of November, states that many of the jurors of the Federal Court were having Austin on account of the non-arrival of Judge Watrous.

The Brazos River has been navigable for the past two months as high up as Washington. There is, according to the Democrat, but one boat in the river, the steamer Brazos.

The Item says that Major Scott, the mail agent, was in Huntsville a short time since. He is hard at work, says this paper, at Galveston, and it is expected that we shall have mails from Houston in about thirty hours, instead of thirty-six. This will be a considerable gain. He has gone to Madisonville to regulate the mail service there.

The Clarksville Standard learns that shortly before the meeting of the Circuit Court in Cook county, a small body of marauding Indians, composed chiefly of Caddoes, stole in one night seventeen horses, and with their booty made good their escape.

Emigrant trains were passing through Austin daily some of which were destined for the Guadalupe and St. Mark's valleys.

The Lavaca Register of the 25th states that Mr. J. B. Craig had left Lavaca for the North, for the purpose of securing steamers to run in opposition to Harris & Morgan's line to New Orleans.

A public meeting held in Woodville, Tyler county, relative to the appropriation of $30,000 made for the erection of a light house at Sabine Pass, passed resolutions censuring the general government for a direction of duty.

The cotton crop was beginning to come in rapidly at Lavaca—one bale having been received during the last five days. The fever has entirely abated and business had commenced in real earnest. The streets were crowded from morning till night.

Dr. Parson writes to the Dallas Herald that at a meeting in Corsicana, $3,000 were subscribed toward improving the navigation of the Trinity river. As soon as a sufficient amount is raised, a boat will be procured to run between Magnolia and Dallas.

It is said the Rangers have already been engaged in several skirmishes with the Indians on the frontier of Texas.

The State Times says that "Captain Walker, after running from the San Saba, made a reconnoissance on the head of the Guadalupe. He encountered a party of Indians—killed several and recaptured nineteen American horses. The particulars of the engagement are not given."

Advices from Santa Fe in the 28th of October, state that the inhabitants of the Mesilla Valley acknowledged the jurisdiction of the United States, and elected Gen. Garland their delegate to Congress. Several refugees from justice had been given up. The Indians were not particularly troublesome.

A NOBLE ACT.—We have learned of an act of magnanimous philanthropy, performed by our friend Carpenter, the Clerk of the Courts of Perry county, says the Paulding (Miss.) Courier, which does infinite credit to the heart of that gentleman. A venerable old negro man and wife, with whom the world had dealt roughly in early years, had settled upon a piece of land with the intention of establishing a pre-emption claim. With their own hands they had cleared and fenced a portion of the tract, indulging the fond hope that they were preparing a ruin but comfortable place of repose for their declining years. A heartless speculator saw the work done, observed that the soil was good and the location eligible, and proceeded to the land office to enter the same at a "bit" an acre. Mr Carpenter learned his inhuman purpose, followed him, passed him on the road at night, reached the office first, entered the land in his name at $1 25 per acre, and then made a deed of gift of the premises to his ancient friends. Other citizens, hearing of the transaction, determined to share in the noble charity of Mr Carpenter, and at once made up the requisite amount of money, which they refunded to the generous donor. He deserves the thanks of the humane and the benevolent for saving age, infirmity and misfortune from the fangs of the sharper.

The construction of a new steamship for the New York and Havre Steamship Company has been commenced in the yard of Westervelt & Sons, New York. Her dimensions will be the same as those of her consort, the Franklin. She is to have water-tight compartments.

MORE MARINE DISASTERS.—From New York papers received yesterday we extract the following telegraphic dispatches:

BOSTON, December 9, 1854.—Private advices from Halifax leave no reasonable doubt to doubt that the steamer Ellen Claiborne, formerly employed by the Newfoundland Telegraph Company, foundered on her recent passage from this city to St. John's. Her officers and crew undoubtedly went down with her.

CHARLESTON, Friday, December 8.—The steamer Plymouth Rock, on her passage from New York last night, passed a schooner cotton laden, on fire, off Stratford. A boat was lowered and sent to the schooner, but no one could be seen about her, nor could her name be ascertained. It is presumed the crew had taken to the boat, as none was seen attached to the schooner.

BUFFALO, Friday, December 8.—The schooner Lewis Cass is ashore east of Conneaut Piers. The crew, seven in number, are on board, and it is feared they cannot be saved.

The crew of the schooner Lewis Cass, reported wrecked off Conneaut yesterday, were saved by the Government life-boat. The boat made two attempts to rescue the poor fellows on the schooner, who were nearly frozen before she succeeded in doing so, and was once driven back and dashed ashore among the breakers, nearly drowning her noble crew; but nothing dannted, and resolute and fearless, they made the second attempt, reached the deck, and took off the suffering crew, not one of whom were able to stand when they reached the shore.

OSWEGO, Friday, December 8.—The schooner Island Queen, which cleared from Oswego on the 3d instant, for Ogdensburg, is ashore near Sodus; and the British brig Halifax, with a cargo of flour from Toronto, is ashore in Mexico Bay near Port Ontario.

ROME, Friday, December 8.—The crew of the wrecked bark Pomona saved themselves by the yawl, and landed at Grenadier Island. The brig Hattax of St. Catherine's, with a cargo of flour for Sackett's Harbor, went ashore at Port Ontario, and is a total wreck.

A CURIOUS SURPRISE.—A Seven Years' Sleep. A letter from San Francisco relates a curious incident that occurred there recently. Her Britannic Majesty's exploring ship Plover arrived at San Francisco a short time since, from the Polar sea, where she had been ice-bound since 1847:

When the first San Francisco, some years ago, it was a mere trading station, resorted to by a few vessels in pursuit of hides, and the town or place contained only a few adobe houses. The captain and crew expected to find the same San Francisco in 1854 that they left in 1847. The captain then fore, sailed into the Bay without a pilot, and approached the city in the evening. He was much amazed at the numerous lights he saw. When he awoke from his dream of seven years, the next morning, he found a noble city occupying five sixths of the ancient San Francisco. He had known nothing of the Mexican war and cession of California to the United States, and the many other great events that had taken place during the time he had been locked up in the frozen regions of the North.

I mentioned in a late letter my belief that the Indians on the frontier were mad taking a hostile movement toward the whites. This opinion has since been confirmed. I have seen several old hunters who have spent years among them, but they all think something unusual is going on, and are coming to the settlements for safety. The demeanor of the Indians of all the tribes I have visited is very much changed. They will sell you nothing; if they meet you on the path they will hide or avoid you; and they positively refuse to give you any shelter, day or night. This is very unusual, as they are the only person who has been in the habit of entertaining travelers. A singular being is that Indian. When I first came to this country, I felt deeply for the wrongs of the "poor Indian." But I have got bravely over that. There are no Philips, no Red Jackets, no Logans about the Indians of our day. They are deceitful, crafty and malicious. They would as lief kill the man who treats them well and feeds them, as they would an inveterate enemy. Of this I have had the fullest evidence. Their women are for the most part good looking, but they have no sense of shame or virtue.

POPULAR SUPERSTITIONS.

The following is a very quaint and diverting list of the Sympathetic Superstitions which were once devoutly believed in by thousands and thousands of the human race:

When women boil yarn, they must tell a lie at the same time, otherwise it will not get white.

Parents must not buy their children any nutties, nor allow any to be given them, or they will be slow at learning, and will speak with difficulty.

When you take straw for a hen's nest out of a marriage bed, you must take it from the man's side if you want cock chickens, and from the wife's if you want hen chickens.

No one must on any account weigh an empty cradle, or he will weigh the child's rest away.

The nails on the hands of an infant must be bitten off by the mother for the first time, or it will learn to steal.

If you wish a child to become a hundred years old, you must get it godfathers out of three different parishes.

If you let a child look into a looking-glass before it is a year old, it will become proud.

Children that cry at christening will die soon.

Let a mother go three Sundays successively out of the church in sileuce, and blow each time into the mouth of her child, and it will get its teeth easy.

Let the father immediately after the christening give the child a sword in its hand, and it will become brave.

Blue cornflowers gathered on Corpus Christi Sunday stop the bleeding at the nose, if they are held in the hand till warm.

A woman can cure her ear-ache by binding a man's stocking around her head.

Elder planted before the stable-door preserves the cattle from witchcraft.

He who carries about him a cord with which a rupture doctor has bound up a rupture may lift the heaviest weight without any danger.

A piece of wood cut of a coffin that has been dug up, when laid in a cabbage-bed, defends it from caterpillars.

One should not lean over a cradle where a child is sleeping, nor should it be left standing open.

He who would sow seed, let him be careful not to lay it on a table, otherwise it will not grow.

He who has the hiccup, let him plunge a naked knife into a can of beer, and take a good draught of it at one breath.

He who cannot sleep, be it a child or adult, let him lay a composing wisp under his pillow; that is, straw which workmen put under the burdens on their backs; but it must be taken from the people unknown to them.

In brewing, lay a bunch of nettles in the barrel; it is then safe against thunder.

A wife who has a cold must sneeze into her husband's shoe.

It is not good to strike a beast with a switch which has been used to correct a child.

Chastise neither man nor beast with a peeled stick, for whatever is beaten with it will dry up.

When you place your shoes reversed at the head of your bed, the Nightmare cannot oppress you.

Old women often cut a turf of a foot long which their enemy has lately trodden on, and hang it up in the chimney, and their enemy must wither away.

Let any one who has great anxiety touch the great toe of a dead person, and he will at once become free from it.

If any one dies in the house, you must shake the bee-hives and the wine and vinegar, or the bees, the wine and the vinegar will all go off or spoil.

The first medicine which a lying-in woman takes, should be out of her husband's spoon; it will then be more efficacious.

During the pains of child-birth, it does good to turn the slippers of the husband round.

Three grains of salt in a measure of milk preserves it from witchcraft.

No one must taste the first warm beer which is given to a lying-in woman; it must be tried with the finger, otherwise the woman will be attacked with colic.

If a child has the red gum, take a piece of wood from a mill-wheel, burn it, and smoke the child's swaddling-clothes therewith; then wash the child with water that flows from the wheel. The wheel that remains must be cast into running water.

You should never wean a child while trees are in blossom; otherwise it will have gray hair.

Three buttons bound together with a thread, and laid in a coffin, will free from warts.

If any one has received a bodily hurt, wash him with brook-water while the bell is tolling for a funeral.

RUSSIAN POLITENESS AND FRENCH HONOR.—The Moniteur de l'Armee says: "We have received a letter from the French lines before Sebastopol, stating that Captain Du Val de Dempierre, bl-de-camp of General Bosquet, taken prisoner during a reconnaissance. In which he himself was killed. Having asked to be conducted to a Russian General, requested him to send word to the advanced posts that he was a prisoner and not wounded, in order to reassure his family and friends. The Russian General, with a courtesy we are happy to proclaim, the more so as it does honor to one of our enemies, replied to M. de Dempierre that he placed every confidence in the word of a French officer, and that he did not hesitate to give him permission to deliver in person the message to his friends on condition that he would return to the Russian camp. M. de Dempierre gratefully accepted the favor, and a few hours afterwards he returned to the Russian advanced posts to redeem his pledge and resume his captivity."

Felicien David, the celebrated French musician, is travelling in the East, during the vacation of the company to which he is attached. The fame of his talent follows him every where—at Cairo he was asked if he would consent to give music lessons to the wives of the Pacha. Mr. David, who saw the harem filled with handsome Circassians, almost Houris, opening before his eyes, accepted the proposal with a warmth, almost too highly disguised. He was led into the unapproachable gynecæum, and there in a porce alin saloon, under the murmurs of a fragrant fountain, he was presented to—five abominable eunuchs! These fellows were to take the lessons from the artist and transmit them to the wives of his Highness!

A DIABOLICAL JUVENILE.—A boy about six years of age, the son of a Mr Cole, living on the farm of Mr. C. Alexander, on the Virginia side of the Potomac, on Friday morning week, during the temporary absence of his mother cut off, with a hatchet, three of the fingers of his infant brother, as he lay in the cradle, with the right hand resting on the side. The mother, happily, returned in time to prevent the lad from inflicting a similar blow upon the other hand of the infant, and arrested his arm before he consummated the act.

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,

CONSUMPTION.

OF all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints, nothing has ever been found which could compare in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions. We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.

The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1847; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Art in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the Cassaw Pictorial, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.

I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how a better remedy can be made for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.

THE UNWELCOME PREACHER.

THE REV. L. D. HUSTON.--SOUTHERN LADIES' COMPANION.

In the fall of 1823, the Methodists of a certain town in Kentucky concluded that they were able, though but twenty-two in number, to support a preacher by themselves. Accordingly they wrote to the Conference, requesting the Bishop to make a station of their village. But, considering their want of numerical and financial strength, it was deemed important that the minister sent them should be a man of popular talents. Because, where he could command the admiration and caress the favor of the people, there was danger of failing to support him.

They, therefore, asked for a brother Johnson—at that time one of the most popular and effective ministers in that State—and made the getting of that particular man the condition upon which they wished to become stations. To them it was clear, that the principles of Methodism, if not of Christianity itself, in that particular region, depended upon having the man they wanted that year. It was thought advisable, however, to choose brother Johnson elsewhere.

There was in the Conference at the time, a young man who had just been received into connection, without experience and reflection as a preacher, and by nature disqualified for any position where his abilities were likely to be tried. Tender-minded and addicted to gloom, exposure to bad treatment, or, what would be worse, a cold reception from those to whom he might be sent, would dishearten him at once. Some such treatment most probably awaited any other man save brother Johnson, who might be sent to the town of which we speak; yet this young man was selected to go. Fortunately, however, the Bishop was to accompany him.

It is known to as many as were acquainted with Bishop George, that his most noticeable characteristic was prayerfulness. The fervency, fervor, and singular power with which he addressed the throne of Grace, are mentioned as often as a reminiscence of him is made. During their journey, of some two hundred miles on horseback, the young preacher had abundant opportunity to observe and imbibe the spirit of this excellent man. When they stopped for meals, rest, lodging, or to see and encourage some pious family, whose residence by the way was known to them, they had a season of prayer.

When about twelve miles from the place of the young man's destination, at the house of brother S., the Bishop was attacked with malaria, a disease to which he was very liable. The remedies which usually relieved him were tried without effect; the man of God got no better. At length he sent for the young preacher, and directing his attention to the sublime description of the New Jerusalem, contained in the Book of Revelation, desired him to take his Bible into the grove, meditate upon that passage for a season, and then come in and preach to him what it: "for," said he, "I want to get hupon it: If my soul was powerfully blessed, I think it would cure my body."

The young man, ever distrustful of his own powers, was alarmed at the idea. He begged to be excused; and prompted as much, perhaps, by fear as by faith, recommended to the Bishop his never-failing expedient for getting happy"—prayer.

"Well," said the sick man, "go out, my son, and shut the door; let me be left alone." His wish was complied with. In another moment he was composing his mind to its favorite employment; Elijah, wrapped in the mantle of prayer, was alone with God.

For a moment all was silent, but at length loud and repeated pruises issued from the sick room. The family gathered round to rejoice with the man of prayer; and the immediate effect of the excitement was a cure of the malady so effectual that the travelers proceeded on their journey in the morning.

Before they started, the good brother with whom they were sojourning, broke to the unsuspecting young preacher the shocking intelligence, already in the reader's possession, that he would be an unwelcome arrival at the place of his appointment. Of course, he was sunk at once in the deepest dejection. Possessed of keen perceptions of the painful, and nervously sensitive to any unkindness, he was a very man to be overwhelmed in such a situation. Personal danger, trial, toil, would have daunted him; but to be coldly pushed off as not welcome, to feel that he was imposed upon a people who did not want him, as what he could not bear. Instantly reasoning, therefore, not to submit to such a mortification, he hastened to communicate his discovery and his purpose to the superintendent. The Bishop, aware of the feeling of revolt with which his protegé was liable to be struck, exhorted him, nevertheless, to determine upon nothing rashly; to wait till he saw the place and the people, and in the mean while to give himself to prayer: adding, that he had himself persuaded all the while that the appointment was "right," and in the end would prove providential. This advice was reluctantly given.

Arrived at the new station, they were the guests of a prominent member of the Church, and one for many years afterward as the usual host and fast friend of the preachers. The next morning, as the Bishop was preparing to pursue his journey, he and the good brother of the house were conversing together in the parlor, while, unknown to them and without design, the young preacher was sitting in the porch near the window, with nothing but a thin curtain between him and them; so that what passed was distinctly audible to him.

"Well, brother," said the bishop, "how will the young man do?"

"Not at all, he will not do at all, sir; we might as well be left without a preacher altogether," was the emphatic reply.

"O, I hope you will like him better, after awhile," rejoined the old man. "Treat him kindly, and I am persuaded he will do you good."

"I have no objection," returned the host, "to his staying at my house for a few weeks, if you desire it, but it will be useless—he is not the one we wanted."

The poor young man could hear no more; he crept from the porch almost blind with mortification. The thought that he was to remain with a people who considered him a tolerated burden—that every mouthful he ate was to be a charity—that he was to be a young and healthy mendicant—sickened him!

He was lying in wait as the Bishop sallied forth, and, drawing him to a spot where they were sheltered from observation, he burst into tears, exclaiming, "O, Bishop, I can not stay; I heard what passed in the room, and indeed you must release me."

"Can you get your horse and ride a little way with me?"

This he did with alacrity—glad of even an hour's respite from his painful position.

After riding a few miles, they turned off into the woods, and dismounting by a fallen tree, engaged in solemn and importunate prayer—prayer for light and help in that dark and trying hour. Then, taking the hand of his companion, the Bishop turned upon him a look of love, which none but a strong, stern heart can feel—so deep and genuine was it—so full of serious concern and earnest sympathy.

There is a smile too bright to be deep; it is born and it dies on the surface. Not such was the expression of this good man's face—it shined clear up from a heart constrained by the love of Christ. It did not glitter, but its glow seemed to pervade and warm its object. A truly pious, stern man is always gentle, and he only can impart that look which, like the remembered smile of a mother, will sometimes sooth us into delicious tears twenty years after the face that wore it has perished.

He concluded an address fraught with parental feeling and sound wisdom, with, "Now my son, I will make you a proposition: see if you can fulfill the conditions of it: Go back to the town; if you find a cross there, bear it; diligently and lovingly perform every part of your duty: do the work of an evangelist; fast once a week, and spend one hour of each day in special prayer, that God may open your way in that community; do this for one month, and if at the end of that month you do not feel willing to stay, consider yourself released from the appointment. Can you do this?"

He thought he could: upon which they took an affectionate leave of each other, and Enoch George—what signifies a title to such a man?—turned toward the southwest and assumed his pilgrimage of hardships. The young man sat upon his horse watching the receding form, till it sank out of sight in the horizon. Not till that moment had he fairly tasted the exquisite bitterness of his cup. The "man angel," upon whom he had leaned, was gone, and he was left to grapple with his trial alone. He could have sobbed like any boy.

Faithfully did he comply with the condition of his promise, through all the tedious month, without discerning any material change in his own feelings, or in the bearing of his people toward him; albeit, one wicked man and his wife had from the beginning endeavored to encourage him.

Finally, the last Sabbath arrived of the month, during which he had promised to stay. The glad village bells were pealing their summons to the house of God, as our hero—was he not a hero?—arose from the struggle of the last hour of prayer. He walked out toward the little attic window, which commanded a view of most of the streets, wiping his eyes and thinking of the few reluctant hearers who awaited him, when lo! what a sight met his gaze! Group after group of citizens were flocking to the Methodist church! At first a sense of awe came over him, and then a glass of mingled feelings, as if confidence and strength, and joy were storming the heart, while fear and weakness, and mortification still disputed the right of possession.

He hastened to his pulpit, and as he arose from the first silent prayer, the thought of victory thrilled through him like the voice of a clarion. His text was Isaiah vi, 4; "And the posts of the door moved at the voice of him that cried." The attention of the audience was arrested by the announcement, for the voice that had been wont to tremble with embarrassment now rang clear with a tone of authority; his eye, hitherto confused and unsteady, now kindled with "a light that never shined on sea or shore." Fresh from the chamber where he had accomplished his thirtieth hour of special prayer, the live coal had touched his lips; he was with a witness, "a man sent from God," and gloriously baptized with the Holy Ghost.

He referred his text back to the point at which Christ first interposed for man's salvation—the voice that cried, "Lo! I come, to do thy will," he applied it to the sacrificial offering of Jesus—the voice that cried, "It is finished," he carried forward the application to "the right hand of the Majesty on high," where the Intercessor makes his dying words immortal, crying with infinite iteration, "Father, forgive them;" to the day when sound shall make its next impression upon "the dull, cold ear of death," when at the "voice of the Son of God, the dead, small and great, shall rise."

The power of the Highest was manifestly upon the audience, and the presence of an ambassador of Christ was attested by sobs and groans from every part of the house. The preacher descended from the pulpit, without pausing in his discourse; he invited to the place of prayer those who desired to flee the wrath to come. With loud cries for mercy, sinners came streaming down the aisle, and before the congregation were dismissed, seven souls professed to find peace in believing.

When the meeting broke up, the pastor hastened back to his closet. Many a time had he entered it disheartened and sad, never before to triumph. He thought of good Bishop George, and his steady persuasion that the appointment was "right;" of the fastings and prayers—all the way down to the last hour's experience—and his faith in God and in the efficacy of prayer, then and there settled down into a substance upon which time has made no impression. Thirty-one years of toil and change have passed over him since that sweet Sabbath; the vicissitudes of an itinerant's life have led him, through heat and cold, by night and day, from one end of Kentucky to the other, till

> "He is known to every star,
> And every wind that blows.

Forms then unknown, afterward became dear as life, and then perished from his sight; "sickness and sorrow, pain and death," have left their scars upon his form and heart, but nothing has ever shaken his confidence in the God that answers prayer. The memory of that bright morning is as fresh beneath his gray hairs as it was beneath his locks of jet. Like trampled chamomile, the virtues of his spirit took deeper root for being bruised, and shed a perfume that has sweetened life's atmosphere ever since.

For four weeks very little was attended to but the revival. Stores and shops were closed during the hours of worship, which occurred twice, and often three times a day. At one of the meetings, held in a private house—where the venerable John Littlejohn was present—a call was made for those who wished to join the Church, and one hundred and eleven persons presented themselves for admission!

Thus the permanent establishment of Methodism, in Russellville, Ky., was effected, under God, through the instrumentality of —The Unwelcome Preacher.

It will doubtless add to the interest of the foregoing narrative, for the reader to know that the subject of it is now our worthy senior Book Agent, Rev. E. Stevenson, D. D.

CAUSE OF CHANGES IN CLIMATE.

THE MAGNET AND COLD.

History informs us that many of the countries of Europe, which now possess very mild winters, at one time experienced severe cold at this season of the year. The Tiber, at Rome, was frozen over, and snow at one time lay for forty days in that city. The Euxine Sea was frozen over every winter during the time of Ovid, and the rivers Rhine and Rhone used to be frozen so deep that the ice sustained loaded wagons. The waters of the Tiber, Rhine and Rhone, now flow freely every winter; ice is unknown in Rome, and the waves of the Euxine dash their wintry foam unrestrained upon the rocks.

Some have ascribed these climate changes to agriculture, the cutting down of dense forests, the exposure of the upturned soil to the summer sun, and the draining of the great marshes. We do not believe that such great changes could have been produced in the climate of any country by agriculture, and we are certain no such theory can account for the contrary change of climate—from warm to cold winters—which history tells us has taken place in other countries than those named. Greenland received its name from the emerald herbage that clothed its valleys and mountains; and its east coast, which is now inaccessible on account of the perpetual ice heaped upon its shores, was, in the eleventh century, the seat of flourishing Scandinavian colonies, all trace of which is now lost. Cold Labrador was named Vinland by the Northmen who visited it in the year 1,000, and who were charmed with its then mild climate. The cause of these changes is an important inquiry.

A pamphlet by John Murray, civil engineer, has recently been published in London, in which he endeavors to account for these great changes of climate by the changable position of the magnetic poles. The magnetic variation or declination of the needle is well known. At the present time it amounts in London to about twenty-three degrees west of north, while in 1659 the line of variation passed through England, and then moved gradually west until 1816. In that year a great removal of ice took place on the coast of Greenland; hence it is inferred that the cold meridian, which is now supposed to pass through Canada and Siberia, may at one time have passed through Italy; and that if the magnetic meridian returns, as it is now doing, to its old lines in Europe, Rome may once more see her Tiber frozen over, and the merry Rhinelander drive his team on the ice of the classic river.

Whether the changes of climate mentioned have been caused by the change of the magnetic meridian or not, we have too few facts before us, at present, to decide conclusively; but the idea once spread abroad, will soon lead to such investigation as will, no doubt, remove every obscurity and settle the question.

It is harder to avoid censure than to gain applause; for this may be done by one great or wise action in an age. But to escape censure, a man must pass his whole life without saying or doing one ill or foolish thing. [Hume.

THE PRAYER MEETING.

DUTY OF PASTORS, OFFICERS AND MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH, TO BE PRESENT AT THE REGULAR WEEKLY PRAYER MEETING.

It is the express command and example of our blessed Savior, to watch and pray, that we enter not into temptation.

1st. It is expected that pastors who have at heart the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, should set a proper example to their people, by regular attendance at the weekly prayer meeting, and not be, as many are, hindrances in the way of their people's spiritual improvement, by absenting themselves, under cover of frivolous excuses of "no time," and the like, and thereby granting licenses to their people to go and do likewise; which, unhappily, the people often do and quote their pastor's example in justification. Pastors are the leaders of their people, and should be the first and foremost in every work to edify them, and should make no engagement nor belong to any society that interferes with their primary duties to their particular church and people; for only let pastors, as the church's leaders, do their duty, one of which is to be present at the weekly prayer meetings, and let them show that they actually prize the privilege, and it will not be long before their example will be appreciated and imitated by their people, in an increased attendance at prayer meetings, lectures and Sabbath services; for every pastor knows (that wishes to know) that he holds a position of influence which no officer or member can possibly possess, for he can from the pulpit (if his heart is in the work) lay before his hearers, from time to time, cogent reasons why the stated prayer meetings should be attended by all. And then, when pastors take bold energetically, their influence will be seen and felt, and the answer to the question, Shall the dry bones of this or that congregation live! will be in the affirmative: for the Divine Spirit by Ezekiel, commanded to prophesy upon dry bones, to pray, and he did so; and the dead bones were made to live in answer to fervent prayer. Pastors must, therefore, be earnest with God in prayer, for the working of the Spirit with the Word in our churches, where so many dry bones lie exposed to view, and fervently to prophesy to the wind to come and breathe upon them, that they may live; for God's grace can save souls without preaching, but preaching cannot save them without God's grace; and that grace must be sought by unceasing prayer by pastor and people.

2d. It is the duty of officers and members of the church to sustain their devoted pastor in all his efforts to edify his people, by giving their personal attendance at all the prayer meetings, lectures and Sabbath exercises; to feel deeply, pray fervently, and contribute liberally, for the evangelization of the whole world. One of the blessed results of a praying people is, that they cannot be a contentious people; for those who often meet together before the heart searching Jehovah will not retain ill-will towards each other, but must love and live with each other in being useful in their day and generation.

The following are additional reasons why the stated prayer meetings should be attended by all.

1st. To fulfill the positive command of God, to assemble and pray.

"Forget not the assembling of yourselves together as the manner of some is." "Pray without ceasing." "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and the door shall be opened," "Ye receive not because ye ask not."

2d. To obtain blessings promised to united prayer.

"If two of you shall agree on earth, as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven."

3d. To receive the gift of the Holy Spirit.

"If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him."

4th. To make the preached truth efficacious.

"Brethren, pray for us, that the Word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified." Manifestation of the Spirit's power on the day of Pentecost, "the disciples were, with one accord, in one place."

5th. To secure the conversion of the world.

"Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession."

ONE DROP AT A TIME.—"Life," says the late John Foster, "is expenditure; we have it, but are as continually losing it; we have the use of it, but are as constantly wasting it. Suppose a man confined in some fortress, under the doom to stay there till death; and suppose that there is for his use a dark reservoir of water, to which it is certain none can ever be added. He may suppose the quantity is very great; he cannot penetrate to ascertain how much, but it may be very little. He has drawn from it, by means of a fountain, a good while already, and drawn from it every day. But how would he feel each time of drawing and each time of thinking of it? Not as if he had a perennial spring to go to. Not, 'I have a reservoir, I may be at ease.' No! but, 'I had water yesterday, I have water to-day; but having had it, and my having it to-day is the very cause that I shall not have it on some day that is approaching. At the same time I am compelled to this fatal expenditure!' So of our mortal, transient life! And yet men are very indisposed to admit the plain truth, that life is a thing which they are in no other way possessing than as necessarily consuming; and that even in this imperfect sense of possession, it becomes every day a less possession."

CHURCH FELLOWSHIP.

CLASS MEETINGS.

The London Watchman closes what it terms a "Lay Sermon," with the following suggestions concerning "Class Meetings." We commend them to such as do not love class meetings, particularly where they refer to the spiritual influence of this delightful, but too lightly prized, means of grace:

"Could not the 'love feast' be gradually improved into something still more edifying and expressive of the mutual help afforded by each member to each, in the body of Christ? Might not the society meeting still more powerfully elicit the sense of church fellowship? And then, above all, there is the class meeting, which is to our economy what the germ-cell is to the primordial forms of vegetable organization. Two or three Methodists set down upon the shores of a distant continent, attract each other by a vital affinity; they form a 'class meeting,' and this rudimentary organism contains the very life, and possesses, in a dormant state, all the essential attributes of Methodism. In this way the Australian Connexion and the Methodist Episcopal Church of America have been evolved from the germ of the class meeting. At this moment the class meeting is the first, the intimate, and the indispensable condition of fellowship in our church. Accordingly, those who are ostensibly or secretly our enemies, declaim against these meetings; but none can do us so much injury as those who desire to be numbered among our friends, and yet neglect, and so discountenance them. That it is substantially in the power of the church to direct this particular mode of mutual help and oversight, as the criterion of membership, the foundation of godly discipline, and the expression of fellowship, we conceive it would be superfluous to argue. We go much farther, and maintain that after this mode has been providentially laid before us, and so abundantly blessed among us, and after the attestation of millions to its adaptation to their spiritual instincts and needs, it would be infatuation, weakness and wickedness to surrender one privilege or attribute of the 'class meeting,' and to remove the line, not of separation, but of distinction, between the congregation and the church, the hearers and the members. If we might be permitted to offer a suggestion to the hearer, 'the anxious inquirer' in the congregation, it would be—to try the 'class meeting' for a single quarter; and if we might address another to some of our intelligent members, especially the employers of labor in large towns, to whom many look up with trustful and kindly feelings, it would be—to become desirous, with a godly ambition, of a call to this work. Some of the most successful men of business we have known in our connexion have been leaders of large classes; and, on the other hand, some of those who, in the midst of worldly prosperity, have found it most difficult to maintain the vigor of the spiritual life, having suffered, it is too probable, from declining the self-rewarding responsibilities of this most important spiritual office.

THE CHARACTER OF PAUL.

BY J. T. HEADLEY.

Paul in his natural character, before his conversion, resembles Bonaparte more than any other man—I mean both in his intellectual developments and energy of will. He had the same inflexibility of purpose, the same utter indifference, when he had once determined on his course; the same tireless, unconquering resolution—the same fearlessness both of man's power and opinion, and calm self-reliance and mysterious control over others. But the point of greatest resemblance is the union of strong, correct judgment, with rapidity of thought and sudden impulse. They thought quicker, yet better than other men. The power, too, which both possessed, was all practical power. There are many men of strong minds, whose forces nevertheless, are in reflection, or in theories to act upon. Thought may work out into language, but not into action. They will plan better than they can perform. But these men not only thought better, but they could work better than all other men.

The same self-control and perfect subjection of his emotions—even terror itself—to the mandates of his will, are exhibited in his conduct when smitten to the earth, and blinded by the light and voice from heaven. John, when arrested by the same voice, on the isle of Patmos, fell on his face as a dead man, and dared not speak or stir, till encouraged by the language—"Fear not." But Paul (or Saul) although a persecutor and a violent man, showed no symptoms of alarm or terror. The voice, the blow, the light, the glory, the darkness that followed, were sufficient to upset the strongest mind; but master of himself and his emotions, instead of giving way to exclamations of terror, he simply said—"Lord, what wilt thou have me do?" With his reason and judgment as steady and strong as ever, he knew at once that something was wanted of him, and ever ready to act, he asked what it was.

From this time his track can be distinguished by the commotions about it, and the light above it. Straight back to Jerusalem, from whence he had so recently come, with letters to legalize his persecutions, he went to cast lot with those he had followed with violence and slaughter. His strong heart never beat one quicker pulsation through fear, as the lofty turrets of the proud city flashed upon his vision. Neither did he steal away to the dark alleys and streets, where the disciples were concealed, and tell them secretly his faith in the Son of God. He strode into the synagogues, and before the astonished priests preached Christ and him crucified. He thundered at the door of the Sanhedrim itself, and shaking Jerusalem like an earthquake, awoke a tempest of rage and fury on himself. With assassins dogging his footsteps he at length left the city. But, instead of going to places where he was unknown, and where his feelings would be less tried, he started for his native city, his father's house, the home of his boyhood, for his kindred friends. Te entreaties, tears, scorn, and violence, he was alike impervious. To Antioch and Cyprus, along the coasts of Syria and Rome, over the known world, he went like a blazing comet, waking up the nations of the earth. From the top of Mars Hill, with the gorgeous city at his feet, and the Acropolis and Parthenon behind him, on the deck of his shattered vessel, in the interval of the crash of billows, in the gloomy walls of a prison, on the borders of the eternal kingdom, he speaks in the same calm and determined tone. Deterred by no danger, awed by no danger, awed by no presence, and shrinking from no responsibility, he moves before us like some grand embodiment of power. The nations heave around him, and kings turn pale in his presence. Hands of conspirators swear never to drink till they have slain him, and people stone him; yet over the din of the conflict and the storm of violence, his voice of eloquence rises as clear and distinct as a trumpet call. As he still preached Christ and him crucified. The whip is laid on his back until blood starts with every blow, and then his mangled body is thrown into a dungeon; but at midnight you hear that same calm, strong voice which has shaken the world, poured forth in a hymn of praise to God! and lo! an earthquake shakes the prison to its foundations, the manacles fall from the hands of the captives, the bolts withdraw of themselves, and the massive doors swing back on their hinges.

One cannot point a single spot in his career where he faltered a moment, or gave way to discouragement or fear. Through all his perilous life he exhibited the same intrepidity of character and lofty spirit. With his eye fixed on regions beyond the ken of ordinary mortals, and kindling on glories it was not permitted to reveal, he pressed forward to an incorruptible crown, a fadeless kingdom. And then his death, how indescribably sublime! Napoleon dying in the midst of a midnight storm, with the last words that fell from his lips a battle cry, and his passing spirit watching, in its delirium, the torn heads of his mighty columns, as they disappeared in the smoke of the conflict, is a sight that awes and startles us. But, behold Paul, also a worn veteran, battered with many a scar, though in a spiritual warfare, looking back, not with alarm, but with transport, gazing not on earth, but in heaven. Hear his calm, serene voice ringing over the storms and commotions of life: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course—there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." No shouts of foemen, nor smoke of carnage of battle surrounded his spirit struggling to be free; but troops of shining angels, the smile of God and the songs of the redeemed—these guarded and welcomed him home.

SLEEVES AND SAUCE.—The most stupid and ugly fashions always last the longest. How many years the long dresses have swept the streets! For the last twelve months bonnets have been flying off the head, and so, probably they will continue for twelve months more. However, the bonnets are simply ridiculous. As to long dresses, there is something to be said for them. They are convenient to aged ladies. They enable them to enjoy, without attracting remark, the comfort of list slippers and laced stockings and rollers for their poor old ancles. They render it possible for young ladies to wear bluchers and high-lows, thereby avoiding damp feet, and to save washing, by making one pair of stockings last a week. So they will doubtless continue to be worn whilst the laws of fashion are dictated by a splay-footed beauty or a lady troubled with bunions.

But this kind of apology cannot be made for hanging sleeves. They are not only absurd but inconvenient. They are always getting in the way, in the sauce, and in the butter-boat. Your wife cannot help you to a potatoe across the table but she upsets her glass and breaks it with her dangling sleeve. It may be said that your wife has no business to help potatoes—that there ought to be footmen in attendance for that purpose. Certainly; or else she should not wear sleeves. But ladies must, of course follow the height of fashion, whether suitable to their circumstances or not.

Could not the leaders of fashion, then, in pity to the less opulent classes, devise and sanction a kind of sleeves, adapted to a life in a cottage—whether near a wood or elsewhere—to be called cottage sleeves, and to be worn by the genteel cottager-classes, without prejudice to their gentility? [Punch.

WOMAN'S LAUGH.—A woman has no natural grace more bewitching than a sweet laugh. It is like the sound of flutes on the water. It leaps from the heart in a clear, sparkling rill; and the heart that hears it feels as if bathed in the cool, exhilirating spring. Have you ever pursued an unseen fugitive through trees, led on by her fairy laugh, now here, now there, now lost, now found? We have. And we are pursuing that wandering voice to this day. Sometimes it comes to us in the midst of care, or sorrow, or irksome business; and then we turn away and listen, and hear it ringing through the room like a silver ball, with power to scare away the ill spirits of the mind. How much we owe to that sweet laugh! It turns the prose of our life into poetry; it flings showers of sunshine over the darksome wood in which we are traveling; it touches with light even our sleep, which is no more the image of death, but is consumed with dreams that are shadows of immortality. STORMING OF A CITY.

When a city is taken by storm, in military phrase, and in accordance with the usages of war, it is "given up to the soldiery." What this means will be apparent from the frightful picture of Badajos, as it appeared on the night after it had been carried by the Allies, under Wellington, April 6, 1812. Says an English officer, who participated in the assault:

It was nearly dusk, and the few hours while I slept had made a fearful change in the condition and temper of the soldiery. In the morning they were obedient to their officers, and preserved the semblance of subordination; now they were in a state of furious intoxication; discipline was forgotten, and the splendid troops of yesterday had become a fierce and sanguinary rabble, dead to every touch of human feeling, and filled with every demoniac passion that can brutalize the man. The city was in terrible confusion, and on every side horrible tokens of military license met the eye.

One street, as I approached the castle, was almost choked up with broken furniture; for the houses had been gutted from the cellar to the garret, the partitions torn down, and even the beds ripped up and scattered to the winds in the hope that gold might be found concealed. A convent at the end of the strada of St. John was in flames, and I saw more than one wretched nun in the arms of a drunken soldier.

Farther on the confusion seemed greater. Brandy and wine casks were rolled out before the stores; some were full, some half drunk out, but more staved in, in mere wantonness, and the liquors running through the kennel. Many a harrowing scream saluted the ear of the passer-by; many a female supplication was heard asking in vain for mercy. How could it be otherwise, when it is remembered that twenty thousand furious and licentious madmen were loosed upon an immense population, among which many of the loveliest women upon earth might be found? All within that devoted city was at the disposal of an infuriated army, over whom, for the time, control was lost, aided by an infamous collection of camp-followers, who were, if possible, more sanguinary and pitiless even than those who had survived the storm!

It is useless to dwell upon a scene from which the heart revolts. Few females in this beautiful town were saved that night from insult. The noblest and the beggar; the nun, and the wife and daughter of the artisan; youth and age, all were involved in general ruin. None were respected, and consequently few escaped. The madness of those desperate brigands was variously exhibited; some fired through doors and windows; others at church bells; many at the wretched inhabitants as they fled into the streets to escape the bayonets of the savages, who were demolishing their property within doors; while some wretches, as if blood had not flowed in sufficient torrents already, shot from the windows their own companions as they staggered on below! What chances had the miserable inhabitants of escaping death, when more than one officer perished by the bullets and bayonets of the very men whom a few hours before he had led to the assault?

This city contained about sixteen thousand inhabitants, and had twice before within the space of thirteen months been subjected to the horrors of a siege, by the "Liberators of the Peninsula."

A LUNATIC'S CUNNING.

A very laughable incident occurred at a lunatic asylum at Lancaster about ten days ago. A parish officer from the neighborhood of Middleton took a lunatic to the asylum, pursuant to an order signed by two magistrates. As the man was respectably connected, a gig was hired for the purpose, and he was persuaded that it was merely an excursion of pleasure on which he was going. In the course of the journey, however, something occurred to arouse the suspicions of the lunatic with respect to his real destination; but he said nothing on the subject, made no resistance, and seemed to enjoy his jaunt. When they arrived at Lancaster it was too late in the evening to proceed to the asylum, and they took up their quarters for the night at an inn. Very early in the morning the lunatic got up and searched the pockets of the officer, where he found the magistrates' order for his own detention, which, of course, let him completely into the secret. With that cunning which madmen not infrequently display, he made the best of his way to the asylum, saw one of the keepers, and told him that he had got a mad fellow down at Lancaster, whom he should bring up in the course of the day, adding: "He's a very queer fellow, and he has got very odd ways. For instance, I should not wonder if he was to say I was the mad man, and that he was bringing me; but you must take good care of him, and not believe a word that he says."

The keeper, of course, promised compliance, and the lunatic walked back to the inn, where he found the officer still fast asleep. He awoke him, and they sat down to breakfast together.

"You're a lazy fellow to be sleeping all day; I have had a long walk this morning," said the lunatic.

"Indeed," said the officer, "I should like to have a walk myself after breakfast; perhaps you will go with me?"

The lunatic assented, and after breakfast they set out, the officer leading the way toward the asylum, intending to deliver his charge; but it never occurred to him to examine whether his order was safe.

When they got within sight of the asylum, the lunatic exclaimed: "What a fine house that is!"

"Yes," said the officer, "I should like to see the inside of it."

"So should I," observed the lunatic.

"Well, I dare say they will let us through: I will ask," was the response.

They went to the door; the officer rang the bell, and the keeper whom the lunatic had previously seen made his appearance with two or three assistants. The officer then began to fumble in his pockets for the order, when the lunatic produced it, and gave it to the keeper, saying: "This is the man I spoke to you about. You will take care of him; shave his head, and put a straight waistcoat on him."

The men immediately laid hands on the poor officer, who vociferated loudly that the other was the madman, and he the officer; but, as this only confirmed the story previously told by the lunatic, it did not at all tend to procure his liberation. He was taken away, and became so indignantly furious that the straight waistcoat was speedily put upon him, and his head was shaved secundum artem.

Meanwhile the lunatic walked deliberately back to the inn, paid the reckoning, and set out on his journey homeward. The good people in the country were, of course, surprised on seeing the wrong man return; they were afraid that the lunatic in a fit of frenzy had murdered the officer, and they asked him, with much trepidation, what he had done with Mr. Stevenson.

"Done with him!" said the madman, "why, I left him at the Lancaster Asylum as mad as hell!" which, indeed, was not very far from the truth; for the wits of officer were well nigh upset by his unexpected detention and subsequent treatment.

Further inquiry was forthwith made by his neighbors, and it was ascertained that the man was actually in the asylum. A magistrate's order was produced for his liberation; and he returned home with a handkerchief tied round his head in lieu of the covering which nature had bestowed upon it. A traveler from the South has issued a suit against the proprietors of the Metropolitan Hotel, New York, for the sum of $100, stolen from his trunk. The defence said that the hotel notice, forwarded that all moneys should be deposited in the desk in the office. The court argued negligence on the part of the proprietors in not having a stronger police force, and gave judgment against them for the sum of $196 66, and costs.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30.

"How old art Thou?"—An editorial—considerable lengthwise—of the "Great official," 14th inst., gives information that its "luck" has been "hid upon us; and what is equally news, that we have been "skinned;" and more surprising still, that we "felt it keenly." Really, we were not aware of what had happened. Now that our excellent contemporary has analyzed his editorials and marked the string points, we hope to be able to cut them too. This was meant for "a look"—that for "keen," etc. [Like the Dutch artist writing under his painting—"This is a horse."

But, we cannot let our venerable brother McFerrin off that way. Thoughtlessly he made an issue between us of age. Innocently on our part, and perhaps indelicately but not unkindly, we joined that issue. See how he dodges it:

"But brother McTyeire seems to be seriously offended that we alluded to his youth, and is very desirous of knowing our age. Well, as we have said nothing special in reference to that subject, personally, we are not quite sure that an answer would add much to his large stock of information."

Could any sphinx beat that dodge? We were not offended at all, Doctor: not ashamed to tell our age: told it to you, the first time you hinted that way. Tell us yours. Come Doctor, now: no dodging.

Leonard Periodicals.—We refer our readers to the Advertisement of L. Scott & Co., who are the only republishers of Periodicals leading and indicating the higher class of public opinion in England.

The present critical state of European affairs will render these publications unusually interesting during the forthcoming year. They occupy a middle ground between the hastily written news items, crude speculations, and flying rumors of the daily journal, and the ponderous tome of the future historian, written after the living interest and excitement of the great political events of the time shall have passed away.

The republishers inform us of arrangements now permanently made for the receipt of early sheets from the British Publishers, by which they are enabled to place these Reprints in the hands of subscribers, about as soon as they can be furnished with the foreign copies.

Death of a Minister.—We regret to learn from the Presbyterian Herald, that the Rev. J. E. Davidson, recently pastor of the church at Minden, Louisiana, has departed this life. Mr. Davidson had been but a few years in the ministry, and gave promise of much usefulness.

We regret that Rev. A. M. Wynn's health so failed as to compel his return. He got no farther on his way to California than Havana, when hemorrhage, aggravated by sea voyage, caused him to return.

Home Circle.—The editorial character of this Monthly is most favorably foreshadowed in the first article on our first page. It is the best prospectus that could be issued.

AN IMMIGRANT EVANGELIST.

Rev. R. S. Finley, who had just "landed" by an overland route in Texas, lets us hear from him in the best style: And his friends would like to have the benefit of our note. To this sort of immigration Texas is much indebted for the honorable position she enjoys in respect to schools, temperance and religion:

Kickapoo, Anderson Co., Texas,
Dec. 5, 1854.

I have just landed in that part of Texas above indicated; purchased a farm on the Neches River, eighteen miles from Palestine: family all in health and much delighted. So you see I have bidden adieu to my mother Conference. Heaven bless the Alabama conference eighteen years of the flower of my life have been spent in the vineyard of my master under her direction and within her bounds. Here opens before me a vast field, white unto the harvest. May I have grace to occupy it successfully!

Before my wagons were unloaded, I opened my ministry to an attentive congregation upon the first Psalm, and was much refreshed in spirit by a good old fashioned Methodist shout in the sequel. I also obtained a subscriber for the New Orleans Christian Advocate. Please forward it.

Circuses and Public Concerts.—Parents and guardians, do you realize to what a fearful extent this class of entertainments (so called) is vitiating the taste and depraving the minds of your children? Very many of them now seem to think more of learning to turn somersets and handsprings than of storing their minds with useful knowledge; more of singing foolish and vulgar songs, than of learning to declaim well.

Many teachers are doing all they can to resist this tide of moral and degrading influence, but still the work of demoralization goes on. It is not confined to any particular class—it affects those of every rank. Is not the evil of sufficient importance to demand your serious attention? If it is not soon arrested or counteracted, it may be forever too late to prevent its ruinous consequences. Even now, so general among boys is the fondness for imitating the performances of the clown and the Ethiopian minstrel, that the visit of a circus or a band of singers, is sure to spoil a school for that week, and greatly to injure its usefulness for weeks afterward.

THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

The twenty-third Annual Session of this body convened in Talladega, Dec. 13. Bp Andrew presiding.

T. W. Dorman and J. A. Heard were appointed secretaries.

There was a larger attendance than ever before, of ministers, and a working, harmonious meeting.

The rich valley of Talladega and adjacent country is being put in connection with Selma by railroad, now completed 56 miles. Over this road we made our way to the seat of Conference as far as Montevallo, and thence by a pleasant day's staging. For solidness of construction, smoothness and comfort of motion, the Selma railroad is not surpassed.

It is a beautiful country. Springs coming out of rocks, pebbly-bottomed streams, cereal vales and pleasant mountains are the characteristics. The inhabitants are mostly Baptists and Methodists—a plain, thrifty and intelligent people. The Conference and its visitors were most hospitably entertained. This was, to most of them, the first visit to Talladega, which means "Border-Town."

Two members had died during the year—Thos. J. Campbell and Lewis Oslin. Intelligence was received, also, of the death of a probationer, John Gross. Of these brethren there was a good report.

Among the one hundred and sixty ministers present, there was one we wished to see, but did not—Wm. Murrah. Few sessions of this body, if any, have been held without him, since his early connection with it. Foremost in counsel and labor has he stood, his clear voice ringing out in song, sermon and speech, ever well-timed and wisely. A communication from him informed the Conference that family affliction bore heavily upon him, in consequence of which he was absent and asked a location. Locate Murrah! They would not hear it. In his sore affliction (the derangement of a son, a beloved boy, the care of whom devolves on the father) they deeply sympathised and would grant him a supernumerary relation, praying that a kind Providence might open his way to effective position again.

Readmitted into Conference:

P. R. McCrary, B. S. Williams, Jas. S. Lane.

Admitted from Meth. Prot. Church:

Edwin Baldwin.

Admitted on Probation:

Robt. S. Woodward. J. N. Glover, J. M. Elliot, Wm. I. Johnson, Wm. C. Hearn, Thos. A. Tann, J. T. M. Gregory, G. Hewkins, T. C. Wier, Jas. C. Steward, Jas. S. Stone, Geo. J. Mason, F. T. J. Brandon, Edw'd McClellan, Jos. H. Hightower, Wm. M. Motley, Jno. W. Rush, J. W. Jordan, Wm. A. McCarty, Jno. W. Solomon, Thos. S. Abernathy, Jun., Wm. A. Sampey, W. L. Thompson.

Admitted into full connection:

A. Watson, J. M. Patton, F. Walker, J. A. Peebles, F. M. Crain, F. M. Grace, G. W. Brown, S. H. Cox, R. Scales, W. A. Shegog, Walter C. Harris, M. S. Andrews, J. B. Cottrell, L. F. Dowdell, J. N. Depree and J. J. Hutchinson.

On Sabbath, after sermon, 11, A. M., by Bishop Andrew, there were ordained fifteen travelling deacons and twenty local. In the afternoon two travelling elders and fifteen local. The pre-ordination sermon, preached by Dr. J. Hamilton, was represented to us as highly appropriate and forcible in its substance and delivered with an uncoaxed unction that laid it to the heart of his hearers. It has been requested for publication in the Tract series. Another sermon was also called for, that of Dr. Mitchell, on the opening of Conference. We were, to our regret, too late to hear it, but will enjoy its reading in the Minutes.

The Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist Churches were supplied with three services each on the Sabbath.

The Sunday School is cared for. On Friday night, the annual meeting was held, presided over by T. H. Foster. An excellent address was made by E. J. Hamill. The audience was large and gave good heed and a good contribution. We predict that this occasion will soon rival the Missionary Anniversary itself. Certainly it has the elements of an increasing interest. The Missionary Anniversary was presided over by J. J. Hutchinson, who introduced, after the reports of those two important officers, the secretary Dr. Summers, and the treasurer O. R. Blue, Bp. Andrew and Dr. Green. The secretary talked along generally and with his usual felicity. Dr. S. can keep up the best running fire upon an audience we ever saw. His Reports are prize essays. They are documents worthy of the best place in the Church's archives. Collection about $600. The total for the year about $20,000.

The Stewards settled with Conference claimants at 92 per cent. This raised figure is due, not so much to increased collections as to the lately adopted rule of discrimination among claimants.

The Preacher's Aid Society is well sustained. It has six young men in charge, and is limited rather by candidates than funds. This is among the objects for which money is most easily raised—a significant fact.—A circumstance operating unfavorably on the various Conference funds is the Graduated Land Bill. This threw much public land into market, especially in Blountsville and Camden Districts. Buying land was all the rage. The most pressing means were resorted to to raise cash—selling corn at 25 cents per bushel, or borrowing money, in some instances, at 100 per cent per month. So the earth did not help the woman.

The statistics of membership show an increase of 3,427 for the year past. Of these 1,667 whites, 1,753 colored, and 7 local preachers. Total of present membership: 39,273 whites; 19,775 colored, and 473 local preachers.

The removal of Lagrange College to Florence was concurred in. Florence is only twelve miles distant from the old site on the mountain. Its citizens made liberal propositions—a committee of whom was present. The main reasons for removal were: the inaccessability of the mountain site, the dilapidated buildings and lack of society. When located, the college was the heart of a refined society, but it has moved away, and the fertile country around is covered with plantations. Against social and natural disadvantages the friends of education have toiled, as at a Sysiphean task, these years—not to roll the college up the mountain,—but such is it there. The old panel of trustees stood by it nobly to the last, and some few members of the Conference were disposed to non-concur. This Conference will now go about a Male College in her own bounds. Auburn has made a generous proposition. But it was deemed best to hasten slowly in so grave a matter. Commissioners were appointed, one lay and one clerical, from each P. Elder's district, who are to meet in Summerfield, July 4th, 1855, and determine on a location and general plan. Meantime other localities can be heard from. We hope they will, in no case and in no place, consent to put a spade to the ground, till the buildings are secured and $100,000 besides, for endowment. And if Alabama does not suit herself better, why cannot all Southwestern Methodism unite upon Centenary, and make it a Yale or Harvard?

Dr. Taylor appeared on Wednesday, and did a happy day's work for the China mission. A few words to the assembled ministry joined their hearts and hands to him. At night a crowded congregation heard a more extended lecture, and spontaneously offered a $280 contribution. Dr. Taylor has a manful head and childlike heart, and does good going about. Of other visitors, whose presence and communion was a contribution to the fellowship of the Conference, we mention Rev. Dr. Green of Nashville, Rev. J. B. Glenn of Auburn, Rev. Mr. Lyon, Agent of the Bible Society, Prof. Ross of Lagrange and Judge Mays and Hon. Messrs. Baker, Garrett and Ferrell.

Talladega is a notable Indian battle ground. Here, in 1813, Gen. Jackson met the hostiles. The Rev. E. Hearn was one of his soldiers. We enjoyed the solitary and rare privilege of a walk with this veteran of the two wars, carnal and spiritual, over the ground where forty-one years ago were mingled the sound of musket and war-whoop. He "shouldered his crutch and showed how fields were won,"—not a crutch exactly, but practical looking walking stick, with which he pointed out how "Old Hickory" disposed his 3,000 men. "Here the horse, there the foot—here the advance-guard, there the main body drew up—about that point was I—yonder was the thickest of the fight, and the dead Indians lay in heaps." It was no Headley or Abbott sketch of a battle scene. Our narrator, faithful in memory, to minute particulars, could say of all, pars fui. The fighting began about sunrise on a Tuesday morning, and was over by 9, A. M. The Indians retreated toward the mountains, whither they were followed for three miles, leaving 700 warriors on the ground. Jackson lost only 18 men. Several years afterward the citizens of Talladega gathered their patriotic bones, and honored them with sepulture in a substantial vault—built on the spot of their hasty interment. Our venerable friend almost confessed to homicide as we put the question direct—Did you kill any? "I came to fight, had a good gun, took good aim and had a good mark." Poor Indians! Poor soldiers, in the vault there! War to the death is a dreadful alternative. But the Indians were breaking into the settlements and massacring women and children. Then shoot the Indians. All right. Something is wrong, evidently. A crooked, gnarled, rotten and twisted-up world is this we live in. Looked at in a dry light, victories are mournful occasions. But so do civilization, peace and right advance in the earth! Our reflections were checked by looking into the benignant face of our friend, who took a matter-of-fact view of the business, and was right well satisfied that he was neither of "those eighteen" upon whom the tower of Siloam fell, or who fell at the Talladega. And we were glad of it too, and felt that his name, just then and there, was what it ought to be—Ebenezer. As a suitable memento we brought home a stick, grown on the ground and presented by our polite host and friend, Col. Huey; a real hickory, stout enough to beat off a whole regiment of dogs.

How changed the scene of forty-one years ago! The raw militiaman a gray haired Christian minister. No furrow then had been opened, nor habitation built. Now, the thrifty village stood, bright with evening fires; cornstalks of rank thickness lay over the ground where the braves died; and the soldiers' tomb was in the midst of a ploughed field. As we turned away, the last rays of a clear sunset were departing, the first evening bells ringing, and from the columned porch of the Masonic Female Institute, a Conference of ministers of the gospel of peace were quitting an afternoon session, and breaking up into cheerful groups, and sought hospitable homes.

We were pleased and edified by our visit to the Conference at Talladega. It is good to see these brethren dwelling in unity and going on from strength to strength. The specific interests in charge of the Conference will appear from the Reports to be given next week. In advance of them, we may safely say, that they are in a healthful and progressive condition. The number and quality of young men that have, within the last few years, been added to the ministry, is matter of special gratulation. Aside from the cordial friendliness of our personal reception, we found the Advocate among its old and still firm friends and supporters. As will be seen in the resolutions adopted, they ask and advise no change in its present terms of subscription and agency, and speak of the position and conduct of the paper in terms gratifying to us, as we believe them sincere.

We were obliged to leave before adjournment. The courteous senior Secretary, however, Rev. T. W. Dorman, to whom, with his associate, we are indebted for many facilities, has favored us with the subsequent proceedings and an authentic copy of the

SPIRIT OF MISSIONS.

JUVENILE MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY

In noticing this means of raising money for missionary purposes, and for cultivating the spirit of missions in the Church, we anticipate what should properly come in hereafter.

Last Sabbath night, Christmas eve, "the Juvenile Missionary Society of the Felicity Street Sabbath School" held its second anniversary. At an early hour the Church was well filled. The meeting was opened with singing and prayer, after which the audience was entertained with addresses and dialogues, from the platform, by the youth of the society. These exercises were relieved at intervals by hymns and songs, sung by the children. The president, not yet out of his teens occupied his place on the stage and presided with the utmost propriety. The annual report, an interesting and well written document, was read by the Secretary, after which a collection was taken. Judging from the large and delighted congregation and from our own feeling, a Christmas eve was never spent more pleasantly; a sabbath night was never spent more profitably.

This Society is chiefly composed of the members of the Sabbath School. Membership is secured by the payment of one dime initiation, and five cents per month thereafter. The payment of four dollars at any one time, constitutes a life membership, with an elegant certificate of the same. On the first Sabbath morning of every month, instead of the usual exercises of the Sabbath School, the meeting and business of this Society are attended to. The superintendent, for the nonce, relapses into private station, and the youthful president takes the chair. The secretary calls the roll of members and receives the monthly dues; new members are elected, other business is dispatched, and an address is delivered by some one appointed at the previous monthly meeting. It is a scene of touching beauty to see a hundred or more cheerful boys and girls, of all ages, from the infant to the Bible class, bringing up their picayunes, and in person, laying them upon the treasurers desk. We have often spent the hour before preaching, in these meetings, and have been impressed always, that they afford a most profitable link of transition from the closet to the pulpit.

The Secretary informs us that the amount raised by this Society for foreign and domestic missions during the year will exceed two hundred and fifty dollars. This is by no means a large sum; but with the consideration that the Society is in the beginning of its existence, and that its organization is scarcely yet matured, it must be regarded as a flattering and satisfactory result: a result which promises well for the future.

This considerable amount of money, we may safely suppose would never have reached the missionary treasury through any other channel. It is, therefore, a clear gain over what is collected by other means. The amount raised by the Congregational or adult Missionary Society of the same Church is about three hundred dollars. This shows that the Juvenile Society falls below the other only fifty dollars: and that its contribution is but one sixth less. By this, then the amount total of a single charge is nearly doubled. In other charges, circuits and stations where the Juvenile Societies have been organized, a like result, or one approximating to it, has been realized. The organization of these Societies in all of our Sunday Schools, and their hearty support and encouragement by the official members and pastors would swell our total missionary fund of the Church, to at least a third or a fourth more than it is at the present time.

If these societies were not, to some extent, already organized in many of our Sunday Schools throughout the connexion, the examples we are now reviewing, would warrant us in placing the general result at a much higher figure. But this estimate is based upon what may be done, more than has been done, in this way.

Important as these societies are when viewed from this stand-point, they have a higher claim to consideration, as the means of cultivating the spirit of missions. If the money derived from them were far less than it is; if they contributed nothing directly in this way, their consequence to the Church would not be greatly abated. That the present generation of Christians will attain to the true and high ideal of the spirit of missions, is quite beyond our hope or expectation. The reason that it has not already attained it, and the reason we dare not hope it will attain it, is that it has not been early trained and baptized into this cause. Doubtless our adult christians may be greatly improved in this respect, by how many degrees, we shall neither guess nor prophisy, but they cannot be brought up to the climax of consecration and zeal. For such a realization in them, we have begun too late; and we can only turn the costly lesson to account, by bringing forward a generation of missionaries, who shall do better than their fathers have done before them.

The missionary education of children cannot all be accomplished in Sabbath Schools, and in Juvenile Societies. God has devolved much of this upon the mothers of the Church, and we would that they felt this tremendous responsibility more than they do. But a great deal—a very great deal will those societies do toward its accomplishment. They will familiarize infant and youthful minds, with enlarged and enlightened missionary thought. They will be thus early impressed with this as the burden of the Church's responsibility, and of its great central and glorious enterprise. A spirit will be implanted which will grow with their growth and strengthen with their strength. The habit of giving will be formed, a liberal evangelical feeling will be cultivated. The mind will be supplied with such information as is most congenial to its development, and the heart will glow with such expansive sympathies as are in themselves celebrated to refine and christianize. Children can be made to think and feel on this subject more readily than adults; and there is in their thoughts a simpler faith, and in their feelings more of unmixed tenderness, than in older heads and hearts. Their whole being once imbued, the cause of missions becomes ever after a living reality, harmonizing in its objective aspects, with the benevolent instincts and yearnings of the soul.

Besides cultivating the spirit of missions proper these Juvenile Societies will be fruitful of good in bringing out the latent call of many who are designed of God for the ministry. This call is often smothered, before its subject reaches the state of adolescence. The convictions of a call to the ministry are strong in many youth, at an age when we do not dream of their existence. These convictions would rarely die in a genuine missionary atmosphere. They would rather be confirmed and developed; and many would be secured as laborers in our home and foreign fields, who are otherwise lost to the ministry and the Church.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE REPORTS.

TWENTY-SECOND ANNUAL REPORT OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

At the last session of the Alabama Conference, 35 missions were recognized within its bounds. From the reports of the Missionaries, we condense the following interesting particulars:

1. The German Mission, in Mobile, was served by M. Maass, who reports 20 members, 18 Sunday school scholars, 3 teachers. Their church is finished.

2. Portersville was served by J. W. McCann, who reports 129 white, 22 colored members; 2 Sunday schools, 50 scholars, $196 15 received.

It is promising; the patrons generally are pleased, and some of them pay liberally for its support, and $548 have been received.

5. Dayton is reported prosperous by the missionary, Jesse Ellis, who preached to about 800 colored persons, 250 being church members; 20 joined, 9 adults, 320 infants baptized, $310 received. The patrons speak of building churches on the mission.

In making our Annual Review of the operations of the Church in the field of Missionary effort, we discover some cause for gratulation and gratitude. If we mistake not, the cause is sustained by more enlightened measures than heretofore obtained. This, indeed, is no matter of marvel. The church has received a vast amount of information in the premises: Missionary addresses, sermons, tracts, reports, letters and newspaper articles have been so multiplied of late, that it is next to impossible for any one to be ignorant of the plans, principles, operations, and results of the various Missionary organizations which obtain among us. The philosophy of the cause is better and more generally understood now than at any former period. Men know what they are doing when supporting this great interest, and why they are doing it. Were there no positive command to go and preach the gospel to every creature, the genius of the system—its natural expansiveness and aggressive power—would impel us to put forth endeavors to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery of the world's redemption. If Christianity is better than Paganism, Mahommedanism, Judaism, infidelity, or superstition of any then ought those who are in possession of the truth as it is in Jesus, to make it known to all the world besides, and to press it upon them as worthy of all acceptation. It is impossible not to see, that in a thousand respects the infidel world would be benefited by the cordial embracement of Christianity—even in regard to the interests of the life that now is—and to say the least, it is equally impossible not to extend the benefit to the life that is to come. To demonstrate the importance of Christianizing the heathen, it is not necessary to go into exaggerated descriptions of their wretched condition without the gospel, much less to pronounce a general sentence of damnation upon them for the vices which result from their moral destitution. There is a great difference in the condition of pagan nations—some of them are in comparatively comfortable circumstances—others are miserable beyond description: but we are safe in saying that there is not a heathen or Mahommedan nation, or tribe, on the face of the earth, that would not be vastly benefited in all moral, intellectual and physical respects, by an espousal of Christianity. This is generally acknowledged by Christians—it is not only acknowledged but felt to be a fact, and it is had in view in their missionary operations. The records of history and the reports of travelers have so corroborated the teachings of Revelation on this subject, that Christians have no misgivings that there may be a waste of ointment in our labors for the evangelization of the world. Christianity is recognized as the exclusive system of religious truth, and its propagation to the displacement of error, which has usurped its place in the minds of men, is now generally recognized by Christians as the most philosophical, the most benevolent, the most god-like work in which it is possible to engage.

In connection with this, and partly resulting from it, the Missionary movement has assumed a more practical character. This we consider a very favorable omen. We suppose the work of God, both at home and abroad will always have something of the marvellous and romantic about it; there will be prodigious development, heroic adventures—and a great many persons will always be looking out for signs and wonders in the prosecution of this great enterprise. Some will look for extraordinary interpositions of Providence and displays of sovereign grace—others for the thaumaturgical exploits of an Austin, a Boniface, or a Xavier. We cannot help this. But we rejoice to believe that this wonder-seeking spirit is giving way for a more practical cast of mind and habit of thought. The romance of the Missionary cause is merged in its matter-of-fact operations. This has been brought about, to a considerable extent, by our domestic missions, especially those among the people of color. We have met with great success among the servile progeny of Ham on our plantations—thousands of them have been redeemed from the lowest grade of heathenism; and this has been effected by the simplest instrumentalities imaginable—such as scarcely recognize the poetic, sentimental, heroic, or romantic element to which we have referred. We do not now consider it any wonderful or miraculous thing that a man should take his life in his hand to carry the gospel across seas to the heathen. Men take their lives in their hands to cross seas on military, mercantile and scientific expeditions, and thousands of them lay down their lives in consequence of their undertakings, and their heroism is not celebrated in sermons or song. It seems to be a recognized fact, that so many of our fellow-men should be engaged in pursuits of this character, and those whose bent of mind or circumstances determine them to these vocations, engage in them without challenging or receiving any great meed of praise from those who are otherwise engaged. So should it be in the operations of the Church.

The man who faithfully discharges the duties of his calling in the ordinary pastorate of the church is doing a work which is of indispensable importance: if he does it well and faithfully, it will develop missionary aspects and have missionary bearings, it will connect with missionary movements at the very outposts of the Church: let not that man's labors be undervalued. He who wears out his life in catechizing and otherwise instructing and discipling the nations, negroes, young and old, is doing a work second in importance to none enacted on the Yang-tze-kiang, the Ganges, or Gnboon. The prevalence of such views as those is of immense interest. We have already learned that there is an identity between the home and foreign work—that it requires plain, practical, common sense for the latter as well as the former, that romantic sentimentalists will not answer for the one any more than for the other, and that men's turn of mind, moral aptitude, physical capacities, and social relations have all to be taken into consideration, before they are sent forth from positions where they are or might be useful to foreign lands, where they might possibly be of no use at all. We have learned this also, as a practical lesson of great importance, that there are men naturally endowed and designated for the missionary work, whether in the frontiers of our own country or in foreign lands. Common sense has taught us to look out these men and appoint them to this business. It is not to be supposed that in secular life we should find a fair proportion of men adapted to migratory and other venturous vocations—enough of such to subserve the interests of the general community in this respect—and that there should not be found in due proportion of such men for correspondent enterprises in the sacramental host of God's elect. Leaving out of the question the qualifying influences of divine grace, we might be sure that there is no lack of men adapted by nature to those undertakings.

In this connection too, we may note the systematic character of the present missionary movements of the church: This is a promising feature. In the infancy of christianity there were, indeed, the rudiments of our missionary organizations—but nothing more. There were the Masons and Gaiusee who entertained the messengers of the churches, and others, as the Philippians, that ministered to their necessities, and were thus fellow helpers to the truth. The noble principle thus developed is carried out in our day in a most beautiful clock-work system of benefecet operations. By virtue of our organized movements, the abundance of the rich and the alms of the poor can be made available to the cause—every member of the church can lend a helping hand—the places most suitable for missionary occupancy can be selected and the requisite aid be granted—and every place thus occupied is responsibly represented. We are approaching to a perfect system in regard to the raising of means for the support of missions, inasmuch, as every minister is instructed to secure contributions from every member of the church, and also by judicious solicitations to induce the "earth to help the woman." The maintenance of the cause is thus put upon the same footing with that of our home interests; and the opening of new missions, and the perpetuation of old ones, and the appropriations for them, can be done with a moral certainty that the church will not fail of a substantial endorsement of the action and the dependent responsibility. The advantage of a wide connectional movement in this cause is obvious—In the nature of the case, almost every community has its seasons of plenty and its seasons of dearth, its alternations of surpineness and zeal; but by associated action—the missionary cause is not materially affected, by these changes, as what one fails to accomplish another performs—accordingly, those communions that have adopted the independent platform in other matters pertaining to church regimen, recognize the connectional in this, and the result justifies the policy.

There is also a steadily increasing outlay of effort on the part of the church for the evangelization of the world. The church sees her duty more clearly than heretofore, feels it more sensibly, acknowledges it more fully, sets about discharging it with more heartiness, prayer for success is more frequent and fervent—personal effort and sacrifice are not so rare as in the days of Vanderkemp and Coke; financial contributions are made on a more liberal scale, and not so much under the impulse of special excitement. These are all good omens: they augur well for the missionary cause.

But after all, the church is but getting ready to enter on the great crusade for the conquest of the world. It is not enough to say there remaineth much land to be possessed; we have scarcely crossed the Jordan, except as our spies have gone over to reconnoitre the foe. We have subdued a Sihon and an Og, and taken possession of their territories, and too many amongst us, like Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, are thorowith content, evincing, meanwhile, but little disposition to imitate those tribes in accompanying the sacramental host to further conquests. A better spirit must pervade the church—all her members, young and old, rich and poor, bond and free, male and female, official and private, must become interested in this great enterprise; and when this is the case, the powers of darkness will be seized with consternation, the hitherto impregnable fortresses will yield to our prowess and determined efforts, and the banner of redemption will be run up in triumph in every nation, and be hailed with exultation by every kindred, people, and tongue.

REMOVAL OF LAGRANGE COLLEGE.

The committee to whom was refered the subject of the removal of Lagrange College, having bestowed upon the question all the attention that time and other engagements would allow, submit the following report:—

We are free to confess that it was not without some astonishment, that we saw the announcement of the anticipated removal, and when further revealments made it a probable realization, we were filled with emotions of sadness and regret. For some of us have known and labored for this college from the incipiencies of its being, and all of us have loved it for its vocational aess as a Southern Methodist College, and especially so, for the precious fruit yielded to the church and country. But regrets with us are unavailing, for however much we may revere the locality consecrated by the prayers, tears and labors of some of our wisest men, still an inflexible necessity seems to be upon us, and we are to choose between removal or non-removal. If by voting the latter, we could perpetuate the college in that state of vigorous healthfulness, and efficiency which the wants of the church and times seem to demand, then there could be no debate, for the reason, that the question would have but one side. For if the college could be sustained in its present position, it ought not to be removed. But already, two of the patronizing conferences have voted removal,—and the learned and able faculty, with one exception, have resigned,—the students are disbanded, never perhaps to return to this mountain home of science, and morals; and consequently, we would not by our action, prompt the faithful and laborious board of trustees to further exertions, nor flatter the hopes of the friends of the old college site, by voting its continuance. And inasmuch, as the friends of the Church and Christian education resident in Florence and vicinity have pledged to the conferences not only as good, but increased facilities and immunities, therefore,

Resolved, That we concur with the Tennessee and Memphis, Confs. in the proposed removal of Lagrange College to Florence, Alabama, under the following restrictions and instructions; viz:

1. That the citizens of Florence carry out and fulfil in good faith the pledges by them made, in the premises.

2. That we as a conference are not to be involved in any pecuniary liabilities, by such removal.

3. That our conference retain, and have guaranteed to its members all the original rights and privileges, heretofore enjoyed in that Institution.

Resolved, That we gratefully acknowledge, the long and faithful labors and sacrifices of the Board of Trustees; and hereby affectionately recommend to its members the adoption of such a course as will soonest free the College from all indebtness, and thereby leave it freely to follow in the path of its promised and prospective greatness and usefulness. All of which is respectfully submitted:

EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE.

This body convened on Wednesday, Nov. 20th, and closed on the Monday evening following. Bishop Early, in accordance with the energetic course adopted from the beginning of his tour, was on the ground in due time.

Nearly all the preachers were in attendance, and appeared in fine health and spirits. Not one, we believe, had died during the year. Many of them are young men, and a more hearty, energetic looking body of men we have scarcely ever seen. They pursue, as far as we could see, a wise course in the selection of their presiding elders—or, at least, their Bishops do—selecting them from their leading men, the only way to make the office as valuable as designed. Two things worthy of special commendation, in so young a Conference, are the gentlemanly courtesy with which they treat each other in debate, and the apparent absence of all cliques and combinations. The appointments were received in the ancient spirit of a devoted itinerant ministry—here they are:

General Intelligence.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

We ought to be in receipt of much later as well as more complete news from Europe and the Crimea. The news by the Sarah Sands, that left Liverpool on the 5th, has been anticipated by the Washington and America, that sailed on the 6th and 9th, though we have received only incomplete telegraphic summaries by either. The Atlantic left Liverpool for New York on the 13th, with four or nine days later intelligence, and ought to have arrived by the 20th. We are therefore in expectation of hearing from her at any moment, and doubtless her information will be exceedingly interesting. When the America sailed it was supposed in England that the next news from Sebastopol would be more decisive than any previous and indicate the probable success of the campaign.

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—Report for the week ending Saturday evening, 23d inst., at 5 o'clock:

Admissions.....261 | Discharges.....262
Deaths..... 49

Up to last evening the additions were 31 admissions, 21 discharges, and 4 deaths.

PROPOSED SALE OF THE COLLINS STEAMSHIPS. It is now positively stated in New York that the proprietors of the Collins line of steamers have been offered over $800,000 a piece for their steamers, by the French Government. They are wanted for war purposes. It is further stated that the company will accept this offer and sell out their line, unless Congress continues the appropriation heretofore made for carrying the mail, etc. If, however, the amount be granted, the company will immediately build another steamer, the Adriatic, and complete all other arrangements for making the line more perfect than it ever has been.

By Telegraph.

HALIFAX, Dec. 23.—The Cunard steamship America has arrived at this port from Liverpool on the 9th instant.

Her advices are nine days later than those by the Pacific at New York on the 13th instant, and present some features of striking importance. Austria has after a long and vexatious delay, at last joined the Western Powers and signed a treaty offensive and defensive with France and England.

The advices from the seat of war are to the effect that no change of moment had occurred in the position of affairs since the departure of the Pacific.

Commercial Intelligence.

Messrs. Browa, Shipley & Co. quote the sales of cotton for the week preceding the departure of the America at 40,000 bales, of which 1000 were on speculation and 3000 bales for export.

They also quote a decline of ⅛d in Fair Orleans cotton, which is quoted at 6d. Middling qualities had improved an eighth to a quarter of a penny, and middling Orleans was quoted by the same firm at the close at 5⅝d, while middling Uplands was worth 5d. Trade at Manchester had slightly improved, and the tone of affairs was better.

THE TWENTY-THIRD.—Saturday being an anniversary of notability in New Orleans history—that of the first blow given to British invaders in this region—was celebrated by a parade and review of the Louisiana Legion, and salutes of artillery at morning, noon and night. Though the streets were sloppy, the military made a fine display.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE—The Mechanics' Institute in Ruins.—Tuesday night about 9 o'clock, a fire broke out in the rear part of the basement of the Mechanics' Institute, on the Philippa street front of University Square, and to little more than an hour's time the splendid edifice was reduced to a pile of smoking ruins; nothing being left standing but the front and portions of the side walls. The conflagration was intensely brilliant and fierce, lighting up the whole city, and attracting people till the surrounding streets were perfectly jammed. The firemen were soon on the spot, and it required their bravest exertions to keep the flames from spreading. The handsome private residences on the opposite side of Philippa street were severely scorched, and on fire several times, and the firemen are entitled to no little credit in having saved them, in the intense heat that filled the street. The rear of the Louisiana Medical College, which building fronts on Common street, was also scorched badly, but saved by the firemen, who, however, did some damage to the contents of the College with their water. No accident, that we could hear of, happened during the fire.

The loss to the Mechanics' Society is about $70,000; the building only, which was worth $50,000, being insured for $30,000, divided equally between the Sun Mutual and Crescent offices; the effects, consisting of the furnishings of the splendid hall, and the Fisk Free Library, scarcely any portion of which was saved, being valued at $26,000, and not insured. The Mechanics' Society sustains a loss which money can not cover, namely, all its books, papers and archives since its foundation, forty-eight years ago. The loss of the library is inestimably severe upon the public, by which it was beginning to be largely patronised, as well as upon the Society.

The Steamboat and Steamship Engineers' Association, the United Laborers' Association, and the Order of the Sons of Malta, each of which occupied a room in the building, lost all their furniture, fixtures, books and papers. The Engineers' society have to deplore the loss of a collection of charts and drawings, which neither time nor money can replace.

The Repository of Arts and Sciences, kept in one of the rooms by Mr Breckett, lost every thing—valued at about $3000. Mr. Truchois, the portrait and pictures painter, occupying another room, lost every thing. One picture alone, of large size, which he had nearly finished entitled "The Crucifixion," he valued at $3000. Mr Giroux, the photographist, occupying the front room on the second floor, opposite the library, lost every thing. He had just finished fitting it up at an expenditure of $2500. Mr. Gomez, who kept a cabinet making and repairing shop on the ground floor, under Mr. Giroux's room, also lost his all—about $1000 worth. The other front room on the ground floor, under the library, was occupied as a dancing academy, alternately by Mr. Oberardi and Mr. Metcayer, who, of course, lost nothing.

Nothing was saved, that we could discover, but a piano belonging to the Institute, a few chairs, and a few books in a damaged condition. Not counting those articles which money can not replace, the entire loss may safely be set down at $150,000.

The part of the building in which the fire was first seen was the warerooms on the ground floor, in the rear, used by Messrs. Henderson & Haines, crockery dealers, communicating by a passage way with their warehouse fronting on Baronne street. Some goods had been deposited in the room during the afternoon, and that is all that is known that has any bearing on the origin of the fire. We could not discover the extent of Henderson & Haines's loss, but it must be considerable, and must be set down exclusive of our estimate of the loss.

Our readers may now judge what a loss last evening's fire occasioned to the city. The building was one of our finest architectural ornaments; but this is the smallest part of the loss. The fire-god has been very severe upon New Orleans this season. The ruins of a splendid church disfigure Lafayette Square. The ruins of a beautiful theater disfigure Gravier street. And now, the ruins of the noble and useful Mechanics' Institute are smoking on University Square.

Revelations of the Barometer—The Spiritual Telegraph Superseded.

The following latest resting communication was recently addressed to the French Minister of War by M. Le Maout, achemist of St. Brieac:

ST BRIEAC, Oct. 27, 1854

Monsieur le Ministre: I have occupied myself since the commencement of the Eastern war with a series of observations on the modifications which the atmospheric experiences from the cannonades that take place. These observations are made every three hours.

I have collected, on the effects of cannon, facts of the highest interest, which I render intelligible upon paper by the aid of figures, a specimen of which I send you, extracted hastily from the results of my observations, and which represent the comparative effects of the cannonades of Odessa, of the battle of Alma, of the day of the 5th of October (cannon fired at the Invalide), of the opening of the bombardment of Sebastopol, and of the day of the 25th of October.

I hope to be able to establish that the barometer is not, as is commonly thought, an instrument merely intended to indicate rain and fine weather, but a mobile apparatus excessively sensitive, which places us in communication with all great atmospherical phenomena.

What is remarkable in this instrument is, that at from 600 to 800 leagues of distance an impression is produced on it in a few hours by the discharge of cannon. Observed with care and intelligence it can not fail, in certain circumstances, to become of the highest utility in the time of war.

The object to which I venture to direct your attention is this:

I have no occasion to apprise you of the commencement of the bombardment of Sebastopol, as you have already received the news of it officially; but I can announce to you, with a certainty which will not be belied by the facts, that the day before yesterday a cannonade, such as has not taken place during the year which is about to elapse, even comprising those of the siege of Silistria and of the bombardment of Odessa, commenced in the morning before Sebastopol.

Be good enough to cast your eye over the table that I send you. You will see there that in 48 hours the barometer arose 30 millimetres, and that the figure which represents this rise, comparatively to those produced by the other bombardments, is almost vertical, an index, with the other signs by which it is accompanied, of the intensity of the action of the cannonade.

In a few days you will receive from Sebastopol news of the 25th, which will give you full information of what occurred on that day, which has proved, I have no doubt, one of the most memorable of the whole campaign.

In the meanwhile I remain, etc., CH. LE MAOUT.

It is scarcely necessary for us to add that the information contained in this letter was subsequently confirmed by the facts.

Col. Steptoe, the new Governor of the Mormons is said to be a conscientious, mild dispositioned man, of the Episcopal faith, and a member of that church. The Government expects no difficulty, and thinks it about certain that on his arrival at Utah, Brigham Young will receive a dispatch from Heaven requesting him to resign, whereupon, it is supposed, he will resign, being content for the rest of his life with the dignity of high priest among the saints.

A man was recently tried in Indianapolis, under the seventh section of the fugitive slave law, for aiding in the escape of slaves from their masters, in which case Mr. Cyrus Fillmore, brother of the ex-President, was the principal witness. The man was proved guilty of the charge, but it is said the jury would not render their verdict, unless the judge would promise to remit the fine which the act imposes as a penalty for the offence, which was agreed to, and the jury thereupon brought in their verdict that the prisoner pay a fine of fifty dollars, and be imprisoned one hour in the court room.

In spite of the hard times in New York, a large dealer in laces says he has never before sold so many or such expensive laces as during this season. Owing to the numerous defalcations, undoubtedly, adds the Boston Post.

CONGRESSIONAL.

WASHINGTON, December 18.

SENATE.—The Senate assembled at noon, and after reading the journal of previous proceedings,

Mr. Sebastian presented the credentials of Mr Johnson of Arkansas, when he was sworn in and took his seat.

Mr. Shields reported a bill for increasing the army which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The President's late annual message was then taken up and its several parts referred to the appropriate committees.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Baron de Kalb was next taken up and debated at considerable length by several members.

HOUSE.—The House assembled at the usual hour, and after reading the journal of Friday, and going through the preliminary matters, States were called on for petitions, memorials, etc.

The bill for the relief of Betsy Nash and the widow of Mr. Bachelder, whose husband was killed in the Inghlis-dave riot in Boston, is returned from the Senate and referred to the Committee of the Whole. It will pass with probably some amendments.

The bill for the relief of officers and soldiers of the army was taken up, largely discussed and referred to the Military committee.

The House is still in session—nothing of importance will be done until after the holidays.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19, 1854.

SENATE.—A message was received from the President transmitting the report from the Secretary of State, of the correspondence with our minister at Constantinople.

Mr. Rockwell presented a petition from David Sears, Abbott Lawrence and others, asking an appropriation for the Massachusetts Humane Society in behalf of shipwrecked mariners on the eastern coast.

Mr. Fish presented a petition from the merchants of New York to send an expedition to the Northern Seas in search of Dr Kane.

Mr. Cass gave notice that at a future day he should move that the Senate adopt Mr. Underwood's resolutions, asking for the intervention of the American Government to secure to our citizens abroad the rights of religious sepulture, and calling the attention of the President thereto.

He eulogized Napoleon for his sentiments in reference to religious liberty, and read the following reply to the representatives of the consistorial bodies of his empire who were present at his coronation:

"I see with pleasure assembled here the pastors of the reformed churches of France; and I embrace with ardor this opportunity of testifying to them how highly I have been satisfied with the reports that have reached me of the fidelity and good conduct of the pastors and citizens of the different Protestant communions. I desire them to understand that it is my firm intention to maintain the freedom of religious worship. The empire of the law exists where the undefined empire of conscience begins. Neither the law nor the sovereign can do anything against this freedom. Such are my principles and those of nature. And it any one of my race, who may succeed me, should forget the oath I have taken, and disregard by the promptings of a false conscience, should violate it, I beg you to join in public censure, and authorize you to give him the name of Nero."

Mr Brodhead made an eloquent appeal in behalf of his resolution for sending a steamer to the Axle Seas in search of Dr. Kane's expedition. Passed.

Mr Pettit made a report from the judiciary that the House bill concerning the United States land at Dincinnati pass—and it was passed.

Mr. Brodhead reported a bill in favor of Gen. John E. Wood, and recommended its passage. Passed.

Mr. Brodhead moved that so much of the President's message as related to naval matters be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE.—Mr. Phelps, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and the repairs of the barracks and quarters. Both were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The House then went into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union on business pertaining to the District of Columbia.

Several bills were considered and laid aside to be reported to the House, including one giving additional powers to the corporation of Washington for the election of all officers not now elective, and to establish Houses of Refuge or correction, and Police and Municipal Courts, etc.

While this was under consideration, Mr. Giddings offered an amendment, that no person shall be imprisoned unless charged with a criminal offense.

The Chairman (Mr. Phelps) said the amendment was in order.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, appealed from the decision of the chair, remarking that the House could not in this bill control the Judiciary of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Giddings said the bill provided for an efficient police for the maintenance of order and for the protection of persons and property. If any thing was more appropriate than his amendment to secure this end, he was unable to see it.

The question was then taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained—yeas 73, nays 60.

Mr. Giddings said there was a law in existence providing for the imprisonment of the free men of color found in this District. The question came home to every heart. Men thus arrested are sold into perpetual bondage to pay jail fees. His object was to set aside every law which involves in slavery men now free. All he asked was a definite expression by the House.

Mr. Hamilton was opposed to the amendment. It had nothing to do with the bill; and he hoped the vote would now be taken on it.

Tellers were then ordered. (A voice—let the Abolitionists go through.)

Mr. Giddings: And let the slave-holders stay back. (Laughter.)

The amendment was rejected—yeas 55, noes not counted.

The Senate bill to suppress the circulation of small notes as a currency in the District being under consideration,

Mr. McMullen presented a remonstrance from R. W. Latham and other citizens, against the bill, and asking for the passage of a free banking law. He said he was opposed to small circulation any where, but doubted the policy of passing the bill at this time, owing to the embarrassed financial condition of the country. Virginia has a small note issue, and he knew it could not be enforced in his district.

Mr. Baskin said in his (Richmond) district the law acted like a charm. The worthless small notes had been banished from their midst, and there was plenty of gold and silver for ordinary business transactions.

Mr. Hamilton here like testimony regarding the Maryland small note law.

Mr. Florence said in the small note law had precisely the same effect in Pennsylvania as in Mr. Baskin's district in Virginia. Specie had there taken their place. He remarked that the remonstrance Mr. McMullen presented was signed by R. W. Latham, who had become notorious for the failure of the Exchange Bank, with which he had been connected. He desired to protect the working men from losses sustained by chin-plaster issues, for on the poorer classes such disasters invariably fell.

Mr. Letcher said he was opposed to chin-plasters, blister-plasters, and almost every other species of plasters, and especially chin-plasters. The times are certainly out of joint, but it did not occur to him he would find his colleague (Mr. McMullen) in favor of small notes. Nor did he expect him to come in with a dead memorial, dated January, 1853. The thing had kept respectable, while the managers who drew it had gone with all things perishable. It is headed by R. W. Latham, and he imagined his friends had heard of a defunct institution, known as the Exchange Bank. Owing to that institution commencing the issue of small notes, Virginia was driven to the necessity of banishing them from its borders.

Mr. McMullen explained that this bill was prepared during the last session. It was then the remonstrance was handed to him to be presented to the House. He had not changed his views with regard to the impropriety of the circulation of small notes, but doubted the policy of passing this bill now.

Mr. Letcher resumed, asking his colleague whether, if this remonstrance had been gotten up now, there would have been the same signatures to it. Would men now be found endorsing the conduct of the defunct institution?

Mr. McMullen: Does my colleague mean to say I endorse the remonstrance?

Mr. Letcher: I say those who sent the remonstrance here a year ago would not now sign it.

Mr. McMullen replied he was charged with the presentation of the paper, and thought it his duty to present it without committing himself as to its contents.

Mr. Letcher asked his colleagues to look at the date. The very fact that no remonstrance has now been sent in shows that that the people of the District have borne as long as they could the evils of that institution. Such laws ought to be put down. They operate as a fraud upon that portion of the community least able to bear losses—the small note law of Virginia is in force this very day.

Mr. Hamilton suggested that as but three days were assigned to the District of Columbia business, gentlemen proceed without unnecessary discussion.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, argued in favor of an extra metallic currency.

Mr. Cummings thought that would be absurd and distract the entire business of the country.

Mr. Skelton agreed with Mr. Jones, and expressed his views regarding the evils of paper money.

Mr. Heyly, of Virginia, says notice that on the 16th of January he shall make an effort to take up the French spoliation bill. This design was mentioned that no one should be taken by surprise.

Mr. Taylor, of Ohio, attributed the present evils of paper money in the District to the neglect of Congress to re-charter the banks.

The Committee then rose, and without disposing of any of the bills which had been considered, the House adjourned.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20, 1854.

SENATE.—Mr. Sumner presented the memorial of the New England Baptist Free Mission Society, praying the repeal of the act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, and also the repeal of the fugitive slave law, which they believe to be a violation of the rights of men and the constitution of our country. Mr. S. said that, as the Senator from Ohio (Mr. Chase) proposed at an early day to call up the bill introduced by him for the prohibition of slavery in the territories of the United States, he would ask that the memorial lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Stuart, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the bill to continue in force for a limited period the act to ascertain and settle private land claims in California, without amendment.

Mr. Weller urged the importance of prompt action on the bill; and it was considered and passed.

Mr. Sumner submitted a resolution directing the Committee on Commerce to consider whether any further legislation be necessary in order to promote the interests of the fisheries of the United States, especially by amending the system of bounties; also by altering the terms of the bounty to vessels engaged in the bank and cod fisheries; and also by extending this bounty to vessels engaged in the mackerel fisheries. The resolution was agreed to.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855; and Mr. Rusendon moved the amendment of which he gave notice yesterday.

The amendment, the effect of which is to place the widows of officers in the naval service upon the same footing with the widows of officers in the army, was opposed by Messrs. Hunt, Stuart, and Toombs, upon the grounds that it was not germain to this bill and had not received the examination of a committee.

Messrs. Rusendon, Chase, Brown and Waller advocated it as a measure just in itself, and one which ought not to be defeated on account of a mere rule of order, which was frequently disregarded at every session of Congress.

Mr. Dawson desired time to examine the subject.

The Senate being taken, the amendment was agreed to—yeas 19, nays 18—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs Badger, Bradbury, Brown, Chase, Clayton, Dodge, of Wisconsin; Fessenden, Fish, Foot, Gillette, James, Jones, of Iowa; Jones, of Tennessee; Nanner Thompson, of Kentucky, Wade, Walker and Waller—19

Nays—Messrs Adams, Allen, Brodhead, Clay, Dawson Dodge, of Iowa, Evans, Geyer, Hunter, Johnson, Norris, Hunk, Sebastian, Shields, Stuart, Toombs, Toney and Wright—18

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr Bayard called the attention of the Senate to the fact, that at the last session the House had passed a bill to extend the naturalization laws so as to provide that children of citizens of the United States, born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the Union, should be regarded as citizens. That bill also contained a provision that the fact of the marriage of an alien woman to a citizen should constitute her a citizen. Mr. Bayard thought it important at the present session. Mr. Pearce said the bill was taken up. The Committee on the Judiciary had reported no amendment, to strike out the provision in reference to married women. This amendment was now withdrawn by Mr Bayard, on behalf of the Committee, and a provision inserted confining the benefits of that section to women who might be lawfully naturalized under the existing laws. With this amendment the bill was passed.

Mr. Fish's bill for the better preservation of life and property of emigrants on ship-board, was recommitted for further amendment and investigation.

The bill to establish a department of law, to prescribe certain duties of the Auditors and Controllers of the Treasury, and for other purposes, was taken up.

After a brief conversation the further consideration of the bill was postponed until Tuesday next.

On motion by Mr Brodhead, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and, after some time spent therein, the doors were opened and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE.—Mr. Phelps announced that Mr. J. W. Witherfield, the delegate from Kansas Territory, was present and ready to take his seat.

The Speaker administered to him the oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States, and Mr. Witherfield took his seat in the House of Representatives.

Mr Fuller submitted a resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary for the better defining of the rights of citizens of the United States in ships, vessels or other property purchased by them of citizens or subjects of foreign countries under certain circumstances, and to report by bill or otherwise; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

The House then passed the following named bills, which were reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union yesterday:

A bill granting certain additional powers to the Corporation of the City of Washington;

A bill to increase the compensation of the Washington Auxiliary Guard;

A bill to incorporate the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; and

A bill authorizing the Washington Gas Light Company to increase the capital stock of this company.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Phelps in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to suppress the circulation of small notes as a currency in the District of Columbia.

Several amendments were proposed respectively by Messrs. Orrw, Walsh, Hughes, Perkins of New York, Bridges and Cumming; and, after being discussed, was rejected.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The Committee proceeded to consider the bill authorizing the extension, construction and use of the Metropolitan Railroad Company into and within the District of Columbia.

Mr. Craige offered an amendment, which was agreed to, preventing the railroad from being extended through Pennsylvania Avenue and the public squares and reservations.

The bill was further amended, reserving to Congress the power to change, alter, or repeal the act, and to give the corporations of Washington and Georgetown the power to designate the line of the railroad through the two cities.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The bill authorizing the corporation of Georgetown to collect an annual tax on the assessable property of that city, to meet engagements principally assumed by subscriptions to the Metropolitan Railroad Company, was taken up; when, after a debate and the rejection of several amendments the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The bill to liquidate the indebtedness of the District Penitentiary was read, and laid aside to be reported to the House.

The committee then rose, when the amendment made to the bill to suppress the circulation of small notes as a currency were rejected, and the bill passed as it came from the Senate.

The bill authorizing the extension, construction and use of the Metropolitan Railroad Company into and within the District of Columbia; and

The bill to discharge the indebtedness of the Penitentiary of the District of Columbia, were severally passed.

The question having been stated on the passage of the bill, authorizing the corporation of Georgetown to impose additional taxes,

Mr. Letcher moved to lay it on the table; pending which motion

The House adjourned.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21.

SENATE.—Mr. Allen presented resolutions of the Legislature of Rhode Island in relation to the allowance of pensions and bounty lands to the officers, soldiers and sailors who served in the last war with Great Britain.

Also, from the same, in favor of the establishment of a navy yard at Narragansett Bay.

Also, in favor of the establishment of a system of cheap ocean postage. All of which were read and ordered to be printed.

Mr Dawson presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Georgia in favor of the establishment of a navel depot at Brunswick, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. Sibdell presented a memorial from a committee of the Louisiana Baptist State Convention, asking that measures may be taken to protect citizens of the United States sojourning in foreign countries in the full exercise of their religious faith.

On motion of Mr. Sibdell a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire whether and what legislation be necessary to obviate a conflict with the laws of the several States on the subject of compensation and regulation of pilotage within their limits.

On motion of Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, a resolution was adopted requesting the Post-master General to inform the Senate whether or not a contract has been made for carrying the mail from Galveston to New Orleans, as was directed by an act of Congress passed at the last session; if not, that he inform the Senate why it has not been done.

Mr. Clay introduced a bill emendatory of, and explanatory to, an act to "graduate and reduce the price of the public lands to actual settlers."

On motion of Mr. Brod

A Poetic Song.

"With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman sat, in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread—
Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger and dirt,
And still, with a voice of dolorous pitch
She sang the "Song of the Shirt!" [Hood.

From Chambers's Edinburgh Journal.

STITCH! STITCH! STITCH!

Who has not wept over the "Song of the Shirt?" Who has not sympathised with the tenant of the garret—

"In poverty, hunger and dirt,
Sewing at once, with a double thread,
A shroud as well as a shirt!"— until the very names, "needle-work" and "needle-woman," became associated with poor, half-starved creatures, doomed by their employers to sit in foul atmosphere, chained to their seam by the constantly-plied needle and thread, like galley-slaves to the oar? And yet this continual ringing the changes on

"Seam, and gusset, and band, Band, and gusset, and seam,"

is not much a occurrence to all; is not always so fatal in its consequences; and, though it may be the exception which proves the rule, in an instance we are about to mention, this stitch! stitch! stitch! was preferred, nay, as enthusiastically followed as any branch of high art; as absorbingly as a passion for music, or a love for painting.

Annie Linton was the best sewer in Mrs. Roy's school; and the mistress declared, on inspecting the first shirt she had made for her father, that the Duke of Buccleugh himself might wear it!" This was high praise for little Annie, who was only eleven years of age, and who never forgot it. Her work was the neatest and the cleanest ever seen. Then she did it so quickly her mother could not keep pace with her daily demand for "something to sew."

"I wish Annie would take to her book," said Mrs. Linton to her husband.

But it was quite clear that Annie never would take to her book; she had little reading and less spelling; and yet she could "mark" (with cotton) all the letters of the alphabet, as if she was a very miracle of learning.

"Something to sew!" eagerly demanded Annie.

"Will any mowing come of this sewing?" asked her father, with a very natural attempt at a pun.

"Those who do not sew shall not reap," said little Annie, cleverly taking up her father's meaning and her work-bag at the same time, as she whisked past him in fear of being too late for school.

"Three weeks after—

"Annie's learning to be a scholar," said Mrs. Linton, "no more demands for sewing."

That afternoon Annie came bounding into the house from school, sat upon her father's knee, opened her work-bag, which hung over her arm, and putting a screwed up paper into his hand, said: "There's the mowing."

Her father undid the paper, and found four half-crowns. "Annie," questioned her father, "where did this come from?"

"From the sewing," answered Annie, laughing delightedly at his surprise, as she escaped from his knee, and ran out of the room, but to delay a little longer the solution of the riddle.

"Wife," said John Linton, "it is impossible that Annie could earn all this by the sort of child's play girls call 'work;' and whom did she earn it from? I'm afraid there's something wrong."

And, to tell the truth, Annie Linton was practising a little disguise; nor had she given her father all the money she had earned. The sum originally was twelve shillings. This was all designed for her father alone; but a prior claim had come in the way. It was cold winter weather, and the children of the school brought the forms, in a sort of square, round Mrs. Roy's fire. Annie, who was a favorite of the mistress, always occupied a warm corner close to her own big chair. On the day in question, Mrs. Roy happened to be out of the room.

"I'll change seats with you, Jessie Wilson, if you're cold," said Annie, addressing a little girl; a very book-worm, who, clad in a threadbare, printed cotton gown, sat shivering over her lessons.

Jessie, thus invited, came a little nearer.

"You should put on a woolen frock like mine, and warm yourself well at your mother's fire before you come to school these winter days," said Annie, scrutinising the poverty-struck appearance of the girl.

"Mother says," replied Jessie, "that she'd rather do without a fire than my schooling, and she can't pay for both."

"Has your mother no fire at home this cold weather?" asked Annie, in amazement.

"No," said Jessie; "I wish I dared bring her with me here; it's warmer than at home. And I know mother is ill, though she won't tell me."

"Sit there," said Annie, placing Jessie in her warm corner, "and don't go out of school without me."

That afternoon the two girls went hand in hand to Jessie's door.

"Have you plenty to eat, if you've no fire?" asked Annie.

"This is the first day that mother was forced to send me to school without any breakfast," said Jessie, hanging down her head as if ashamed of the confession.

"Here," said Annie, after a slight pause, untwisting the paper in which were deposited her first earnings; "I won't go in with you, for your mother might not like to take it from a little girl like me; but (and she put two shillings into Jessie's hand) that is to buy you some thing to eat, and a fire; and if your mother can sew as well as I can," said Annie, with pardonable vanity, "I can tell her how to get plenty of money to pay for both."

No wonder Annie's riches increased; the first investment was a good one. Nevertheless, the concealing it from her parents she knew to be wrong; she feared they would disapprove; and she added to her little prayer at night after the usual ending of "God bless father and mother, and forgive me for keeping secret that I helped Jessie Wilson."

Could the Recording Angel carry up a purer prayer to Heaven?

Of course, Mr. and Mrs. Linton very soon discovered that Mr. Seamwell, of the "Ready-Made Linen Warehouse," was the grand source of Annie's wealth. He said there was no one who could work like her, and that he would give her eighteen pence each for the finest description of shirt-making. This was no great payment for Annie's exquisite stitching, and, thirty years ago, it would have brought her three-and-sixpence a shirt. But Annie is of the present, not of the past; and as she could complete a shirt a day, her fingers flying swifter than a weaver's shuttle, she earned nine shillings a week.

"Good wife," said Mr. Linton, "we are not so poor but that we can maintain our daughter till she's twenty, and by that time, at the present rate of her earnings, she will have a little fortune in the bank."

But this little fortune amassed but slowly, for Annie seldom had nine shillings to put by at the end of the week—times were other "Jessie Wilsons" who required food and fire.

Had Annie been a poet, she would assuredly have written, not the song, but a song of a shirt; for once when she was questioned as to the dull monotony of her work: "Dull? Delightful!" said Annie, in advocacy of her calling. "Why, with this rare linen and fine thread, my stitches seem like stringing little pearls along the wristbands and collar!"

What an anti-song of the shirt might not Annie have written!

Annie's eighteenth birthday was celebrated by a tea-party to all the seamstresses of Mr. Seamwell's establishment, where she was now forewoman. Besides being a cheerful, kind-hearted little creature, beloved by every body; it was a compliment, Mr. Seamwell said, she well deserved—her admirable superintendence of the department allotted her having increased his business tenfold.

Some time after, there was a greater day of rejoicing in the firm of Seamwell & Co. The father had taken his son as a partner, and the son took a partner for life—the indefatigable little seamstress, Annie Linton. There never was a thinner bridal. Annie—herself having risen from the ranks—had a present for every workwoman. Indeed, it was a day of presents; for, on that very morning, and in time to be worn at the wedding, a shawl arrived for Annie all the way from India—an Indian shawl that a duchess would have envied! Upon it was pinned a paper, on which was written:

"Wear this for the sake of one who is now rich and happy; but who can never forget the service you rendered to the poor school-girl—

Jessie Wilson.

"Annie," said young Seamwell, after the marriage, "I fell in love with you when you were a child, and came to our shop for your first sewing. I also happened to be passing when you gave part of your first earnings to Jessie Wilson. I was a boy then; but I said to myself: 'If I were a man, I'd marry Annie Linton; not because she's so pretty'"—here Annie blushed most becomingly—"'not because she's so industrious; but because she's so kind-hearted.'"

Curious Eastern Tale.

There lived in Bagdad a young man of such extreme beauty that he was surnamed "The Brilliant." He had also the gift of poesy. Omeen-el-Benine, the wife of the Caliph, El-Onlid-ben-Abd-el-Malik, was so much in love with this young man that she fell sick. She introduced him into her apartment every day, and, when she feared to be disturbed by the approach of any one, she concealed her lover in a coffer. Such was their daily course.

One day the Caliph received a present of a collar of gold garnished with precious stones, with which he was greatly pleased. "I will reserve this for my wife," said he, and immediately he ordered one of his eunuchs to carry the collar to the Sultana.

The slave, in going to execute his commission, found the house door open. "What does this mean?" inquired he of himself. So saying, he advanced stealthily along toward the chamber, whence proceeded sounds of laughter, and he met the eyes of the young man, who started end became as pale as death.

With a bound, the Sultana pushed him into the coffer; but the slave had seen all.

He presented the collar, and said: "Madam, I must demand of you a stone from this jewel."

Indignant at such boldness, she exclaimed: "Rude creature, depart from my presence!"

The enraged slave went straight to his master and said: "My Lord, today I found a man in conversation with your wife in such a chamber. At my approach the Sultana hid him in precisely such a coffer." He then described the piece of furniture.

The Caliph was infuriated against the servant for bringing him such a message. "Thou base, miscreant dog!" he exclaimed, and ordered his head to be cut off.

When the execution was over, the Caliph rose, put on his slippers, and went to his wife's apartments. She was occupied in arranging a head-dress. He entered and sat facing her upon the coffer indicated by the slave. He said to her in the course of conversation: "How happens it that you have such a liking for this chamber?"

"Because my apparel is here," she replied.

"May I dare to hope that you will favor me with one of the coffers with which the chamber is furnished?"

"Take, my lord, whichever you please, with the exception of the one you are seated upon."

"This is precisely the one I prefer," replied the Caliph; "you must let me have it."

After a moment's estnpor, the Sultana said to him: "Very well, it is yours."

At a signal from the Caliph, the blacks appeared. "Take this coffer into the Hall of Council, and wait for me."

While the slaves were bearing away the coffer, the countenance of the Sultana bore traces of confusion.

"Why dost thou change countenance?" inquired El-Onlid; "Perhaps this coffer may contain thy heart."

"Pardon me, my lord, it contains nothing such. If I appear a little moved, it is because I have been taken suddenly ill."

"God will cure thee," observed the Caliph, retiring;

When he reached the Hall of Audience, he found the coffer npon the floor. "Raise the carpet," he said to his slaves, "and dig a hole the size of a man."

The pit being dug, he made a sign to place the coffer on the brink. Then planting his foot upon the piece of furnitnre, he pronounced the following words: "Newe has come to me; if it is true, thy vestment shall be thy shrond, this box shall be thy bier, and it is God that immolates thee." If this newe is false, I inter a coffer, and lose only a few planks." He then pushed the box, which descended rapidly to the bottom of the pit. The blacks filled up the grave and replaced the carpet.

The Caliph then returned to his spouse, and both deported themselves as if nothing had happened between them. Peace united their existence until the day of death. [London Court Journal.

The Lancaster Gun—How It Differs from the Ordinary Gun—Its Merits and Defects.

Among our extracts from English papers in a recent issue, our readers may have observed a paragraph upon the subject of this new arm, and as a public writer has shown so much ignorance while professing to instruct others, it has occurred to us that a brief description of this powerful instrument of death and the principle of its construction would be acceptable to many.

The writer in question commences by saying: "The object of boring the Lancaster gun into an ellipsis is to prevent the ball taking a rotary motion," and thereupon he raises the question whether the elliptical ball, in passing through an ellipticai bore, being prevented from taking a rotary motion, has not a dangerous tendency to burst the gun. So far from his premises being correct, the very reverse is the true state of the case. The elliptical bore is intended to give the ball a rotary motion, for in this motion of the ball upon its own axis consiste the superiority of this gun over the ordinary cannon. It is a well-known fact that it is impossible to cast balls or bullets in such a way that one side will not be heavier than the other, and it is also well-known that this circumstance deflects the projectile from its right line.

With small arms the difficulty is overcome by the groove in the rifle barrel, which, being spiral, acts upon the soft substance of the loaden bullet, and gives it a rotary motion before leaving the muzzle of the rifle, which continues until the ball is stopped. By this means the heavy side is alternately turned in all directions, so that any tendency in one direction is immediately counterbalanced by a revolution of the bullet, which changes the position of the heavy side, and the result is that the ball flies in a direct line. Now, however well this plan may answer for small arms and loaden balls, the groove is impracticable for cannon and cast-iron balls, and it has long been a problem to discover some means of making rifled cannon.

The Lancaster gun professes to have accomplished this by means of an elliptical bore, out of which is to be thrown an elliptical projectile, either shot or shell. Without plates we may not be able to make all our readers understand our explanations, but we hope most of them will do so. The gun is large, because it is at a long range that its great precision of aim tells best over the common gun, and its appearance is that of an ordinary large cannon, except that the month, instead of being circular, is elongated like an egg, having one axis longer than another. We will suppose that the mouth is the largest up and down—that is, that the longer axis vertical, so that the flattened ball fitting it would stand on its edge; but the bore winds gradually from the mouth to the breech of the gun, so that when the ball is driven home to the proper position when the gun is loaded, it will have turned 4 arouud, and will lie horizontally; that is, at right angles to the longer axis of the mouth of the gun, and on its side. When the gun is fired, the ball must make one revolution for every four lengths of the gun, and thereby counterbalance any imperfection in its shape which would otherwise deflect it. Several of these guns have burst. This is perhaps attributable to the fact that they are used at very long ranges, and were probably overloaded, although it is quite possible, and the fact probable, that forcing the ball to take a rotary motion would increase the resistance offered so much as to increase the risk of bursting. Experience will soon test the question. We may remark that the same principle has been applied to small arms, and a decided advantage is claimed for the Lancaster over the common rifle.

Newton invited a friend to dinner, and forgot it. The friend arrived, and found the philosopher in a fit of abstraction. Dinner was brought up for one. The friend, without disturbing Newton, sat down and dispatched it. Newton recovered from his reverie, looked at the empty dishes, and said, "Well, really, if it wasn't for the proof before my eyes, I could have sworn that I had not yet dined."

CHRISTMAS.

Chrismas has come again, inaugurating the holidays and making glad the hearts of many thousand people in different lands, of different religions, speaking divers languages and living under strange stars. The observance of the anniversary is not confined within geographical limits or bounded by the boundaries of any persuasion, but has its fitting honors wherever christianity and civilization are found. In England, in America, in Russia, in Greenland, among the islands that lie along the equator, and among villages that approach the poles—mankind combine to celebrate the day of Christ's birth.

Chrismas was originally of a strictly religious character and so observed. In the lapse of time, without losing altogether its primitive significance, the celebration has acquired a somewhat different character and reputation, and now introduces a period of gayety, good-will and general festivity. It witnesses the re-union of families, the meeting of friends who have been separated, a relaxation from the steady business of life, and a very pleasant and desirable domestic mirthfulness. This acquired character can be traced back a long time in English annals and in the contemporary history of other countries, and is fittingly described in the literatures of the different periods. The observances of this country have their origin in those of England. What they were there two hundred years ago is not badly pictured in these lines of George Withers, entitled "Merry Christmas":

So now is come our joyful'st feast
Let every man be jolly;
Each room with ivy leaves is drest
And every post with holly.
Though some churls at our mirth repine
Round your foreheads garlands twine;
Drown sorrow in a cup of wine
And let us all be merry.

Now all our neighbors' chimneys smoke
And Christmas blocks are burning;
Their ovens they with baked meats choke
And all their spits are turning.
Without the door let sorrow lie,
And if for cold it hap to die
We'll bury't in a Christmas pie
And every more be merry.

Now every lad is wondrous trim
And no man minds his labor.
Our lasses have provided them
A bag-pipe or a tabor.
Young men and maids, and girls and boys
Give life to one another's joys;
And you anon shall by their noise
Perceive that they are merry.

Rank misers now do sparing shun;
Their hall of music soundeth;
And dogs thence with whole shoulders run,
So all things there abounds.
The country folks themselves advance,
With fiddlers fresh from out of France;
And Jack shall pipe and Jill shall dance
And all the town be merry.

Ned Squash hath fetched his bands from pawn
And all his best apparel;
Brisk Nell hath bought a ruff of lawn
With droppings of the barrel.
And those that hardly all the year
Had bread to eat or rags to wear
Will have both clothes and dainty fare
And all this day be merry.

In connection with these verses, that very prettily describe the character of Christmas observances in that period of English history when Christmas was most largely kept, and paint better than any artist the rites of its celebration we may appropriately join the Christmas song of 1695.

Now, thrice welcome Christmas
Which brings us good cheer,
Mince pies and plum porridge
Good ale and strong beer;
With pig, goose and capon,
The best that can be—
So well doth the weather
And our stomachs agree.

Observe how the chimneys
Do smoke all about;
The cooks are providing
For dinner, no doubt;
But those on whose tables
No victuals appear,
O, may they keep Lent
All the rest of the year.

With holly and ivy
So green and so gay,
We deck up our houses
As fresh as the day.
With bays of rosemary
And laurel complete;
And every one now
Is a King in conceit.

SOME OF THE RESULTS.

A French chemist, M. Deville, has just succeeded in extracting silver from clay. A cotemporary, in speaking of Monsieur's experiments, says:

There being no reason to doubt the facts, our first impression is, that we are about to witness a revolution which will affect our commerce, our industry, our science, and our domestic economy. It is already known that some clays contain twenty-five per cent. of aluminum. Who, then, shall set a limit to its production? What a change! The chemist will henceforth have a metal out of which to make his pans, crucibles and capsules, all indestructible, and all cheap. The platinum pans used in certain manufactures cost £1000, or more. Platinum is exceedingly heavy, aluminum exceedingly light. The latter is, therefore, eminently useful as weights for chemists, who, for minute quantities, require a weight which shall neither be too small nor liable to rust. How accurate analyses will be when made in unalterable vessels, and tests may be pushed to the very refinement of delicacy! Then in the art culinary. No more tin or copper sauce pans; no more brass skillets; all our cooking utensils will be made of aluminum, from which will ensue a manifest improvement in public health, to say nothing of gratification to our palate. Decidedly, a new era seems to be opening for cooks and confectioners. And where will the "silver fork school" be, when the whole nation, from Cornwall to Caithness, is using silver forks? Will any one ever wish he had been born with silver slippers?

We might fill whole pages with motions as to the changes to be brought about in the industrial and decorative arts. In such a climate as ours, to have architectural ornaments, household articles, tools, and fifty other things, that "won't rust," will be an incalculable benefit; and who knows whether we may not see glittering roofs on our public buildings and temples without having to journey to the East? Then is silver to be superseded as a medium of exchange, and shall we have a coinage of aluminum? The occupation of counterfeiters will then be gone. Sir John Herschell, Master of the Mint, is already looking into the subject. Then, again, is there no danger of feverish excitement? Shall we not have an army of experimentalists setting to work on all sorts of earths? Will clay farms rise in the market? What are we to do for bricks? Will very fat churchyards fetch the highest prices? and shall we come to bequeath the mortal part of us to our poor relations for the sake of the aluminum it may contain?

Seriously; we believe that most important results will follow M. Deville's discovery; perhaps far beyond what can be predicted at present. It was just as much a problem, perhaps more so, when many of us were boys, to extract soda from sea-water; and now it is produced in thousands of tons. So, who shall say what is impossible in turning clay into metal? We all know that silver was not any thing accounted of in the days of Solomon; and whether such an argentiferous abundance is again to be realized remains to be seen.

MRS. SHERWOOD'S CHILDHOOD.—Lady Jane Grey speaks of the severities to which she was subjected by her noble parents. I had neither onffs, nor bobs, nor pinches; but I experienced what I thought was much worse. It was the fashion then for children to wear iron collars round the neck, with a backboard strapped over the shoulders; to one of these I was subjected from my sixth to my thirteenth year. It was put on in the morning, and seldom taken off till late in the evening; and I generally did all my lessons standing in stocks with this stiff collar around my neck. At the same time I had the plainest chair in my mother's presence. Yet I was a very happy child, and when relieved from my collar, I not unceldom manifested my delight by starting from our hall-door, and taking a run at least half a mile through the woods which adjoined our pleasure grounds. [Life of Mrs. Sherwood.

GHOSTS.—It is stated by travelers that the Arabs of Upper Egypt are not believers in what are called ghosts. They live habitually among tombs and sarcophagi, and when tents and other dwellings are not to be procured, actually choose the mummy-vaults for houses. In these they may frequently be seen stretched upon the ground in slumber by the side of a corpse, or walking through dust that was once animated, with all the coolness imaginable.

TO PREVENT METALS FROM RUSTING.—Melt together three parts of lard and one of resin powder. A very thin coating applied with a brush will preserve Russia iron stove and grates from rusting during summer, even in damp situations. For this purpose, a portion of black lead may be mixed with the lard. The effect is equally good on brass, copper, steel, etc. The same compound forms an excellent water-proof paste for leather. Boots, when treated with it, will thereafter take the usual polish when blacked, and the solce may be saturated with it without soiling the floor, as it does not rub off.

AFTER DINNER ENJOYMENT OF A ROMAN EMPEROR.—Caligula must have been a most unpleasant person to dine with. He entertained himself and his guests with the sight of men tortured on the rack, and he got up private executions on these occasions to enliven the scene. We read of Her Majesty's concerts, and how "Mrs. Anderson" presided at the piano. But the Roman only heard of their Emperors killing in fun, to frighten his friends with, and saw his divinity's private headsman, Niger Darbaine, performed as usual with his well-known dexterity. His frolics were of a really frightful character. It was after a banquet, when the capital jest of slaying had failed to make him merry as usual, that he rushed to the sacrificial altar, attired in the dress of a victim-killer—that is, with a linen apron for his sole costume. He selected a mallet as though he were about to slay the appointed victim, but he turned suddenly round on the resident official, and butchered him instead. And thereat, all who had witnessed the frolicsome deed of their master, declared that "Fere Jove, 'twas a mors capitol joke than the last!"

His answer to the councils who ventured to ask the cause of a sudden burst of laughter in which he indulged at a crowded feast is well known: "I laugh to think," said the amiable creature, "that with one wave of my hand I can sweep all your stupid heads off!" His method of loving was equally characteristic. He would swing his terrible arm round the fair neck he proposed to admire, and express his delight that he could cut it off when he pleased. There was a brilliant Greek: "I can not tell," said her imperial lover at a feast, "why is it that I am so fond of that girl. I'll have her put on the rack for a quarter of an hour, that she may be compelled to tell me the reason." Pine Beard was the mildest of Quaker gentlemen compared with this Caligula. A lady might as well have been wooed by a boa constrictor.

EXECUTION OF BEHEKIAH.—The New York Times has a full report of the particulars of the execution of Nicholas Behechan, the murderer of Mr. and Mrs. Wickham at Cathcogue, Long Island. We extract the following:

At eight minutes past 12 o'clock the doomed man grasped the hand of Father McCarthy, kissed it several times, and his last words were, "Oh, Lord, do have mercy on my soul, do! do! I feel sorry I transgressed the Fifth Commandment. Oh, Lord! Oh, Lord!"

The Fifth Commandment in the Catholic Bible reads thus: Thou shalt not kill.

At ten minutes after 12 o'clock the Priest signified to the Sheriff that "all was ready," and the officer of the law immediately severed the rope with a heavy blow of the broad-axe; the weights fell to the ground, and the wretched man was suddenly elevated into the air. The jerk was not of sufficient force to dislocate his neck, consequently he struggled very hard, and his life was prolonged in great suffering.

Physicians are of the opinion, in regard to the courage of Beheehan, that if he had been permitted to stand three minutes longer under the gallows, with the rope around his neck, he would have fallen to the ground a corpse, as his great fright would have produced death.

The body was permitted to hang forty minutes.

A REVOLUTIONARY RELIC.—We were yesterday shown by Mr. Jesse P. Allbright, of this city, a revolutionary relic now in his possession, being a powder-horn taken from a British Artilleryman at the battle of Germantown by his father, Mr. John Allbright, a soldier in the Revolution. It is ingeniously ornamented, apparently having been ex deus by its original owner with a knife. On one side is a correct representation of dragoons in the act of charging upon the artillery; on the reverse side a column of infantry also making a charge. Je coetaine the following inscription: "John Churchel, Crewnpoint, Nov. 6, 1759;" as also the following couplet:

"Men of might they take delight
In sword or gun that they may fight."

The intermediate spaces contain various emblems of war. It is a curiously wrought relic of the olden time, and one highly prized by its present possessor. [Baltimore Sun.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE—Where it was Written.—We find the following in the Philadelphia Ledger of the 28th:

It has been stated that the Declaration of Independence was written by Thomas Jefferson, in the old building at Fifth and Minor streets, known as Jefferson Wigwam, recently destroyed by fire. Other places have also been named, but the following letter from Mr. Jefferson to Dr. Mease, of this city, would indicate that that instrument was written in the building, still standing, at the south-west corner of Seventh and Market streets:

MONTICELLO, Sept. 10, 1825.—Dear Sir: It is not for me to estimate the importance of the circumstances concerning which your letter of the 8th makes inquiry. They prova, even in their minutiaeness, the sacred attachment of our fellow-citizens to the event of which the paper of July 4, 1776, was but the declaration, the genuine effusion of the soul of our country at that time. Small things may, perhaps, like the rules of Saints, help to nonrish our devotion to this holy bond of our Union, and keep it longer alive and warm in our affections. This effect may give importance to circumstances, however small. At the time of writing that instrument, I lodged in the house of a Mr. Graff, a new brick house, three stories high, of which I rented the second floor, consisting of a parlor and bed-room, ready furnished. In that parlor I wrote habitually, and in it wrote the paper particularly. So far, I state from written proofs in my possession. The proprietor, Graff, was a young man, son of a German, and then newly married. I think he was a brick-layer, and that his house was on the south side of Market street, probably between Seventh and Eighth streets, and if not the only house on that part of the street, I am sure there were few others near it. I have some idea that it was a corner house, but no other recollections throwing any light on the question are worth communication. I will, therefore, only add assurance of my great respect and esteem. TH. JEFFERSON.

Dr. JAMES MEASE, Philadelphia.

FIVE NEGRO CHILDREN BURNED TO DEATH.—Five little negroes, belonging to the editor of this paper, were burned to death in the kitchen on his plantation, in Richmond county, on Thursday evening of last week; and the occurrence was the more afflicting to him because, by proper precaution, it might have been prevented. He had left strict injunctions that the children should not, under any circumstances, be suffered to remain a single moment without some person with them, able to take care of them; in case of fire or other emergency. In disregard of his instructions, the nurse who had charge of them was sent off in the evening, together with a small boy, while the hands were at a distance at work, to drive up the cattle, leaving six children under five years of age in the house. The smoke was soon discovered; but before relief could be brought the roof of the house fell in, consuming One of the children! The eldest had made his escape. [Wilmington (N. C.) Argus, 6th.

AYER'S
FOR THE CURE OF
COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

Of all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints, nothing has ever been found which could compare in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions. We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.

The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1847; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Art in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the CHERRY PECTORAL, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.

Read the following opinion, founded on the long experience of the eminent Physician of the Port and City of ST. JOHNS, May 8, 1851.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.

I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how a better remedy can be made for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.

J. J. DURTON, M. D., F. R. S.

SUNDARY, Jan. 24, 1851.

DR. AYER: In the month of July last, I was attacked by a violent diarrhœa, in the mines of California. I returned to San Francisco, in hope of receiving benefit from a change of air and diet. My diarrhœa ceased, but was followed by a severe cough, and much soreness. I finally started for home, but received no benefit from the voyage. My cough continued to grow worse, and when I arrived in New York, I was at once marked by my acquaintances as a victim of consumption. I must confess that I saw no sufficient reason to doubt what my friends all believed. At this time I commenced taking your truly invaluable medicine, with little expectation of deriving any benefit from its use. You would not receive these lines did I not regard it my duty to state to the afflicted, through you, that my health, in the space of eight months, is fully restored. I attribute it to the use of your CHERRY PECTORAL.

Yours truly,

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty, to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Dragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in enlarging and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

D. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug6—0m26
